The King of France conſidering the detriment that redounded to his Country by continual Diſſentions with England, ſent over an Embaſſage[b] about Chriſtmas to make Propoſals of a perpetual Peace between the two Nations. King Richard having taken advice with his Council about it, was much encouraged to compliance, and diſmiſſed them with Promiſes of a ſpeedy Treaty about it. Soon after their departure, the King by the like advice put out a Proclamation, purſuant to the Statute of Proviſors made the laſt Parliament, and had it publiſh'd in London, commanding all beneficed Clergymen, who were Engliſh-Men by Birth, and then reſided in the Court of Rome, to return home within a Year, under the Penalty of forfeiting their Benefices; and if they were not beneficed, under certain other Puniſhments therein mentioned. This Proclamation ſtartled the Pope[c], and made him think that now the Engliſh began to be in earneſt, and the Laws made againſt his profit would lie no longer dormant, as they had formerly done. Whereupon the Pope in anger ſends his Nuncio over to the King, requiring him to aboliſh and repeal the ſaid Statutes and Proclamation, ſo far as they tended to the derogation of the Church's Liberties; otherwiſe declaring, that he thought himſelf in Conſcience obliged to proceed againſt all ſuch Perſons as had been inſtrumental in making thoſe Laws according to the ſeverity of the Canons. Moreover he inſinuated to the King, that the late Propoſitions of Peace made by the French King were only intended to farther a deſign which he had contrived with the Antipope to make himſelf Emperor, and his Brothers the Dukes of Turin and Anjou, the one King of Tuſcany and Lombardy, and the other King of Sicily; which Plot, if he could lull England aſleep with hopes of a Peace till he he could effect, he ſhould then be in a capacity of making himſelf abſolute Maſter of all; which it concern'd England moſt to prevent, and therefore beſought him to aſſiſt his Maſter againſt the French King, if he invaded Italy as he threaten'd to do. The King ſeem'd to give a favourable Ear to the Nuncio's words, and having communicated them to his Council, appointed him to ſtay till the Parliament met, which ſhould be about Michaelmas, and then he ſhould receive a full anſwer to all his Demands.

A. D. 1391.

The Pope ſends a Nuncio into England.

The Duke of Gloceſter went this Spring into Pruſſia, to the no ſmall trouble of the People. He was always accounted the People's Darling, but it could not be imagined how much he had of the People's Affections before this Voyage; for his departure was as heavily taken as if the Sun had fallen from the Firmament, or the Happineſs of the Nation were quite vaniſh'd with him. His Voyage was very rough and dangerous, as if Providence had been as much againſt it as the People; for he was carry'd by a violent Tempeſt upon the Coaſts of Norway and Denmark, in his return, and at laſt with much difficulty arrived at Tinmouth, where he tarry'd a ſhort time to refreſh himſelf, and then return'd to his Manſion-houſe at Pleſhey, receiving infinite Expreſſions of Joy for his ſafe arrival all along his Journey thither[d].

The Duke of Gloceſter's Voyage into Pruſſia.

This Summer many great Calamities afflicted the Nation, which ſeem'd to be preſaged by ſome ſtrange Clouds which cover'd the Sun for ſix weeks together, and much darken'd the Light of it. They firſt appear'd red and bloody, and remain'd all day upon the face of it; but at length they turn'd black, and remov'd at noon. Immediately upon the ceaſing of this Prodigy follow'd both Peſtilence and Famine. The Plague break out in ſeveral parts of the Nation, but raged moſt in Norfolk, and about York. In that City there are ſaid to have dy'd ten thouſand, and in Norfolk a greater number. The Famine afflicted London, and the adjoyning Countries chiefly, which were not ſo deeply infected with the Plague, but laboured under ſo great a ſcarcity of Corn, that the Poor of the City were fed at the City charge, two thouſand Marks being taken out of the Orphan's Stock to buy Corn, and the twenty-four Aldermen being forced to joyn twenty Pounds a-peice for the ſame purpoſe, that the Wants of the Poor might not create them Troubles and Diſturbances. They ſold the Corn to ſuch as had Money at a moderate price, and to ſuch as lacked upon truſt to be paid the next Year; and ſo not only preſerved the

Reg. 15.

The Nation variouſly afflicted.

[a] This is Polydore Virgil's Account, but he is not to be believ'd; and beſides it appears by Froiſſard's Relation, that the Town was not taken. [b] The great Chamberlain of France. [c] Boniface the Ninth.

[d] The Account of the Duke of Gloceſter's Voyage to Pruſſia is taken from Holinſhead, but we do not find it in any authentick Author of thoſe times.

A. D. 1391. Peace of the City, but obtained a good Opinion of all Men for their Charity and Care of the common Good. The Harveſt brought an end of theſe Evils by its plenty; yet the unwholeſome Food, which many had liv'd upon in the time of the Famine, caſt them into Fluxes and other Diſtempers, whereof they dy'd in great multitudes. About this time Henry Hotſpur Earl of Northumberland, who had been ſome time Governour of Callis, was call'd home and made Warden of the Marches of Scotland, and Thomas Mowbrey Earl of Nottingham was made Lieutenant in his place.

Eighteenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The Parliament, according to the King's promiſe to the Pope's Nuncio, met on the day after the Feaſt of all All-Souls at Weſtminſter. Several things were enacted in this Seſſion to regulate Abuſes about the Meaſures of Corn, the Juriſdiction of the Admiral, Encroachments of the Lords of Mannours upon Freeholders, and other matters of like nature. But the Law which was thought of greateſt benefit at that time, and ſince hath done great ſervice to the Church, was the Act then made about Appropriations. It ſeems that before this Parliament it was lawful to appropriate the whole Fruits and Profits of any Benefice to a Religious Houſe, upon condition that the Abbot or Prior took care to have the Cure tolerably ſupply'd by his Monks or Fryars of the Houſe. This bred many Inconveniences. viz. in that Hoſpitality was neglected, the Churches and Rectories delapidated, and Miniſters were often wanting: Whereupon the Commons complain'd, and procur'd this Act, 'That in every Licenſe to 'be made hereafter in Chancery for the appro-'priation of any Church the Biſhop of the Dioceſs 'ſhould have power to reſerve a convenient Sum 'of Money out of the Fruits and Profits of it to 'ſuſtain the poor Pariſhioners of the ſaid Church, 'and to endow a perpetual Vicar ſufficiently to 'ſupply the Cure of Souls conſtantly. This Act was the original of moſt of our Vicarages, which tho' they are a contemptible maintenance for the Clergy, eſpecially ſince the Obventions of the Altar are removed, yet have proved a very great ſupport to the Church, the pooreſt Livings often producing the moſt painful and laborious Miniſters. So that the Nation hath a great Reaſon to applaud this Act, becauſe our Governours ever ſince have been ſo negligent in providing a better; for had we not had this, 'tis to be feared the Church would have had no proviſion at all in abundance of places where Vicarages now are.

The Pope's Nuncio anſwer'd by Parliament.

The Pope's Complaint againſt the Statute of Proviſors was preferr'd to the Lords and Commons, and the King and Duke of Lancaſter laboured all they could to have it repealed; but by all their Intereſt and Interceſſion could not obtain it, the Proviſions of the Pope being accounted an intolerable grievance to the Nation, yet by much Importunity it was allow'd, that the King by his Proclamation ſhould have power to diſpence with the Execution of the Statute till the next Parliament; by which Conceſſion, tho' the Pope granted not ſo much as he deſired, yet he had his ends, it being not very material whether the Lion be dead or no, if his Claws be cut off, and his Teeth knock'd out; for 'tis all one for a Law not to be at all, and not be executed. This Parliament granted the King a tenth from the Clergy, and a fifteenth from the Laity to ſupport the Charges of the Duke of Lancaſter, who was in the Lent following to go over to Amiens to treat of a final Peace with the King of France in perſon; and 'twas thought neceſſary that he ſhould be attended with a princely Equipage for the Honour of the Nation, and in reſpect to the King. And becauſe an Invaſion was fear'd from Scotland, therefore another tenth and fifteenth was granted, upon condition that it ſhould not be gather'd, unleſs the Scots were ſo troubleſome that an Expedition againſt them were judged neceſſary. And then the Parliament was diſſolv'd, and ſent home.

A. D. 1391.

1392. The King and Queen, with a great Concourſe of the Biſhops, Nobles and Ladies, kept their Chriſtmas at Langley with mighty Magnificence and Splendour. On Chriſtmas-day a large Dolphin of ten Foot long, and of a great bigneſs, was taken about London-Bridge; his coming ſo far up to land-ward was look'd upon as a Preſſage of that tempeſtuous and ſtormy Weather which follow'd in a few days. Soon after Chriſtmas the Duke of Lancaſter, with the Biſhop of Durham [a], and ſeveral others of the Nobility, having with them a train of a thouſand Horſemen, ſet forward towards France, to the place of Treaty at Amiens. The King of France having heard a great Character of him for his Wiſdom and Prudence (and indeed he was one of the wiſeſt and greateſt Peers of thoſe days) made as magnificent Preparations for his Reception, as if he had been the greateſt Emperor in the World, and met him himſelf at Amiens, with his Brother the Duke of Touraine, and his Uncles the Dukes of Berry, Bourbon, and Burgoigne, and many other Peers of France. The Charges of the Engliſh Ambaſſadors and their Retinue was born by the French King from their coming from Callis till they return'd thither again. At the Treaty divers Propoſitions for Peace were made on each ſide, but both Parties were ſo cautious to ſettle an advantagious Peace to themſelves, eſpecially ſince it was to continue ſo long by agreement, that nothing was concluded farther, than that the Truce which was then on Foot, and to end at Midſummer, ſhould continue another Year, and in the mean time more effectual Counſels ſhould be taken at the meeting of the next Parliament for the concluſion of the intended Peace; and ſo the Duke of Lancaſter and his Retinue return'd home again. In the abſence of the Duke, the King having expended his Treaſure for this Embaſſy, was in want of Money, and ſent to the Citizens of London to borrow of them One (or, as others ſay, Ten) thouſand Pounds. The Londoners, unmindful of their Duty to their Prince, flatly deny'd to anſwer his Requeſt themſelves; and when they underſtood that an Italian Lombard, or Banker, had undertaken to furniſh the King with the deſired Sum, they beat and abuſed him ſo groſly that he was in danger of Death. The King was ſo diſpleas'd with this inſolent and rude anſwer, that he propounded it to his Council, and deſired their Advice how he ſhould deal with them, and was encouraged to repreſs their diſloyal and impudent Behaviour with Severity and Arms. But the King himſelf conſidering that the Denial it ſelf was lawful (for 'twas not reaſonable for him to force their Eſtates from them) tho' the manner of doing it was very unbecoming Subjects, wiſely wav'd his Reſentments till a fitter opportunity ſhould offer it ſelf to retaliate their Unkindneſs more deſervedly upon them, which his watchful Eye ſoon found out.

Duke of Lancaſter went to Amiens to make a Peace with France.

Londoners refuſe to lend the King Money.

Soon after the Duke of Lancaſter's arrival in England, the King call'd a great Council at Stamford, like a Parliament, for the King ſummon'd

A great Council at Stamford call'd by the King.

[a] Froiſſard, who was about that time in England, writes, That the Duke of York was joyn'd in this Commiſſion with the Duke of Lancaſter, and not the Biſhop of Durham, as Walſingham relates; the former Account is moſt probable, conſidering the high Quality of thoſe they were to treat with.

ſome

A. D. 1392.

ſome of the chief Men for Wiſdom and Experience in moſt of the Towns of England, to conſult about the Peace to be concluded with France, or reſolve upon a War as ſoon as the current Truce was expired. The Duke of Lancaſter put the King upon this Determination, becauſe the King of France had engag'd him to haſten the Peace, that he might reſtore Leo King of Armenia, and ſubdue the other Barbarians, who were troubleſome to Chriſtendom. This Council had long and hot Debates among themſelves about the Expediency and Conditions of the Peace propounded, but came to no Reſolution; and ſo much the rather, becauſe at that time the Duke of Gelderland, the King's Coſin, a valiant and ſtout Prince, came over; and adviſed the King to make no Agreement of Peace with the King of France, but upon ſuch Conditions as were both advantageous and honourable to himſelf and Realm; promiſing him an Aſſiſtance of a conſiderable Body of Men, if he had occaſion to make War either againſt the French or Scots. This Offer made the King, and whole Aſſembly, more indifferent to the Peace, and more reſolute to obtain good Conditions if it went on.

Reg. 16. A great Tumult in the City, and the Biſhop of Salisbury's Palace aſſaulted.

While theſe things were tranſacting for the publick Good, an unhappy Accident fell out at London; which from an inconſiderable beginning proceeded ſo far, as to make the Citizens as much ſtand in need of the King's Favour, as he did a little before of their Money. The Occaſion was this: A Baker's Man carrying a Basket of Bread thro' Fleet-ſtreet to his Maſter's Cuſtomers, as he paſs'd by the Biſhop of Salisbury's Palace, had a Loaf taken out of his Basket by one Walter Roman the Biſhop's Servant [a]. The Baker concern'd at the Loſs, endeavour'd to take it from the Man by force, but was worſted by the Servant, and wounded in the Scuffle. The People of the Street knowing that the Baker had received the Wrong, as well as the Abuſe, gather'd together to apprehend the Biſhop's Servant, and have him puniſhed for the Breach of the Peace; but his Fellow Servants ſeeing him in danger, got him into the Palace, and ſecur'd him againſt them. The People without, being enrag'd more by this Reſcue, firſt peaceably, by the Conſtable, demanded the Servant that had thus wronged the Baker's Man; but they denying to reſign him, the unruly Rabble, who loved not the Biſhop, nor much feared him, tho' at that time Lord Treaſurer, began to be very outrageous, endeavouring to force open the Gates, and becauſe they had Reſiſtance that they could not, threaten'd to fire them. The Mayor, Sheriffs, and Aldermen, had Information of this Tumult, and with all Care and Speed ſought to repreſs it; but the Commons were grown ſo numerous, and ſo juſtly provok'd, that neither Force nor Perſuaſions would prevail a long time: But at laſt, by much Intreaty, they appeaſed them, and ſent them quietly home. The Biſhop himſelf was then with the King at Windſor, and ſoon receiv'd an Account of his Servants about this Tumult; which that it might not ſeem foul on their ſide, repreſented the Citizens as ſpitefully as they could. [b] The Biſhop, who hated them in general, becauſe they were commonly reputed Favourers of Wickliffe, and ſo Enemies to the Church, entertain'd the Relation with much Paſſion; and having acquainted Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of York, and then Lord Chancellor, with it, immediately preferred a grievous Complaint of the City to the King, as if the Tumult had been encourag'd by the Heads of it, and was a malicious Out-rage not only againſt the Church but State, he being both Treaſurer and Biſhop. The King, who kept his former Diſpleaſure in his Breaſt, needed no Inſtigations upon ſo good an Occaſion; but being farther incens'd by the Aggravations they made uſe of, was moſt furiouſly enrag'd and threaten'd to raze the City: But his Heat being allay'd by the Mediation of ſome of the Nobility, he ſent for the Mayor, Sheriffs, and other chief Citizens to Court [c], and objected many Crimes and Diſorders againſt them. They made a modeſt and plain Defence, but nothing would be accepted as ſufficient; wherefore the Mayor was impriſon'd at Windſor, and the reſt of them ſent to other Goals, and all the Liberties and Privileges of the City ſeized into his own hands. The Authority of the Mayor was wholly removed, and the King put in a Governour under the Name of the Warden of the City. This Office was firſt conferred on Sir Edward Darlingrig, or as others ſay, Belerigge, on June 21. but he being thought to be too great a Friend to the Citizens, was in leſs than a Fortnight removed, and Sir Baldwin Radington placed in his room. He was a very prudent Man, and carry'd himſelf with ſuch Auſterity and Care, that he pleaſed both the King and City, and gave them ſome hopes, that by their contented Obedience to him and Submiſſion to the King, they might in a little time obtain his Favour again. The Citizens, in this Condition, were very much diſcontented, and made humble Suit by the Queen, the Duke of Gloceſter, the Biſhop of London, and other noble Perſonages, to the King to be reſtored again to their ancient Liberties and Immunities. Who ſo far prevailed at length with him by the Remembrance of their former good Services and rich Preſents, that he ſent for their Charter, and other Grants of Liberties to their City, which he cauſed to be diligently peruſed; and allowing ſome, and cancelling others, reſtored the City again to their ancient State and Favour, excepting their Government by a Mayor, which they could not obtain, till at ſeveral times they preſented the King with two thouſand Marks of Gold, and ten thouſand Pounds in Silver: So that in the end, the Denial of lending ten thouſand Pounds [d] coſt them above as much more, and that Favour which they might have gotten by mere Compliance, they were forced to buy at a dear rate, and glad they could ſo attain it. This Reconciliation being finiſh'd, the Mayor, and Sheriffs, were choſen again after their uſual manner, and the Terms which had been removed from Weſtminſter to York, were again reſtored. The Biſhop of London, who had a principal Intereſt in making this Peace, was much honoured by the Citizens all his Life for it; and after his Death the Mayor, Aldermen, and many chief Citizens, according to their Companies, went nine times a Year in a ſolemn Proceſſion to Weſtminſter, where he lay bury'd, to pray for his Soul and the Souls of all Chriſtians, as a grateful return of his Kindneſs to them.

The King inenſed againſt the City, ſeized on their Charter, and took away their Liberties.

The City reforced to their ancient Privileges.

The Iriſh about this time revolted from their Subjection, and the Duke of Gloceſter being firſt made Duke of Ireland, was furniſh'd with Money to raiſe an Army for an Expedition thither; which he did with all imaginable Care, and had gotten a very great Force ready to paſs thither. His great Name had almoſt ſubdu'd all the Rebels,

The Duke of Gloceſter ready to go into Ireland is forbidden.

[a] In Caxton's Chronicle, 'tis one of the Biſhop of London's Servants. Sir John Hayward, in his Life of Henry IV. agrees with Holinſhead, that 'twas the Biſhop of Salisbury's [b] John Waltham. [c] Which was then at Nottingham. [d] Walſingham ſays it was but one.

A. D. 1392. bels, before his Paſſage over thither, for the chief Leaders of the Revolters had determin'd to ſubmit themſelves to him as ſoon as he arrived. But the Enemies of the Duke envying him the Honour of being ſo great a Benefactor to the common Good, prevail'd with the King ſo that he was countermanded, to the great Grief of the Commons, and Dammage of both Kingdoms[a].

1393. Nineteenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

A little after Chriſtmas the Parliament met at Winchester, and divers good Acts for the publick Benefit were made; as concerning Merchant-Strangers, Weights, and Meaſures; Freedom of Freeholders from Suit and Service in the Lords Courts, and the Acts to puniſh ſuch as obtained Pardons for Murther, Treaſons, and Rapes, repealed. But the Act of greateſt Fame, was the Statute called the Statute of Præmunire, made this Seſſion, by and in which it was enacted, 'That whereas the Biſhop of Rome, under a Pre-'tence of an abſolute Supremacy over the Church, 'took upon him to diſpoſe by his Mandates of 'moſt of the Biſhopricks, Abbacies, and other 'Eccleſiaſtical Benefices of Worth in England; 'and if the Biſhops did, upon the Legal Preſent-'ments of the Patrons of ſuch Benefices, inſti-'tute any Clerks to them, they were thereupon 'excommunicated by the Pope, to the great Da-'mage and unjuſt Wrong of the King's good Sub-'jects. And whereas the Biſhop of Rome took 'upon him to tranſlate and remove the ſaid Bi-'ſhops either out of the Realm, or from one See 'to another within the Realm, without the 'Knowledge of the King, or Conſent of the Bi-'ſhops themſelves. If any Perſons ſhall purchaſe, 'or cauſe to be purchaſed in the Court of Rome, 'any ſuch Tranſlations, Sentences of Excommu-'nication, Bulls, or other Inſtruments, to the 'Detriment of the King and his Realm, both 'they, and ſuch as bring, receive, notifie, or 'put them in Execution, ſhall be put out of the 'King's Protection, and their Lands and Tene-'ments, Goods and Chattels forfeited to the 'King, and their Bodies attach'd, if they can be 'found, Proceſs being made out againſt them 'by the Writ called Præmunire facias, as is or-'dain'd in other former Statutes of Proviſors. This Statute was badly reſented at Rome by the Pope, who was very peeviſh for the Statute of Mortmain, and other leſs ſevere Acts againſt his Incroachment made a little before; but this put him into ſuch a Fury, that he immediately ſent a Letter to the [b] Duke of Bedford, wherein he calls the Act it ſelf Execrabile Statutum, a curſed Statute, and the paſſing of it, Fœdum & turpe facinus, a wicked and baſe Act. In this Parliament the Laity gave the King no Tax, but the Clergy yielded him half a Tenth to furniſh out the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter for their Negotiation into France, to compleat the Peace between the two Kingdoms, by which they ſhewed their Duty to their Prince and Zeal for Peace.

The Duke of Ireland died at Lovain.

In the time of this Seſſion Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, and Duke of Ireland, died at Lovain in Brabant in great Anguiſh of Mind and Poverty, and the King conferred his Honour of Earl of Oxford upon his Uncle, the Lord Aubery de Vere. By the Death alſo of John Eures, Conſtable of Dover Caſtle, and Lord Steward of the King's Houſe, ſeveral Promotions were made at Court: For the Lord Thomas Peircy, who was Vice-Chamberlain, was raiſed to be the Lord High Steward; the Lord Thomas Beaumont was made Conſtable of Dover Caſtle and Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and the Lord William Scroop was made Vice-Chamberlain, and ſoon after brought the Regality of the Iſle of Man (for that Iſle was reputed a Kingdom, and the Lords of it are crown'd with a Crown of [c] Gold) of the Lord William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, but he only held it for his own Life.

A. D. 1393.

Another Treaty of Peace with France.

In the Spring of this Year the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, and the Earl of Darby, and ſeveral other Peers [d], paſſed over to Calais in order to finiſh the Treaty then in hand. They had a full Commiſſion to conclude a Peace both by Sea and Land between the Kingdoms of England and France and their Allies. The Commiſſioners for the King of France were the Dukes of Burgogne and Berry: The Place of Treaty was Balingham [e], where were ſtately Tents erected for their meeting. Here they met ſeveral Days together, and after their Commiſſions were looked into, Propoſals were laid down and argu'd on both ſides. The Frenchmen required to have Calais razed, but the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter anſwer'd, That they had no Power to treat in that Matter, and that they knew that their Maſter would hold it in Demeſn and Inheritance; and if they intended to conclude the Peace, they muſt not mention it any farther, which ſmart Reply put an end to that Demand. Then the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter inſiſted, That the Countries on that ſide, which had of late been either in the Poſſeſſion of King Edward III. or King Richard their Maſter, ſhould be reſtored, and the Florens which were left unpaid by reaſon of the War, ſhould now be paid; which the Engliſh Lawyers proved to be agreeable to Reaſon and Equity. But the Frenchmen argu'd much againſt it, and would by no means yield to neither: So that their Debates were adjourned for nine Days, that the Kings on both ſides might be acquainted with what they had done. The Duke of Gloceſter, who was for no Peace with France, but upon very good Terms; for which Reaſon the People deſired that he might be a Commiſſioner, was very reſolute to have no Peace, unleſs the former Conditions were granted. But the French King, and Nobles, as well as King Richard and the Duke of Lancaſter, were very deſirous to bring it to an end, and ſo a Truce at their next meeting was made for four Years; and had not the King of France fallen ſuddenly into his old Diſeaſe of the Frenzy, it is thought a longer and firmer Peace had been concluded, tho' without the Conſent of the Duke of Gloceſter, who in his heart was wholly for War with France; which having brought ſo much advantage to the Nation formerly, was moſt deſir'd by the People, whom the Duke ſought to pleaſe above all things.

A. D. 1393. Reg. 17.

A Peace for four Years made with France.

Several calamitious Accidents befall the Nation.

After the Concluſion of this Truce, the King made Sir Thomas Peircy, the younger, Lord Warden of Bourdeaux and Aquitain, and ſent him thither: The Nation alſo ſuffer'd much by Tempeſts and exceſſive Rains. There were ſuch vio-

[a] Holinſhead, from whom our Author has taken this Event, ſays, the Duke of Gloceſter was created Duke of Ireland; but that is very much to be doubted, the rather, for that the Earl of Oxford, on whom King Richard had beſtowed that Title, was not then dead; and though he was attainted, yet King Richard lov'd him ſtill too well to give his Honour to his Enemy: Beſides, that Title was ſo odious, that the Duke of Gloceſter would hardly have accepted of it; and no good Author, except Holinſhead, has taken Notice of it.

[b] There was no Duke of Bedford at that time, the firſt that bore that Title was John Brother to Henry V. and after his Death Regent of France.

[c] Neither the Houſe of Mountacute, nor that of Stanly, were permitted to wear a Crown of Gold; the Regalia being only a Leaden Crown, and the Robes that belong to them as Peers of England.

[d] The Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of London.

[e] Leulingham between Calais and Bologne.

lent

A. D. 1393. lent Thunders and Lightnings in many parts, eſpecially about Cambridgeſhire, that many Houſes and Stacks of Corn (for the Harveſt was but juſt paſt) were beat down, and burnt by them. In other parts ſuch abundance of Rain fell, eſpecially about Bury in Suffolk, and New-Market, that the Floods carry'd away many Bridges and Houſes. The Peſtilence rag'd in Eſſex, and ſwept away great Multitudes. Other things happen'd alſo concurrent with theſe accidents. The Lord Roſs returning out of the Holy-land dy'd at Paphos. The Town of Chierburg, which was engaged to King Richard for the payment of two thouſand Marks [a] by the King of Navarr, was reſtored to the ſaid King upon the payment of the ſaid Sum. Three Scotch Gentlemen alſo challenged three Engliſh to fight at Juſts, viz. the Earl of Mar, the Lord Nottingham; Sir William Darrell the King of Scots Banner-bearer, Sir Peirce Courtney the King of England's Standard-bearer; and one Cockburn Eſq. Sir Nicholas Hawkirke In this Tryal of Manhood the Engliſh were Victors, for the Earl of Mar and Cockburn were unhorſed by their Opponents, the former being ſo bruiſed and wounded by the fall, that he dy'd in his return home; Darrell ran five Courſes, and was ſo equally match'd, that they neither were Victors.

1394. Twentieth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

A Parliament met at Weſtminſter a little after the Feaſt of St. Hilary, and after ſome things of common concern were enacted, the King growing weary of the Charge which he was at to maintain his Dominions in Ireland againſt the Rebellious Natives, deſired a Tax to enable him to make an Expedition into that Nation to reduce it by force; for as it now ſtood, 'twas an inſupportable Burthen to England, the King being yearly at thirty thouſand Pounds charge to preſerve the Dominion of that Iſland, which had brought formerly thirty thouſand Pounds a Year into his Treaſury. The Houſes yielded to his deſires, and the Clergy granted him a tenth if he went into Ireland, but half a tenth only if he went not. In this Parliament the Duke of Lancaſter accuſed the Earl of Arundel of encouraging and aſſiſting the Commons of Cheſter againſt him, lying in his Caſtle of Holt by Cheſter with a Body of Men, while the People under one Nicholas Clifton aſſaulted the Duke's Houſe. But the Earl of Arundel flatly deny'd that he had the leaſt Intention that way, and gave ſuch probable Reaſons in his own defence, that he was clear'd of any ſuch deſign, and by the mediation of certain great Perſons was perfectly reconcil'd to the Duke.

The King goes into Ireland.

The King immediately after the Diſſolution of this Parliament made a ſpeedy preparation for his Expedition into Ireland; but when he was almoſt ready his beloved Queen Ann dy'd at Shene near Richmond in Surry, which put a ſtop to his proceedings awhile; for as he was always fond of her while ſhe liv'd, ſo he was paſſionately griev'd for her when ſhe dy'd; of which he gave this memorable proof, 'That he curs'd the place of 'her Death, and ſo hated it ever after; that he 'would never come there, but commanded the 'Buildings to be demoliſhed. And indeed ſhe is ſaid to be a Princeſs of ſo great Worth both for Virtue and Piety, that the greateſt Love was but her due. In the blind Age ſhe liv'd in, ſhe enjoy'd Light, and could nor endure the implicit Devotion of the Romiſh Church. She had the Goſpels in Engliſh, and ſeveral of the beſt Expoſitors upon them. She favour'd Wickliffe's Doctrines, and had ſeveral of his Books, which after her Death being carry'd by her Maids into Bohemia, were a means of promoting the Reformation there. She was bury'd at Weſtminſter, and a Sermon preach'd at her Interment by Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of York, in which he commends her for her great pains in the ſtudy of Scripture, and reading Godly Books, in which, ſaid he, ſhe was more diligent than the Prelates themſelves, tho' their Office and Buſineſs required it. Her Funerals being celebrated, the King, tho' full of Sorrow, went on in his deſign, which had been put off for ſome Months; and having by Proclamation commanded all Iriſhmen to depart the Kingdom before the Nativity of our Lady, Sept. 8. about Michaelmas he ſet forward for Ireland, attended by the Duke of Glocester, Earls of March, Nottingham and Rutland, Thomas Lord Peircy, and divers others, his Army conſiſting of four thouſand Horſe, and three thouſand Foot. The Duke of Lancaſter was not with him, becauſe the King had a little before given the Dukedom of Aquitain to him and his Heirs, and ſent him with five hundred Men at Arms and a thouſand Archers to take poſſeſſion of it. The King landed at Waterford in the beginning of October, and encamped his Army [b] very warily, expecting a vigorous aſſault from the Enemy at firſt; but they perceiving themſelves too weak to oppoſe ſo ſtrong an Army in a pitcht Battle, did nothing againſt him but by ſurprize, falling ſuddenly upon ſome part of their Camp, or upon ſtraggling Forragers, and lurking in their boggy Woods and Mountains when they advanced againſt them; by which, tho' they ſav'd their Perſons, yet they left their Eſtates and Towns expoſed to the Mercy of the Engliſh; who ſo well uſed the advantage, that the Iriſh were forced to come in and ſubmit themſelves to the King to ſave their Eſtates. The chief of them were four Kings, viz. O-neal the Great, King of Meath, Brine King of Thomond, Arthur Macmur King of Lempſter, and Conbur King of Cheveno and Darp, whom he courteouſly entertain'd and kept with him, leſt they ſhould relapſe into their former diſobedience, if they return'd to their People again. He kept his Chriſtmas at Dublin, and at the end of that Feaſt held a Parliament there, calling all his Subjects to it, as well thoſe who had lately ſubmitted, as thoſe who had continu'd in their Loyalty, that by his impartial favour he might equally oblige them to Fidelity for the future.

A. D. 1394.

Ireland ſubdu'd.

A Parliament in Ireland.

1395. About the Feaſt of Epiphany, the Duke of York the King's Uncle, who was Lord-Warden of England, called a Parliament by the King's Order to provide him farther Supplies to carry on his Expedition, and the Duke of Glocester was ſent over to repreſent to the Parliament the ſtate of the King's Affairs, and deſire another Tax. There needed little Rhetorick to perſuade, when the Reaſon and Condition of things required it, and therefore they readily granted a tenth of the Clergy and a fifteenth of the Laity for the King's ſupply; yet humbly petitioning, that the Settlement of things in Ireland might be effected as ſoon as poſſible. Other matters were put off till the King's return, and ſo the Parliament was diſmiſſed without making any Acts of publick concern. Yet while it ſate, the Followers of Wickliffe, then call'd Lollards, being grown numerous among the common People, and having gotten ſome Friends in the Houſes, by which they were encouraged to attempt a Reformation of the Diſ-

Twenty firſt Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

Lollards endeavour a Reformation in Parliament.

Q. Ann dy'd.

Reg. 18.

[a] Froiſſard tells us it was ſixty thouſand Nobles.

[b] Conſiſting of thirty thouſand Men.

orders

A. D. 1395. orders of the Churchmen both in Doctrine and Manners, perferred ſeveral Concluſions to the Parliament in oppoſition to the preſent Orders and Tenets in the Church, not without ſome aſ*ſurances of ſucceſs.* They were twelve in number, and delivered in Words to this effect: 'I. That Pride, through the greatneſs of the 'Temporalties, daily increaſed in the Church, 'and Faith, Hope and Charity decayed. 2. That 'the preſent Prieſthood was not the Prieſthood 'of Chriſt's Inſtitution. 3. That the Cœlebacy 'of the Prieſts was the cauſe of Sodomy, Whore'dom, and other foul Sins. 4. That Tranſub'ſtantiation engaged Chriſtians in a brutiſh Ido'latry. 5. That Exorciſms and Conſecrations 'were not of divine Appointment, but magical 'Incantations. 6. That it was very unſeemly 'for Prelates to be Juſtices of Peace, and Cu'rates civil Officers. 7. That Prayers for the 'Dead were a bad motive of Alms-giving, '8. That Pilgrimages to Crucifixes, to our La'dy's Image, &c. were Idolatrous. 9. That 'Auricular Confeſſion makes Prieſts arrogant 'and proud, and is an encouragement of Sin. '10. That Manſlaughter and War for Temporal 'Gains, or Religion ſake, is unlawful. 11. That 'Womens Vows of Chaſtity produced much Sin. '12. That multitudes of Arts and Trades which 'were not neceſſary, were a means of beget'ting much Pride and Vanity among Chriſtians. Theſe Poſitions, which at the ſame time were fixed upon S. Paul's Church-doors, found a very favourable Reception in the Houſes, and had ſo great a Party for them, that the Prelates were afraid all their gainful Doctrines and Practices, which were levell'd at in them, would not be long tolerated if the King did but conſent to the Majority of the Members, as it was likely he would unleſs he could be otherwiſe engaged. This being the only way left, as they imagin'd, to ſupport their tottering Church, Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of York, and Robert Braybrooke Biſhop of London, ſent as was ſuppoſed by William Courtney, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Clergy, made a Voyage into Ireland to the King, to com*plain of the Inſolence and Prevalency of the Hereticks*, as they call'd them, and to beſeech him to engage his Power in the defence of the Church and Religion, which without his aſſiſtance was in great danger of being ruin'd. The King, who was always zealous for the Religion he had been train'd up in, gave much attention to the Biſhop's Importunities, and promiſing them his Protection, compoſed his Affairs in Ireland as faſt as he could, and return'd about Eaſter into England.

The King's Actions againſt the Lollards.

Soon after his arrival he began to look into the Grounds of the Biſhop's Complaint againſt the Lollards, and finding that ſome of his own Servants and Officers, viz. Sir [a] Richard Story, Sir Lewis Clifford, Sir Thomas Latimer, and Sir John Montacute, had been moſt forward to encourage and uphold them, he called them before him, and made them ſeverally ſware, that they would not from thence forward hold or maintain any ſuch erroneous Opinions; adding himſelf, that if they were found again to do it, they ſhould certainly die for it. Having thus laid a reſtraint and check upon the chief Abetters of the Hereticks, he proceeded to ſuppreſs them, by giving the Biſhops a Charge to execute their Offices diligently in their Dioceſſes, according to the Canon, to correct all Offenders, ſearch out and examine all Engliſh Books, root out all erroneous Teachers and Doctrines with all their endeavours, and to bring all the People into the Unity of the Catholick Faith. And that the Laity as well as Clergy might advance this holy Deſign, as he accounted it, he ſent out a Commiſſion into all and every Shire of the Kingdom, appointing certain Perſons zealous for the Church, to be Searchers out of the Lollards, their Favourers and Books, charging them to uſe their utmoſt diligence and care to find them; and when they have apprehended any, to commit them to the next Gaol till he ſhould give farther Orders concerning them. The King was the more zealous in this matter, becauſe Pope Boniface had by his Letters beſought him to aſſiſt the Biſhops in ſuppreſſing this Sect, and recommended it to him as a moſt meritorious Action; yet his Subjects did not ſhew as much Zeal in perſecuting them, as the King did to excite them to it. The Archbiſhop indeed was active, and began immediately a metropolitan Viſitation, in which he made a ſtrict ſearch for the Lollards and their Books, ſolemnly excommunicated all ſuch Perſons as maintained, or cauſed to be maintained, any of the Errors or Opinions of Mr. John Wickliffe at the Cathedral in Lincoln and Leiceſter-Abby, and made ſeveral to recant, and do penance for holding the ſaid Opinions at Oxford and other places. But we do not find that there were any Proſecutions of them by the Laity, nor ſeveral of the Biſhops; ſo that tho' the King had depriv'd them of his Protection, God may ſeem to have made their Enemies at peace with them.

The Archbiſhop viſits to ſuppreſs the Lollards.

This Spring the French King being in ſome doubts which of the Antipopes was to be acknowledged for the Head of the Church, called a General Council of all his moſt able Divines at Paris, and required their Deciſion of the Diſpute that was among the Chriſtian Princes about it. The Divines, after much and ſerious Debate, determined, That Pope Clement was lawfully choſen, and ought to be accepted as the Head of the Church; and confirmed this their Judgment by the Univerſity of Paris Seal. The King of France having ſo good an Authority for adhering to Clement, ſent a Copy of their Deciſion to King Richard, hoping to bring him over to acknowledge him; but King Richard would not ſubſcribe to their Reſolution till he had the Judgment of his own Divines upon it, of whom he ſummon'd immediately a Convocation of the ableſt and moſt learned at Oxford. Theſe, after mature Conſideration of the Arguments of the contrary Party, made a contrary Determination for Urban and his Succeſſors, and warranted their Judgment with the Univerſity-Seal; by which means the Breach in the Church was made more incurable than it was before, and the Schiſm much more juſtifiable.

Both the Antipopes confirm'd by National Councils in England and France.

This Summer the Daniſh Rovers much infeſted the Britiſh Seas, and did great miſchief on the Coaſts, plundering the Ships, and robbing the Sea-Towns. On the Coaſts of Norfolk they ſet upon certain Ships belonging to the Merchants of Norwich, and took them, their Cargo being valu'd at twenty thouſand Pounds. This Wrong ſo incenced the Inhabitants of thoſe parts, that they mann'd out ſome Ships to fight them; but after a ſharp Engagement were defeated, and many of them taken Priſoners, whom they re-

Reg. 19. Daniſh Rovers rob the Coaſts.

[a] Sir Richard Story and Sir Thomas Latimer were Members of Parliament, and deliver'd the Lollard's Addreſs to the Houſe of Commons.

deemed

A. D. 1395.

deemed at a dear rate; and so they returned home enriched by Ransoms, and laden with the plunder'd Goods of the English. William Courtney also Archbishop of Canterbury, purchased a Bull of the Pope to levy 4 d. per Pound upon all the Spiritual Promotions and Benefices within his Province; which tho' it was generally disliked and disgusted by the Clergy, yet was paid by most of them thro' Fear, the Prebendaries of Lincoln being only excepted, who looking upon it as an unreasonable Exaction, utterly deny'd to pay it, and appealed to the Pope; but the Archbishop's Death prevented the farther Progress of the Controversie, which would have proved much more chargeable to them had it continu'd. His Death was esteem'd no small Security for the Followers of Wickliffe, to whom he was a bitter Enemy. John Waltham also Bishop of Salisbury and Lord Treasurer died, and was by the King's Order buried in Westminster among the Kings, and Roger Walden Secretary of State, and Treasurer of Calis, was put in his place. In the latter end of this Year, the King out of the Love he still retained to the Duke of Ireland after his decease, had his Corps fetch'd from Brabant where it lay ignobly interred, and brought into England for a more honourable Burial. It was first embalmed, and richly adorned with Robes, a Chain of Gold about his Neck, and rich Rings on his Fingers; and being put in a Cypress Coffin, the King himself came to view his Body, and to shew his Affection to him, looked on his bare Face and touched him. His Body, after some time, was interred at Coln-Priory in Essex; the King himself, with the Countess of Oxford his Mother, several Bishops and Abbots attending his Corps thither. Very few, or none of the Nobility, would shew any Respect to his Reliques, for the Hatred they bore to him when he was alive; the Memory of the Person being detestible, whom they found so great an Enemy to the common Good, so long as he was in Power and Favour.

Archbishop Taxes the Clergy.

The Duke of Ireland's Body brought into England, and solemnly interr'd.

The Duke of Lancaster went into Aquitain, to take Possession of it.

The Duke of Lancaster being arriv'd in Aquitain, summon'd the Lords and chief Inhabitants of the great Towns, and declar'd to them the Gift of the King of England to him, that their Country was given to him and his Heirs for an Inheritance, and desir'd their peaceable Submission to him as their Supreme Lord. But they returned him answer, That their Country was inseparably united to the Crown of England, and would never submit to him otherwise than as the King of England's Lieutenant. The Duke insisted upon his Gift, but would use no force to compel them to Subjection, unless it were the more lasting ones of Kindness and Moderation; but they constantly stood upon it, that they had ever been govern'd by Kings, and could not be alienated from the Crown of England without a Violation of the King's Coronation Oath, and therefore would never submit to those Terms. At length an [a] Embassy was sent to the King about the Controversie, and tho' the Duke of Gloucester (more to keep his Brother out of the Nation, than out of Love to Justice or to his Brother's Interests) pressed the inviolable Nature of the King's Grant to his Brother; yet the Arguments of the People of Aquitain were so prevalent [b] with the King, that it was decreed, That the Country and Dutchy of Aquitain should always remain in the Demesn of the Crown of England, lest at length it should fall into the hand of some Stranger; but the Duke remain'd there governing as the King's Deputy, which Station he manag'd so well, that he gain'd the Love and willing Submission of all the People, being wise, liberal and moderate, so that lest the Grant which the King had so lately recall'd should be obtain'd against his Will, he sent for him home, and eased himself of that Jealousie; for tho' the Duke had been at great Expence to purchase their Favour, yet he chose rather to lose his Money than Loyalty, and so returned to the King at Langley, where he kept his Christmas. He stay'd a little at Court, and then retreated to his own House at Lincoln, where he marry'd the Lady Katharine Swinford, who had been his Concubine in his Wife's days, and born him two Sons Thomas and Henry, and one Daughter, whom he named Beaufort. This Match was much disliked by the Court Ladies, and the Dutchess of Glocester, Countesses of Warwick, Arundel and Darby, particularly disdain'd her; but her prudent Behaviour conquer'd their Passions, and she became very grateful to them in a short time.

A. D. 1395.

The Duke of Lancaster recalled from Aquitain.

1396.

While these things were transacting abroad, the King's Mind inclin'd to a second Marriage; and because he very much desir'd a firm Peace with France, he determin'd to chuse a Wife in that Court, which was the likeliest way to effect his design; and to that end sent an Embassy by the Archbishop of Dublin, the Earls of Rutland and Marshal, and the Lords Beaumont, Spencer and Clifford, to treat of a Marriage between himself and the Lady Isabel the French King's Daughter, who was then but eight Years old. The Proposition was very joyfully accepted, and tho' the Lady had been a little before promis'd to the Duke of Britain's Son in Marriage, yet because this was likely to prove a more advantageous and honourable Match, and would in all Probability settle that Peace, which was so earnestly desired by the French as well as English, an Expedient was resolv'd upon to dissolve the former Contract [c], and she was assured to the King of England. The Embassadors having been sumptuously entertain'd, and their Charges born by the French King, so long as they were in his Country, returned home with this favourable Answer and Promise, to the great Joy of their Master.

King Richard desired the Lady Isabel the French King's Daughter for a Wife.

Pope Boniface the IX. who was some time since got into the Papal Chair at Rome, after Pope Urban's decease, by which means the Schism was still upheld, having received Information of the Bishops of England, that the Followers of Wickliffe, notwithstanding all former Endeavours to suppress them, grew more numerous, and were spread almost into all parts of the Nation; the Bishops wanting Power to inflict what their Zeal was ready to do, wrote a second pathetical and earnest Letter to King Richard to assist the Bishops in the Cause of God,

The Pope's Letters to King Richard to suppress the Lollards, and repeal the the Præmunire Act.

[a] Froissard, Vol. IV. Chap. 61. writes, he was in the Court of England when these Deputies arrived from Aquitain, and that the reason of their desiring not to be alienated from the Crown was, because they depended chiefly upon it for Assistance and Protection.

[b] Henry Earl of Darby, the Duke of Lancaster's Son, was for granting the Petition of the Deputies of Aquitain, and annulling the Donation of that Dutchy to his Father.

[c] The Embassadors had no other Answer from the French King at this time, than that he thank'd his Brother of England for his good Will, but that the Lady was too young, and besides was affianc'd to the Duke of Bretagne, which former Agreement must be dissolv'd before another cou'd be treated of. They carry'd this Answer to their Master, and being sent with new Proposals, concluded the Treaty of Marriage and Truce.

A. D. 1396. as he call'd it, againſt the Heretical Teachers of his Realm; and to take care, that the late Statutes of Proviſors, called the Præmunire and Quare impedit Acts, ſhould be taken away and aboliſh'd. But we do not find, that this Letter produced any of the deſired Effects, the King being otherwiſe taken up with Matters of State, eſpecially about his Marriage. The Pope at the ſame time ſent over a Recovatory Bull to recall and confine all ſuch Monks again to their ſeveral Orders, as had formerly purchaſed the Privileges of being his Chaplains, either of himſelf, or of his Nuncios, by which they were exempted from the Rules of their Profeſſion. This was very ungrateful News to the Purchaſers, but very acceptable to the Fryars, who were confin'd to their Cloyſters: For they were forced with Shame and Loſs to return to their Monaſteries.

King Richard's Marriage, and the Peace between England and France ſettled.

The King having been encourag'd in his Propoſals of a Marriage in the French Court, was not ſluggiſh in the purſuit of it, but in the beginning of the Spring ſent the former Embaſſadors to France to ſettle certain Points of Agreement neceſſary for the Completion of it; of which one was, That a Truce for thirty Years ſhould be firmly enter'd into by both Nations. Theſe Articles were eaſily aſſented to by both ſides, and the Lady being Marry'd to the Earl Marſhal [a] in the Name of Richard King of England by Letters of Proxy, was from thenceforth called the Queen of England. Things being thus concluded in a manner, the King himſelf (now having enter'd the 20th Year of his Reign) took his Journey to Calais to perfect all things that had been aſſented to on both ſides: He had with him his two Uncles, the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, with a great number of Peers and Gentlemen. The Place appointed for the Treaty was between Guiſnes, a Town on the Borders of the Engliſh Pale, and Arde which was on the Confines of the French Territories, rich Pavilions being there erected for the two Kings: The King of France came down with the Dukes of Burgundy, Berry, Britain, and Burbon. About the end of October, the two Kings having firſt ſolemnly ſwore to obſerve the Laws of Amity at this Enterview, came to a Conference about the Peace; and having at ſeveral Meetings concluded and agreed on a Peace for thirty Years [b], upon certain Conditions, they ſolemnly ſwore upon the Evangeliſts to obſerve and keep it faithfully. Then the King of France, with his own hands, deliver'd his Daughter to King Richard, who thankfully received her, proteſting that he took her as the Token of a perpetual Peace between the two Nations; and then delivering her to the Dutcheſſes of Lancaſter [c] and Gloceſter, with other great Ladies, had her convey'd honourably to Calais. The two Kings remained certain days in their Pavilions feaſting each other, and then with ſolemn leave taken departed home. King Richard returned to Calais, where he ſtaid a few days, till he was marry'd by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury in St. Nicholas's Church, and then ſailed with his Queen to Dover, and ſo went forward to London. The Mayor and Aldermen of that City having notice of the King's Arrival with his new Queen, met them at Blackheath in their Robes, with a ſelect number of Citizens in rich embroidered Liveries, and conducted him to Kenſington, where he lodg'd that Night, and continu'd ſome time. About Chriſtmas the Queen paſſed by Water to the Tower, and on the ſixth of [d] January was crown'd at Weſtminſter with all the State and Magnificence that could be deviſed ſuitable for ſo great an Occaſion. The Marriage and Coronation being thus compleated, there appeared a general Satisfaction in all Perſons, unleſs in the Duke of Gloceſter, who ſhewed much Diſcontent in his Words and Actions, both at the King's Marriage and Settlement of Peace, which diſpleaſed the King; and ſo much the more, becauſe he adviſed the Londoners not to pay the Tax granted for a War with France, becauſe there was Peace; which they had follow'd, had not the Duke of Lancaſter aſſur'd them that the Peace was ſettled at great Expence [d].

A. D. 139[illegible]

1397.

Twenty Second Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

Soon after Chriſtmas, on the Feaſt of St. Vincent, a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and enacted ſeveral things neceſſary for the common Good, viz. That foraſmuch as many Miſchiefs were done by Perſons, who rode armed, it was forbidden all Perſons as well Lords as Commons to go or ride by Night or Day armed, except the King's Officers in doing their Duty. And that Juſtice might be adminiſter'd without Favour and Affection, it was enacted, That no Lord, or other Perſon, ſhould ſit upon the Bench with the Judges of Aſſize under great Penalties, leſt their Preſence ſhould influence or byaſs them in their Office. And becauſe the Commons had been much oppreſſed by certain Perſons, who pretended themſelves to be the King's Meſſengers, and took their Horſes out of their Carts to ride about their own Buſineſs; therefore it was enacted, that none ſhould take any ſuch Horſe without the Conſent of the Owner: And laſtly, That it ſhould be lawful for the Judges of Belknap, Holt, and Burgh, to return from their Exile into England, notwithſtanding the Statute made in the eleventh Year of this King; which being contrary to his Oath, made to the Lords in that Parliament, begat ſome Diſcontents among his Subjects. In this Parliament the Duke of Lancaſter obtain'd a private Act, to legitimate the Children which he had begotten on the Lady Katharine Swinford before his Marriage with her, and his eldeſt Son by her, Thomas Beaufort, was made Duke of Somerſet [e]. In the Parliament Rolls of this Seſſion there is alſo recorded a Declaration of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, for themſelves and the Clergy of their Provinces, That foraſmuch as at their Enſtalment they were ſworn to be obedient and faithful to the Pope and See of Rome, if any thing were attempted in Parliament in prejudice or reſtraint of the ſame, they would not aſſent to it, but withſtand it with all their force: And this Proteſtation they deſired might be enrolled, which was done accordingly. Some things that concern'd the Church were enacted by this Parliament, viz. At the Petition of the Begging Fryars it was ordain'd, That none of Fox. ex Rot. Parl. in Turr. Lond. Tit. 22. 32, 36.

---

[a] Thomas de Mowbray Earl of Nottingham.

[b] The Truce formerly mention'd to be for thirty Years was but for twenty eight, and that Truce was only continu'd now two Years longer, and it was no Peace but a Ceſſation of Arms. Froiſſard.

[c] Katherine Swinford.

[d] No leſs than three hundred thouſand Pounds much more than her Portion. Sir John Hayward, Hen. IV.

[e] He was only created Earl of Somerſet, and Cambden in his Brit. Tit. Somerſetſhire, ſays his Name was John de Beaufort; Thomas de Beaufort, as the ſame Author writes, ſub Tit. Dorſetſhire, was younger Brother to John de Beaufort, and was firſt created Earl of Dorſet, and afterwards Duke of Exeter.

their

A. D. 1397. their Order ſhould paſs over the Sea, to Rome or elſewhere, without a ſpecial Licenſe from their Sovereign; nor take upon them the Degree or Title of Maſter in Divinity without being firſt poſed and examined in a Provincial Chapter, upon pain of being put out of the King's Protection. As alſo, that the King's Officers for making Arreſts or Attachments in Church-Yards ſhould be excommunicated. For theſe Acts the Clergy gave the King a tenth alone, and ſo the Parliament was ſent home.

Breſt reſtored to the D. of Britain, for which the D. of Gloceſter reproach'd the King.

The Duke of Britain, a little after the Diſſolution of the Parliament, whether upon any private Agreement made at the Treaty at Ard, or meerly according to the firſt Condition, ſent over to King Richard a certain Sum of Money, for the payment of which he had engaged the Haven of Breſt, and delivered it up to him, to diſcharge that Debt, and recover the Town to himſelf again; King Richard accordingly received the Money, and reſigned it to him. The Duke of Gloceſter knowing the place to be an Haven of Importance to the Engliſh, was very angry at this unuſual piece of Juſtice among Princes; and being at Court one day, where he ſaw many of the Soldiers that were lately come from Breſt, and had no way to live, crowding into the Hall, told the King, 'That thoſe poor 'Men had been ill paid, and now having no 'Imployment, knew not how to live. The King reply'd, 'That it was not his fault, but 'he would take care they ſhould be paid. The Duke anſwer'd, 'That it had been better 'they had continued where they were; he 'ſhould firſt have taken a Town by his own 'Valour and Conduct, before he had reſigned 'what his Anceſtors had left to him. This Reflection fell ſharply upon the King, who changing Countenance immediately, ſaid, What is it you ſay, Uncle? The Duke then repeated the ſame words again; whereupon the King in a great Paſſion, reply'd, 'Think you that I am a 'Fool, or Merchant, to ſell my Land? No; By 'S. John Baptiſt, no: But our Couſin the Duke 'of Britain having paid the Sums for which the 'Town and Haven of Breſt were engaged to me, 'Reaſon and good Conſcience required that I 'ſhould reſtore it. This anſwer, tho' reaſonable, did not take away the Reſentment of the Affront which the Duke's Words made upon the King's Spirit, but he hated him ever after for the Brand of Cowardiſe he had laid upon him[a].

Earl of S. Paul comes into England, and adviſes the King againſt the Duke of Gloceſter.

Before the King's Paſſions were cool'd throughly, Guido Earl of S. Paul, who was ſent by Charles the French King to viſit and compliment King Richard and his Queen, arriv'd at the Court, and after a ſhort time was admitted into great Familiarity with the King partly through his own Officiouſneſs, and partly by the Troubles of the King's Mind, which made him not very choice to whom he unburthen'd his Diſcontents. With this Earl the King being one day diſcourſing, complained to him of the mutinous and factious Behaviour of the Duke of Gloceſter his Uncle towards him, viz. 'That he openly 'diſliked his Marriage, and uſed his utmoſt En'deavours to break the Peace ſo happily con'cluded between France and England, by ſtir'ring up a Rebellion among his Subjects. The Earl knowing that generally nothing is ſo pleaſant to rooted Paſſions as Revenge, which would be ſweeten'd in this Caſe by neceſſary Policy, gave the King this Advice, 'That he had no 'way to ſecure himſelf, and the Peace of his 'Kingdom, but by taking away his Life; for 'when a Subject is grown ſo Great and Po'pular, it is impoſſible for a King to be ſafe ſo 'long as he is alive. The King eaſily aſſented to this Counſel, and that he might not want Pleas enough to juſtifie what he had in a manner fully reſolv'd to execute, he obſerv'd every word and action of the Duke more narrowly than formerly; and taking every thing in the worſe ſenſe, as Jealouſie and deſire of revenge ſuggeſted, thought him ſuch a diſeas'd Member as could not be cur'd but by cutting off. To make way for this he complain'd very grievouſly of him to his Brethren, the Dukes of Lancaſter and York, with others of the Nobility; but as in all of them he found a good Opinion of the Duke, ſo his Brethren told him, 'That tho' their Bro'ther Gloceſter was ſomewhat raſh in his Words, 'yet they knew him to be of truly loyal Prin'ciples, really ſtudious of his Majeſty's and 'Realm's Happineſs, and that he would not act 'any thing prejudicial to either. Theſe words ſo much allay'd the King's Anger, that had not ill Inſtruments apply'd themſelves to blow the Coals afreſh, all Animoſities had been quite bury'd. But a little after, being inform'd by the Earls of Nottingham and Huntington, that the Duke of Gloceſter was much diſſatisfied that his own Counſels were not follow'd, and had utter'd many ſeditious Speeches, as, That the King was miſled by evil Counſellors, which he daily had about him; That he was not fit to govern, and therefore ought to be remov'd from his Throne; That he would undertake a Refor- Reg. 21.
mation of things; and to that end had conſpir'd with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and Darby, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Abbot of S. Albans, and Prior of Weſtminſter, (which two laſt had encourag'd him in the Attempt, by pretending that it was reveal'd to them by a Viſion, that King Richard ſhould deſtroy the Kingdom by his miſgovernment) to take him and his whole Council, and puniſh them according to their demerits. Whether this were really ſo or not, our Hiſtorians are in doubt; yet 'tis certain, this Accuſation ſharpen'd the King's Anger ſo much againſt the Duke, that he entred immediately into a Contrivance with the ſaid Earls of Huntington, Nottingham, and others, to apprehend the Duke and his Confederates ſuddenly; and put them to Death. The Duke of Gloceſter was then at his Houſe at Pelſhey in Eſſex, and ſuſpected nothing of what was reſolv'd againſt him, and therefore was eaſily apprehended in this manner. The King himſelf with the aboveſaid Earls having laid an Ambuſh of arm'd Men in Epping-Foreſt, went with a ſmall Retinue to Pelſhey to the Duke of Gloceſter, whom finding in his Bed early in the Morning they raiſed, and pretending earneſt Buſineſs of State, drew him with them to London. The Duke in haſte poſted along with the King, and took only a Servant or two with him. When they came at the place of the Ambuſh, the King riding before, the Earl Marſhal arreſted him, and the Soldiers immediately ſeizing him, carry'd him blindfold to a Barge, put him on Shipboard, and convey'd him to Calis. He was either too Popular, or elſe too Innocent to be brought to a publick Tryal in England, and therefore he was

The Duke of Gloceſter apprehended and murther'd

[a] This Story is in Grafton, but is not very probable; for Froiſſard affirms, the Duke of Gloceſter was one of the Commiſſioners who concluded the laſt Treaty; by the Articles of which he had conſented, that the Caſtle and the Town of Chierburgh in Normandy ſhould be reſtor'd to the King of Navarr and the Duke of Bretagne their Owners.

A. D. 1397. remov'd to Calis; and after a formal or pretended Tryal before Judge Rikell, an Iriſhman, who ſent the King word, that upon his Examination he confeſſed all that was alledg'd againſt him, he was order'd to be executed by Thomas Mowbrey Earl Marſhal, who is ſaid to have been ſo unwilling to put him to Death, tho' he was aſſiſtant in apprehending him, that he would not do it till the King threaten'd him with Death if he did not execute his Orders. Whereupon he caus'd him to be ſmothered or ſtrangled privately, as if he were aſham'd to be ſeen an Inſtrument of ſuch a baſe Act. The ſeizure of the Duke of Gloceſter was carry'd ſo ſecretly, that there was no noiſe of it; and the King ſhew'd ſuch an even Countenance towards the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, that he invited them to Dinner with him as his greateſt Favourites; but while they were in their Mirth, he caus'd them to be arreſted, and carry'd immediately to the Tower to be kept cloſe Priſoners; the Lord Cobham alſo and Sir John Cheyney were at the ſame time apprehended, and ſent to the Iſle of Wight. Theſe Actions much amazed the People; and leſt they ſhould riſe for the Lords reſcue, a Proclamation was put out to aſſure the Nation, that they were ſeized for new Crimes which they had been found guilty of, and which ſhould be prov'd againſt them at the ſitting of the next Parliament, in which the Commons hoped they would have ſuch fair dealings, that every Man reſted contented, and did not doubt but if they were innocent they would be clear'd, and if guilty of any Crimes deſerving Death, 'twas fit they ſhould have their deſerts.

The Earls of Warwick and Arundel imprison'd in the Tower.

In the Interval, before the Parliament met, the King and his Friends were very buſie to lay a ſure train for the ruin of their Enemies, whom they had now got in their power; and to this end, firſt, certain of the Nobility, whom the King could beſt truſt, were ſuborn'd to impeach them of High-Treaſon, viz. Edward Earl of Rutland, Thomas Earl of Nottingham, and Earl Marſhal, Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, John Holland Earl of Huntington, Thomas Earl of Somerſet, John Montacute Earl of Salisbury, the Lords Spenſer, and Scroop Vice-Chamberlain, whoſe Honour and Greatneſs was thought enough alone almoſt to juſtifie a falſe Accuſation. Next, All Endeavours were uſed to procure ſuch a Parliament as might be ready to concur with the King's deſigns; and leſt the Dukes of Lancaſter and York ſhould attempt any thing for the defence of their Brother the Duke of Gloceſter, whom they knew to be a Priſoner at Calis, or the Friends of the Earls of Arundel and Warwick ſhould undertake their Reſcue, the King provided a ſtrong Guard of Cheſhire-Men, and four thouſand Archers, beſides the Forces which he had order'd the Lords of his Party to bring with them, to attend and guard the Parliament, which might at the ſame time be an awe upon any refractory Members.

Twenty third Parliament, its Acts.

Theſe things being thus prepared, the Parliament was ſummon'd to meet at Weſtminſter about the middle of September, which it did accordingly. The Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter doubting of their own ſafety, becauſe their Brother was impriſon'd, brought along with them a ſtrong Body of Men to defend themſelves, and were received into London, tho the King before had forbidden the Citizens to entertain them; but certain of the Nobility, who were ſent to them from the King, giving them Aſſurances that there was no ill intended againſt them, and that nothing ſhould be done againſt the Lords but with their Advice and Concurrence, ſo prevail'd with them that they diſmiſſed their Forces home. The Lords of the King's Party, viz. the Earls of Darby, Marſhall, Rutland, and Northumberland, the Lords Spenſer, Henry and Thomas Peircys, and Scroop, brought great Troops of arm'd Attendants, which they kept and lodg'd in the Towns about London all the Seſſion. It was open'd by Edward Stafford Biſhop of Exeter, then Lord Chancellor, who in a grave Speech deliver'd, 'That the King was of abſolute and in-'controulable Authority, inferiour to none but 'God; and that all Perſons that ſhall dare to 'leſſen or limit his Power, upon any pretences 'whatſoever, are worthy of Death, as wicked 'Traitors. Theſe Words within the Houſe, being ſeconded with the Guards without, were thought a manifeſt Indication, that not Law but arbitrary Power was to order matters that Seſſion. In the lower Houſe, Sir John Buſby, Sir William Bagot, and Sir Henry Green, the King's Creatures, had a ſtrong party, ſo that they could carry all things as they pleaſed. Sir John Buſby was choſen the Speaker of the Commons, and a Vote paſs preſently, 'That 'any one that ſhould be convicted of oppoſing 'the King's Power and Regality ſhould ſuffer 'as a Traitor. Theſe Foundations of Action being laid, the King by his Attorney preferr'd his Complaint of Rebellion and Treaſon againſt Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſeveral others, ſubmitting the Judgment of them, to the Parliament. Sir John Buſby having aggravated the Crimes and Ingratitude of the ſaid Peers, firſt required, That ſince the former Grace and Favour had wrought ſo little upon them, their Pardons might be revoked; which was accordingly done: And then he demanded Judgment upon them for their late Crimes, and particularly for Treaſon, in compelling the King to grant them a Commiſſion to govern the Realm; and upon the Archbiſhop for procuring the ſaid Commiſſions, and granting their Pardons. The Archbiſhop roſe up to make his Defence, but the King enjoyn'd him Silence till the next day, and then upon his Appearance in the Houſe he commanded him by the Biſhop of Carliſle to go home; and ſo he came to the Houſe no more. After his departure, the King having order'd the Biſhops to chooſe themſelves a Procurator, becauſe it was not lawful for them to be preſent in caſes of Blood, (whereupon they choſe Sir Thomas Piercy, and departed the Houſe) he granted a Commiſſion to ſeveral Peers, of which the Duke of Lancaſter was High-Steward, to examine and try them for all Crimes and Treaſons laid againſt them. The King had a little before prepared a large Building, like an Hall, open on all ſides but the Roof, for their Tryal, with Seats for himſelf, the Parliament, the Appellants and Defendants. When the Day of their Arraignment was come, and the Earls were brought out to their Examination, the Appellant Lords accuſed them as Traitors, for '1. Forcing the King to grant them a Commiſ-'ſion for the Government of his Realm. 2. For 'uſurping the Regal Authority in holding a Par-'liament in prejudice of the King's Royal Dig-'nity, under pretence of that traiterous Com-'miſſion. 3. For traiterouſly murthering Sir Si-'mon Burley and Sir James Barniſh, two of the 'King's faithful Leige-Subjects, without the 'King's conſent: And, 4. For raiſing a traite-'rous Inſurrection at Haringey-Park, and en-'tring arm'd with the Duke of Gloceſter and 'Earl of Warwick into the King's preſence; and then

A. D. 1397.

'then severally flung down their Gloves, offering to justifie their Accusation by Fight. The Earl of Arundel, Richard Fitz-Allen, first answer'd, and boldly deny'd their Charge, saying, 'That he was not a Traitor in Thought, 'Word or Deed; and that what he had acted, 'either by Virtue of the aforesaid Commission, 'or while he was in Arms with the Duke of 'Gloucester and the Earl of Warwick, was not done 'with any ill Intention against the King's Person, but for the good of the King and his 'Realm, which he did not doubt but he could 'make good against any or all the Appellants 'by fight, if it would please the King to permit him so to vindicate his Innocency against 'their false Accusations. But because his Enemies had him now in their power, and his most innocent Actions would (as he very well knew) be construed in the worst sense; and what they had alledged as Treasons, they would make such, he added, as his firmest Plea, which he would abide by; that those very Acts, if Treasonable, were pardon'd to him by the King's Grace, and that not only more publickly with the Duke of Gloucester and Earl of Warwick, but he had a special and a particuler Pardon for himself. The Duke of Lancaster and Sir John Busby immediately reply'd, 'That both those 'Pardons were revoked by the King, his Lords, 'and his faithful People assembled in Parliament, and therefore could not avail him in 'this Case. The Earl reply'd, 'That the Revocation of his Pardon was not done by the 'People, for they lamented him, but by him 'and his Company, who love no faithful dealings. Then the Duke of Lancaster asked him if he had any thing farther to alledge for himself? But he said, 'The King's Pardon was 'freely granted him, and the benefit of it he 'hoped would not be deny'd him, for he insisted upon it. But that being over-rul'd, they proceeded to give Sentence upon him in this form: I John, Steward of England, judge thee, Richard, to be a Traitor; and I condemn thee to be drawn and hang'd, beheaded and quarter'd; and thy Land, entail'd and not entail'd, from thee and from thine Heirs of thy Body descending to be confiscated. This usual Sentence in Treason was, according to the Custom, by the King's Grace released to him in respect to his Blood, and he was commanded to be beheaded according to his Condemnation; which was executed upon him the same Afternoon upon Tower-hill, and his Body was interr'd in the Austin-Fryars-Church in Broad-street, London. This Noble Earl behav'd himself with much Courage and Calmness in his Sufferings. In his passage to his Execution he gave all the Money he had to the Poor, that he might carry their Prayers with him to his Grave. Several Lords attended him to his Execution, and among them three that were nearly related to him, the Earl of Nottingham that marry'd his Daughter, the Earl of Kent his Sisters Son, and the Earl of Huntington. These Men's forwardness he could not but take notice of, and therefore told them, 'It had been more decent for them to have 'been absent; but since they pleased themselves in his Misfortunes, he could foretel 'them, that their Miseries in a short time would 'be as remarkable as his then were. Then turning to the Executioner, he felt the Sword, and desired him to do his Office as carefully and speedily as he could; and kneeling down, his Head was separated from his Body at one Blow[a]. His Lands, which were Confiscated to the King, were annexed to the Earldom of Chester, which thereupon was advanced to a Dutchy[b]. His Death was much lamented by the Commons, among whom he was in very great esteem for Valour, and his Love of the common Good. Divers Reports were carry'd about, that Miracles were done by his Reliques, and that his Head was again miraculously cemented to his Body; which meeting with a good Opinion of him in Men's Minds, caused him to be honoured as a Martyr[c].

Earl of Arundel try'd and condemn'd.

Beheaded on Tower-hill.

A. D. 1397.

The Earl of Warwick, Thomas Beauchamp, was next brought to his Tryal, and accused of the same Heads of Treason. He answer'd for himself, 'That he never knew that it was Treason to ride so arm'd, as he confess'd he had 'done in Haringey Park; but since the Judges 'had declared it to be so, he begg'd the King's 'Pardon; and with many effeminate Tears besought the Nobles to intercede for him to his Majesty. The King asked him, 'Whether he 'acknowledged himself guilty of the Treason 'charged on him? The Earl answered, 'That 'he could not deny it, and wished he had never seen the Duke of Gloucester and Earl of 'Arundel, by whom he was led into it. Then the King having conferr'd a little while with the Duke of Lancaster, and received the Requests of several Peers to save his Life, told the Earl, 'That the ingenious Confession of his Fault had 'more pleased him then all the profit of their 'Lands could, and therefore he would pardon 'his Life. But his Estate was seiz'd upon for the King's use, and the Earl was banish'd into the Isle of Man, with an Allowance of four thousand Nobles a Year for his own and Lady's Maintenance; but it was so badly paid, that they are said to have liv'd there in great Poverty, which was so much the heavier to them, because of their old Age. The Lord Cobham and Sir John Cheyney were indicted, and condemned for the same Treasons; but by the Intercession of some of the Peers, their Lives were spared, and they were condemned to perpetual Imprisonment. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who had been summon'd to answer for the said Treasons, but was excused by the King, and pardon'd, with the Archbishop of York, Bishop of Winchester, and some others, was at the earnest Importunity of Sir John Busby, and the Commons of his party, banished, and his Temporalties seized into the King's hands, having six Weeks limited for his departure. While these Tryals of the Peers were carrying on, a Certi-

The Earl of Warwick try'd and banish'd.

---

[a] The King was present at his Execution. Froissard.

[b] This Earldom was never advanc'd into a Dutchy. See Camb. sub. Tit. Cheshire.

[c] The People, who always pretend to be the best Judges of their Interest, and can distinguish their Friends from their Enemies, were ever ready to venerate the Memory of Patriots; and as they formerly reckon'd the Earl of Lancaster a Saint, so now they esteem'd the Earl of Arundel as a Martyr. Pilgrimages were daily made to the Place of his Burial in Austin-Fryars, London. A Rumour was spread about in those superstitious Times, that his Head was miraculously fix'd to his Body. The King knowing such Reports were design'd to reflect on his Justice, caus'd the Corps to be taken up and view'd ten Days after its Interment. He commanded the Ground where it lay to be pav'd in, and no mention to be made of the place; forbidding any Discourses in his favour. However, 'twas constantly aver'd for a Truth, that the King's Mind was disturb'd with the Horror of this Murther, and that he was haunted with an Apparition of his Ghost. 'Tis certainly true, that the Proceedings of this pack'd Parliament hasten'd the end of this King's Arbitrary Power in his Dethronement and Death.

ficate

A. D. 1397.

Duke of Gloceſter, tho' Dead, condemn'd.

ficate came from the Earl of Nottingham then Captain of Calis, that the Duke of Gloceſter was Dead, and Judge Rikell read a Confeſſion of ſeveral Treaſons owned and acknowledged by the Duke of Gloceſter under his own hand; whereupon at the Petition of the Appellants, the ſame Sentence was pronounc'd againſt him, tho' Dead, which was paſs'd upon the Earl of Arundel, but his Body was allow'd to be deliver'd to his Friends, by whoſe care it was convey'd to Pleſhey, and honourably interr'd in the Tomb which he had there prepar'd for himſelf in his Life-time in the Church.

After theſe Judgments paſſed on the Peers, the Parliament ſat ſome time, till near Chriſtmas, and paſſed ſeveral Acts relating to the preſent State of Affairs, viz. That all Benefices or Gifts granted or alienated by thoſe that were already condemn'd, or ſhould be hereafter condemn'd by this Parliament, granted ſince the tenth Year of this King, ſhould be revoked and made void. That all ſuch as gave either Counſel, Aid, or Favour, to the Children of ſuch as were or ſhould hereafter be condemn'd in this Parliament, ſhould be puniſh'd as Traitors. That all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal ſhould ſwear inviolably to obſerve whatſoever in this Parliament was enacted, and that the Cenſures of the Church ſhould be pronounced by the Prelates, againſt all thoſe that ſhould oppoſe or violate them. That all ſuch Perſons as ow'd any Moneys to Rocheſter Bridge[a], ſhould be deſtrain'd for the Payment of it for the uſe of the ſaid Bridge. In the time of this Seſſion, the King being deſirous to ſee the Forces of the City of London, cauſed them to muſter before him upon Blackheath. He alſo order'd, that the Arms of King Edward the Confeſſor ſhould be added to his own, and bare them together parte per pale. And then the Parliament was prorogued till after Chriſtmas, and appointed to meet at Shrewſbury on the Quindene of S. Hilary, Jan. 28.

1398. Twenty-fourth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The King having thus removed his Enemies, either by Death or Baniſhment, kept a triumphant and magnificent Chriſtmas at Litchfield, and at the time perfixed went to Shrewsbury to meet his Parliament. At his firſt Arrival he held a great Feaſt for all his Nobility and Commons, at which he created[b] five Dukes, a Dutcheſs, a Marqueſs, and four Earls, viz. Henry Bullingbrooke Earl of Darby he made Duke of Hereford, Edward Earl of Rutland Duke of Aumerle, and of Corke in Ireland; Thomas Holland Earl of Kent Duke of Surrey; John Holland Earl of Huntington Duke of Exeter; Thomas Mowbrey Earl of Nottingham and Marſhal Duke of Norfolk; the Lady Margaret Counteſs of Norfolk, Dutcheſs of Norfolk; John Earl of Somerſet Marquiſs Dorſet[c], Thomas Lord Spenſer Earl of Gloceſter; Ralph Lord Nevil Earl of Weſtmorland; William Lord Scroop Earl of Wiltſhire, and Sir Thomas Peircy Vice-Chamberlain Earl of Worceſter; to and among whom he diſpoſed of the greateſt part of the Eſtates of the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, thinking thereby to oblige them more firmly to be his Friends. At this time he made the Earldom of Cheſter a Principality, and aſſumed to himſelf the Name and Title of the Prince of Cheſter to grace that Honour the more. And as the King ſought all means to ſtrengthen himſelf, and greaten his Power, ſo alſo did the Parliament; for they enacted, That the Commiſſions granted by the King to certain Noblemen to inquire into and reform Abuſes in the Realm, Anno 10. of his Reign, ſhould be repealed as extorted from the King by Threats, and that no ſuch Commiſſion ſhould be granted for the future; and that the Heirs of ſuch Perſons as had been ſentenc'd by the ſaid Commiſſion ſhould be reſtored to their Inheritances, Lands and Poſſeſſions, but ſhould not exact the Revenues of the Poſſeſſors from that time. 1. That it ſhould be high Treaſon for any Perſon whatſoever to compaſs or imagine the King's Death; 2. To contrive his Depoſition; 3. To ride armed, or make War againſt the King in his Realm; Or 4. to diſclaim the Homage due to him; and that the Heirs of all Perſons who were convicted of any of the ſaid four Articles of Treaſon, ſhould be for ever deprived of the Lands and Poſſeſſions of their Anceſtors, and ſhould not be allowed to have an Action of Claim for them. The King alſo obtained, that the whole Power of both Houſes ſhould for a time be put into the hands of certain Perſons nominated by himſelf, viz. John Duke of Lancaſter, Edmund Duke of York, Edward Duke of Aumerle, Thomas Duke of Surrey, John Duke of Exeter, John Marquiſs Dorſet, the Earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, March, Gloceſter, and Wiltſhire, Sir John Huſſy, and ſome others. Theſe Men were enabled by Virtue of the ſaid Grant to hear and determine all Matters and Petitions not ended in the laſt Seſſion; and by Virtue of that Conceſſion, proceeded to conclude and determine almoſt what they pleaſed. In the end of the Seſſion the King had a Tenth and half of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth and a half of the Laity granted him, beſides the Cuſtoms of Wool at 50 s. a Sack of every Engliſhman, and 3 l. of every Stranger, and ſo the Parliament broke up; and a general Pardon immediately follow'd their Diſmiſſion, of all Perſons but fifty, not named, which was done to keep the Nobility in Awe, the King being at Liberty to except almoſt whom he pleaſed by that means.

A. D. 1398.

The King having thus eſtabliſh'd his Power, and put himſelf beyond all Oppoſition and Contradiction, thought himſelf ſecure and an abſolute Prince; but it being laid upon ſuch a Foundation as begat many Diſcontents among the People, all the Fabrick proved weak, and was ſoon followed with lamentable Ruin. The Parliament was indeed diſſolved, but there was ſtrange murmuring about ſeveral things that attended it and were done by it, as 1. That it was a Parliament not freely choſen, but pack'd by the King's Intereſts, conſiſting of Men impoſed on the Shires and Towns by the King's Authority. 2. That it was wholly managed by Court Favourites, and had bent all its Endeavours to deſtroy the Liberties and Privileges of the People. 3. That tho' the Duke of Gloceſter was ſo illegally murther'd, they were ſo far from puniſhing the wicked Actors, that they Diſcontents about the laſt Parliament.

---

[a] By this Rocheſter Bridge I ſuppoſe the Author means a Petition of the Commons to the King, that he wou'd be pleas'd to order three or four thouſand Marks to be diſtributed among thoſe Perſons that had been plunder'd at Radcot Bridge, when the Duke of Ireland was defeated by the Earl of Darby; for there is no mention of any Tax for Rocheſter Bridge in this Seſſion.

[b] Theſe Lords were created on Saturday, being Michaelmas-Day, Anno 1397. Rot. Parl. 21. Rich. II.

[c] Sir John Hayward in his Hiſt. of Hen. IV. ſays, the Earl of Somerſet was created Marquiſs of Somerſet, which is moſt likely, becauſe Thomas de Beaufort his younger Brother was afterwards in the thirteenth Year of Hen. IV. Anno 1412. made Earl of Dorſet. This Nobleman was the firſt that ever bore the Title of Marquiſs in England.

approved

A. D. 1398.

approved their Deeds. 4. That the Lords, who had deſerved well of the Nations, and were pardon'd all irregular Actions, were made guilty by an unpreſidented Power of revoking their Pardons. 5. That by diſannulling the Grants of the condemn'd Perſons, made ſo many Years before, they had deprived many honeſt and good Men, both Menial Servants of the ſaid Lords and others, of their lawful Inheritances and Eſtates. 6. That they had not only laid heavy Taxes upon the Nation themſelves, but had exalted the King's Authority to ſuch a pitch, and allow'd him ſuch a Power of acting, that he need not obſerve any Laws but his Will. Theſe things concurring with other Matters of Complaint in the King's Actions, partly grounded on the Grants of Parliament it ſelf, as his impoſing the Oaths ſo ſeverely on all Perſons to obſerve inviolably the Ordinances of it, and farming the Taxes to Buſhy, Baggot, and Green, who exacted them with the utmoſt Rigour and Severity; and partly on his own Management, as that he was prodigal in his Expences, lewd in his Behaviour, and partial in his Favours: That he diſcountenanc'd his ancient Nobility, and preferr'd ſuch Perſons to his neareſt Attendance as were neither eminent for Birth nor Virtue, on whom he beſtow'd the Revenues of the Crown, and impoveriſh'd the Nation by it: That he preferred ſuch of the Clergy to Biſhopricks and other Dignities of the Church, as either favour'd or joyn'd with him in his lewd Courſes. Theſe things alienated the Hearts of the People ſo much from him, that they lay expos'd to a Revolt upon the leaſt Temptation; of which an Occaſion ſhortly after happen'd after this manner, tho' it were ſome time before it was brought about.

Reg. 22. The Conference between the Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk.

The Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk riding between Brainford and London, and diſcourſing friendly among themſelves about Affairs of State, the Duke of Hereford having obſerved how faſt the People's Affections toward the King declined, freely deliver'd his Thoughts to the Duke of Norfolk, and told him, 'That the preſent Management and Miniſters were very 'diſtaſteful to the Nation in general; That 'the King was made odious by his mean and 'bad Counſellors, who not only raiſed the En'vy of the Nobles by enjoying the Favours 'which was their due, but gained him the Ha'tred of the People by their Conduct, which 'manifeſtly tended to their own, not the pub'lick Intereſt; and therefore he adviſed the 'Duke of Norfolk, who was a Privy-Counſellor, 'and had an eaſie Acceſs to the King's Ear to 'advertiſe the King of it, that he might by a 'prudent Alteration of things prevent the ill 'Conſequences which would certainly follow; 'adding, That it was not out of any ill Will he 'bore to the King, or an Humour of finding 'fault that he ſaid this, but out of a pure de- A. D. 1398.
'ſire of the Happineſs of the King and his Go'vernment. The Duke of Norfolk ſeemed to aſſent to the Duke Hereford's words, as very neceſſary and good Counſel, and promiſed to repreſent them ſo fairly to the King, that they might have the Effect he wiſhed, and ſo they parted. The Duke of Norfolk was not unmindful of his Promiſe, but [a] being ſenſible how ungrateful a Meſſage it was to the King, or perhaps deſigning to ingratiate himſelf by the Report, he gave a very invidious [b] Relation of the Duke of Hereford's Words to him, adding ſuch aggravating Expreſſions of his own inventing, as made them look like a Calumny both of his Majeſty and Government. The King, who was ever very impatient of Reproof, was extreamly enrag'd at the Duke of Hereford, and ſends for him to appear before the Council to anſwer the Accuſation brought againſt him by the Duke of Norfolk. The Duke of Hereford appeared, and having heard what the Duke of Norfolk had alledg'd againſt him, thank'd the King for his Favour in giving him Liberty to anſwer for himſelf, and then ingenuouſly confeſſed what he had ſaid, and with what Intention; but accuſed the Duke of Norfolk of perverting and miſrepreſenting his Diſcourſe, either out of Malice or Flattery, which he offer'd to juſtifie againſt the Duke of Norfolk by Combat, if the King would permit him. The Duke of Norfolk unwilling to undergo the Diſgrace either of recanting his words, or refuſing a Defence of them, ſtoutly avouched the Truth of his Relation, and [c] flinging down his Glove, accepted the Combat. The King was unwilling to grant their deſire, and endeavour'd to pacify the Contention between them by interpoſing with his Authority; but when nothing would prevail with them, the King in his Paſſion ſwore by St. John Baptiſt, That he would never more concern himſelf to make them Friends, and granted them a Combat to be fought on Sept. 17. at Coventry [d]. At the time appointed, the King order'd a ſtrong Stage to be erected for the Combatants; but having receiv'd Information, that the People were much diſcontented that the Duke of Hereford, a Valiant and Heroick Nobleman, ſhould be ſuffer'd to juſtifie his Innocency by the Hazard of a Combat, who might be ſo ſerviceable to the Nation, he permitted them to meet and bid Defiance of each of other; but before they fought, by the Advice of his Council, put an end to the Quarrel by a Sentence of Baniſhment to the Duke of Hereford for ten Years, as not wholly guiltleſs of the Calumny, and to the Duke of Norfolk for his Life, as having ſown Diſcord by his falſe Information between the King and his Peers, which was executed within a few days. The Duke of Norfolk went into Germany, and from thence to Venice, where he

The Duke of Norfolk accuſes the Duke of Hereford.

Both Dukes Baniſhed.

---

[a] Sir John Hayward gives him his Character in little. In former Times he had taken part with the Lords, but afterwards was deſirous to be accounted rather among the great Men than the good.

[b] Polydore Virgil, the moſt unfaithful Hiſtorian that ever wrote of our Engliſh Hiſtory, has drawn the Modern Authors into an Errour, by affirming, That the Duke of Norfolk accus'd the Duke Hereford; whereas it appears on the contrary, on Record, Placit. Coron. in Parl. 21. Richard II. That on the 30th of January, Henry of Lancaſter came before the King with a Schedule in his hand and ſaid thus, That having attended him before at Haywood, he there accus'd the Duke of Norfolk of ſlanderous Words, reflecting on his Majeſty, and now by his Command he repeated the ſame; which Schedule is to be ſeen at large in the ſaid Records.

[c] 'Twas order'd by the King and the Dukes of Lancaſter, York, Albemarl, Surrey and Exeter, the Marqueſs of Dorſet, the Earls of March, Salisbury, Northumberland and Gloceſter, the Earls of Worceſter and Wiltſhire, Sir John Buſhy, Sir Henry Green, Sir John Ruſſel, Sir Robert Tey, Sir Richard Chelmſwych, and Sir John Golofer, Commiſſioners, appointed by the Parliament to decide the Diſpute, that the Determination of this Difference ſhou'd be according to the Laws of Chivalry. See the foremention'd Pleas of the Crown in Parliament, which Record fully confutes the Romantick Account of the Glove. The Order of the King and the Commiſſioners was made at Oſwaldſtrue in Oſweſtre in Shropſhire, on the 19th of March, and on Monday the 29th of April the two Dukes appear'd before the King at Windſor, where Battel or Duel was appointed between them, for want of other Proofs to determine the Difference.

[d] In Auguſt. Sir John Hayward.

through

A. D. 1398. through Melancholly and Trouble dy'd. The Duke of Hereford at his departure had four Years of his Baniſhment releaſed, when he took his leave of the King at Eltham; but being ſtill forced to leave the Kingdom for ſix Years, he went into France, and was honourably received in that Court by Charles the Sixth then King there [a].

The King fined ſeventeen Counties.

The Departure of the Duke of Hereford, being the only ſurviving Perſon of the popular Lords who was likely to head a Faction againſt the Court, gave Encouragement to more arbitrary proceedings of the King and his Miniſters than they had dared to attempt before. For ſoon after he was gone, the King impoſed a great Fine upon all the chief Inhabitants of ſeventeen Counties in the Eaſt parts of the Nation, becauſe they had ſided with the Duke of Gloceſter and Earls of Arundel and Warwick againſt him; and having by his Agents induced the Noblemen and chief Gentry, as well Temporal as Spiritual, to acknowledge themſelves Rebels and Traytors, upon aſſurances of Pardon, he compelled them to ſecure their Pardon and his Favour for the future by ſubſcribing blank Charters, by which they obliged themſelves to pay ſuch Sums of Money to him as he ſhould think fit to require, which prov'd very heavy to many; for ſome were forced to pay a thouſand Pounds, and others a thouſand Marks, with like inſupportable Sums; commanding them alſo to take the Oath to maintain inviolable the Statutes of the laſt Parliament. This Oath, and theſe Charters were very offenſive to the Citizens of London, and therefore they adviſed their Sheriffs, by whom they were order'd to be impoſed upon them, to withſtand them. The King was highly diſpleas'd with their refractory Oppoſition, and threaten'd a more then uſual Severity againſt them. But the new Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Roger Walden, who was remov'd from being the King's Chaplain to that See about this time, and their old Friend Robert Braybrooke Biſhop of London ſo effectually interceded for them to the King, that he promiſed to forgive them, but did not do it, till by his blank Bonds and Charters which he ſent to all the richeſt Citizens, he had ſqueez'd great Sums out of them, as he had done from the Clergy and Gentry of the ſeventeen Counties, and other places before.

And extorts great Sums from the Londoners.

1399. On New-Years-Day the River near Bedford, which runs between Swelſtone and Harewood, divided it ſelf, and became dry for almoſt three Miles; and about the ſame time the Bay-trees, without any unuſual or extraordinary Cold, dry'd up and wither'd; which tho' not ſo much taken notice of at preſent, yet were thought afterward to portend the Changes of State which happen'd the enſuing Year. About Candlemas dy'd that great and illuſtrious Prince, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter dy'd.

John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, fourth Son of Edward the Third, at the Biſhop of Ely's Houſe in Holborn, and was honourably interr'd in St. Paul's Church [b] on the North-ſide of the High-Altar, by his firſt Wife Blanch, the Daughter of Henry the Firſt, Duke of Lancaſter. By his Death the Dukedom of Lancaſter with all his other Honours and Lands deſcended to his eldeſt Son Henry Duke of Hereford, who was then in France; and ſo not being preſent to take poſſeſſion of his Inheritance, it was eaſily made a Prey to the Avarice of the Court Harpye. The King indeed had ſhew'd ſome Favour to the Duke of Hereford when he left his Country, and beſides the Releaſe of ſome of the Years of Baniſhment inflicted [a] by the firſt Sentence, he granted to him by his Letters-Patents [c] a power to ſue out by his Attorney a Livery to any Lands or Poſſeſſions, holding of the King in Capite, which ſhould or might befal him in his abſence, and a reſpite of his Homage, till he ſhould return, for a reaſonable Fine. But the rich Booty which was expoſed to their Pleaſure and Will by his abſence, ſo allured their deſires, that contrary to all Juſtice and Faith they perſuaded the King to revoke his Grant, and ſeize upon the Duke of Lancaſter's whole Eſtate for the time of his Son's Baniſhment, which he made perpetual by their Advice, and thereupon diſpoſed of his perſonal Eſtate to and among his Favourites. This arbitrary and unkingly Action brought an Odium upon the King, not only from the Commons, who being factiouſly enamour'd with him, took every thing ill that was look'd upon as tending to his prejudice; but the Nobility themſelves, who began to doubt of their ſecurity under ſo eaſie a King, and ſuch covetous Counſellors. Edmund Duke of York, the only Uncle of the King that ſurvived, who ſeem'd not much concern'd at the Death of his Brother the Duke of Gloceſter, ſhew'd a great diſguſt at theſe Proceedings, and with his Son the Duke of Aumerle retired from Court to his Country-houſe at Langley, and others of the Nobility withdrew their Company from the King, becauſe they found it ungrateful. But tho' the Duke of Hereford's Inheritance brought greater ſeverity upon him in England, yet it was a cauſe of his greater Preferment and Favour in France; for being there reputed to be one of the Richeſt by his Father's Death, as well as Braveſt Princes in the World for his Natural Courage, he was courted for a Match to the only Daughter of the Duke of Berry, the French King's Uncle, which was certainly a very great Honour to a baniſh'd Man. But King Richard having intelligence of the Deſign, and foreſeeing how much ſuch an increaſe of the Duke of Hereford's Intereſt might prove prejudicial to him, diſpatched over the Earl of Salisbury immediately to hinder it by falſe Suggeſtions and a flattering Perſuaſion, that it would be a great Diſhonour to a Lady of the Royal Blood of France to be marry'd to an Engliſh Rebel and notorious Traitor; and ſo prevented the French King's Kindneſs to him. So great an Enemy was King Richard to the proſperous Fortunes of the Duke of Hereford both at home and abroad.

A. D. 1399.

King's Injuſtice to the Duke of Hereford after his Father's Death.

About the time of the Duke of Lancaſter's Death happen'd ſeveral things of Importance; the Earl of Arundel's eldeſt Son, Thomas Fitz-Allen, who had been kept a cloſe Priſoner in the Earl of Exeter's Houſe ever ſince his Father's Death, made his eſcape from his Confinement, and by the help of one William Scott a Mercer, got over the Sea to his Uncle, the late Archbiſhop of Arundel, then ſojourning at Cullen;

---

[a] The Pleas before cited report, That all this was done by the full Advice, Authority, and Aſſent of Parliament, (that is, the Committee) and not by his abſolute Power, tho' he pretended to it, and was as fond of it as any of his Succeſſors. Sir John Hayward obſerves, That the Sentence was given againſt the Duke of Norfolk the ſame Day of the Year wherein the Duke of Gloceſter, by his wicked means was ſtrangled at Callis.

[b] Where his Tomb remain'd till the late general Conflagration, Anno 1666.

[c] He granted the ſame to the Duke of Norfolk.

the

A. D. 1399.

the Biſhop of Chalcedon alſo came into England out of Greece with Apoſtolical Letters from the Pope, exhorting all well-diſpoſed Perſons to aſſiſt the Emperor of Conſtantinople with a liberal Contribution of Money, that he might be able to defend Chriſtendom againſt the Inroads of the Tartars, and encouraging them to ſo important a Work by a plenary Pardon of their Sins; but another Accident hinder'd his Succeſs, and that was the Revolt of the Iriſh. For Roger Mortimer the Earl of March and Ulſter (who was lately declared Heir Apparent to the Crown, and made Lieutenant of that Nation) being beſieged at Kenlis by a very ſtrong Body of the wild Iriſh, was there ſlain in a Sally with many of his Men, and the Engliſh Towns left as a Prey to the Natives, who under Obrian, Mackmore, and others, committed great Barbarity and Spoil upon the King's Subjects there. The news of this Rebellion much diſturb'd the King and his Council, and put them into many Perplexities what to do; they had no Preparations for a War, and 'twould be a ſhame to the Nation to leave that Kingdom, which had coſt ſo much to conquer, and had been held ſo long by the Engliſh, in the hands of the Enemy: Whereupon it was at laſt reſolv'd, That the King ſhould raiſe an Army, and go over himſelf in Perſon to ſubdue them to their Obedience. Money was wanting, which is the Sinew of War; and therefore the Miniſters were forced to uſe many Exactions to raiſe a Sum to provide for the Expedition, partly borrowing upon the King's Letters-Patents of the Biſhops and others, and partly extorting it from thoſe that were unwilling to lend him; and tho' the Neceſſities of the Nation, and Intereſts of it might have been ſome excuſe for his Actions, yet his extravagant Expences in Peace, when wiſe Princes are to provide a Treaſure againſt War, were ſo good an Argument againſt his preſent Wants, that tho' he did indeed raiſe a conſiderable Army, yet it was with the extream Diſcontent of the whole Nation. In the Spring the King was ready to embark for Ireland with his Army, but leſt he ſhould leave his Queen in diſcontent for his departure, he celebrated ſolemn Juſts to divert her ſeveral Days; and about Whitſuntide ſet forward toward Briſtol, and in two hundred Ships paſſed from Milford-Haven in Wales with his Army into Ireland, and landed ſafely at Waterford on the laſt Day of May, having with him the Duke of Exeter, the Duke of Gloceſter's and Hereford's Sons, ſeveral Biſhops, the Earl of Salisbury, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, and many other Noblemen; and leaving his Uncle the Duke of York his Deputy in England, whom he had order'd to ſend Edward Duke of Aumerle with ſome Reinforcements to his Army, that he might not be too weak for the Enterprize, if the Troops he carry'd were not ſufficient. While the King remain'd at Briſtol he had ſome Information given him, that Henry Piercy Earl of Northumberland, and ſome other Noblemen, were contriving an Inſurrection in his abſence: Whereupon the King by his Purſuivant ſent to the ſaid Earl and his Aſſociates to attend him in this Expedition with all their Force they could gather together. The Earl of Northumberland return'd Anſwer, 'That it was not ſafe to draw 'away the Strength of the North to go againſt 'the Iriſh, whom a leſs Force than what he had 'with him was enough to ſubdue, becauſe by 'that means he ſhould expoſe thoſe Countries 'to the Injuries of the Scotiſh Borderers, who 'waited all Opportunities, as the King well 'knew, to make their Advantages of England, 'and were no longer Friends than they wanted 'a fair Occaſion to ſhew their Enmity with gain 'to themſelves; That ſince there was no Guard 'of thoſe appointed in his abſence, he hoped his 'Majeſty would be better adviſed than to require 'his Attendance, which would be a greater diſ'advantage to him at Home than his Service 'could profit him Abroad. This modeſt Anſwer was look'd upon by the King as a crafty Evaſion of his Command, and confirm'd him in his opinion that he was guilty of the Accuſation brought againſt him: Wherefore to deter him from any farther Attempts he ſeized upon his Eſtate, and proclaim'd him and his Aſſociates Traitors, and ſo departed into Ireland.

The Iriſh revolt, and the King goes over in Perſon againſt them.

The Earl of Northumberland accuſed of Treaſon, and his Eſtate confiſcated.

A. D. 1399.

The King being arriv'd in Ireland, ſtay'd ſome days at Waterford to refreſh his Army, and then march'd forward to Kilkenny, where he reſolv'd to ſtay ſome time for the arrival of the Duke of Aumerle, whom he daily expected. The King's Army ſtruck ſuch a Terror into the Iriſh Rebels that they dare not appear againſt him, but after their uſual manner kept cloſe in the Woods, and by Parties made their Aſſaults upon the Engliſh, as they happen'd to meet with Advantages. But the Engliſh being acquainted with their Artifices, went ſo well prepar'd for their Encounters, that they ſlew many of them. For Jenico Dartois, a valiant Captain under the King, in one Skirmiſh at Ford in Kenlis, ſlew two Hundred of them with the Soldiers under his Command; and the Citizens of Dublin invaded the Country of Obrian, and ſlew above thirty, with very little loſs. When the King had ſtay'd about a Fortnight at Kilkenny, and ſaw the Duke of Aumerle not come, he ſet forward and invaded the Country of the Arch-rebel Mackmore, who keeping in the Woods with about three Thouſand Men, little valued the King's Army. The King had two Thouſand five Hundred Pioneers with him to grub up the Woods, and open Paſſages for his Army, who were ſet to work, but could not by Art and Diligence come at him; ſo that the Engliſh rather ſuffer'd than gain'd by this Attempt, becauſe many of them were ſlain by Mackmore's Men when they were foraging. The Uncle of Mackmore, and ſeveral of the Iriſh of better Note, came to the King with Wythes about their Necks, ſubmitted themſelves to his Mercy, and were pardon'd. This the King thought would be a good Example for Mackmore himſelf to imitate, and therefore invided him to come and accept of the ſame Mercy. But Mackmore underſtanding that the Engliſh could not long ſubſiſt in thoſe places for want of Proviſion, which could not be had by Force or Money, refuſed to ſubmit, but offered to lay down his Arms upon aſſurance of Indemnity for his paſt Offences, and to have his Liberty for the future. This Anſwer much enraged the King, ſo that he ſware he would not leave Ireland till he had Mackmore dead or alive; and being forced to retreat to Dublin to refreſh and victual his Army, took ſuch Courſes as he thought moſt effectual to obtain his ends: For firſt he publiſhed a Proclamation, wherein he promiſed a great Reward to any Perſon that ſhould bring Mackmore to him alive or dead; and after he had reſted and refreſhed his Army fifteen days, he divided it into three parts, and ſent them out to beſiege the Enemy on all ſides, and reduce them if poſſible. Juſt as the King had thus ſent out his Army, the Duke of Aumerle arrived with a great Reinforcement in an hundred Ships; and tho' his Delay was blameworthy, yet the King received him with much Joy, and by the Conjunction of his Forces brought ſo many of the Iriſh into ſubjection, that had he not been call'd home, he had reduced Ireland into as intire Obedience as ever. But his Fate was now to rule no longer, and the Period of his Dignity came thus.

The King's arrival in Ireland, and Action there.

A. D. 1399.

The Conſpiracy to depoſe King Richard, with the Reaſons and Cauſes of it.

The Nobility, Gentry, and Commons of the Nation having for ſeveral Years paſt been intolerably oppreſſed and ſlighted by the King and his Favourites, and now at the King's departure into Ireland vexed with unjuſt Exactions, began to long for Relief, and having an opportunity by the King's abſence to put their Deſigns in Execution, contriv'd to ſettle the Crown on another Head, which might govern them with greater Prudence as well as Mercy. The Earl of Northumberland and his Friends, who had ſuffer'd lately ſo deeply for ſuſpicion, were among the forwardeſt in this Action, hoping to regain their Loſſes by a real, which they had undergone for a ſuppoſed Inſurrection. The Perſon whom they thought fitteſt to weild a Scepter, tho' he had none, was Henry of Bullingbroke Duke of Lancaſter and Hereford. He had all the Qualifications fit to make an excellent King, as well as a Lineal Title to it. For he was the Son of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, fourth Son of Edward III. and after the Death of Roger Mortimer lately kill'd in Ireland, next allied to the Crown [a]. He was a Prince of great Wiſdom, Courage and Experience, a Lover of the Commons, and a Friend to the Nobles, and having ſmarted ſo ſeverely by the Injuſtice and Cruelty of a bad King, was moſt likely to make a good one, by not laying thoſe unjuſt Impoſitions upon others Shoulders, when he found ſo heavy on his own. He was indeed in France, but would gladly have return'd home, if he ſafely might have done it before; how much more now, being invited by the People, and allured by a Crown: Wherefore they took up a general Reſolution to ſend for him with all the privacy and ſpeed poſſible, aſſuring him of their hearty aſſiſtance in ſettling upon him what they ſo much deſired he would accept. Theſe their Requeſts and Deſires they drew up into a Letter, and ſent it over by faithful Meſſengers to Archbiſhop Arundel, who was then in Britain, whom by Letters they alſo importun'd to be their Advocate with the Duke to comply with them. The Archbiſhop, being a Fellow-ſufferer, gladly accepted the Office, and went with the Meſſengers to the Duke of Hereford at Paris, where having obtained a Secrecy fit for a matter of ſuch Importance, they delivered their Letters from the Nobles and Commons of England, and the Archbiſhop ſeconded them with the beſt Perſuaſions which Reaſon could invent, or Rhetorick urge. He repreſented to him the Miſery of the preſent State of the Engliſh Nation, 'That they were utterly ruined and 'ſtroyed by the ill Management of the publick 'Affairs; in which tho' the King himſelf were 'not actually concerned; yet ſo long as he em-'ployed and upheld ſuch unfit Miniſters, he 'could not be thought fit to govern; That 'it is far more intolerable to be Slaves to mean 'Perſons than to the King himſelf, and there-'fore ſo long as the King could not be won 'from maintaining their Pride and Tyranny 'over his Subjects, it was hardly any Crime to 'depoſe that Perſon, who left his Power in ſuch 'baſe Hands; That the preſent Condition of the 'Nation was ſo low and diſtracted, that no-'thing but a preſent Remedy can ſave it from 'utter Ruine; for the ancient Honour of the 'Nation for Chivalry was degenerated into Ef-'feminacy, and the Men who were famous for 'their Courage and Conduct, either put to death 'or baniſhed, the Nobility is contemned and 'ſlighted, the Gentry abuſed, and the Commons 'miſerably polled and taxed, and that not to 'ſupport the Government, but the Pride and 'Avarice of their Fellow-Subjects; That the 'Relief of theſe Grievances could not be ex-'pected from any Hands but his reaſonably, 'not only becauſe he was ſo eminent for all 'warlike Atchievements, but becauſe he had ſo 'near a Relation to the Crown; and therefore 'the Nation had devolv'd their Hopes of Eaſe 'entirely upon him, which he in Honour and 'Duty ought to endeavour, eſpecially ſince 'they had reſolv'd to ſtand by him in the At-'tempt, and it could hardly prove unfortunate 'to him, where ſo much Love, Power, and In-'tereſt were united. The Duke, who had all the Reaſon in the World to hearken to theſe Propoſals, becauſe 'twas the only way left him to revenge the barbarous Death of his Uncle, recover his own Honour and his Eſtate, free himſelf of an uneaſie Baniſhment, and reſtore his Family and Children to their Natural Rights, yet was not ſo much enamour'd with ſo fair an Offer of a Crown, but he was very cautious of the Acceptance, and told them, 'That tho' he 'was ſenſible of the bad ſtate of things in Eng-'land, which ſtood in great need of a preſent 'Redreſs, and was much obliged to his Country-'men for their good Opinion of him, yet he 'was not unſenſible of the great danger in at-'tempting the depoſing of a King, and the fickle-'neſs of People's Affections; which tho' they 'might lead Men into hazardous Attempts, yet 'ſeldom held up to carry them through, and 'therefore could hardly think it prudent to truſt 'to them. He declared himſelf free from all 'ambitious and aſpiring Thoughts, being now 'of more ſtaid Years and Conſideration; and if 'he ſhould engage in ſo difficult an Action, 'twould be more for the Love of his Country 'than his own Honour; That tho' 'twas ſome 'motive to reſcue himſelf and Family from 'ruine, yet it was much greater to retrieve 'an whole Nation; and therefore ſince the No-'bles and Gentry had gone too far to retreat 'with ſafety, he would rather run the hazard 'of his own Life than deſert them; and ſo diſ-'miſſed the Meſſengers with promiſes of Ac-'ceptance if the Nobles and People of England 'would hold to their Petition [b]. This Anſwer, which was carry'd back with as great ſecrecy

The Duke of Lancaſter and Hereford ſollicited to take the Crown.

A. D. 1399.

[a] He cou'd not be ally'd to the Crown the nearer for Mortimer's Death, that Lord having left a Son, Edmund Mortimer, who poſſeſs'd his Right.

[b] He objected to the Archbiſhop the Unlawfulneſs of the Deſign, to whom the Biſhop thus reply'd: Examples of caſting a King out of his State are not rare (I wiſh I could affirm) nor long ſince put in practice, nor far hence to be ſetch'd. The Kings of Denmark and Sweden are oftentimes baniſhed by their Subjects, oftentimes impriſon'd and put to their Fine. The Princes of Germany, about an hundred Years paſt, depoſed Adolphus the Emperor, and are now in hand to depoſe their Emperor Wenceſlaus. The Earl of Flanders was a while ſince driven out of his Dominions by his own People, for uſurping greater Power than appertain'd to his Eſtate. The ancient Britains chas'd away their own King Caractacus, for the Lewdneſs of his Life, and Cruelty of his Rule. In the time of the Saxon Heptarchy, Bernicia King of Mercia, for his Pride and Stoutneſs towards his People was by them depos'd. Likewiſe Alcredus and Ethelred, Kings of Northumberland, were for their Diſorders expell'd by their Subjects. Since the Victory of the Normans the Lords endeavour'd to expel King Henry the Third, but they were not able; yet were they able to depoſe King Edward the Second, &c. Sir John Hayward, Henry IV. p. 67.

A. D. 1399.

as Haſte, ſet the Nobles of England on work to raiſe what Men they could ready to receive him; and the Duke himſelf carrying the Matter very cloſely, obtain'd Leave of the French King to go and viſit the Duke of Britain his Kinſman, that he might paſs the more unſuſpected into England. Archbiſhop Arundel, and his Nephew Thomas Earl of Arundel, lately eſcap'd out of Priſon in England, the Lord Cobham, and ſome other Gentlemen of Note attended him. The Duke of Britain accommodated them with ſome Ships and Men for his deſign; but the Duke had ſo great Confidence in the Engliſh Nobles, that he would carry no Force along with him, but a ſmall Guard of thirty Lances [a]. From Port Blanc in Britain they ſet ſail for England, and being arriv'd, hover'd a while upon the Coaſts to obſerve in what Forwardneſs the Nobles were for his Reception, and where he might moſt ſafely Land. The Earl of Northumberland and his Friends, whoſe freſh Injuries had made them moſt zealous Enemies to King Richard, had ſo well diſpoſed the People of the North to the Duke of Lancaſter, that he eaſily found their Kindneſs to him; and thereupon Landed [b] at Ravon Spurr in Holderneſſe in Yorkſhire. The News of his Arrival was no ſooner ſpread Abroad, but the common People flocked in to his Aſſiſtance, and the Earl of Northumberland and his Son Henry Hotſpur [c], the Earl of Weſtmorland, the Lords Nevill, Roſſe, Willoughby, Darcy, Beaumont, and many other Perſons of Honour, with a conſiderable Body of Men, came to him; inſomuch, that in a very few Days his Army was grown to near ſixty Thouſand well accouter'd and able Men.

The Duke of Lancaſter's Paſſage and Landing in England.

The Duke of York gathers an Army againſt the Duke of Lancaſter.

The Duke of York, who was the Governour of the Nation in the King's abſence, had Intelligence of theſe things, and like a Perſon faithful to his Truſt, took the moſt effectual means to meet the impending Danger; and calling the King's Council together, propounded it to them, to conſult by what ways they might ſecure the Nation in its Obedience to their King, and prevent the Deſigns of the Invader. The chief Men of the Council were Edmund Stafford Biſhop of Exeter, Lord Chancellor [d]; William Scroop Earl of Wiltſhire, Lord Treaſurer; John Buſhy, William Baggot, Henry Green, and John Ruſſel, Knights. Theſe Men, upon deliberate Thoughts, reſolved, That it was beſt to leave London, which had been lately diſoblig'd, and had always been inclined to the Lords Party, and raiſe an Army about St. Alban's, for the Defence of the King and Nation, with which they might oppoſe the Duke of Lancaſter either at his Landing, or before he had gotten a Body of Men together to his Aſſiſtance. This Advice was immediately put in Execution, and an Army of Men, whoſe Loyalty put them upon that Service, gotten together; but when they underſtood that they were to fight againſt the Duke of Lancaſter, they unanimouſly declared that they would not oppoſe him, becauſe his Quarrel was ſo juſt, and they believed he ſought not the Crown, but the Reſtitution of his Right, which it would be the higheſt Injuſtice to keep him from. This Anſwer quite diſcourag'd the King's Friends, for they eaſily ſaw their Army, tho' in number ſufficient to have done much, yet was not to be truſted to; and therefore diſmiſſing it, betook themſelves to other ways for their Security. The Duke of York and Biſhop of Exeter kept a good Body of Men with them [e], but the Lord Scroop, Buſhy, and Green, fled to Briſtol, and fortified themſelves in the Caſtle; Baggot went to Cheſter, and ſo eſcap'd into Ireland.

A. D. 1399.

The Duke of Lancaſter and Hereford, who had found Fortune even to out-go his own Wiſhes, was invited to proceed in his Attempt by it; and therefore having taken an Oath to the Lords, 'That he would neither procure nor permit any 'bodily Harm to be done to King Richard; That 'he would require only the Lands which were 'deſcended to him by Inheritance from his Fa'ther, and in Right of his Wife; That he would 'obtain, that the Commons ſhould be eaſed of 'their Taxes and Subſidies, cauſe the King to ſend 'home his Guard of Cheſhire Men, and bring 'him to a better Order of Government; he 'made all the haſte he could to London, the Me'tropolis of the Nation, of which if he could 'get the Poſſeſſion, he ſhould eaſily maſter 'the reſt. In his Paſſage his Army daily increaſed, partly through the general Inclination that the People had to him, and partly through the Encouragement that Archbiſhop Arundel gave them by his Pardons from the Pope, promiſing Remiſſion of all their Sins to ſuch as would aſſiſt the Duke againſt his Enemies. The Duke of York had gotten an Army to oppoſe the Duke of Lancaſter in his March thither, but they would not Fight againſt him; and ſo he was forced to paſs by him to meet the King at his Landing in Wales. At London the Duke of Lancaſter was received with all Demonſtrations of Joy, ſuitable to the Expectations they had of him: The coſtlieſt Entertainments by Feaſting, Pageants, and Proceſſions, were thought too little Expreſſions of their Happineſs by his Preſence; and as if their Allegiance were tranſferred to him only, they beſtow'd all their good Wiſhes and Promiſes on him, leaving nothing for King Richard but Railings and Curſings. The Duke by his abode here, having ſecur'd the City on his ſide, had little to do but to purſue the Enemies of the common Good; and therefore bent his Courſe to Briſtol, where the three chief Inſtruments of the Nation's Miſery had fortified themſelves, ſending Parties on all ſides to ſeize and plunder the Perſons and Eſtates of all ſuch as did not join with him and his Confederates. The Duke and his Army beſieged the Caſtle of Briſtol, and after four days Siege took it by force, with the Lord Scroop, Buſhy, and Green that held it. The Hatred of the People to them would bear no delay of their Puniſhment, wherefore being arraign'd before the Conſtable and Marſhal, they were found guilty of Treaſon in milleading the King, and were immediately Beheaded. The Duke of York after this Execution, became the Duke's Friend and chief Counſellor. The Parties arreſted the Biſhop of Norwich, Sir William Elmham, and Sir Walter Burley, Lawrence Drew, and John Goloſer, Eſquires; and ſo what through Fear, and what through Affection, the whole Nation ſeem'd in a manner ſubdu'd to the Duke. From Briſtol he went to Cheſter, which receiv'd him with Proceſſions, and yielded their Charter up to him: From hence he ſent his Son into Ireland, with the Duke of Gloceſter's Son, but in their Paſſage the latter was drown'd.

The Duke of Lancaſter marches to London.

While theſe great Changes were working in England, the King was in Ireland, and had no Intelligence of it; for the Iriſh Seas were ſo

[a] Fifteen Lances. Ibid. [b] About the beginning of July. [c] Sir Henry Pierc.
[d] Biſhop of Chicheſter. Sir J. H. The Biſhop of Exeter was in Ireland with the King. Walſ. [e] He gave over the Cauſe. Ib.
[f] He dy'd of the Plague at Cheſter. See Thin's Collection of Conſtables, and Gower's Verſes in Holinſhead, p. 867.

A. D. 1399.

tempeſtuous for near ſix Weeks, that no Veſſels could paſs them: So that, as if Providence had favour'd the Duke of Lancaſter's Attempt, he met with little Oppoſition before he was ſettled in England. The News of it at laſt arriv'd, and put the King into ſtrange Agonies and Perplexities: Something was neceſſary to be done, but what would avail him was paſt humane Invention to contrive. The beſt Advice that could be given him was what himſelf propounded, viz. That he ſhould haſten with his Army into England, and give the Duke of Lancaſter Battel, before his Friends were united with him; and in the mean time he would impriſon the Duke of Lancaſter's Son Henry, and the Duke of Gloceſter's Son Humphrey in the Caſtle of Trim. But the Duke of Aumerle (whether out of Deſign, or Ignorance is uncertain, tho' his Revolt afterward makes the former moſt credible) earneſtly perſuaded the King not to go himſelf into England, till the whole Fleet was ready, which it might be in few Days, and to ſend ſome of his Friends before to gather him an Army, that he might not be in Danger at his Landing. This Counſel the King accepted, and accordingly John Montacute Earl of Salisbury was ſent before to prepare an Army of Welſh and Cheſhire Men againſt his Arrival, which he promis'd ſhould be within ſix Days. The Earl landed at Conway in Wales, and by his Zeal for the King's Service, and ſending Letters to the Genlemen of thoſe Countries, which he had heard or knew to remain Loyal, raiſed an Army of forty thouſand Men, ready to march with the King againſt his Enemies, if he had met them according to his promiſe. But when the Earl of Salisbury, who led them to attend the King at the time appointed, ſeemed to deceive them; and ſome had raiſed a Report, That the King was dead in Ireland, the whole Army was ſo poſſeſs'd with the Fears or Belief of it, that they would not by any Arguments the Earl could uſe be perſuaded to begin any Action, till they ſaw the King, but were contented to ſtay fourteen Days longer for his Arrival; in which time, if it did not happen, they would depart home, as indeed they did, becauſe the King did not leave Ireland till eighteen Days after the Earl left him, and was three Days in his Paſſage. The King with the Dukes of Aumerle and Exeter, the Biſhops of London, Lincoln, and Carliſle, with divers other Nobles, landed at Milford Haven in Wales, and leaving the Forces which he had brought out of Ireland with the Duke of Aumerle at Milford, went in a diſguiſe to Conway to ſee what Army the Earl of Salisbury had got ready to receive him; but he found, that his Delays had robb'd him of his Friends to his great Grief, which he with the Earl of Salisbury much lamented. While the King was gone to Conway, the Duke of Aumerle ſhew'd the Falſeneſs of his Heart by his Actions; for giving it out, that the King had quite left his Army and was fled, he diſmiſſed every Man to provide for his own Safety, and fled himſelf with five Hundred to the Duke of Lancaſter. Thomas Peircy Earl of Worceſter alſo, who was Steward of the King's Houſe, brake his Staff in the midſt of the King's Servants, and ſo diſſolv'd the King's Family, and fled with him. But the Cheſhire Men were not corrupted by theſe ill Examples of others, they went to Conway to the King; where meeting with others of their Countrymen, they made a conſiderable Army, and were reſolved to maintain the King's Right againſt the Duke and his Adherents unto Death. But King Richard having heard, That all the Caſtles from the Borders of Scotland unto Briſtol were deliver'd up to the Duke of Lancaſter, and that all Lords, Gentry, and Commons of the North and South Parts of the Nation had joined themſelves with him, and that his truſty Friends and Counſellors had loſt their Heads at Briſtol, he deſpair'd of all Succeſs; and calling his Army together, licens'd them to depart to their Homes, chuſing rather to ſubmit himſelf to the Mercy of the Duke, than hazard the Lives of his Loyal Subjects in vain: And ſo he with the Dukes of Exeter and Surrey, the Biſhop of Carliſle, Sir Stephen Scroop, and about ten more of his faſt Friends, betook themſelves to the Caſtle of Conway to the Earl of Salisbury, reſolving to keep themſelves there till he could gain better Terms and more Security.

The News of the Duke of Lancaſter's Invaſion of England carry'd to the King in Ireland.

K. Richard Lands at Milford Haven.

The Caſtle of Conway was not only very ſtrong in it ſelf, but ſituated ſo upon the Sea-ſhore that the beſieged might eaſily eſcape into Ireland, if ſtreighten'd by a Siege. Theſe Advantages the King had ſo well ſecur'd, that he fear'd not all the Force of his Enemy the Duke of Lancaſter, who was haſtening with all his Army towards him, being the only Caſtle of moment which held out againſt him. The Duke was not inſenſible of the Impoſſibility of getting the King into his Power by Force, ſo long as he held this Caſtle; and therefore called a great Council of the Peers which adhered to him, to have their Advice how they ſhould get the King into their Power. Force of Arms was generally agreed upon to be of little Uſe in ſo mountainous a Country, and againſt ſo ſtrong a Fortreſs; wherefore it was adviſed by Archbiſhop Arundel, that the King who was always ſimple and credulous, ſhould be dealt withal by Policy; and ſince he had lately ſent the Dukes of Exeter and Surrey to know of the Duke of Lancaſter what he intended, and deſir'd that certain Meſſengers ſhould be diſpatch'd to the King from the Duke with this Anſwer to his Demand, 'That he 'ſought nothing but a peaceable Settlement of 'things for the Good of the Nation, and that if he 'would be pleaſed to call a Parliament, where-'in thoſe who had barbarouſly murthered, or 'adviſed the Death of the Duke of Gloceſter, 'ſhould be puniſh'd, and other Irregularities of Government reformed, he and the 'Duke would be good Friends; only the Duke 'ſhould have his Pardon of all Offences granted 'upon his begging of it upon his Knees, and en-'joy the Office of High Judge, as his Anceſtors 'had it for an hundred Years, to himſelf and 'Poſterity. The whole Council approv'd of this Advice as moſt politick and ſure, and accordingly the Duke ſent the Earl of Northumberland with four hundred Lances, and a thouſand Archers, to deliver the ſaid Meſſage to the King. In his way the Earl had the two Caſtles of Flint and Rutland deliver'd up to him: When he came at a narrow Paſſage near the Town, he divided all his Men into two Ambuſhes, and plac'd them under a Rock, charging them to keep it; and ſo he with five Men only in his Company went to the Town, where as ſoon as he arriv'd, he ſent an Herald to the King to declare, That he was ſent by the Duke about an Agreement between them, and deſir'd to have ſafe Conduct granted him. The King not ſuſpecting any Deceit, immediately gave him Licenſe, and the Earl paſſing over the Water, enter'd into the Caſtle, where he found the King and the Earl of Salisbury, to whom he deliver'd his Meſſage with much Serioufneſs, and after confirm'd it with a ſolemn Oath taken upon the Sacrament, that the Duke ſhould perform what

The King diſmiſſes his Army, and betakes himſelf to Conway Caſtle.

A politick Contrivance to get the King into the Duke of Lancaſter's Hands.

he

A. D. 1399.

he had promiſed in his Name, and if the King pleaſed to go to the Duke and confirm theſe Propoſals, he ſhould depart whether he pleaſed afterwards. The King not believing that Treachery could lurk under ſuch holy and ſacred Oaths, no ways compell'd, agreed to meet the Duke and ſettle this Agreement, intending to paſs afterwards into Wales, and provide an Army to ſecure himſelf againſt all future hazards. The Earl having obtained his deſires, haſten'd the King away with him to the Duke; and having got him on Horſeback, with the Earl of Salisbury, Biſhop of Carliſle, Sir Stephen Scroope, and Sir William Feribee, who attended him, rode along with him to conduct him. The King deſired the Earl of Northumberland to ride before to Rutland to provide them a Dinner, which he ſeem'd diligent to obey, and rode apace from them; but went no farther than his Ambuſhes, to whom giving Notice of the King's approach, and commending their Order, he ſtaid till the King came up, who ſeeing ſuch a company of Men with the Earl, found that he was treacherouſly enſnar'd and betray'd; but he had no way to eſcape their Hands, being on all ſides incloſed with Rocks. The Earl ſeeing the King ſurpriz'd, went to him, and kneeling down to him, told him, That they were a Guard which he had appointed to attend his Perſon; but the King retorted, That they were needleſs, and contrary to his promiſe, who had aſſured him that he would not have above ſix Perſons with him; and in an Anger ſaid, he would return to Conway; but the Earl was then more plain with him, and ſaid, That ſince he had him in his Power, he would now carry him to the Duke of Lancaſter, as he had engaged to do ten Days ſince. The King, tho' unwilling [a], was forced to go forward, and dining at Rutland, was conducted to Flint-Caſtle that Night to lodge. The next Morning the Duke of Lancaſter, who had Notice of the King's Arrival at Flint-Caſtle, drew up his whole Army, conſiſting of an hundred Thouſand Men, round about the Caſtle; and having firſt ſent the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Peircy, and the Earl of Rutland, to the King in the Morning, to prepare and diſcourſe him, the Duke himſelf waited on him in the Afternoon. The King received the Duke with much Calmneſs and Obligingneſs; and when the Duke told him firſt, that he came to obtain the Reſtitution of his Honours and Lands through his favourable Permiſſion; the King reply'd, That he was ready to accompliſh his Will; and when he farther added, That ſince the People complain'd of his rigorous Government for theſe two and twenty Years, he was now reſolv'd to help him to govern better. The King anſwer'd, Fair Couſin of Lancaſter, ſince 'tis your Will to do ſo, it pleaſeth me well. The Duke alſo ſpake to the Biſhop of Carliſle, Sir Stephen Scroope, and Sir William Feribee, but took no Notice of the Earl of Salisbury, who thence gather'd the Duke's deadly hatred to him. After this diſcourſe was over, the Duke order'd the King's Horſes to be brought out, and being mounted with his Friends, conducted him that Night to Cheſter, where he was kept in the Caſtle under the Care of the Duke of Gloceſter's [b] and Earl of Arundel's Sons, who hating him for putting their Fathers to Death, would be more watchful to keep him for the Day of their hoped Revenge. From Cheſter he was remov'd by Nantwich to Newcaſtle in Staffordſhire, where the old Earl of Warwick, recalled from his Baniſhment in the Iſle of Man, met him to upbraid his Severity to him. From hence he was brought by Stafford to Litchfield, and being lodg'd in the Caſtle had like to have eſcaped out at a Window, but was diſcover'd and put under greater Security. From hence he was carry'd in a few Days through Coventry, Daventry, Northampton, Dunſtable, and St. Albans, to London. When the Duke was come within ſix Miles of London, the Mayor and Companies in their Liveries, with Trumpets ſounding, met him, and paid him much more Reverence than the King himſelf. When the Duke came within leſs than two Miles of the City, he made a pauſe, and enquired of the Citizens [c] what he ſhould do with the King? Who anſwer'd, That he ſhould be kept at Weſtminſter; but he ſtay'd only one Night there, and was convey'd the next Day to the Tower, to be kept a cloſe Priſoner till the meeting of the next Parliament. Several Citizens had contriv'd to kill him as he paſs'd through the City; but the Mayor and Aldermen having timely Notice of their Deſign, did by their Vigilance and Care prevent it, and reſerv'd him to a more miſerable Fate.

The King taken by the Earl of Northumberland's Treachery, and carry'd to the Duke of Lancaſter.

A. D. 1399.

The Duke of Lancaſter remain'd ſome Days in the City, at the Biſhop of London's Palace and St. John's Hoſpital without Smithfield, and then retired for ſome time into Hertfordſhire; and having at his firſt coming to London iſſued out Writs [d] in the King's Name to ſummon a Parliament to meet on the laſt Day of September, was extreamly buſie in Conſultations with his Friends [e] how to order Matters in this critical Seſſion. It ſeems that it was fully reſolv'd among them, that King Richard ſhould no longer govern the Nation, but the moſt plauſible Methods of depriving him was thought worthy of Conſultation. Many things were propounded, but the Duke of York's Advice was follow'd, who thought it beſt, that King Richard ſhould both voluntarily reſign his Throne, and be ſolemnly depoſed by the Parliament too; becauſe, as he ſaid, tho' the Judgment of Parliament may make him thought worthy to be depoſed, yet his Deprivation will never be juſt, unleſs he joyn'd in a Reſignation. This Advice was much approv'd, and accordingly put in Execution; for the Day before the Parliament met, which was on the Feaſt of St. Michael, there aſſembled in the Tower Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Richard Scroope Archbiſhop of York, John Biſhop of Hereford, Henry Duke of Lancaſter, Henry Earl of Northumberland, Ralph Earl of Weſtmorland; the Lords Burnell, Barkley, Roſſe, Willoughby, and Abergevenny; the Abbot of Weſtminſter [f] and Prior of Canterbury; William Thirnings and John Markham, Chief Juſtices; Thomas Stoke and Thomas Burbach, Doctors of Law; Sir Thomas Harpingham and Sir Thomas Gray, William Ferly and Dennis Lopham, Publick Notaries. When they were ſet in their places;

Conſultations to depoſe King Richard.

---

[a] The King deſir'd to talk with the Duke, Sir J. H. The ſame Author affirms, That when the Archbiſhop and the Lord Northumberland came to him at Conway, he relinquiſh'd his Sovereignty at the firſt meeting. Life of Hen. IV. p. 83.

[b] The Duke of Glouceſter had but one Son, Humphrey Earl of Buckingham, who was not then arriv'd in England, where, as we have ſaid before, he dy'd ſoon after of the Plague.

[c] The Author of a Manuſcript Hiſtory in the Library at Lambeth, who was preſent at the firſt Enterview between the Duke of Lancaſter and King Richard at Flint-Caſtle, and accompany'd the former in his March to London, writes, That when he came near the City the Recorder and many Perſons of Quality waited on the Duke to deſire him to Cut off King Richard's Head, and the Heads of thoſe that were with him. The Duke anſwer'd, 'Twould be an eternal Reproach to him if he granted their Requeſt, but they ſhould be left to the Judgment of the Parliament.

[d] He iſſu'd out theſe Writs at Cheſter. Rot. Clauſ. 23. Rich. 2.

[e] Of whom the Duke of York his Uncle was principal.

[f] This Perſon was one of King Richard's chief Favourites.

the

A. D. 1399.

the King was brought forth in his Regal Habiliments, and being placed in a Chair of State, he read the form of his Reſignation to this Effect:

K. Richard's Reſignation.

In the Name of God, Amen, I Richard by the Grace of God King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, do hereby acquit and diſcharge all Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earls, Barons, Lords, and all other my Subjects, both Spiritual and Secular, of what degree ſoever, from their Oath of Fealty and Homage, and all others Bonds of Allegiance to me due both from them and their Heirs, and do hereby releaſe them from the ſaid Oaths and Allegiance, ſo far as they concern my Perſon for ever. I alſo reſign all my Kingly Majeſty and Dignity, with all the Rights and Privileges thereunto belonging, and do renounce all the Title and Claim, which I ever had or have to them. I alſo renounce the Government of the ſaid Kingdom, and the Name and Regal Highneſs thereunto belonging freely and wholly, ſwearing upon the Evangeliſts that I will never oppoſe this my voluntary Reſignation, nor ſuffer it to be oppoſed, as judging my ſelf not unworthily deprived of my Regal Dignity for my deſerts. This Reſignation King Richard read with much chearfulneſs and calmneſs, as if he had gladly parted with the Burthen, not Honours of a Crown, and then ſigned and ſubſcribed it in their preſence, deſiring that his Couſin the Duke of Lancaſter, on whoſe Finger he put his Signet, might be his Succeſſor, and appointing the Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of Hereford to be his Procurators, to declare and ſhew this his voluntary Reſignation to all the States of Parliament, and his deſire that his Couſin the Duke of Lancaſter, ſhould ſucceed him in his Throne. And this done, they took their leave of him.

The Monday following the Parliament met and after the Archbiſhop of York and Biſhop of Hereford had declared in the King's Name, that he voluntarily had reſigned his Regal Dignity and Power, which they all both Lords and Commons agreed to and accepted, they proceeded to his Depoſition; and in order to it digeſted all the Miſdemeanours of his whole Reign, as far as they could call them to mind, into 33 Articles of Accuſation, alledging againſt him, 'That he 'had waſted the Publick Treaſure, and given 'away the Poſſeſſions of the Crown to Perſons 'of no merit; That he had impeached certain 'Lords of Treaſon for treating of Matters concerning the State of the Nation, tho' appointed 'to it by Parliament; That he had forced the 'Judges to give their Opinions contrary to Law 'for the deſtruction of the Lords; That he had 'puniſhed the Lords, and fined their Attendants 'for Crimes pardon'd by his Proclamation and 'Charter; That he had detain'd Records of ne'ceſſary concern for the good of the Nation; 'That he had unjuſtly baniſh'd the Duke of Lan'caſter and Hereford, and forbad all his Friends 'to ſue for his return; That he had procured 'Bulls from the Pope to force his Subjects to ob'ſerve Laws made for his own ends; That he 'forbad the Duke of Hereford's Proxies to pro'ſecute or defend his Cauſe, notwithſtanding his 'Grant to him under Seal; That he put out di'vers High-Sheriffs duly elected, and put in his 'Favourites, and kept them in that Office longer 'than uſual; That he borrow'd great Sums of his 'Subjects, and would not pay them; That he 'taxed his Subjects at his pleaſure, and would not 'pay them for Proviſions had of them; That he 'ſaid, All Law was in his own Breaſt and Head, 'and the Lives of his Subjects were in his Hands; 'That he put out Knights and Burgeſſes duly 'elected for the Parliament, and put in Men for 'his own turn; That he had extorted ſeveral 'Sums of the Clergy at his going into Ireland, 'contrary to Law; That he deviſed certain new 'Oaths, and forced his Subjects to take them; 'That he baniſhed the Archbiſhop of Canterbury 'without juſt Cauſe, and gave his Goods to his 'Succeſſor, on condition he ſhould obſerve the 'Statutes made at Shrewsbury and Coventry; with other Miſdemeanours of leſs Importance. Theſe Articles being compoſed in Form and Engroſſed, were brought into the Houſes, and being read, it was demanded of the Lords and Commons, what their Judgment was concerning them? They reply'd, That they were notorious Crimes, and that King Richard being manifeſtly found guilty of the ſame, was worthy to be depoſed from his Royal Authority and Dignity; and thereupon Commiſſioners were appointed by both Houſes to pronounce a Sentence of Depoſition againſt him in the Manner and Form following.

A. D. 1399.

In the Name of God, Amen. We, John Biſhop of Aſaph, John Abbot of Glaſſenbury, Thomas Earl of Gloceſter, Thomas Lord Barkley, Sir Thomas Erpingham, and Sir Thomas Gray, and William Thirning Juſtice, Commiſſioners ſpecially choſen by the three States of this preſent Parliament, repreſenting the whole Body of the Realm for all Matters by the ſaid States to us committed, conſidering the manifold Perjuries and Cruelties, notorious Crimes and Offences, by Richard late King of this Realm committed and done, contrary to the Laws and good Government of the Kingdom, during the time of his Reign, as was made manifeſt to the whole Body of Parliament by ſeveral Articles exhibited againſt him, and by his own Confeſſion of his own Inſufficiency, and Miſdemeanours of Government: We the Premiſſes well conſidering, do by the Power and Authority to us committed, in the Names of all the ſaid States, pronounce, decree and declare the ſaid Richard unworthy of the Rule and Government of the ſaid Realm, and for the ſaid Cauſes do deprive him of all Kingly Dignity and Worſhip, expreſsly forbidding all Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earls, Barons, and Knights, and all other Perſons within this Kingdom, of what Quality or Degree ſoever, from this Day forward to be Obedient or Attendant on the aforeſaid Richard as King and Lord of theſe Realms. This Sentence of Depoſition being pronounced, the ſaid Commiſſioners in the Name of the Parliament reſigned unto King Richard all their Homage and Fealty, which in time paſt they had made or did owe unto him; and ſo King Richard was look'd upon as wholly depriv'd of his Regal Power and Kingdoms.

K. Richard depoſed.

The Report of theſe Commiſſioners being given in to the Parliament, it was preſently voted that the Throne was [a] vacant by the voluntary Ceſſion and juſt Depoſition of King Richard, and therefore they ought to proceed immediately to the Election of a new Prince into the Throne, left by a long Vacancy the Affairs of the Nation ſhould receive any Prejudice. Before any Perſon was or could be mentioned, Henry Duke of Lancaſter roſe up from his Seat, and having croſſed himſelf on the Forehead and Breaſt, as the manner was, put in his Claim for the Kingdom in theſe Words:

The Duke of Lancaſter claims the Crown.

[a] The Throne was not formally voted vacant; but as ſoon as the Depoſition and Renunciation of King Richard were read, the Duke of Lancaſter roſe up and claim'd the Crown by deſcent; after which the Lords and Commons ſeverally and generally conſented to chooſe him for their King.

In

A. D. 1399.

In the Name of God, Amen. I, Henry, Duke of Lancaſter, do claim as my Right the Crown and Realm of England, with all the Dominions and Appurtenances thereunto belonging, being Lineally deſcended from Edmund ſurnamed Crouch-back, eldeſt Son of our good Lord Henry the Third; and through the Right which God of his Grace hath ſent me by his Aſſiſtance, and help of my ready Kindred and noble Friends, who have adventur'd with me to recover the ſame, being at the point of Deſtruction for want of good Government and an orderly Diſtribution of Juſtice. And then he return'd to his Place, and ſat down again.

How far this Claim prevail'd in the Election, 'tis no ways evident. The Archbiſhop, who made the Propoſals, did not think fit to inſiſt much upon this Title, but put it to the Houſes choice whom they would have for their King: For he in order mentioned ſeveral that had a near Alliance to the Crown, and asked the Houſes, Firſt, Whether they would have the Duke of York for their King? And they ſaid, No. Then, Whether they deſired his eldeſt Son Edward Duke of Aumerl? And they reply'd, No. Then he propounded the Duke of York's youngeſt Son, and ſeveral others, but all were refuſed. Then the Archbiſhop pauſing awhile, asked them, Whether they would have the Duke of Lancaſter for their King? They ſaid, We will have him, and none elſe; and ſo anſwer'd three times. The Choice being thus fixed on the Duke of Lancaſter, the Archbiſhops going to him, kneeled down before him, and declaring to him that the People had unanimouſly choſe him for their King, deſired his Acceptance of the Care and Government of the Realm. The Duke being alſo on his Knees when they ſpake to him, roſe up and reply'd, That ſince the Kingdom was devolved upon him by a ſpecial Diſpenſation of Divine Providence, he durſt not refuſe it. Then the Archbiſhop having read to him the Duties of a King, ſigned him with the Sign of the Croſs, and the King kiſſed the Archbiſhop; and the Conſtable taking the Ring with which the Kings were wedded to the Realm, ſhewed it to the whole Aſſembly, and then put it on the King's Finger, and the King kiſſed the Conſtable. Then the Archbiſhops led the King to the Royal Seat, who made his Prayers immediately before it, and then turning himſelf to the Aſſembly, gave Thanks to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and all the States of the Realm; aſſuring them, That he would not by way of Conqueſt diſinherit, or deprive any Man of his Rights and Franchiſes which he now enjoyeth, or hath had by the Cuſtom and good Law of the Realm. Then a general Silence being kept a little time, the whole Houſe gave Thanks to God for his Gift of ſo good a King to the Nation; the Archbiſhop roſe up, and in a Sermon-like Speech upon 1 King 9. 17. from whence he ſingled out theſe Words for a Theme, A Man ſhall rule over my People, declared the Happineſs of this Nation in the Perſon they had choſen; That he was not as the former King, a Child in Underſtanding, tho' not in Years, under whoſe Government they ſuffer'd ſo many Miſeries, but a Man of perfect Reaſon and vaſt Experience and Judgment, under whoſe auſpicious Government we have Aſſurance of a full and free Profeſſion of Religion, a due Adminiſtration of Juſtice, a laſting Peace and Plenty, concluding with a ſhort Prayer, 'That he might long proſpe-'rouſly Reign over the Kingdom, to the Glory 'of God, and the Proſperity of the Nation. To which the whole Aſſembly, with joyful Acclamation ſaid, Amen, and Amen.

A. D. 1399.

The Duke of Lancaſter elected King.

King Richard was thus depoſed from his Royal Dignity, and Henry Duke of Lancaſter ſettled on the Throne [a], when he had reigned two and twenty Years, three Months and eight Days. The Manner and Form of it was ſignified to him by Juſtice William Thirning the next Day, who at the ſame time ſurrender'd back all Homage and Fealty due unto him; but King Richard ſeem'd very little concern'd, hoping, that the new King would ſhew him the greater Kindneſs for his willing Reſignation of all to him. King Henry, as ſoon as the Parliament roſe, went to Whitehall, and made a great Feaſt for all the Members; at which he demean'd him with the uſual Obligingneſs and Kindneſs, without the Majeſtick Reſervedneſs or Diſtance of a King, to the good liking of all his Subjects preſent. In the Afternoon he was proclaimed King by the Name of Henry the Fourth King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland; and Proclamations were publiſhed to continue all Officers and Juſtices in their Places, to preſerve the Order and Government of the Kingdom.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Richard II.

IN the 5th Year of his Reign, when his firſt Wife Queen Anne came from Bohemia, ſhe had no ſooner ſet Foot on Shore, but ſuch a Tempeſt immediately aroſe as had not been ſeen in many Years. Several Ships were daſh'd in Pieces in the Harbour, and the Ship in which the Queen came over was ſhatter'd and broken; which was the more obſervable, becauſe his ſecond Wife brought a Storm with her to the Engliſh Coaſts, in which the King's Baggage was loſt, and many Ships of his Fleet caſt away. Sir John Hayward.

At Newcaſtle upon Tine, as two Ship-Carpenters were ſquaring a piece of Timber, wherever they hew'd, Blood iſſu'd forth in Abundance. Ibid.

In the 6th Year of his Reign, on the 21ſt of May, ſeveral Churches were thrown down by an Earthquake; and on the 24th of May there was an Earthquake, or as Holinſhead calls it, a Water-quake; whoſe Motion was ſo violent, that it made the Ships in the Harbours beat one againſt the other, and very much endamag'd them.

About the ſame time the Uſe of Guns came in, and Sir Hugh Calverly, Governour of Calis, was the firſt that employ'd them in the Engliſh Service.

In his 10th Year Wine was ſo cheap, that the beſt was ſold for 20*s.* the Tun, and that which was not ſo good at 13*s.* 4*d.*

The ſame Year Sir John Montacute, a great Follower of Wickliffe's, order'd all the Images to be taken out of his Church at Shenly in Buckinghamſhire. Holinſhead.

In his 12th Year, while the King was at his Mannor of Sheen in the Month of July, there appear'd on a ſudden ſuch innumerable Swarms of Gnats, that they darken'd the Air. They ſhir-

[a] On Tueſday the 30th of September, 1399.

miſh'd

miſh'd and fought in Parties, the ſlain fell down to the Ground by Heaps at a time; and being ſwept together with Brooms, were found to be many Buſhels full. About a third part of the whole came off Conquerors, and flew away.

In the following Year a Hurricane threw down many Houſes, deſtroy'd Cattel, and rooted up Trees. This preceded a great Mortality, eſpecially among the Youth, and that a Famine; for ſays my Author, Wheat was ſold for 13 d. a Buſhel. Hol. Tho' Money was ſcarce at that time, yet one would think ſuch a Price for Corn had never been the Sign of a Dearth in England.

On the 9th of July, in his 15th Year, the Sun appear'd to be obſcur'd by certain thick and dreary Clouds between that and the Earth; Its Beams ſeem'd of the Colour of Blood, and gave little or no Light from Noon till it ſet. Theſe Clouds roſe daily for almoſt ſix Weeks together. The North and Eaſt Parts of England were at the ſame time ſore afflicted with a Peſtilence: In a few Weeks there dy'd eleven thouſand Men, Women and Children, in the City of York. Hol.

The next Year Wool was ſo cheap, 'twas ſold in ſome places at 22 d. the Stone. The ſame Year a Dolphin was taken near London Bridge ten Foot long: His coming up the River ſo far was an ill Omen of the Storms that happen'd ſoon after.

In his 18th Year an Apparition of Fire was ſeen in divers Places in England in ſeveral Forms, ſometimes like a turning Wheel burning, ſometimes like a Barrel with Flames of Fire flaſhing out at the Head, and ſometimes like a long burning Lance: When it appear'd to any Perſons, it would go as they went, and ſtop when they ſtopp'd. A Head was made at this time, the Cruel Parliament then ſitting, which ſpoke of it ſelf and ſaid, The Head ſhall be cut off, the Head ſhall be lift up aloft, the Feet ſhall be lift up aloft above the Head; which was done, as Holinſhead ſuppoſes, by Necromancy, and as we would think now by a Trick. In April a fiery Dragon was ſeen in ſeveral Counties, and ſome time before there happen'd a Conjunction of the two greateſt Planets Saturn and Jupiter.

In the Reign of this King the moſt Famous Soldiers were Henry Earl of Darby, who ſucceeded him in the Throne, Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Gloceſter, Richard Earl of Arundel; Popular Lords, Henry Earl of Northumberland, and Roger Mortimer Earl of March. For Learning the moſt Eminent were, Henry of Bury an Auſtin Fryar.

Simon Alcock.
Ethred Bolton a Welſhman, and a Monk of Durham.
William Jordan a Black Fryar.
John Hilton a Fryar Minor.
John Clipton a Carmelite Fryar in Nottingham.
Ralph Marham.
John Markly a Gray Fryar.
Thomas Broom a Carmelite Fryar of London.
John Bridlington a Yorkſhire Man.
John Thompſon a Carmelite Fryar of Norfolk.
Thomas Winterton of Lincolnſhire, an Auguſtine Fryar at Stamford.
John Botleſham a Black Fryar of Cambridge.
William Babbie a Carmelite Fryar, Biſhop of Worceſter, and Confeſſor to the Duke of Lancaſter.
William Folleville a Fryar Minor of Lincolnſhire.
Dr. John Bourgh Chancellor of Cambridge.
William Sclade a Monk of Buckfaſt Abbey in Devonſhire.
Thomas Aſhburn an Auſtin Fryar.
John Aſton a Wickliviſt, condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment.
Mr. Caſterton a Monk of Norwich, an excellent Divine.
Nicholas Radcliffe a Monk of St. Albans.
John Aſhwarby a Wickliviſt.
Richard of Maidſtone a Carmelite Fryar of Ailesford.
John Wardbie an Auguſtine Fryar, a great Divine.
Robert Warldbie Archbiſhop of Dublin.
Dr. William Berton Chancellor of Oxford, an Enemy to the Wickliviſts.
Philip Repington a Wickliviſt.
Thomas Lombe a Carmelite Fryar of Lyn.
Dr. Nicholas Hereford one of Wickliff's Followers.
Henry Herkly Chancellor of Oxford, an Enemy to Wickliff, and a great Sophiſt.
Robert Ivory a Carmelite Fryar of London, the 20th Provincial of his Order here in England.
Dr. Lankine a Londoner, an Auguſtine Fryar, an Enemy to Wickliff.
William Gillingham a Monk of St. Saviours in Canterbury.
Peter Pateſhall a zealous Wickliviſt, forc'd at laſt to fly to Bohemia.
William Woodford a Franciſcan Fryar, a choſen Champion of the Papacy againſt Wickliff.
John Bromyard a Lawyer and Divine, one of the ſame Principle.
Marcil Ingelne an excellent Divine and Philoſopher, one of the firſt Profeſſors in the Univerſity of Heidelbergh.
Richard Northall Son to the Lord Mayor of London of that Name.
Thomas Edwardſon Prior of St. Auſtin's Fryars at Clare in Suffolk.
John Somers a Franciſcan Fryar of Bridgwater, an Enemy to the Wickliviſts.
John Swetham Biſhop of Bangor, a violent Adverſary to the Followers of Wickliff.
William Egumond a Fryar-Hermit of the Sect of St. Auſtin's in Stamford.
Robert Withee a Wickliviſt.
Cardinal Adam Eſton advanc'd to that Dignity by Pope Gregory XI. he was Biſhop of London.
John Tiſſington a Franciſcan Fryar, and William Rimſton a Monk of Salleie, both Champions of the Papacy.
Dr. John Beaufu a Carmelite Fryar of Northampton, Prior of that Monaſtery.
Roger Twiford an Auguſtine Fryar.
William Shireburn,
Richard Wichingham, and
Ralph Spalding, theſe were all Prieſts and Fryars, Men noted in thoſe Days for their good Learning and good Preaching.
Henry Daniel a Phyſician.
Simon Bredon the ſame, and an Aſtronomer.
Adam Meremub a Canon of St. Paul's Church, London.
William Packington Secretary and Treaſurer of the Houſhold to the Black Prince.
Henry de Knighton. The three laſt were Hiſtorians.
John Treviſa a Corniſhman, tranſlated the Bible.
John Mohun an Engliſhman born, but bred up in the Univerſity of Paris, he wrote the Romance of the Roſe in French, and 'twas tranſlated by Gefferey Chaucer.

THE

E. Lutterell delin.
P. Vanderbanck Sculp.
KING HENRY THE IIIIth

THE LIFE and REIGN OF HENRY IV.

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1.

K. Henry's Pedegree, Birth, and Succeſſion.

HENRY, ſurnamed, of Bullingbrooke, a Town of ~~Lincolnſhire~~, the Place of his Birth, having obtain'd the Crown of England by the Reſignation of King Richard, and Election of the Three States of the Realm, then aſſembled in Parliament, aſſumed the Government, Sept. 30. 1399. He was the Eldeſt Son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, Fourth Son of King Edward the Third, and after his Father's Death was himſelf Duke of Lancaſter, as he was before in Right of his Wife, Duke of Hereford. The Regal Power did not belong to him in a Lineal Succeſſion after King Richard, becauſe there were yet ſurviving ſome of the Poſterity of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, (the Elder Brother of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter,) by a Female Branch, his Daughter Philippa, who being married to Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, left a Son Roger Mortimer, who had been declared next Heir of the Crown by Parliament in King Richard's Time, and dying left Edmund Mortimer the Heir of his Honour and Eſtate, with ſeveral other Children. But as the great Opinion of Henry's Merit, in reſcuing the Nation from the Tyranny of Favourites, and the Oppreſſion of bad Governours, made no Reward to be thought great enough for him, but that of the Crown; ſo Henry being confident of the People's Favour, and conſidering the Obſcurity of Mortimer's Family, ventured upon it, and, as if the Salick Law had been in Force in England, claim'd the Royal Authority, as the next Heir to it. Edmund Mortimer was not inſenſible of his Right, and tho' he ſaw it in vain, while the Nation was in ſo great a Ferment, and the Minds of the People were ſo paſſionately fix'd upon the Duke of Lancaſter, to oppoſe the Current of Favour, and Power with his Claim, and therefore betook himſelf to Privacy at his Mannor of Wigmore, in Herefordſhire; yet it was very grating to him to hear Henry call himſelf Heir of the Crown of England, and therefore ſaid to his Friends, that he was Hæres malus, ſuch an Heir as the Pirate is to the Merchant's Goods, which he by Force takes from him.

Richard II.

K. Henry's Coronation.

Henry being thus got into the Poſſeſſion of the Crown, uſed all the Arts of a politick Prince, to ſettle himſelf firmly in it, and entail it as ſtrongly as was poſſible upon his Poſterity. The Firſt of theſe he had no other Way left to do, but by his Coronation; which for that End he appointed to be celebrated on St. Edward's Day, October 13. as ſoon as Preparations could be made for ſo great a Ceremony. The latter he reſolved to do by Parliament, which he upon mature Deliberation diſſolved, (becauſe it was called by King Richard, Writ, and therefore its Acts might become diſputable, if it had been continued,) and ſent out his own Writs to have another choſen, which he appointed to meet the next Day after his Coronation, October 14. in order to his Crowning, which drew on apace. He not only ſupply'd all Offices of the Court, which were vacant either by the Deaths of ſuch as had ſuffer'd, or were fled for their Miſdemeanors under King Richard, with ſuch Perſons as were moſt faithful and deſerving, (viz. Henry Piercy, Earl of Northumberland, he made High-Conſtable; Ralph, Earl of Weſtmoreland, Earl-Marſhal; Sir John Norbury, Lord-Treaſurer; Sir John Sherley, Chancellor; and Sir Richard Clifford, Keeper of the Privy-Seal; and confirm'd the other Officers of State, who were to aſſiſt at that Ceremony,) but conſtituted a Special Court to receive the Claims of ſuch as by certain Tenures or Cuſtom were to officiate at it; of which his Second Son Thomas was appointed Steward, (a) and for that Purpoſe kept his Court in Weſtminſter-Hall ſeveral Days together, till all Things were ſettled, and order'd for the Solemnity. The King on St. Edward's Eve lodged in the Tower of London, and there made his Three Sons, with ſeveral of the Sons of the Nobility, and many others to the Number of Forty Six, Knights of the Bath. On St. Edward's Day in the Morning he rode through the City of Weſtminſter, being attended by the Mayor, Aldermen, and chief Citizens of London, cloathed in rich Liveries, and follow'd with a coſtly Equipage, were he was Conſecrated, Anointed, and Crown'd by Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. He was anointed with an Oil, which was then thought to have a peculiar Sanctity, and Excellency in it, being given to his Grand-Father by the Mother-Side, to Henry, Duke of Lancaſter, by a religious Hermite, with this Prophecy; That the Kings that ſhould be anointed with it, ſhould be endued with a Zeal to patronize and defend the Church. King Richard having found it among his Father's Jewels and Treaſures, with a Label, ſignifying the Uſe of it, had a Deſign to have been crown'd again, that he might be anointed with it; but Archbiſhop Arundel aſſerting it unlawful for him to be anointed twice, put him from that Reſolution; and ſo Henry having got it of King Richard, at Flint-Caſtle, by the Archbiſhop's Means, was the firſt that was anointed with it. At his Coronation, King Henry ha-

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1.

Knights of the Bath made at the Coronation.

(a) Thomas Piercy, Earl of Worceſter, officiated for him, the Prince being not above Ten Years of Age.

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1.

ving obſerv'd that his Hereditary Claim was not juſtifiable, (b) and that it began to be ridiculed by his Enemies, cauſed himſelf to be proclaim'd King of England, firſt by Conqueſt, and then by the ſpecial Deſignation of King Richard, who at his Reſignation of his Crown had given it to him, then Duke of Lancaſter, as his adopted Son. And thus did Henry ſeem to himſelf, to have clear'd up his Title, and ſecured himſelf a firm Poſſeſſion of the Crown, which ſome at that time judged to be given him by God's ſpecial Favour and Providence, ſo much the more, becauſe his Coronation happen'd exactly upon that Day Twelve-month, on which he had been baniſh'd by King Richard, as if this great Change of the Kings had been the Reward of the Injuſtice of the One, and the Innocency of the Other, and God had beſtowed Crowns not for Civil Titles, but Deſerts.

(c) The Parliament, according to Appointment, aſſembled the next Day after the Coronation; and having choſen a new Speaker, William Durwood, Eſq; in the Place of Sir John Cheyney, who deſired to be excuſed for his Infirmity and Sickneſs, they were order'd by the King, in the firſt place, to inſpect into the Abuſes of Government, in the Reign of King Richard, and to regulate all Things that had been found prejudicial to the publick Intereſts; to examine the Caſe of the condemn'd Lords; and, more eſpecially, to bring the Murtherers of the Duke of Gloceſter to condign Puniſhment. The Parliament were very zealous to obey ſo juſt a Command; and in purſuit of it, having recited, and condemn'd the Tranſactions of the Parliament, in the 21 Richard II. in baniſhing the Duke of Hereford without any reaſonable Cauſe; in condemning the Archbiſhop, without hearing his Defence; in barbarouſly juſtifying the Duke of Gloceſter's Murther; in denying the Earl of Arundel the Benefit of his Pardons, and putting the whole Power of the Parliament into the Hands of certain ſelect Perſons, to the great Injury of the Nation, they repeal'd, and utterly made void all, and ſingular the Statutes and Ordinances of the ſaid Parliament, and abrogated the Authority and Power given to any Perſon or Perſons by any Act or Law of the ſame, and revived the Statutes of the Parliament held in 11 Rich. 2. by which the Supreme Power of the Nation was put into the Hands of the Duke of Gloceſter, Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and ſome others, till the King ſhould be of full Age to aſſume the Government himſelf. By theſe Acts the Attaint of Blood was removed from the Lords, which had ſuffered, or were condemn'd in the ſaid Parliament; and as a neceſſary Conſequence of that, the Heirs of the condemn'd Lords were reſtored to their Honours and Eſtates by another Act made for that Purpoſe; yet, with a Proviſo, That the Rents of their Lands ſhould not be exacted of the Perſons that had been in Poſſeſſion of them for the time paſt. And becauſe many Things had by the ſaid Parlaiment been made to be Treaſon, which had not been formerly ſo eſteem'd, and that for no other Reaſon, but that the Crimes of the ſaid Lords might be more notorious; yet with ſuch Prejudice to all the King's Subjects, that no Man hardly could behave himſelf cautiouſly enough to avoid the Penalty of it; therefore it was further enacted, That nothing for the future ſhould be eſteem'd, or adjudg'd to be Treaſon, but what was ordain'd to be Treaſon by 25 Edw. 3. A. D. 1399. Reg. 1.

The Statutes of King Richard's pack'd Parliament repeal'd.

The next Thing they enter'd upon, was the Duke of Gloceſter's Murther, concerning which they had a very particular Information given them by Sir John Baggott, then a Priſoner in the Tower, who in a kind of Narrative, among many other Things relating to King Richard's Actions and Sayings, diſcover'd; 'That it was by 'the Advice and Inſtigation of the Duke of Au-'merle, that the Lords were apprehended by the 'King, and that the Duke of Gloceſter was in-'humanely murther'd at Callis; That the Duke 'of Norfolk did keep the Duke of Gloceſter alive 'Three Weeks againſt the King's Will;--but, 'that for fear of the King's Diſpleaſure, both 'the ſaid Duke and himſelf, with ſeveral of the 'King's, and Lord's Servants, went over to 'Callis, and ſaw him put to Death. The Duke of Aumerle denied the Charge brought againſt him by Sir John Baggott, and offer'd to juſtifie his Innocency by Combat, in ſuch manner, as ſhould be thought requiſite; but Baggott not being at Liberty to accept the Challenge, the Lord Fitzwater, with Twenty other Lords, offer'd to make it good by their Bodies, That he was the very Cauſe of the Duke of Gloceſter's Death. The Duke of Surrey ſtood up againſt the Lord Fitzwater; and having affirm'd, that what the Duke of Aumerle had done againſt the Duke of Gloceſter, was by Conſtraint and Force, offer'd to vindicate him by Fight: Their Hoods, which they flung down as Pledges of their Intention, were deliver'd to the Conſtable and Marſhal to be kept. The Parliament might have taken Occaſion from theſe Diſſentions of the Noblemen to have proceeded with greater Severity againſt all the Inſtruments of this barbarous Fact; but the King having preſcribed them ſuch Meaſures as were more ſuitable for his preſent Condition, they contented themſelves to inflict a more moderate Puniſhment on them, viz. That the Dukes of Aumerle, Surrey, and Exeter, the Marqueſs of Dorſet, and Earl of Gloceſter, who had been the Accuſers of the Duke of Gloceſter, and the other Lords, ſhould be reduced to the ſame State they were in before the Arreſt of the ſaid Duke and Lords, loſing not only their preſent Titles of Honour, of Duke, Marqueſs, and Earl, but alſo all thoſe Caſtles, Lordſhips, Manors, or other Poſſeſſions whatſoever, which had been given them ſince the laſt Parliament, and belonged to any of the Perſons whom they had impeach'd, or were held by Gift from the King, and ſhould forthwith bring the Charters and Deeds of the ſaid Lands, Caſtles, or Manors into the Chancery to be cancell'd; and, That it ſhould be utterly unlawful for any of the ſaid Lords to give Liveries to any Retainers, or keep any Perſons about them, but neceſſary Servants; and, That it ſhould be High-Treaſon in any of them to enable, or any ways aſſiſt King Richard, to recover his Crown, and diſturb King Henry in the Poſſeſſion of it.

Duke of Gloceſter's Murther examined and puniſhed.

Theſe Inflictions ſatisfied the King and Parliament, but the Commonalty were not ſo con-

(b) His Hereditary Title was one of the Three by which he proclaim'd, that he held the Crown. The Firſt was, By Right of Conqueſt; the Second was, King Richard's Reſignation and Deſignation of him for his Succeſſor; the Third and Laſt was, His being of the Blood Royal, and next Heir Male of King Richard; which laſt Words in the Proclamation occaſion'd that Pun of Mortimer's, Hæres Malus; but Edmund had his Jeſt, and Henry his Crown.

(c) On the Day of his Coronation his eldeſt Son Henry was by aſſent of all the Three Eſtates created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Cheſter, being then about Eleven Years old; the Crown was alſo ſettled upon him after his Father's Death; and in caſe of the Death of the Prince, on Kings Henry's other Sons.

tented,

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1.

tented, for they repined againſt the King, Archbiſhop, Earl of Northumberland, and others, that they were not put to Death, as well as thoſe who had been immediate Actors; of whom John Hall, who confeſſed himſelf to be one, was in the Time of this Seſſion hang'd and quarter'd, and his Head ſent to Callis, to be ſet upon the Caſtle; 'for, if the Executioner acting by the 'King's Command be guilty of Murther, much 'more the falſe Accuſers and Witneſſes, who 'cauſed his Condemnation; but Moderation was thought more neceſſary at this Juncture, and eſpecially, ſince the King's Authority was pleaded for their Action: But, that no ſuch Pretences ſhould be uſed for the future, a Statute was made, enacting, That it ſhould be no Excuſe hereafter for any Perſons doing an unlawful Action, to alledge, that he was forced and conſtrained by the King; and a general Pardon was then granted to all Perſons, but the Duke of Gloceſter's Murtherers.

Proceedings againſt King Richard.

The Parliament having proceeded thus far in the Matters done in King Richard's Reign, came next to conſider about his Perſon; and the Motion being made how he ſhould be diſpoſed of, (d) that he might not be a Trouble to the King and Nation for the future, the Houſes enter'd into hot and long Debates concerning it, as being a Matter of very great Importance; and among others, who by ſpecial Order of the Houſes were allow'd to deliver their Opinions upon that Subject without Interruption; John Marke, Biſhop of Carliſle, a Perſon both of Learning and Integrity (and as Sir Walter Rayleigh ſays, the only honeſt Man in the Parliament, who ſcorn'd his Life and Eſtate in reſpect to his Sovereign's Right, and his own Allegiance) having always diſliked the former Proceedings, in depoſing King Richard, and ſetting the Duke of Lancaſter on the Throne, deliver'd his Judgment to this Effect, in a grave and learned Speech; 'That the Reſolution of this 'Queſtion being ſo neceſſary for the Settling the 'Peace of their own Conſciences, as well as the 'future Order and Quiet of the Nation, they 'ought to conſider, before they came to any Determination upon theſe Two Things. 1. Whether King Richard be ſufficiently and lawfully depoſed: And, 2. Whether King Henry be juſtly and prudently choſen in his Place. As 'for his own Opinion upon them, he freely and 'boldly laid it down before them thus: That 'though in a popular or conſular State, ſuch as 'of old, the Commonwealth of the Lacedæmonians and Romans at firſt were, and ſuch as the 'Empire of Germany, Kingdoms of Denmark, Swedeland, and Dukedom of Venice at this Day 'are, it may be lawful for the Nobles, or People to reſtrain, or remove their Princes from 'their Imperial Power and Dignity, becauſe 'they have not Regal Rights, yet in ſuch Governments as the Sovereign Majeſty is abſolutely ſeated in the Prince, as it was in the 'Three firſt Empires, and in the Kingdoms of Iſrael and Judæa anciently, and is in the Nations of England, France, Spain, and almoſt all 'the Kingdoms of Aſia and Africa at preſent, 'it is not, nor can be lawful for any, nor all 'their Subjects, whether Nobles or Commons, 'to injure and hurt the Perſons, nor limit and 'abrogate the Power of ſuch Kings, either by 'any judicial Proceedings, or by Force, altho' 'they be become not only unprofitable and hurtful, but intolerable and deſtructive to their 'Subjects; and that becauſe neither one, nor 'all Magiſtrates have any Authority over their 'Prince, from whom all their Power is derived, 'and whoſe Preſence doth immediately ſuſpend 'all their Rule and Juriſdiction; and more eſpecially, becauſe no Subject of what Degree 'or Condition ſoever can imagine, attempt, 'counſel, aſſiſt, or undertake any thing prejudicial to the Perſon or Authority of ſuch 'Princes, but they incur the great and heinous 'Crime of High-Treaſon. Who were more 'cruel, unjuſt, and impious Princes than Nebuchadnezzar and Saul, and yet the Prophets 'Jeremiah and David command Obedience to, 'and condemn all rebellious Attempts againſt 'them? The Law of God allows not the Child 'to lift up his Hand againſt his Parent, be he a 'Robber, a Murtherer, and a Perſon never ſo 'execrable for Villanies, both to God and Man; 'and ſurely our Prince, who is Pater Patriæ, 'the common Father of all his Subjects, and 'therefore ought to be more ſacred and dear 'to us than our natural Parents, may much 'leſs be rebelled againſt or depoſed, though never ſo Tyrannical and Impious. The Oracles 'of God tell us, That King's have Dominion 'over the Bodies and over the Cattle of their 'Subjects at their Pleaſure; and the Church 'hath declared it an Hereſie, to hold, That a 'Prince may be ſlain, or depoſed by his Subjects 'for any Defects, either in his Life or Government. And if it be really unlawful to depoſe 'the worſt of Princes, how unjuſt is it to depoſe good King Richard, who his really guilty 'neither of any Cruelty, nor Impiety. For, 'if we impartially examine the Accuſations 'brought againſt him, we ſhall find nothing either of Truth or Moment objected. Some Errors and Overſights he may be guilty of, but 'ſuch as have proceeded from ſuch Originals, 'viz. want of Experience, or corrupt Counſels, as are very pardonable, and in their 'worſt Effects have not ſavoured of Tyranny, 'or Cruelty; and if theſe Failings may be allow'd as juſt Cauſes of depoſing Kings, the 'beſt of Princes will be daily in Danger, and 'every Tax, Execution of Criminals, or diſapproved Action ſhall arm their Subjects againſt 'them. But ſuppoſe King Richard muſt be depoſed without Authority in us, or deſert in 'him, yet what Right had the Duke of Lancaſter to the Crown? Why did we give it him? 'Heir he could not be to the Crown, not only becauſe King Richard is ſtill alive, and the Living have no Heirs; but becauſe ſome of the 'Poſterity of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, are yet 'ſurviving, whoſe Line by the Judgment of the 'Parliament, holden 8 Rich. II. was declared 'Heirs to the Crown. By Right of Conqueſt 'he could not have it; for being a Subject, all 'War raiſed by him againſt his Sovereign was 'Rebellion; and Victory, Treaſon. As for King Richard's Reſignation of the Crown to the 'Duke, it gives him no Title; for by the Laws 'of the Land the King can't alienate ſo much 'as the ancient Jewels and Ornaments belonging to the Crown, much leſs the Crown it ſelf 'and Kingdom; which, if it were in his Power, yet ſince it was exacted of the King in 'his Impriſonment, and under Conſtraint, it 'can't in Reaſon be thought of any Force to 'bind him; for no Act of a King can be obligatory that is not free, and none is free where 'Liberty is reſtrain'd, and Fear juſtly ſuſpected.

Prerogative of Parliament, p. 85.

Biſhop of Carliſle's Speech in the Parliament.

Neb. 9. 37. Alph. à Caſtro in Lib. de Hær. & Sto de Juſt. & Jur.

(d) Hollinſhead ſays, The Commons Addreſs was to this Purpoſe; That ſince King Richard had reſign'd, and was lawfully depoſed from his Royal D nity, he might have Judgment decreed againſt him. P. 512.

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1.

'We have no Cuſtom in England, that the Peo'ple ſhould elect them a King at their Pleaſure,
'but they are always bound to ſubmit to him,
'who by Right of Blood is the next Succeſſor;
'and therefore the People's Election, as it can 'neither create a Title to the Crown, nor give 'any Regal Right, ſo neither can it make that 'Title good, which is before by Violence got'ten and uſurp'd. 'Twas nothing then that
'raiſed Henry to the Crown, but Ambition in
'himſelf, and a ſeditious Diſpoſition in the 'People, who, though they have gotten greater
'Wiſdom and Courage in their King by the 'Change; yet will find, if not greater Cruelty
'and Policy, ſhou'd the right Heirs ever be able 'to vindicate their Title by Arms, that they 'have entail'd Miſery and Bloodſhed upon them-
'ſelves and Poſterity. From theſe Premiſſes, he 'boldly concluded, That they had neither Pow'er nor Policy to depoſe King Richard, nor 'elect King Henry in his room; That King Ri- 'chard was ſtill their lawful King, and that they 'ought not to paſs any Judgment concerning
'him; That the Duke of Lancaſter had offend-
'ed more againſt the King and Realm by his
'impious Arms, than King Richard hath againſt
'him or us; and if they thought not fit to take 'Notice of Henry's Injuries done to the Nation,
'contrary to his Oath, yet their private and 'publick Dangers ought to deter them from 'any violent Proceedings againſt King Richard.

This Speech how well ſoever it was inward-ly approved in ſuch Men's Minds, whoſe Loyal-ty was ſtifled rather then extinct, yet was out-wardly generally diſguſted, and the Biſhop him-ſelf being apprehended and ſent to the Tower by the Earl-Marſhal, (e) the Houſe proceeded to this Reſolution, and cauſed it to be enacted, 'That King Richard having been lawfully depo-
'ſed from his Royal Dignity for his Miſgovern-
'ment, was by the Clemency of King Henry,
'granted his Life; yet, for the Security of the 'Kingdom, ſhould be kept in cloſe Impriſon-
'ment ſo long as he lived, being allow'd a
'Princely Attendance and Maintenance; but,
'if any Perſon ſhould attempt his Deliverance,
'King Richard himſelf ſhould be the firſt Man
'that ſhould be put to Death for it.

And thus was the Nation ſecured againſt King Richard, and the bad Effects of his Government, as was thought; whereupon the Houſes pro-ceeded to provide as effectually as they could for the future Safety, Greatneſs, and Continu-ance of their new King, his Friends, and Chil-dren; and to that End made ſeveral Statutes, viz. 1. That no Perſons that had been aſſiſting to King Henry, either in ſubduing King Richard, and his Adherents, or in raiſing King Henry to the Regal Dignity, ſhould be hereafter im-peach'd for Rebellion and Treaſon. And where-as King Richard had procured a Bull of the Pope for the more certain Obſervation of ſome Sta-tutes made by him and his Parliament, as tho' there were not ſufficient Power in them to en-force Obedience without the Pope's Concur-rence: This was look'd upon by the Parlia-ment as a Derogation to the Regal Dignity of England; and accordingly, after they had vo-ted it to be an act of Wrong to the Nation in King Richard, to deſire any ſuch Bull of the Pope, they enacted; 'That the Crown of the Realm
'of England, and the Juriſdiction belonging to 'the ſame; as alſo the whole Realm it ſelf is
'ſtill, and at all Times lately paſt hath been at 'ſuch Liberty, and enjoy'd ſuch an independent
'and abſolute Prerogative, that neither the 'Pope, nor any other Prince or Potentate, who 'is out of the Kingdom, ought or may intrude
'himſelf, or intermeddle with the Rule and 'Government of the ſame; and ſo ſecured the full Power of the Regal Dignity to King Henry. And that not only himſelf, but Poſterity might enjoy it, an Act of Settlement was made to entail the Crown upon King Henry, and the Heirs of his Body, lawfully begotten, viz. 'That from 'and after the Deceaſe of King Henry, his El-
'deſt Son Henry, lately created by his Father,
'Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of 'Cheſter, ſhould ſucceed him in the Crown and 'Government of the Nation, and his Heirs af'ter him; but for want of ſuch Heirs, it ſhould
'deſcend and come unto his Three Younger 'Brothers, Thomas, John, and Humphrey, in or'der, in caſe the Heirs of any, or all of them did
'not ſurvive them. By this Parliament alſo Archbiſhop Arundel was reſtored to his See; and Roger Walden, who had been put into it by King Richard, was removed. (f) Other Mat-ters relating to the preſent State and Conditi-on of the Nation were reſolved, and agreed on; as about the Accompts of Sheriffs, the Liberties of Merchants-Strangers, the Neceſſity of ſend-ing Ambaſſadors to the Neighbouring Princes, about the preſent Change, to ſatisfie them in the King's Title, and Reaſon of his aſſuming the Kingdom, with ſuch like Things; and ſo the Parliament was diſſolved.

Henry having thus attended his Parliament for his Eſtabliſhment; and not much minding how other Affairs went, till he ſaw what the Effects of that would be, becauſe he knew that if the Parliament ſtood by him, other Oppoſition would eaſily be conquer'd, found the Engliſh Dominions both at Home and Abroad in great Diſorder, and himſelf to ſtand very dubious, not only of the Affections of many of his own Subjects, but alſo of the Foreign Princes his Neighbours. The Scots, while the Parliament ſat, knowing that the Lords and Gentlemen, who were the Guardians of the Northern Parts, could not be abſent from it in this Juncture, in-vaded theſe Countries; and becauſe the Peſti-lence ſo afflicted the Inhabitants of them, that few Men of Intereſt or Eſtate were left in them, had an Opportunity of doing much Miſchief, which they were not wanting to make uſe of, and took the Caſtle of Warke in Northumberland, and demoliſhed it.

K. Henry's Prudence, in compoſing the Diſor-ders of the Nation, and ſettling his wavering Subjects in Aquitain.

The People of Aquitain, and eſpecially thoſe about Bourdeaux, the Place of King Richard's Nativity, were much diſcontented, and were almoſt reſolved to deſert that perfidious Nati-on, which had proved ſo falſe and treacherous to their natural Prince, fancying they could not expect a Bleſſing from Heaven upon ſo unjuſt an Uſurpation; and to join in Submiſſion, was to bring themſelves, as they ſuppoſed, under the Stroke of the deſerved Vengeance, which was due to ſo unreaſonable a Rebellion. The King of France, who was extreamly incenſed at the Severity of the Engliſh againſt his Son-in-Law, King Richard, becauſe he was diſappointed at once of the Advantage he had propounded to himſelf in ſo good an Alliance, and to his Daughter in ſo great a Match, was not a little pleaſed to ſee his Neighbours in Aquitain ſo much diſturbed at the Change in England; and endeavouring to make their Diſcontents his Advantage,

Ex Anno 1 Hen. 4. Act 27.

(e) He was confin'd in the Abbey of St. Alban's. Hol.
(f) But had the Biſhoprick of London given him.

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1.

vantage, ſent the Duke of Bourbon to ſollicit them to a Revolt, which they had eaſily been tempted to, had not Sir Robert Knolles, the Engliſh Governour there, and ſome of the moſt conſiderate Men over-perſwaded them, that it was Madneſs to yield their Necks to the unſupportable Burthen of French Tyranny, out of mere Fears and Jealouſies of a bad Conſequence of the Revolution in England, which was at beſt changing a Certainty for an Uncertainty, and ſo reſtrain'd their Determination for a Time. King Henry being a watchful and crafty Prince, was not inſenſible of all theſe Inconveniencies to himſelf and Government, but with a wonderful Dexterity he applied ſuch ſuitable Remedies to them all, as, in ſome meaſure, quickly diſpelled the Dangers which ſeem'd thus to threaten him on all Sides. His own Subjects he won by Kindneſs, taking the Dukes of Aumerle and Exeter into particular Favour, and ſpecial Truſt about his Perſon; which Confidence, tho' his Friends blamed him for, yet he choſe to ſhew to them, leſt any Indications of Jealouſie ſhould excite them to diſturb his unſettled State. The Scots he deſpiſed, becauſe they appear'd not as Enemies, but as Robbers. The Neighbouring Princes he endeavour'd to ſatisfie, by ſending an Embaſſage to each of them, fully inſtructed with all ſuch Arguments for his aſſuming the Regal Dignity, as rather made his Cauſe plauſible, than juſtified it; and was ſo ſucceſsful with all the Princes unconcern'd, that they ſeem'd to approve what he had done; unleſs it were the King of France, who reſolved upon a War with England, to reſtore his Son-in-Law, King Richard, being inſtigated to it by many of his Nobles, but chiefly by Valerem, Earl of S. Paul, who had married King Richard's half Siſter. The depoſed King who had been kept a Priſoner in the Tower of London, during the Seſſion of Parliament, was removed to his Caſtle of Leeds in Kent, and a little after ſent to Pomfract Caſtle in Yorkſhire. The People of Guyenne and Aquitain King Henry pacified by ſending over to them Tho. Piercy, Earl of Worceſter, a Perſon faithful to his Intereſts, and very expert in managing Matters of that Nature, with a conſiderable Body of Men. He behaved himſelf with that Prudence and Moderation towards the wavering People, perſwading the better Sort with fair Promiſes and good Arguments to continue their Subjection, and terrifying the common People with Threats and Arms, that he in a ſhort time brought thoſe Provinces to ſwear Fealty to King Richard, and yield as willing Obedience to him, as to any of the former Kings of England; yet he thought fit to plant ſome Garriſons among them, to ſecure their Allegiance, if they ſhould be tempted to revolt, and ſo return'd Home again.

An Embaſſie ſent to the Neighbouring Princes.

A. D. 1400.

Things being thus ſettled, and tolerably compoſed for the preſent, the King was encouraged to keep his Chriſtmas after the uſual Manner at Windſor, in Feaſting and Sports, as being ſecure from all Dangers, which were near at hand, or within his own Dominions at leaſt, and having Time enough to prepare againſt his only open Enemy the King of France. But as Sores haſtily cured ſeldom prove ſound, ſo this ſudden Settlement of Affairs, after ſo great a Change, ſoon appear'd to be weak: For, though the Nation generally approved and liked the King, yet there were many Malecontents, who either out of a true Principle of Loyalty, or out of Pity and Compaſſion to King Richard, or out of Diſcontent for their own Loſſes or Sufferings, deſired and ſought the Fall of the new erected Government. The firſt Attempt that was made towards it, was begun while the King was giving up himſelf to the Pleaſures and Eaſe of Chriſtmas; and that it might carry no Shew of the Miſchief deſign'd, was contrived to be acted in a Sport that was uſual at that time, Mumming, or Juſting, after this manner. The Abbot of Weſtminſter, who was a much better Politician than Divine, and upon that account had been in great Favour and Credit with King Richard, was upon the Depoſition of his Maſter not only troubled for the Loſs of the Honours and Greatneſs he enjoy'd under him; but by the Placing of the Duke of Lancaſter on the Throne, was put in great Fears of loſing what he ſtill enjoy'd, becauſe he had heard him often ſay, when he was a Subject, That the Revenues of the Church were too great, and the Eſtates of the Noblemen in England too little; which made him conclude, That being now King, he would certainly take away the Revenues of the Abbies, to enrich his Nobles, and ſo ingratiate himſelf with the Laity, as well as ſtrengthen his Intereſt with the Great Men of the Nation. To prevent ſuch a Miſchief to the Church, as well as to himſelf, the Abbot invited ſeveral of the Nobility and Gentry, whom he knew to be diſaffected to the preſent Conſtitution, to a Feaſt in his Monaſtery, viz. the Lords lately degraded by Parliament, Edward, Earl of Rutland, late Duke of Aumerle, Thomas and John Holland, the Earls of Huntington and Kent, late Dukes of Exeter and Surrey, John Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, and Hugh, Lord Spencer, late Earl of Gloceſter, Thomas, Biſhop of Carliſle, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Bernard Brockas, Sir Ralph Lumley, Sir Bennet Celey, and one Magdalen, a Prieſt, one of King Richard's Chaplains, in Perſon much reſembling his Maſter; and after Dinner, withdrawing with them into a private Chamber, he propounded the Reſtitution of King Richard. The Earl of Holland, whoſe Mind was full of Revenge againſt King Henry for his late Diſgrace, as well as of Deſires of reſtoring King Richard, who was not only his Brother, but beſt Benefactor, greedily embraced the Propoſal; and having urged it upon the whole Company, 'That they were in Conſcience obliged to endeavour to ſet their lawful King on his Throne again, and depoſe the Uſurper, tho' with Loſs of their Lives; That they had no Reaſon to think it an unlawful Fact, ſince the Laws and Examples of all civilized Nations did not barely permit this Action, but rewarded and honoured the Actors, as the greateſt Benefactors to a Commonwealth: So far prevailed, that they all promiſed their utmoſt Aſſiſtance to deſtroy and murther King Henry, and entred into an Indenture Sextipartite, to bind themſelves each to other to be diligent and faithful in the Undertaking, ſwearing to keep their Deſign ſecret, and attend carefully upon the Execution.

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1.

A Conſpiracy to murther King Henry, and reſtore King Richard, and the Occaſion of it.

K. Henry keeps his Chriſtmas at Windſor.

The Manner of effecting and bringing about their intended Plot, was thus contrived: The Earls of Huntington and Salisbury appointed to celebrate a ſolemn Juſtes, with Twenty ſelect Men of a Side, at Oxford, under a Pretence of diverting the King; and to that End, the Earl of Huntington went to Him, to deſire his Preſence, and that his Majeſty would be pleaſed to be Judge, if any Controverſie ſhould ariſe in their Exerciſe. The King not ſuſpecting any Deceit, promiſed that he would be there at the Time prefix'd, and the Earls made ſuch Preparations as if they were in Earneſt, reſolving, that when the King was intent upon the Sport,

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1.

Sport, a Party of Men, placed conveniently on purpoſe, ſhould fall upon him, and kill him. The Plot went on ſmoothly and unſuſpected till the Day drew near, and the Lords, having all Things in a Readineſs, were preparing to ſet forward for Oxford. The Earl of Rutland, late Duke of Aumerle, who was one of the principal Conſpirators, was as forward as any in the Deſign; but as he was paſſing to Oxford, left his direct Way to give his Father, the Duke of York, a Viſit, and dine with him. The Earl had brought with him the Counterpart of the Indenture, in which he was bound to the Confederates, and having put it in his Boſom as he was eating, it was eſpied by his Father, who immediately ask'd him what Writing it was, and what was the Purport of it? The Earl, conſcious of the Subject, and knowing how ungrateful ſuch an Enterprize would be to his Father, ſubmiſſively told him, That it was nothing that concern'd him, and humbly begg'd that he might be excuſed. But the Duke ſeeing his Son's Backwardneſs to ſhew him the Writing, accompanied with Fear and Surprize, was the more eager to know the Contents of it, and ſwearing by St. George, That he would ſee it, flew upon his Son, and by Force took it from him. When the Duke had read it, and ſaw the Treaſonable Deſign carry'd on by it, he burſt out into a great Paſſion at his Son, charging him not only with Treaſon to the King, but the moſt ungrateful Perfidiouſneſs to himſelf, who being bound for his Allegiance in the laſt Parliament, was involved in the ſame Ruine and Deſtruction with him: And therefore told him, That ſince he had ſo little Regard to the Safety of a Father, that had been ſo tender of his Son's Preſervation, as to lay down his Life as a Pledge for it, he would take Care to ſecure his own Life, tho' with an Hazard to his Son's; and thereupon order'd his Horſes to be ſaddled, to go to Windſor, and diſcover the whole Matter to the King. The Earl of Rutland, affrighted with his preſent Danger, and having his Conſcience, as well as his Father, for his Accuſer, was in great Perplexity what he ſhould do; and tho' he was unwilling to deſert his Confederates, yet, now ſeeing nothing but unavoidable Ruine to attend the Proſecution of their Deſign, becauſe the King would, by his Father's Diſcovery of it, have Time to avoid their Contrivance, and provide againſt them, he reſolved to become the firſt Betrayer of the Plot himſelf, and therefore taking Horſe as ſoon as his Father was gone, rode another Way to Windſor, and got to the King before him, Youth and Danger putting Spurs to his Horſe. As ſoon as he arrived at the Caſtle, and had gain'd Admiſſion, he pretended earneſt Buſineſs with the King, and having cauſed the Gates to be lock'd, took the Keys with him. Being come into the King's Preſence, he kneel'd down to him, and with a trembling Voice, and dejected Countenance, begg'd his Mercy and Pardon. The King wondring at his Petition, ask'd him, For what Offence? Then the Earl gave him a full Account of the Conſpiracy, and Conſpirators, with the Manner and Deſign of the Execution of it. The King, neither raſhly credulous, nor imprudently careleſs of his own Safety, entertain'd the Diſcovery kindly, and told the Earl, That if his Relation were true, he would pardon him, but if he ſought to impoſe upon him, it ſhould be at his own Peril. Theſe Things had hardly paſſed between the King and Earl, but the Duke of York arriv'd, who by delivering the Indenture to the King, gave him a ſufficient Demonſtration of the intended Treaſon and Plot againſt his Life: So that after he had read and peruſed it, there was no Room left to doubt of the Confeſſion he had receiv'd from the Earl of Rutland; wherefore, making ſome Reflections upon the Baſeneſs and Ingratude of his Enemies, whom he ſpared, contrary to the Deſire of the People, in thus ſeeking his Ruin, he turn'd his Thoughts to more neceſſary Conſiderations, how he ſhould ſecure himſelf, and defeat the Deſigns of his Enemies, for his Intention of going to Oxford ſunk of it ſelf. And for that End he wrote his Letters to the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, and ſuch of his Friends as he had in other Countries, to provide what Forces they could raiſe with all Speed, and come to him to London, whether he poſted as faſt as he could, for fear leaſt his Enemies ſhould ſurprize him at Windſor; and (g) having acquainted the Major with his impending Danger, provided a Force in the City for his Defence, reſolving to ſtay there till he could find what Courſe his Enemies would take againſt him.

Conſpiracy betrayed by the Earl of Rutland.

The Lords carried on the Rebellion after Diſcovery.

The Lords, and the reſt of the Conſpirators at Oxford who waited in Expectation of the Earl of Rutland, not hearing of his or the King's Approach, eaſily gueſs'd, that the Plot was betray'd, and therefore conſidering, that they had ſo lately been pardon'd, and could not hope again for Mercy, which they had ſo groſly abuſed, reſolved to undertake by open Arms, what they had contrived to effect more privately: And that they might get as great a Party as was poſſible, they cloath'd Magdalen in Royal Robes, and gave it out, That King Richard had made his Eſcape from Pomfret-Caſtle, and was come among them to recover his Right, having their Pſeudo-Richard ready to juſtifie their Pretences to the Scrupulous and Inquiſitive. And becauſe they knew, that the King of France would be glad of an Opportunity of reſtoring his Son-in-Law K. Richard, they ſent to him for his Aſſiſtance, and tho' it was not poſſible to have it preſently, yet hoped, he might contribute ſomething in the Spring to their Succeſs. In the mean time, they ſent out their Emiſſaries, to gather as great Numbers out of the Nation to reſtore King Richard, as they could, and wrought ſo far upon the People, who generally pity'd the hard Fate of the Captive King, that in a few Days they had gotten together 40000 Men well arm'd. This proſperous Beginning ſeem'd an Omen of their good End; and, that they might effect their Deſires as ſoon as poſſible, they march'd firſt towards Windſor againſt King Henry, whom if they could ſurprize, they hoped to make a ſpeedy Concluſion of the Nation's Troubles; but the King was eſcaped to London the Night before, and ſo they miſs'd of their Prey. This Diſappointment put them into great Doubts how to proceed effectually againſt him. Some adviſed to march forward to London, and ſet upon the King, while the City was unreſolv'd, and in no Readineſs to make any Reſiſtance, which as it was the beſt Courſe they could take, ſo it ſhew'd a brave Courage in the Adviſers: But the moſt part, who were more timorous and cautious, thought it better to releaſe King Richard firſt, leſt if (g) He ſtaid a Day or two at Windſor, but hearing the Conſpirators had got 40000 Men together, he ſtole away in the Night to London; and a few Hours after he was gone, the Rebels came to Windſor. Sir J. Hayward's, Henry IV.

it

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1.

it ſhould be diſcover'd, that he was ſtill in Priſon, all their Plot ſhould be unravell'd. This Counſel, tho' the worſt, was accepted, and in purſuit of it, they turn'd back to Colebrook, and ſo went to Sunnings, near Reading, where Queen Iſabel's Palace was; to whom they gave this Account, That the King was gotten from his Impriſonment, at Pomfract, and at the Head of an Army of 100000 Men. Which News was ſo pleaſant to the Queen, that ſhe immediately defaced King Henry's Arms, and pull'd off his Badge from her Servants, who were engaged to wear it, (b) and then departed with the Lords to meet King Richard; exhorting the People, as they paſſed along, to take Arms to vindicate their injured King, who was, and is, and ſhould be their Sovereign. They paſſed through Wallingford, and Abbington, and at length came to (i) Cirenceſter; where having encamp'd their Army in the Fields, the Lords took up their Lodgings in the Town, the Earl of Kent, late Duke of Surrey, and Earl of Salisbury, in one Inn; and Earl of Huntington, late Duke of Exeter, and the Lord Spencer, late Earl of Gloceſter, in another Inn. The Bailiff of the Town, who was a firm Friend to King Henry, obſerving the ill Conduct of this rebellious Rout, and knowing, that if the Heads of the Faction could be ſuppreſſed, the miſguided Multitude would melt away of it ſelf, look'd upon the impolitick Separation of the Lords from the Body of the Army, to be a good Opportunity of ſuppreſſing the Rebellion, if he could get them into his Power, which ſeem'd no difficult Matter, becauſe they lay in weak Inns, with no Guards, but a ſmall Attendance of Servants: Wherefore, getting together about Eighty Archers, and ſuch other Arms, as the Time would give leave, he beſet the Inns; and though the Duke of Exeter and Earl of Salisbury with their Men made as brave a Reſiſtance as the Place and their Company would permit; yet they were at length all, but the Duke of Exeter and Sir John Shelly taken, and carried Priſoners to the Abbey. All Means was uſed by the Servants of the Lords, and their Retainers to further their Eſcape, for they ſet the Town on fire in ſeveral Places, hoping, that while the Townſmen were buſied to ſave their Houſes and Goods, their Maſters might have Opportunity to get from them: Others fled to the Army to relate the Accident, and bring them to reſcue their Captains and Leaders, but all proved in vain; for the Townſmen enraged by the miſchievous Action, neglected their Houſes, and bringing forth the Lords, whom they look'd upon as the Authors and Adviſers of this cruel Act, beheaded Two of them in the Market-place, viz. The Duke of Surrey, and Earl of Salisbury. And the Army ſeeing the Fires in the Town, ſuppoſed that King Henry, who had gotten a good Army of Londoners, and others, and was purſuing them, had entred the Town; ſo every Man fled to ſave themſelves.

The Rebels routed at Cirenceſter.

Several of the Chief of the Rebels executed at Cirenceſter.

King Henry was by this Time arriv'd at Oxford, with Intention to ſtop the Progreſs of the Rebels; but the Service of the Men of Cirenceſter had made his Arms uſeleſs, being met there with the good News of their Diſperſion, and a ſtrong Guard, with Sir Bennitt Shelly, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Bernard Brockas, and Twenty Eight Lords, Knights and Gentlemen more, who were the chief Leaders of the Rebellion, whom they had taken and ſent to be diſpoſed of at the King's Pleaſure. Theſe he immediately cauſed to be executed there. Some of the Lords, and others who were Chief in this Revolt, were fled, as the Duke of Exeter and Sir John Shelly, (k) who got into Eſſex, and attempted ſeveral Times to get over into France, but were driven back by contrary Winds; and ſo at length were taken at Prittle-Well, and being carry'd to Pleſhy, were executed in the very Place where the Duke had before arreſted the Duke of Gloceſter; a juſt Reward, as was then thought, of his Wickedneſs to that Nobleman. The Earl of Gloceſter fled towards Wales, but being taken, was Beheaded at Briſtol, and Magdalene, the Counterfeit Richard, with one Fezeby, another of King Richard's Chaplains, were apprehended in their Flight to Scotland, and being brought to the Tower of London, were hang'd and quarter'd. The Heads and Quarters of many of the Conſpirators were ſet upon London-Bridge, and ſent into other Parts of the Nation to be a Terrour to the King's Subjects againſt ſuch Attempts for the future, which, though a juſt Puniſhment, yet favour'd ſo much of Cruelty, that many grave Men were diſcontented at it, and ſpared not to ſay, That in a ſhort time they ſhould wiſh they ſtill had had King Richard for their Governour, the Faults which proceeded from his Remiſneſs and Mildneſs being more tolerable than the Cruelty of their new King. But yet, for the preſent, all Things ſeem'd quiet, and the Rebellion was perfectly allay'd, which though it was a great Satisfaction to King Henry and his Friends, yet was born ſo heavily by the Abbot of Weſtminſter, who was the Author of it, that for mere Grief of the Diſappointment, he fell ſuddenly into a Palſey, of which he ſhortly after died. The Biſhop of Carliſle had the like Death about the ſame time; for being condemn'd for this Rebellion, he prevented his more ſhameful Execution by dying for Grief and Trouble in Priſon. And thus moſt of King Richard's beſt Friends were taken off by this firſt Attempt.

But altho' this Conſpiracy againſt King Henry's Life and Dignity was by a propitious Providence diſappointed, and the Actors periſh'd as ſuddenly and exemplarily as the King himſelf could have deſired; yet ſo long as the Cauſe remain'd, and King Richard was alive, he thought he could never promiſe himſelf any Security, but, upon every ſmall Diſcontent, the plauſible Pretence of reſtoring King Richard to his Throne would be made uſe of to revenge themſelves, and diſturb his Quiet: He ſhould be always look'd upon as an Uſurper ſo long as King Richard, whoſe Right was confirm'd by 22 Years Poſſeſſion, ſurvived; and, notwithſtanding the Rebellion was now appeas'd, yet what Reſpite could he hope from the like Attempts, ſo long as the Body of the Rebels ſtill remain'd, wanting only Heads to lead them. Theſe Arguments, grounded upon ſtrong Fears and Preſumptions, made him think King Richard's Death neceſſary firſt, and after put him upon Reſolutions of deſtroying him. Our Hiſtorians differ much in the Manner of his Death, tho' moſt agree it was by Henry's Means: For that King Richard ſhould voluntarily ſtarve himſelf for Diſcontent at the ill Succeſs of the late Rebellion, as ſome have related, ſeems very

K. Richard murther'd

(b) The King's own Servants attended on her.

(i) at Chicheſter.

(k) They got out of Chicheſter, while the Duke of Surrey, the Earl of Salisbury, and the other Conſpirators, were fighting with the Townſmen, and coming to the Rebels Camp, found them diſperſed at the Sight of the Fire in the Town.

im-

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1.

improbable, becauſe he could not be ſo ignorant of the uncertain Events of Battles and Warlike Attempts, as to be ſo impatient for a Diſappointment, nor had Reaſon to deſpair of future Endeavours for him, ſince of the many Thouſands that join'd for his Reſtoration, he had not loſt Half an Hundred. Thoſe that impute King Richard's Death to King Henry's Order or Encouragement, diſagree in the Method of doing it. Some ſay, He was, by his Order, kept Fifteen Days together from Food, and ſo, by the Help of Cold, ſtarv'd to Death. Others write, That he was every Day ſerved with Plenty of Diſhes fit for a King's Table, as was order'd by Parliament, but not permitted to touch any of them, and ſo died with Hunger: But both theſe Ways of deſtroying were ſo plain and barbarous, that moſt of our Modern Hiſtorians are of Opinion, That King Henry would not ſo notoriouſly contradict his Promiſe, which he had ſo lately made in Parliament, That King Richard's Life ſhould not be touch'd. And therefore the general Current of our Writers follow the Relation of an Author (l) of thoſe Times, who ſeems to have had very good Intelligence of his Death, and relates it thus: That K. Henry ſitting at Table one Day very ſad and melancholy, burſt out into theſe Words, How miſerable is my Condition! who live in continual Fears and Dangers from but one Cauſe, and yet have no Man ſo much my Friend as to free me from them. Sir Peirce de Exton hearing theſe Words, eaſily gueſs'd what the King meant, and though he knew them to be no Order or Command, yet he believ'd it would be the more acceptable Undertaking to execute his Deſire without an expreſs Command from him; and therefore immediately haſten'd, with Eight Ruffians, to Pomfract to execute his bloody Deſign. When he was arrived, he order'd the Gentleman, who uſually was King Richard's Taſter, to neglect his Service, and let him eat what he pleaſed, becauſe he ſhould not eat long. When his Dinner therefore was ſerved in, the Taſter omitting his Duty, King Richard demanded the Cauſe of it, who reply'd, That Sir Peirce de Exton, who was lately come from the King, had forbad him. At which Anſwer King Richard, being angry, catch'd up the Carving-Knife, and ſtriking the Taſter with it, ſaid, The Devil take Harry of Lancaſter, and thee together. As the King ſpoke theſe Words, came in Sir Peirce himſelf, and his Eight Attendants arm'd. Their Deſign was eaſily known by the Roughneſs of their Entrance, and King Richard was ſo far from being daunted at their Preſence, that he wrung an Pole-Ax out of one of their Hands, and ſtood upon his Defence. The Ruffians and Sir Peirce undauntedly purſued their Intent, and aſſaulted the King, who ſo well defended himſelf, that he kill'd Four of them before they could maſter him. At length Sir Peirce himſelf coming behind him ſtruck him a Blow on the Head, and fell'd him, and ſo he died. The News of King Richard's Death, however it might inwardly pleaſe Henry, yet he openly received it with no ſmall Signs of Sorrow for his untimely Fate, and as great Diſguſt to the Inſtruments of it; ſo that Sir Peirce, who expected a Reward for this Piece of Service, was quite put out of Favour, and forced to flie to eſcape the Puniſhment due to his Crime, which the King, to ſave his own Honour, ſeem'd zealous to execute, and died in Diſcontent, and Horrour of Conſcience.

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1.

Thus did King Richard end his Life, after he had lived 33 Years, and reigned 22, ſome few Months after his Depoſition. He was a Man of a very well-proportion'd Body and graceful Perſonage, of a very liberal and kind Diſpoſition, which, for want of more Age and Experience, expoſed him to the Flatteries and crafty Inſinuations of ſuch as were about him, and humour'd his Genius to Pleaſures and Paſtimes, which he much lov'd and follow'd. He was by Nature every way qualified to have made an excellent King, neither wanting Underſtanding to rule, not Courage to defend a Nation; but being corrupted in his Youth by Flattery, and miſled by lewd Perſons, he neither knew himſelf nor others, which was the only Cauſe of his Ruine; for had he dared to do as much at his laſt Arrival in Wales, as he did at his Death, or had he made better Choice of Friends, as he had Judgment enough to have done, he might have kept his Kingdom, perhaps, longer than he did. He was guilty certainly of many Faults in Government; but thoſe, either really none of his own, or for want of Experience; which, had they happen'd in other Times, might have been born with, but meeting with Pride and Ambition in the Great Ones, and Diſcontents in the People, proved his Deſtruction.

The Character of K. Richard.

King Henry, being thus rid of his Fears, took ſuch Care of his Funeral, as ſhew'd, that he neither neglected him, nor would own him for a Rival in his Dignity. His Body being embalm'd, and wrapp'd in Sear-Cloaths, was cover'd with Lead all but the Face, and ſet in the Minſter at Pomfract ſeveral Days to be ſeen of all Perſons, who, either out of Curioſity or Pity, would behold him. From thence it was removed to London, and in moſt of the principal Towns as it was carry'd along, was ſhew'd to all Spectators. In its Paſſage thro' the City, the Corps was carried bare-faced, and being brought to St. Paul's, lay Three Days alſo open to all Beholders, in which time was kept a ſolemn Obſequies to the deceaſed Prince, both in that Cathedral, and at Weſtminſter, King Henry himſelf being preſent at them, with all the Magiſtrates, and chief Men of the City. Theſe ſacred Offices being perform'd according to the Religion of thoſe Times, the King commanded his Corps to be carried down to Langley-Abbey, in Buckinghamſhire, and there buried in the Church of the Friars-Preachers, which was accordingly done by the Biſhop of Cheſter, and the Abbots of Waltham, and St. Albans; none of the Nobles or Commoners being allow'd to attend it, nor any Dinner, or other Ceremony uſed at it, as was the Cuſtom of thoſe Times. But King Henry afterwards had his Body brought back again, and magnificently entombed at Weſtminſter, by the Body of his Queen Ann, by this pious Deed endeavouring to expiate his Father's Injuſtice, and Cruelty done to that King.

The Interment of King Richard at Langley.

Much about the Time of King Richard's Death, deceaſed alſo the Dutcheſs of Gloceſter, who being extremely grieved for the Loſs of her Eldeſt Son Humphrey, who died of the Peſtilence at Cheſter, ſunk under the Load of her Sorrows, and departed this Life. Thomas Mowbrey, Duke of Norfolk, who, for his Accuſation of the then Duke of Hereford, but now the King, was baniſh'd for his Life, died alſo in Several great Perſons died.

(l) Thomas of Walſingham.

Exile

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1.

Exile at Venice, John, Duke of Brittain in France, who had for his firſt Wife Mary, Daughter of King Edward the Third, deceaſed alſo, leaving behind him a Widow Joanna, who was not long after marry'd to King Henry, and three Sons, John, Richard, and Arthur. Edmund, Duke of York, alſo yielded to Mortality about this Time, and left two Sons, Edward, late Duke of Aumerl, and then Earl of Rutland, who was Heir of his Honour and Eſtate; and Richard, Earl of Cambridge, who marrying Anna Mortimer, the Heireſs of Roger Mortimer, Earl of Mareh, and Daughter of Philippa, the only Child ſurviving of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, became afterward a Competitor for the Crown. He carry'd himſelf in his Nephew King Richard's Reign with ſuch Prudence and Caution, that he neither incurr'd the Odium of the Court or People, as almoſt all the reſt of the Nobility did, but was truſted by the King, and yet loved by the Commons. Under King Henry he ſhew'd more Compliance to the Change of Government, than was thought agreeable to the Relation he had to the King; but there was ſo great a Neceſſity of ſubmitting where all Oppoſition had been fruitleſs, that even in this worſt Action of his Life, he kept up his Reputation of Honeſty and Prudence to the laſt, and died lamented and honour'd; his Moderation in all times gaining him both Praiſe and Safety.

The D. of York's Death and Character.

King of France ready to invade England, deſiſts from it upon the News of King Richard's Death.

While theſe Things happen'd in England, Charles, King of France, who had reſolved to revenge the Wrong done to King Richard by the Engliſh, was very active and buſie to gather ſuch an Army, as might be able to effect his Deſign; and by the Aſſiſtance of his Nobility, who readily concurr'd with him in ſo great a piece of Juſtice, had got all Things neceſſary for that Expedition ready againſt the Spring, and was come down with a mighty Army into Picardy; from whence he intended to ſail over into England: But the News of the Death of King Richard being brought to the Army, chang'd their Reſolutions; and now ſince they ſaw it impoſſible to reſtore him, the King and chief Men engag'd in that Enterprize, thought it the beſt way to deſiſt from the Invaſion, which, though it had ſome ſhews of Advantage by plundering ſo rich a Country, for which End ſome deſir'd it might go on, yet had ſo much evident Hazard attending it, that moſt were willing and glad of the Opportunity of laying it aſide, and ſo the Army was diſmiſſed: And it was reſolv'd, that a ſolemn Embaſſage ſhould be ſent over to Henry to demand, that Queen Iſabell ſhould be ſent into France to her Father with her Dower, which was accordingly done; but King Henry would give them no other Anſwer than this, That he would ſhortly ſend his Commiſſioners to Callis to treat and conclude with their Maſter about that, and ſeveral other Affairs of Importance to both Realms, and then would do what was Juſt and Reaſonable.

The Welſh rebel under Owen Glendour.

This Summer the Welſh weary of Subjection to the Engliſh, and thinking this a fit Opportunity to revolt, when Subjection was grown a diſputed Duty, ſet up Owen Glendour to be their Prince and Captain, and aſſociating themſelves in a firm League under him, reſolv'd to recover their Ancient Liberty, and free themſelves from the Engliſh Yoke. This Owen was of no great Parentage among his People nor Eſtate; but being a Gentleman of great Courage and Boldneſs in himſelf, and becauſe he had been a Servant to King Richard at Flint-Caſtle, was very forward to oppoſe and annoy King Henry's Dominions, partly to vindicate his Old Maſter, and partly his own private Wrongs. The latter he thought would be the more plauſible Pretence for his Rebellion; and therefore having had a Quarrel with Reginald, Lord Gray of Ruthen, about a part of a Common which lay between their Eſtates, and had been enjoy'd by Owen ſome time in King Richard's Days, but was lately adjudg'd by Law to belong to the Lord Gray, to the great Diſcontent of Owen Glendour, who taking occaſion from the rebellious Humour of his Country-men, invaded the Lord Gray's Eſtate, with a Body of Men, burns his Houſes and Woods, tramples down his Corn, and barbarouſly murder'd his Servants and Tenants. The Lord Gray, with ſuch Aſſiſtance as he could get among his Neighbours and Friends, ſtood up in his own Defence, and ſought to ſubdue his Enemies: But being overpower'd by Owen Glendour and his Welſh Men, was taken Priſoner himſelf, and many of his Aſſiſtance kill'd. Owen, glad of this Advantage to raiſe his Family, treated the Lord very gently and civilly, and promiſed him Liberty upon Condition, that he would marry his Daughter: But the Lord at firſt ſcorn'd the Offer; yet at length conſidering that he was unable to diſcharge his Ranſom without a greater Damage to his Eſtate accepted it, and was marry'd to her, which was not ſo grateful to Owen, as to oblige him to releaſe him, becauſe he look'd upon it as only a crafty Deſign, and therefore he as deceitfully dealt with him, and kept him Priſoner till his Death. The Succeſs which the Welſh had againſt the Lord Gray, ſo encouraging'd them, that they made another Inroad into Herefordſhire, and having ſpoil'd and harraſſed the Country, return'd with much Riches and Prey. Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, who was retreated to his Manner of Wigmore, in that Country, being much griev'd for the Miſeries of his Country, aſſembl'd all the Gentry of thoſe Parts to oppoſe the Inſolencies of their Neighbours, and engaging with them, maintain'd a bloody and long Battel; but by the good Conduct of Owen, who like a brave Commander encourag'd his Men to hold out, with the Glory of Victory, and Promiſes of Reward, they were overcome, above a Thouſand of the Engliſh being ſlain, and the Earl of March himſelf taken Priſoner: The Welſh grew very Inſolent by this Victory, and not only abuſed the Bodies of the ſlain, but having loaden the Earl of March with Chains, put him into a naſty and irkſom Dungeon, and ravag'd all the Countries on the Weſt of Severn, burning and deſtroying the Towns and Villages with extreme Barbarity. King Henry was not inſenſible of theſe Miſchiefs, but either looking upon them as the Effects of a private Quarrel between the Welſh and their Neighbours, or elſe being taken up with Matters of greater Moment, would not concern himſelf in them; and though he was ſolicited much by the Friends of the Earl of March to revenge his Quarrel, and redeem him from Captivity, yet he would not liſten to their Deſires, knowing his Title to the Crown, and his Liberty might be a Damage to him, but told them, The Earl had not engag'd in his Quarrel, and therefore he was under no Obligation to redeem him.

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1.

Reg. 2.

The Earl of March taken Priſoner by the Welſh.

While theſe Things were done by the Welſh, the Scots were not idle in moleſting England both by Land and Sea, though with no great Advantage to themſelves, the Engliſh doing as much Damage to the Scots in the Iſles of Orkney, as they had done in Northumberland, and taking the greateſt part of their Fleet, which they had

The Scots trouble England, and War is proclaim'd between the Two Nations.

A. D. 1400. Reg. 2.

ſent out, under the Command of Sir Robert Logon, to ſurprize the Engliſh Fiſhermen; yet ſo long as Damages were equal, the Peace was not actually broken, till King Henry was thought to give an Occaſion to Robert, King of Scots, to proclaim open War upon this Account, and for this Reaſon: George Dunbarr, Earl of the Marches of Scotland, having betroth'd his Daughter to Prince David, the Eldeſt Son of Robert, King of Scots, had paid that King a great Sum of Money, in Conſideration of the Marriage which was ſhortly to be celebrated; but being defeated in his Agreement by the Subtilty of Archibald, Earl of Dowglaſs, who envying the Dignity of the Earl of March's Family, ſo prevail'd with the King, that he married his Son to his own Daughter Mariel. This Affront and Diſappointment was a very great Vexation to the Earl of March, inſomuch that he could hardly reſtrain his Paſſions from breaking out into open Rebellion; but chuſing firſt to make the Cauſe known, demanded of King Robert the Reſtitution of his Money, which he had paid him; but the King not able to ſpare it, tho' he could not refuſe Payment, yet would neither promiſe it, nor pay it, but put him off with deluſory Anſwers and Delays. The Earl being impatient at the Injuſtice of Robert, ſends Meſſengers to the King of England, to requeſt of him a Permiſſion for himſelf and Family to come into his Dominions, and Letters of ſafe Conduct for that End, complaining heavily of the Injury done him by his own King, and intending by the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh to revenge his Wrongs and Loſs. King Henry thinking that the Earl might be ſome Advantage to him, if there ſhould happen any Wars between the Two Nations, gave him Liberty to come into his Kingdom; and he immediately fled out of Scotland with his Family to Henry, Earl of Northumberland, by whom he was receiv'd with a grateful Welcome, and by his Aſſiſtance and Advice, the Earl made many Incurſions into Scotland with Succeſs, burning their Towns, and returning with much Booty.

The King of Scots hearing that the Earl of March was gone, and turn'd his open Enemy, deprived him of his Honour, ſeiz'd upon all his Goods and Poſſeſſions in Scotland, and proclaim'd him an open Traitor, ſending Meſſengers to King Henry, to tell him, That he muſt either deliver up to him the Earl of March, or baniſh him his Dominions, or elſe not expect that the Truce between the Two Nations ſhould laſt long. King Henry knowing the uncertain Humour of the Scots, and conſidering their late Incurſions, to the Prejudice of his Subjects, was reſolv'd not to loſe the Benefit of this Diſcontent between the King of Scots and Earl of March, and therefore return'd an Anſwer, That he was deſirous of the Continuance of the Peace, but not fearful of the War, which he would rather run the Hazard of, than falſifie his Honour and Promiſe to the Earl of March, and his Company, who had come into his Nation by his Permiſſion and Leave. This Anſwer being brought to the Scotch King, ſo incenſed him, that he proclaim'd War againſt the King of England, and accordingly both Kings began their Preparations for it againſt the next Spring, when the Seaſon would allow it.

The Greek Emperor comes into England.

The Grecian Emperor Immanuel Palæologus, whoſe Dominions were in great Danger to be loſt by the Incurſions of the Turks under Bazajet the Sixth, came into England to beg King Henry's Aſſiſtance againſt them. The King met him at Black-Heath, and conducted him with much Reſpect and Honour through the City of London, and entertain'd him magnificently, bearing his Charges all the Time of his Abode in England, which was but ſhort, becauſe he receiv'd News, that the King of Leto had defeated the Baſſa of Jeruſalem, and taken that City, and he thought it might be ſome Advantage to his Affairs at Home: Wherefore, taking his Leave of King Henry, he departed, being diſmiſs'd by him with rich Gifts, and Promiſes of a larger Aſſiſtance, when he ſhould by God's Providence have Peace ſettled among his Subjects. A. D. 1400. Reg. 2.

A. D. 1401.

In the Utas or Octaves of S. Hilary, Jan. 21. the Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and made divers Acts for the Benefit both of Church and State. For the Good of the Church, it was made a Præmunire for any Perſon to purchaſe any Bull from the Pope, to exempt them from Payment of Tythes, for the Ciſtertian Monks, and other religious Orders then began to bring in ſuch Exemptions, not only for their own Granges, but alſo for all their Farms and Lands belonging to their Monaſtries holden by Laymen, and ſo much leſſen'd the Maintenance of the ſecular Clergy, which further to prevent, the Parliament made this Act. But that which was then thought to be the beſt Act for the Support of the Church, was the Statute againſt the Lollards, or Hereticks of thoſe Times, becauſe Corruptions in Doctrines are more prejudicial to the Church, than the Loſs of its Revenues. The Occaſion of this Act, was this: One William Sawter, a Prieſt, but a Follower of Wickliffe's Doctrine, having formerly recanted his Opinions before the Biſhop of Norwich, grew more zealous upon his Repentance, and riſe from this Fall; and that he might ſatisfie for his Lapſe, by an Act of ſingular Courage and Charity, came into the Parliament Houſe, and petition'd, That he might be allow'd to ſpeak ſomething for the ineſtimable Benefit and Advantage of the Nation, purpoſing to propound a general Reformation both of Doctrine and Diſcipline in the Church. The Biſhops, who ſome of them knew the Man and his Converſation, and that though he were a Man of ſingular Piety and Vertue, yet worſhipp'd God after the Way which they call'd Hereſie, oppoſed his Requeſt, and deſired that he might be turn'd over to the Convocation to be examined; which being granted, he was there accuſed of holding Heterodox Opinions about the Worſhip of Saints and Angels, Pilgrimages to Tombs and Shrines, and the real Preſence of the Body and Blood of Chriſt in the Sacrament. To which, being obliged to anſwer particularly, many Days were ſpent in his Examination, and Conviction. In the mean time the Clergy and their Friends, being excited by his Forwardneſs, to ſtand up for their Doctrine and Church, became earneſt Suiters to the King, to provide a ſufficient Remedy againſt ſo growing an Evil, and obtain'd a ſevere Act againſt all erroneous Opinions; becauſe, in this unſettled Eſtate, he was willing to gratifie the Clergy, who had aſſiſted him in his coming to the Throne, and being diſcontented, might much embroil his Affairs. Therefore he cauſed it to be enacted, 'That none ſhould preach without 'Licenſe, except Perſons priviledged: That 'none ſhould preach any Doctrine contrary to 'the Catholick Faith, or the Determination of 'Holy Church; and, that none ſhould favour 'or abet ſuch Preachers, or their Doctrines, 'nor keep their Books, but deliver them to 'the Dioceſan of the Place, within Forty Days 'after the Proclamation of this Statute: And, 'if Second Parliament, and its Acts.

The Act de Hæretico comburendo, firſt made.

A. D. 1401. Reg. 2.

'if any Perſons were defamed, or ſuſpected of 'doing againſt this Ordinance, then the Ordi- 'nary might arreſt them, and keep them in 'Priſon till they were Canonically clear'd of 'the Articles laid to their Charge, or abjured 'them according to the Laws of the Church, 'provided that the Proceedings againſt them 'were publickly and judicially done, and end- 'ed within Three Months after the Arreſt; 'and, if they were convicted, he might fine 'them, and keep them in Priſon, as to him ſhould 'ſeem fit: And if any being convict did refuſe 'to abjure, or after Abjuration did fall into 'Relapſe, then they were to be left to the Se- 'cular Court: And the Mayors, Sheriffs, or 'Bailiffs being preſent at the Paſſing the Sen- 'tence, were to receive them after Sentence, 'and they before the People in an High-place 'to be burnt.

This Act was no ſooner paſt, but the Clergy put it in Execution upon William Sauter, that it might be a Terror to all others; for being convicted of Hereſie, and Relapſe, the King iſſued out his Writ, Feb. 26. for his Execution, which was done accordingly, (m) and ſo the Act was ſealed with Blood.

Other Laws alſo were made of great Uſe and Advantage to the State, viz. 'That no 'Proviſions ſhould be brought from Rome by 'any religious Perſon, to exempt him from 'Obedience to the Secular Power; and that 'all ſuch Perſons that ſhall bring any ſuch Pro- 'viſions into the Nation, ſhall incur a Præmu- 'nire. That no Perſon ſhall carry any Gold or 'Silver in Coin, without the ſpecial Licenſe 'of the King, out of the Nation; and if any 'Perſon ſhall preſume to do the Contrary, he 'ſhall forfeit all the ſaid Coin to the King. 'That the Chirographer of the Common-Pleas, 'Clerk of the Crown of the King's-Bench, the 'Marſhal of the Marſhalſea of the King's Houſe 'ſhould take no greater Fees than what are pre- 'ſcribed and limited by the ſaid Statutes.

By theſe Acts the due Subjection of the Clergy and People was preſerved and ſecured to the King, the Traffick of the Nation promoted, and Courts of Juſtice made an Eaſe, and not an intolerable Grievance, as ſince they have been, to all ſuch as ſeek their Rights. We do not find that the King had, or deſired any Tax in this or the former Parliament, becauſe, as he had no great Need of more than the Revenues of the Crown, ſo he was willing to get the Love of the People by eaſing them of Charge, and oppreſſing Taxes.

A Treaty between the Engliſh and French, and Queen Iſabel ſent into France.

As ſoon as the Parliament was diſmiſſed, the King ſent his Ambaſſadors according to his Promiſe to Guiſnes, to treat with the French about Queen Iſabel's Reſtitution, and others Matters of Importance. The Engliſh Ambaſſadors were Edward, Duke of York; Henry, Earl of Northumberland, and his Son Henry, ſurnamed, Hotſpur; the Lord Fitz-Warren, the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Lincoln; and the French were, the Duke of Bourbon, the Lords D' Albert, Hangeſt, and Chaſtlemorant, and the Biſhops of Paris and Beauvais. The main Things inſiſted upon by the Engliſh were, that Queen Iſabel might be given in Marriage to King Henry, (n) ſince the Marriage between her and King Richard was never conſummated by actual Knowledge; and that the Truce which was made by King Richard for Thirty Years, might be continued for the Years that were unexpired. The French Ambaſſadors would by no Means conſent to a Marriage, becauſe it was not in their Inſtructions to treat about it, and their Maſter being in a Fit of his old Diſeaſe, the Frenzy, was not capable of treating with, about any ſuch Propoſition; and ſo they inſiſted upon it, That ſhe ſhould be reſtor'd, with her Dower. The Engliſh reply'd, That the Marriage not being compleated, ſhe had no Dower, but ſhe ſhould be ſent back with her Treaſure and Jewels. Concerning the Truce, they came to a firm Agreement, That ſo much of the Truce as was unexpired ſhould go on, till the Thirty Years were out: And ſo the Treaty ended, and Queen Iſabel was ſoon after ſent, under the Care of the Earl of Worceſter, and ſeveral other Noblemen and Women, into France, and between Bulloigne and Callis was deliver'd to the Lord Valeran, Earl of St. Paul, Lieutenant in Picardy, who, with many French Lords and Ladies, convey'd her to Paris to her Father and Mother, by whom ſhe was not long after given in Marriage to Charles, the eldeſt Son of Lewis, Duke of Orleans. The Earl of Northumberland proteſted her free from all Marriage-Bonds, and received a Teſtimonial of her ſafe Delivery to them, from the Earl of St. Paul.

A. D. 1401. Reg. 2.

King Henry, having gather'd a large Army to go againſt Scotland, thought it was the wiſeſt Way not to wait for the Coming of the Scots, but to invade his Enemies Country, becauſe by that means the Miſeries of the War would fall wholly upon the Scots, and both Sides prey upon Scotland: Wherefore ſending ſome of his Light Troops before, to bring a Terrour upon them, that they might not invade England before he could arrive with the whole Army, he entred Scotland at laſt with all his Forces, and burnt many of their Towns and Villages, took their Caſtles, and ruin'd the greateſt part of Edinburgh and Leith, ſparing nothing but Monaſtries and Churches. The Scots, terrified with the Greatneſs of his Army, which they repreſented much greater than it really was, fled before him, and made no Reſiſtance; ſo that where-ever he came, the whole Country was left in his Power, and to the Will of his Soldiers.

King Henry goes into Scotland to make War there.

In the End of September, the King beſieged the Caſtle of Maidens in Edinburgh, which was maintain'd againſt him by David, Duke of Rothſay, Prince of the Realm, and Archibald, Earl of Dowglaſs, who were the Cauſes of the War. While this Caſtle was beſieged, Robert, Duke of Albany, was appointed Governour of the Realm, becauſe the King of the Scots was very ſick, and unable to govern. This Duke, being under an Obligation, as Vice-Roy, to reſcue the Caſtle from being taken, ſent to King Henry, deſiring him to forbear an Aſſault upon it for ſix Days only, and he would give him Battle, and either raiſe the Siege, or loſe his Life. King Henry, being a very magnanimous and couragious Prince, who valued an Heroick Action above the Taking of an inconſiderable Fort, liberally rewarded the Herald that came with the Petition and Promiſe, giving him a Silk-Gown and a Gold-Chain; and aſſuring him on his Word, that he would tarry the Time deſired: But it was evident, that the Duke of Albany was not ſo ſincere in his De-

Reg. 3.

(m) He was burnt in Smithfield.

(n) The Engliſh Ambaſſadors demanded her in Marriage for the Prince of Wales, King Henry's eldeſt Son; A Man anſwerable to her in equal Degree both of Blood and Years.

A. D. 1401. Reg. 3.

fire, as Henry was in his Promiſe, becauſe he never durſt appear againſt King Henry, and, 'tis probable, had no other Deſign, but, by his Delays, to keep the King from Action, till Winter and Want ſhould force him home, which the Time of the Year eaſily foretold were at Hand, as, indeed, it happen'd accordingly; for the King, out of Generoſity, waiting longer than his Appointment, was forced to withdraw Home without any further Action, becauſe of the Weather and the Want of Proviſion. The Scots, while King Henry remain'd in Scotland, having the Lords Wardens of the Marches with him, had made ſome Inroads into England, and did much Harm in Cumberland about Bamborough-Caſtle, but retreated when the People aſſembled againſt 'em: And when King Henry was gone, they again vex'd the Borders, under the Command of Sir Thomas Halibarton of Dirleton, and Sir Patrick Hebborn of Hales; and though they did little Harm, yet they ſhew'd, that though they had no Courage to fight their Enemies, they had Malice to revenge themſelves upon them. And thus concluded the firſt Summer's War between the Engliſh and Scots.

K. Henry goes againſt the Welſh.

While the King was thus buſied in Scotland, Owen Glendour, and his Welſh, were (o) very active in annoying the Counties adjoining, doing all manner of Miſchief, which either Malice or Cruelty could invent, burning, plundering and deſtroying as they pleaſed. The King being return'd, tho' he was not much concern'd to revenge the Earl of Marche's Quarrel, whoſe Captivity he did not much pity, becauſe he would have been well pleaſed if a more ſevere Fate had befallen him; yet hearing of the Miſeries of his Subjects in thoſe Parts, he march'd, with his Army, againſt the Welſh, to puniſh them for their Cruelty. Owen, as unequal in Strength to the King as in Courage, withdrew himſelf and his Party, and fled into the Deſarts and inacceſſible Places about Snowdon Hills (p); ſo that the King could do no more, than plunder and waſte the Country, which he did very ſeverely, to ſhow his Anger againſt thoſe Rebels, and carried away a great Booty of Cattle with him.

Some Accidents of this Year.

Several remarkable Things are ſaid to have happen'd this Year. King Henry's Enemies, diſcouraged by the ill Succeſs of their Plot the laſt Year, dared not to appear in any open and form'd Action, but they are ſuppoſed to have convey'd a Galthrap (q) into his Bed, which being ſo fram'd, That Three Iron Spikes, very ſharp, ſtood upward, it was almoſt impoſſible for him to have eſcap'd Death, if he had chanced to have lain down upon it; but diſcovering it before he went into his Bed, he ſaved his Life. The Contrivers and Layers of it could never be found out. The uſual Plenty of this Nation was ſo much abated, that Wheat is ſaid to have been ſold at Sixteen Shillings a Quarter, which not long before was at Four Shillings; and it had been much dearer, but that the Merchants brought much Rye and Rye-Flour out of Sprucia, (r) which ſerving for common Uſe, kept down the Price of Wheat. But tho' there was ſuch a Judgment upon the Nation as Famine, yet the Natives were not humbled by it, but great Pride and Vanity in Cloathing were uſed, Maſters and Servants wearing Gowns with Poke-Sleeves down to the Ground, which were both vain and ſuperfluous. The Conduit in Cornhill was built in a Place, where before had ſtood a Priſon for Night-Walkers, call'd, The Tun, the Materials of which ſerv'd to raiſe the new Conduit.

A. D. 1401. Reg. 3.

The King having been at very great Charges by his Expeditions into Wales and Scotland, had a Subſidy granted him by the Laity, by way of voluntary Contribution, or Gift, without calling hie Parliament; ſo ready are Subjects to aſſiſt the King with Monies, when they ſee them careful for the publick Welfare of the Nation.

A. D. 1402.

Libels and Reports againſt the King, and Authors puniſh'd.

About the Beginning of March appear'd a very terrible Blazing-Star, ſending forth its Fiery Streams at firſt toward the North-Eaſt, and at length toward the North, where it ſeem'd to fix, which was after thought to portend the bloody Wars between the Scots and Engliſh, and the ſeveral Executions done this Year upon the Malecontents under the Government. Theſe latter not only raiſed divers Reports, that King Richard was alive, and would ſhortly come to recover his Right with a puiſſant Army, but induſtriouſly diſperſed them as Things certain thro' the whole Nation by their Books and Libels, in which they encouraged all Perſons, by Hopes of great Rewards, to aſſiſt King Richard, and aſperſed King Henry as an Uſurper, and cruel Tyrant. The King had Knowledge of all theſe Things, and to deter theſe Diſturbers of the Government from their Deſigns, he declar'd, That he would ſpare none that he could find inſtrumental in promoting theſe Reports, and would be at any Pains or Charge to diſcover them: But it ſeems this did not ſo affright them from their Attempts, but that ſeveral Perſons were apprehended, and upon their Conviction executed. Sir Roger Clarringdon, who was ſaid to be the Baſtard Son of Edward the Black Prince, and Eight Fryars, were hanged and beheaded for reporting, That King Richard was alive. A Prieſt alſo was taken, who had a Catalogue of divers Gentlemen and others, who had avouch'd, that King Richard was alive, and had promiſed him their Aſſiſtance when he ſhould arrive in England. Several of the Perſons in the Liſt were alſo taken and impriſon'd: However, nothing being prov'd againſt them, and the Prieſt himſelf confeſſing, that he had never heard any ſuch Thing from them, but had ſet down their Names either by the Report of others, or mere Conjecture, they were at length diſmiſs'd, after much Charge and Trouble, and only the Prieſt hang'd and quarter'd. Walter Baldocke, Prior of Laund, a ſmall Monaſtry in Leiceſterſhire, was alſo apprehended, and accuſed of being an Inſtrument in the above-mention'd Reports, but nothing could be prov'd againſt him; yet becauſe in his Examination he confeſs'd, that he knew ſome that had been induſtrious in ſpreading ſuch Treaſonable Reports, and otherwiſe acting againſt the Peace and Government, he was condemn'd for Miſpriſion of Treaſon, and hang'd. Richard Friſby alſo, a Doctor of Divi-

(o) Sir John Hayward, writes, That Sir Patrick Hepburn was kill'd in the Firſt Year of Henry the Fourth's Reign. Life of Henry IV. p. 149.
(p) In Carnarvanſhire.
(q) A Smith's Tool, ſo call'd.
(r) From Pruſſia.

nity,

A. D. 1402. Reg. 3.

nity ſuffer'd the like Puniſhment, for ſaying, upon the Report that King Richard was alive, That if he were indeed alive, he would fight to Death in his Quarrel. (s) Theſe, with many others, ſuffer'd for thoſe Reports and Libels, the King ſparing none according to his Reſolution; in which, tho' he may ſeem to have kept a good Conſcience, and rid himſelf of his Enemies, yet he was eſteem'd cruel, and over-ſevere for ſuch an Act.

K. Henry's Second Expedition into Wales.

Owen Glendour and his Welſh having with Succeſs made ſeveral Inroads upon the Engliſh Borders, to their great Enriching, began this Summer with freſh Aſſaults upon the Inhabitants, burning, plundering, and deſtroying all Places where-ever they came. The King deſirous to relieve his oppreſſed and injured Subjects, aſſembled a great Army of his Nobles, Gentry, and Commons to reduce Wales to its due Obedience, who being all troubled at the Sufferings of their Fellow-Subjects, went with full Reſolutions of ſubduing it before they return'd: Nor did Owen Glendour himſelf ſeem to retain ſo much as Hopes of withſtanding an Army of Men ſo well prepared for an Encounter, the Welſh being all ſtruck with a panick Fear of their Deſtruction. The King with theſe full Hopes, arrived in Wales, but before he could enter upon any Action of moment, there happen'd ſuch foul and tempeſtuous Weather, that the Army ſuffer'd much Damage, and the King was at length forced to return without doing any thing worthy his Reputation. Theſe Storms falling out at a Seaſon of the Year, when they were moſt unuſual, were ſaid to be raiſed by the Magical Skill of Owen Glendour, who was thought to be a Wizzard.

Scots invade England, and are twice routed.

The Scots hearing of King Henry's Expedition into Wales with ſo numerous an Army, and accompany'd with many Nobles, ſuppoſed that the Northern Lords, who were their implacable Enemies, and the Guardians of their Country againſt them, were alſo gone along with the King, and therefore they could not have a fitter Opportunity to invade the Engliſh Borders. Sir Patrick Hebborn, (t) who had the Year before made ſome Incurſions into England with Succeſs, was choſen their Captain, and with a competent Army of the Men of Loughdean, or Lawden, enter'd Northumberland as far as New-Caſtle, taking many Priſoners, and loading themſelves with Spoil and Prey, as if being out of Fear of Oppoſition, they came not to fight, but enrich themſelves. But the Earl of Northumberland, and his Son, who were left behind upon Suſpicion of the Scots Attempts, had News of theſe their Actions, and with a ſufficient Strength, falls upon them at a Town called Nesbyt: The Scots receiv'd them couragiouſly, and maintain'd the Battle ſtoutly a good while, but being in Confuſion when they firſt joyn'd the Battle, they were not able to hold out againſt as ſtrong, and a better order'd Army, ſo that they were forced to yield the Victory to the Engliſh. Sir Patrick perceiv'd the Advantage which the Engliſh had againſt them, and thought to patch up the Defects in their Order, by animating his Men to fight, and giving them an Example of Bravery, in encountring the Enemy at the Head of them, but all was to no Purpoſe. He was ſlain himſelf, and his Army abſolutely vanquiſh'd, many of the Flower of Loughdean being ſlain, and ſome of the principal Commanders, as Sir John and William Cockburn, Sir William Baſſe, John and Thomas Hablington, Eſquires, and many of the common Soldiers being taken. Of the Engliſh few were kill'd, and thoſe not of any Quality. This Fight happen'd upon June 22. The News of this ill Succeſs was heavily taken in Scotland, and by none more than Archibald, Earl Dowglaſs, who reſolving to revenge this Loſs upon the Engliſh, obtain'd a Commiſſion at his own Charge to invade England; and having gather'd an Army of 20000 Men, enter'd the Kingdom like an enraged Enemy, deſtroying all before him. The Earl of Northumberland, and his Son Hotſpur as zealous to keep the Victory they had gotten, as Earl Dowglaſs was to recover it, being certified of the Scots Return, augmented their Forces proportionable to their Adverſaries, and upon Holy-rood-day, tho' it was then Harveſt, met the Scots at Hamildon, or Halidown, and with equal Courage and Fury engaged them. The Battle was very fierce and laſting, but the Scots not able to endure the violent Shot of the Engliſh Archers, were forced to give Ground, and betake themſelves to flight with an incredible Loſs; for there were ſlain not only ſome Men of Eſteem, viz. Sir John Swinton, Sir Adam Gurdon, Sir John Leviſon, Sir Alexander Ramſey, and 23 Knights more, but alſo 10000 of the Commons; and many Priſoners were taken; of which the Chief were Mordack, Earl of Fife, (u) Earl Dowglaſs's Son, who himſelf loſt one of his Eyes in the Battle, the Earls of Angus, Murrey, Athol, and Monteith, with 500 Men of an inferiour Degree.

1. At Nesbyt.

2. At Halidown.

The Earl of Northumberland being thus victorious, reſolved to purſue the Advantage he had gotten over ſo reſtleſs and troubleſome an Enemy; and therefore having diſpoſed of his Priſoners into ſafe Cuſtody, he invaded Scotland, and entring Tividale, he burnt and deſtroy'd the whole Country. Then he laid Siege to the Caſtle of Cocklaws, of which Sir John Greenlow was Captain; he, tho' he were a valiant Man, finding himſelf unable to withſtand ſo great an Army, promiſed to reſign the Caſtle to the Earl of Northumberland, if it were not reliev'd within Three Months; but before that was expired, the King call'd the Earl off to aſſiſt in another Enterprize, and ſo the Caſtle was ſaved, and they had Liberty to redeem their Priſoners.

Particular Accidents.

Particular Accidents this Year were theſe: Tho. Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, died Apr. 8. The Lady Blaunch, the King's eldeſt Daughter, was marry'd to William, Duke of Bavaria, the eldeſt Son of Lewis Barbatus, the Emperor, at Cologn, in great Magnificence, being conducted by the Earl of Somerſet, the Biſhop of Worceſter, Lord Clifford, and ſeveral others of the Nobility. The Devil is ſaid alſo to have appear'd, in the Shape and Habit of a Gray Fryar, in Danbury Church, in Eſſex, where he behaved himſelf ſo outragiouſly, that he much affrighted the Inhabitants. At the ſame time aroſe ſo great a Tempeſt thereabout, that it blew down the Steeple, and carry'd away Half the Chancel. One Sir Lewis Clifford alſo, who had for a long time lean'd to the Doctrine of the Lollards, wholly deſerted them, and diſ-

(s) This Richard Friſeby was a Gray Fryar, and hang'd in his Fryar's Weeds, to the great Mortification of his Brethen.
(t) Sir Patrick Hebborn was kill'd in a former Invaſion. This was his Son, Patrick Hebborn the Younger. Hollinſhead.
(u) Mordack, Earl of Fife, was Son to the Duke of Albany, Governour of Scotland, Ibid. Earl Dowglaſs was himſelf taken Priſoner.

cover'd

A. D. 1402. Reg. 3. Reg. 4.

cover'd all he knew of them to the Archbiſhop, viz. The Doctrines maintain'd by them, and chief Miniſters among them, confeſſing his Error.

Third Parliament; its Acts and Taxes.

On the Morrow after the Feaſt of St. Michael a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and ſat Seven Weeks, to diſpatch ſeveral Matters for the Good and Advantage of the Realm. In this Parliament the King declaring, 'That he 'had in Remembrance the faithful Hearts and 'inward Affections that the Clergy of England 'had born to him, and alſo the great Charges 'they had ſuſtain'd for his Honour and Profit 'ſince the Time of his Coronation, and there-'fore was deſirous to be unto them a gracious 'Lord; cauſed ſeveral Privileges of the Church and Clergy to be eſtabliſhed and enacted: For, Firſt, He confirm'd the ſeveral Statutes made by his Grand-father King Edward the Third, in his 25th Year, called, Statutes for the Clergy; as alſo, the Statute of 15 Rich. 2. 6. whereby it was provided, That in appropriating of Benefices to any Religious Houſe, there ſhould be a perpetual Vicar appointed, who ſhould be allow'd coveniently, at the Diſcretion of the Ordinary, a ſufficient Stipend, for ſaying Divine Service, and to inform the People, and keep Hoſpitality, and that no Religious or Monk ſhall be Vicar. It was alſo enacted, That the begging Fryars ſhould admit none into their Order, without their Parents Conſent, or under Fourteen Years of Age. Several other Acts relating to the Affairs of State were paſs'd, but that which the Parliament was chiefly buſied in, was to ſettle the Diſorders in Wales; for which End they made Nine ſeveral Acts, prohibiting the Welſh to paſs any Judicial Sentence upon an Engliſh Man, to have any publick Aſſemblies, to wear Arms, or buy any out of England, to raiſe any Forts or Caſtles, to bear any Office in Church or State, and commanding them to put all their Wall'd Towns into the Cuſtody of Engliſh Men. All which Acts tended to ſubduing and humbling the Welſh, who at that time were very troubleſome to the King and Realm. In the End of this Seſſion, the Parliament gave the King a Tenth and Half of the Clergy, and Fifteenth of the Laity, and a Tenth of all Boroughs, and particularly recommended the Scotch Earl of March to the King's Favour, becauſe he had behaved himſelf with ſo much Fidelity to the Nation: And ſo were diſmiſs'd into their ſeveral Countries.

A. D. 1403.

About Chriſtmas, King Henry, who had the Year before made ſome Propoſitions of Marriage to Joan de Navarre, the Widow of John de Mountfort, late Duke of Brittain, and was come to an Agreement about it, ſent ſeveral Perſons of Honour into Brittain, to conduct her over into England, who accordingly, after Two Months Stay, brought her ſafely to Falmouth in Cornwall, Feb 7. The King hearing of her Landing, went to meet her at Winchester, whither he had order'd her before to be convey'd, and there was marry'd to her in St. Swithin's Church, on the 7th of February, by the Biſhop of that See. From thence, within a few Days, he paſſed with her to London, where they were receiv'd magnificiently by the Citizens; and on Feb. 26. the Queen was ſolemnly crown'd at Weſtminſter by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. She had Three Sons, but they were left in France under the Care and Guardianſhip of that King. Her Coronation was kept with great State and Splendor, and there appear'd an Univerſal Joy both at Court, and in the Kingdom for theſe Nuptials: But it was not in this King's Fate to enjoy Peace or Pleaſure long, freſh Troubles, both at Home and Abroad ſpringing up to diſturb his Eaſe and Quiet.

K. Henry's Marriage to the Dutcheſs of Brittain.

A. D. 1403. Reg. 4.

French invade the Iſle of Wight and Gaſcoigne.

The Firſt Enemy that annoy'd his Dominions after them, were the French, under Valeran, Earl of St Paul, who envying Henry's Power, becauſe it was raiſed upon the Ruins of his own Intereſts, gather'd an Army of 16 or 1700 Men, invaded the Iſle of Wight, and burnt Two ſmall Villages, and a few ſeparate Cottages. The Inhabitants of the Iſle, who had formerly had the like Injuries done them by the French, and found that they loved Prey more than Fighting, and ſeldom would ſtand out againſt a faint Reſiſtance, aſſembled in a conſiderable Body, and drew up againſt them to fight them. The French, tho enough in Number to have conquer'd the Iſland, yet ſeeing the Courage of the People, withdrew to their Ships, and with little Prey, and leſs Honour, return'd Home. The Earl, that he might make this Expedition ſeem the more conſiderable, Knighted Four of his Captains, as he pretended, for their Bravery and Valour: But the more knowing Men of his Company repined at their ſpeedy Return, being ſenſible, that the Charge of this Expedition was much greater than the Gain. At the ſame time that the Earl of St. Paul infeſted the Engliſh Coaſts, John, Earl of Clermont, Son to the Duke of Bourbon, was ſent with an Army againſt the Subjects of the King of England in Gaſcoigne, and won the Caſtles of S. Peter, S. Mary, and New-Caſtle from the Engliſh, and the Lord De la Bret at the ſame time got the Caſtle of Carlaſin; all which were a great Loſs to the Engliſh. Theſe Damages King Henry's Courage would not have patiently ſuſtain'd without a ſharp Revenge, had he enjoy'd a peaceable Kingdom at Home; but before he could make any Preparations for a Foreign Expedition, the Rebellion of his own Subjects broke out, and drew all his Deſigns and Endeavours to ſecure himſelf at Home. The Occaſion of it was this:

The Rebellion of the Earl of Northumberland; its Cauſe and Succeſs.

King Henry not contented with the Peace, which the late Victories gotten by the Earl of Northumberland over the Scots had brought his Dominions, was very eager, and deſirous to ſhare in the Gains and Advantage of them; and to that End, required of the Earl his moſt gainful Priſoners, all the Lords, whoſe Redemption would raiſe great Sums. The Earl alledg'd, 'That as it was moſt juſt, that 'they who had undergone the Danger of the 'Battle, ſhould have all the Advantages of 'Prey and Priſoners; ſo it had been the Cu-'ſtom of the Kings of England to allow the 'Lords of the North all the Advantage of the 'Scots Wars, to encourage them in defending 'his Dominions, and make up the Damages of 'the continual Depredations of that faithleſs 'People. The King was very angry at this Denial, tho' dutiful and ſubmiſſive, and not only took the Priſoners he had demanded, but continued his Diſpleaſure to the Earl, not ſuffering him to come into his Preſence. This Severity the Earl, who had been ſo inſtrumental in raiſing King Henry to the Throne, reſented not only as a great Piece of Injuſtice, but which was worſe, very great Ingratitude; and therefore reſolved to revenge his Wrong upon the King himſelf, whom as he had ſet up, ſo he thought he had Power enough to pull him down. He was, indeed, in very great Power in the North, and commanded in his Country as a Petty King. He had a near Relation to Edmund, Mor-

A. D. 1403. Reg. 4.

Mortimer, Earl of March, by the Marriage of Eleanor his Aunt, Mortimer being Heir of the Crown had no ſmall Intereſt in the Nation, and therefore he might well pretend ſome Obligation to reſtore him to his Right, or at leaſt to his Liberty. Theſe Two Intereſts he thought ſufficient to effect his Deſign, eſpecially ſince the Earl of March was upon fair Terms with Owen Glendour, and it would be no hard Matter to unite the Welſh with himſelf in dethroning King Henry. The Earl having laid a ſure Train for Rebellion, that he might render his future Actions more plauſible, and make his Party more firm to him, he by the Advice of his Couſin Thomas Peircy, Earl of Worceſter, goes to the King, and demands the Redemption of the Earl of March his Kinſman, who had long lain in his foul and miſerable Impriſonment, among the King's Enemies. But the King anſwer'd, 'That he had no Reaſon to redeem, or 'relieve the Earl of March, nor would, be'cauſe he was not taken for his Cauſe, nor in 'his Service, but had ſuffer'd himſelf to fall in'to the Hands of Owen Glendour and the Welſh, 'being not willing to reſiſt them. The Earl having receiv'd this Anſwer, pretended to be angry, and blaz'd abroad the Cruelty of the King, who would not redeem a Perſon ſo nearly related to him, and his Son Henry, ſurnam'd Hotſpur, ſaid openly, 'Behold, the 'Heir of the Realm is Robb'd of his Right, 'and the Robber will not redeem him with a 'Part of his own. Hereupon the Earl and his Son, meeting in the Arch-Deacon of Bangor's Houſe, (x) with the Earl of March and Owen Glendour, by an Indenture Tripartite obliged themſelves mutually and firmly to depoſe King Henry, and, after his Depoſition, it was farther agreed to, and among them, 'That 'Owen Glendour ſhould have Wales, and all 'the Lands beyond the Severn, to rule over 'them as their King and Supreme Lord: 'That the Earl of Northumberland, ſhould go'vern all the Countries on the North Side of 'the River Trent, and the Earl of March ſhould 'enjoy all the Reſidue of England in his Right, 'as Supreme Lord. This Agreement being made, they all employ'd the utmoſt Intereſts they had to raiſe an Army ſufficient for their Deſign. The Earl of Northumberland, beſides the Forces he raiſed among his Northern Neighbours, procured an Augmentation of his Forces out of Scotland, partly by releaſing the Captives, which he had in his Keeping, and partly by Promiſes of ſeveral Lordſhips and Seignories in theſe Parts adjoyning to their Country, by which Means they raiſed a large and well appointed Army. All things being thus prepar'd, they put out their Declaration, 'That King Henry giving Encourage'ment to Flatterers and Calumnators, their 'Enemies, had entertain'd ſuch an Averſion to 'them, that they dare not come into his Pre'ſence, but by the Mediation of the Biſhops: 'That though he was raiſed to the Throne, 'for the Good of the Nation, yet he had 'play'd the Tyrant, and abuſed his Truſt, 'converting the Money given by Parliament, 'for the publick Defence, to his own private 'Intereſt: Wherefore, that they might ſecure 'their own Perſons, and reform the Govern'ment, they had raiſed ſuch Force, as might 'be ſufficient to reduce Things into a better 'Courſe, both for themſelves and the whole 'Nation. They alſo gave out a Report, to further their Deſign, That King Richard was yet alive in the Caſtle of Cheſter, ready to join with Owen Glendour to recover his Right; and ſo march'd to Shrewsbury, intending to make that City the Rendezvous of their Army.

A. D. 1403. Reg. 4.

The King had no ſuſpicion of theſe Treaſonable Contrivances and Actions, becauſe they carried them on with very great Secreſie; yet, having no viſible Enemy but the Welſh, he raiſed a powerful Army to reduce them to their Allegiance; ſo that when the Earl of Northumberland's Forces appear'd, he was in a very good Condition to oppoſe them. But conſidering, that a Civil War would bring great Damages to his Subjects, he choſe to allay the Diſcontents of the Seditious Party by anſwering their Declaration, alledging, That he never had denied the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Peircy his Son, or any of the Lords of their Party, any Acceſs to him; but allow'd them to come into his Preſence at any Time, without all Danger or Damage to their Perſons; and that the Monies which had been given by the Parliament for the Defence of the Nation, were paid to the Earl of Northumberland himſelf for that End, as he could prove by his Receipts; ſo that their Complaints were ill grounded and ſlanderous. The King himſelf was inclined to wait for the Effect of this Anſwer; but the Earl of March, a Scot, telling the King, That Delays would ſtrengthen his Enemies, put him upon haſtening to them, to give them Battle, which proved of ſome Advantage to the King: For the Earl of Northumberland, being ſomewhat indiſpoſed, was not come up to his Son at Shrewsbury, and the King's ſudden Arrival put the Army there into a Conſternation, ſo that they were unfit to engage him. The King being ready to join his Enemies in Fight, was very loth to ſpill his People's Blood, and therefore ſent the Abbot of Shrewsbury, and one of the Clerks of his Privy-Seal, to offer them Pardon upon ſuch reaſonable Terms as they ſhould deſire. The Lord Peircy was ſo far wrought upon by their Perſwaſions, that he was willing to accept of the King's Mercy, and ſent his Uncle, the Earl of Worceſter, to repreſent their Grievances, and having procur'd a Reformation to ſubmit to the King. The King is ſaid to have condeſcended beneath himſelf to heal the Breach; but the Earl of Worceſter, a Man that ſought to foment the Quarrel, repreſented Things ſo ill to the Lord Piercy, at his Return, that his Nephew was more incenſed than before, and forthwith blew the Trumpet for Battle. The King was ready to receive him, and the Signs being given on both Sides, St. George by the King, and Eſperance Peircy by the Lord Peircy, the Fight began. The Scots behav'd themſelves with great Reſolution, and ſo fiercely fell upon the Kings Van-Guard, that they forced them to give Ground, and had almoſt broke in upon his main Body, and being ſeconded by the Welſh, who reſerv'd themſelves for an advantagious Onſet, put the King upon his laſt Refuge, to call in his Reſerve to reinforce his Army, by which means he recover'd his Ground, and, after a freſh Rencounter, got the better of the K. Henry's Mercy to the Rebels.

His Fight with, and Victory over them.

(x) How could the Earl and his Son meet Glendour and March in Wales, the Welſh being at open War with the Engliſh? Holinſhead ſaith, They did it by their Deputies in the Houſe of the Arch-Deacon of Bangor. And 'tis not likely, the Peircy's would venture to Treat in Perſon with the Rebel Glendour, before they were provided to publiſh their Rebellion to the King and Kingdom; for ſuch an Interview would have given too much Umbrage to both, and ruin their Plot.

Re-

A. D. 1403. Reg. 4.

Rebels. The Lord Peircy, and Earl Douglaſs, General of the Scots, deſpairing of Victory, boldly attempted to ſlay the King, and overthrow his Standard, and to that end forcing their Way thro' the King's Party, they at length got to the King's Standard, which they overthrew, killing Sir Walter Blunt, the Standard-Bearer, and the Earl of Stafford, with many others that ſtood to guard it. The King was retreated from the Standard, by the Advice of the Earl of March, the Scot, who obſerving their Deſign, timely warn'd the King of his Danger, and cauſed him to avoid it. But the King neglected not this Opportunity to aſſault his Enemies in the Abſence of their Captains, and crying, St. George, made ſuch an impetuous Onſet upon the Rebels, that he broke their Order, and put them to Flight, and obtain'd a compleat Victory. In this Battle which laſted Three Hours, the King himſelf was once diſmounted, and the Prince, fighting in Defence of his Father, was wounded in the Face, yet would not leave the Army till the Fight was ended, leſt he ſhould diſcourage the Soldiers. Ten Knights and 1600 Soldiers were kill'd, and 4000 wounded, on the King's Side; but with much greater Loſs to the Rebels, for they had 200 Knights and 5000 Soldiers ſlain, beſides the Lord Piercy himſelf. The Earl of Worceſter, the Baron of Kinderton, and Sir Richard Vernon were taken, and, being condemned, were beheaded Two Days after the Battle, on the 23d of July. The Earl's Head was ſent up to London, to be ſet on the Bridge. The Lord Peircy's Body was permitted to be buried, but upon after Thoughts the King commanded it to be taken up again, and being beheaded and quarter'd, diſpoſed of it into ſeveral Parts of the Kingdom. The Earl of Northumberland, who had been kept from uniting with his Brother and Son by ſome Indiſpoſition of Body, ſoon after the Fight, ſet out towards Shrewsbury, with a conſiderable Recruit, to aſſiſt his Son and Brother, but being met with in his Paſſage by the Earl of Weſtmorland and Sir Robert Waterton, with a ſtrong Detachment from the King's Army, he retreated to Warkworth Caſtle, and there fortified himſelf. The King having ſettled the Countries about Shrewſbury, went to York, and there ſent his Commands to the Earl of Northumberland to diſmiſs his Forces, and come to him upon Aſſurances of Mercy. The Earl, ſeeing no Poſſibility of ſtanding out againſt the King's Power, obey'd his Summons, and diſmiſſing his Forces, attended upon the King at York upon the Morrow after St. Lawrence's Day, Aug. 11. The King, according to his Promiſe, pardon'd him his Life, but kept (y) him in Priſon ſometime till the Ferment of his Trouble was a little over, and then reſtor'd him to his Liberty, but deprived him of his Eſtate and Honour for the preſent, yet afterwards gave him that alſo, hoping by his Kindneſs to oblige him to be more faithful and firm to him for the future.

King Henry ſends the Prince againſt the Welſh.

The King having thus ſettled the Diſguſts of the North, kept his Army about him, which being encouraged by their late Succeſs, was moſt likely to effect his Deſigns againſt the Welſh, and took up ſome Reſolutions to go on, and Endeavours to ſubdue that People: But wanting Money to pay his Soldiers, and furniſh himſelf out for his Expedition, he became wavering in that Reſolve. Some Perſons about him, who were more zealous for the King's Service, and deſirous to pleaſe him, than to chuſe out fit Ways for it, adviſed him to ſeize upon the Biſhops Treaſure and Lands; but Archbiſhop Arundel boldly told them, That none of his Province ſhould be ſpoil'd by them, unleſs with Oppoſition. Though the King was not forward to meddle with the Church-men, yet this Advice put him in mind of the Riches and Plenty of the Clergy, which being beſtow'd on Perſons, whoſe beſt Character it is to be Diſpiſers of the World, might beſt be ſpared at this Juncture, and thereupon, though he would uſe no Force, yet he dealt with the Archbiſhop to procure him a Supply in this Exigency, and ſo prevail'd with him, that calling a Synod of the Clergy, he obtain'd a Tenth of them for him, and the King ſent the Prince, with his Army, into Wales.

A. D. 1403. Reg. 4.

The Brittains under the Lord Caſſils, rob the Engliſh Coaſts.

In the latter end of this Summer, the Brittains, under the Conduct of the Lord Caſſils, came to the Engliſh Coaſts, and having burnt and plunder'd Plymouth, return'd Home ſafe, loaden with rich Spoils. This Inſolence was not long unrevenged, for the Weſtern Parts being incenſed by the Loſs, did, by the King's Leave and Permiſſion, man out a Fleet, to recover their Damage, and ſent it to ravage the Coaſts of Brittain, under the Command of William Wilford, Eſq; who being both a skilful Captain, and a Perſon very zealous for his Country-mens Injuries, faithfully diſcharged his Truſt; for he took Forty Sail of Merchant Ships, loaden with Oil and Soap, and a Thouſand Tun of Rochel Wine; and, not contented with this Prey, though ſufficient to compenſate for the Spoils of the Engliſh, he landed in the Country of Penmarch, and, for Six Miles together, burnt and deſtroy'd the Towns and Villages, as far as the Town of St. Matthew, which alſo he left in Flames, and returning to his Ships, ſet ſeveral empty Veſſels on Fire, which lay in the Harbour, and ſo departed, well ſatisfied with the Retaliation of their Wrongs upon the Brittains.

Reg. 5.

Fourth Parliament.

About the Feaſt of All-Saints a Parliament was called at Coventry, and ſat till St. Andrew's-Day, when they were prorogued, and order'd to meet again at Weſtminſter upon the Octaves of Epiphany. The Shortneſs of this Seſſion was cauſed by the Inconvenience of the Place, there being neither ſuitable Accommodations for Proviſion or Lodging. Nothing was done by this Parliament of Moment, their Debates being interrupted by their ſudden Adjournment, only the King proclaim'd and granted a Pardon to all ſuch Perſons, as had been engaged in the Rebellion of the Peircy's, and all other Offenders againſt the King's Crown and Dignity, thoſe only excepted, who had contrived to deliver up Calais to the French, whom the King ſent over to ſuffer the Puniſhment of their Perfidiouſneſs in that City.

King's Pardon.

French invade the Iſle of Wight.

A little before Chriſtmas a Party of French landed in the Iſle of Wight, and with their uſual Confidence told the Inhabitants, That they were come to keep their Chriſtmas with them. They demanded a Tax of them for King Richard and Queen Iſabel, and began to drive off their Cattle to their Ships. The People of the Iſland deriding their Pretenſions and Confidence, gather'd together in a Body, and challenged them to fight, but the French Men not loving dry Blows, fled to their Ships, and departed without their Prey, to their great Shame.

(y) Hall writes, that he ſuffer'd him to depart Home at their firſt meeting.

The

A. D. 1404. Reg. 5.

Fifth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The Parliament according to Appointment met at Weſtminſter, and ſat Twelve Weeks to ſettle many Abuſes and Irregularities of the Nation, as well as conſtitute ſeveral Things for the Good of it. The moſt remarkable were, againſt ſuch as procured Pardons for thoſe Perſons that had been once guilty of notorious Felonies, but relapſed into the like Crimes again; That thoſe who procured their Pardon for ſuch reiterated Felonies ſhould forfeit 100 l. to the King's Uſe: That Watches ſhould be conſtantly kept upon the Sea-Coaſt, to prevent the Damages done by the French Rovers: That Merchants-Aliens, who brought Goods into the Nation, and ſold them, ſhould lay out the Money upon other ſaleable Commodities, and not carry out the Coin of the Kingdom into Foreign Parts: That Conſtables of Caſtles ſhould not impriſon any Man in their own Caſtles; and that all Veſſels that were Gilt, or Silver'd over, ſhould have a Place in the Foot, or elſewhere, to diſcover their baſe Metal. In this Parliament, the Earl of Northumberland was reſtored to his Lands and Honours, excepting only the Iſle of Man, which the King had beſtow'd on him (z) at the Beginning of his Reign, to hold of the Crown by the Tenure of carrying the Lancaſter's Sword at the Coronation, and now took away from him to ſhew that he was undeſerving of his Favour. By this Parliament, the King had ſo great a Tax granted him, that the Houſes deſired there might be no particular Record of it left to Poſterity, viz. Twenty Shillings for every Knight's Fee, and Twenty Pence for every Twenty Pounds a Year, and One Shilling in in the Pound for Goods: So cautious was the Parliament of oppreſſing the People with heavy Taxes, and where Neceſſity requir'd it, not to leave a Preſident to their Succeſſors of over-loading the People. The Clergy alſo, being met in their Convocation, give the King a Tenth.

Earl of Northumberland reſtored to his Lands.

Duke of Orleans challenges K. Henry.

In the Time of this Seſſion of Parliament, the Duke of Orleans, Brother to the French King, a Perſon courageous, but of more than equal Pride, ſent a Challenge to King Henry to meet him at Bourdeaux, with 100 Men, well arm'd, and expert Warriours, and fight the ſame Number of Engliſh, and every Victor to have his Priſoner. The King, tho' ſenſible of the Preſumption of that Peer, gravely anſwer'd the Meſſengers: 1. 'That he could 'not but wonder at the Imprudence of the 'Duke, who ſought to break the Peace be'tween the Two Nations, by ſuch idle Pre'tences of Feats of Arms. 2. That if this 'could not be objected, yet it was againſt the 'Cuſtom of Nations, for any Crown'd and A'nointed King to accept a Challenge from 'any Perſon, but ſuch as is of equal Dignity, 'which he could not pretend to be, but yet, 'that he might ſatisfie his courageous Deſire, 'he promiſed, upon the Word of a Prince, 'to go ſoon into Gaſcoigne, with a convenient 'Number of Men; and there, either as he 'had propounded, or by ſingle Combat, for 'the avoiding of the Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, 'to enter the Liſts with him. The Duke of Orleans reply'd to this Anſwer, and the King retorted with ſo much Sharpneſs, that the Duke burſt out into Arms, and raiſing 6000 Men, invaded Guienne, and beſieged the Town of Vergi. Sir Robert Antifield, a valiant Captain, was the Governour of it, and had a Garriſon of 3000 Engliſh, who defended the Town ſo bravely, that the Duke was forced to leave it, after Three Months Siege.

A. D. 1404. Reg. 5.

The Britains again infeſt England, but are repulſed.

In the Spring, the Britains, under the Lord Caſſils, being deſirous to revenge the Loſſes they had ſuſtain'd from the Engliſh the laſt Year, came with 30 Ships, mann'd with 1200 Men of Arms, to the Engliſh Coaſts, and took Two or Three Engliſh Ships, laden with Wines, and not being ſatisfied with ſo ſmall a Prey, landed about Dartmouth; but were driven from the Place by the Inhabitants, who had arm'd themſelves in Expectation of their Coming, with no ſmall Loſs; and after being met by the Engliſh Fleet in Black-Pool, were engaged with ſo much Succeſs, that the Lord Caſſils was kill'd, with 400 more of the Common Soldiers, and 200 taken, of whom the Lord Baquevil, the Marſhal of Britain, was one. The Country People, pleaſed not more with the Succeſs, than that they had an Opportunity to approve their Courage, and Fidelity to the King, preſented him with their Priſoners, who graciouſly accepted their Service and Gift, and gave them Plenty of Gold for their Pains; which, though not of equal Value with their Ranſoms, yet was more acceptable to the People, with his Approbation, than greater Sums would have been without it: Yet, ſome of lower Degree they kept, and had their Ranſoms.

Owen Glendour infeſts the Engliſh.

This Summer Owen Glendour, with more than uſual Cruelty, infeſted the Engliſh Borders, plundering and burning their Towns, and carrying away many Priſoners and great Booty; and intending to take the Country into his Dominions, poſſeſs'd himſelf of divers Caſtles, which he fortified, and mann'd to defend it. This Succeſs, whether through the Neglect of the King, or becauſe other more important Affairs of State took up his Care, was thought an Approbation of his Cauſe; and ſo far prevail'd with John Trevor, Biſhop of St. Aſaph, that he fled to him, and took his Part againſt K. Henry. With theſe Calamities by the Welſh, concurr'd other Damages done by the Britains and Flemings, who cruzing upon the Engliſh Coaſts, took ſeveral Engliſh Ships, laden with rich Merchandize, and hanging the Mariners, carry'd the Goods Home with them. But theſe Misfortunes did not ſo much diſturb the King, as a Rumour which was diſperſed up and down the Nation at this Time, That King Richard was in Scotland, at the Head of an Army of French and Scots of 100000, and would ſhortly come to recover his Crown. This Rmmour was built upon the Letters of one Serlow, a Gentleman of King Richard's Bed-Chamber, who having heard of the like Report in France, went into Scotland, and found, indeed, a Gentleman very like King Richard, but not the Perſon, as he very well knew; yet, in Hatred to King Henry, he ſent Letters to ſeveral of King Richard's Friends in England, ſeal'd with his Privy-Seal, That King Richard was, indeed, alive, and would ſhortly appear, to the Comfort of his Friends, and Confuſion of all his Enemies. The Counteſs of Oxford, Mother to Robert de Vere, late Duke of Ireland, eagerly laid hold upon this falſe News, and employ'd her Agents to publiſh it in all Parts of Eſſex; and to confirm ſuch as ſeem'd moſt zealous to eſpouſe King Richard's Intereſt, ſhe cauſed a great Number of Hearts of Gold and Silver to be made, and given to them, as Badges of King Richard's Favour,

A ſeditious Rumour about King Richard.

(z) It fell to the Crown by the Attainder of the Earl of Saliſbury, in the Beginning of his Reign, and was granted to the Earl of Northumberland for his Service to King Henry.

A. D. 1404. Reg. 5.

becauſe that King was wont to give ſuch Tokens of his Kindneſs to his Friends. King Henry, who was very jealous of his Crown, knowing the Tendency of ſuch Reports might prove fatal to him, tho' falſe, was very watchful upon the Inſtruments and Authors of them, and finding them entertain'd by many, ſeiz'd upon the Counteſs of Oxford, and committed her to Priſon, and confiſcated her Goods and Eſtate. Her Secretary, who both by Letters and Report had ſpread abroad the falſe News, he hang'd and quarter'd. This Severity againſt ſome of the principal Actors ſtruck Terror into the reſt, and made others Ambitious to gain King Henry's Favour by apprehending ſuch as had been guilty of the like Crime. For Sir William Clifford, Governour of Berwick, who had incurred King Henry's Diſpleaſure in holding out of the Caſtle of Berwick againſt him, apprehended Serlow and preſented him to him, who thereupon pardoned his own Treaſon. Serlow being before known to have been one of the Perſons that murder'd the Duke of Glouceſter, was immediately examined about that, and being found guilty of both, was Condemn'd at Pontefract, and Executed at London, confeſſing his wicked Actions, and Purpoſes ſo fully and freely, that many pity'd him, and promiſed to hire the Prieſt to ſay Maſſes for his Soul. The King had heard, that the Earl of Northumberland had been engaged in this Conſpiracy, and ſent for him to come to him at Pontefract to clear himſelf; but the Earl bringing his Two Nephews to be Pledges of his Fidelity, gave him ſuch Satisfaction, that the King declar'd him innocent of this Attempt.

Reg. 6.

Sixth Parliament its Acts and Taxes, Parliamentum indoctum.

On St. Faith's Day, October the 6th, a Parliament met at Coventry, which becauſe it conſiſted of ſuch Perſons as were unskilful in the Laws of the Nation, and illiterate, according to the particular Orders given by the King to the Sheriffs of Counties, and Mayors of Corporations, that none but ſuch Perſons ſhould be choſen, was called Parliamentum indoctum, or the Lack-learning Parliament. The chief Buſineſs of this Parliament was to raiſe a Tax for the King's preſent Supply, and therefore little elſe was done, ſave that the Lord Stephen Scroope of Maſham, and the Lord Fitz-hugh were admitted to ſit among the Peers, and two or three Acts were made. Firſt, To prohibit the Clergy from paying to the Court of Rome more for the Firſt-Fruits of any Benefice, Dignity, or Biſhoprick, than was uſually paid before, under the Penalty of a double Forfeiture of the ſame to the King. Secondly, To prevent the Deceits of Sheriffs, Eſcheators and Cuſtomers in giving up their Accompts. And Laſtly, To provide, that Merchants-Strangers ſhould not carry their Goods out of the Nation, which they have once brought in. Theſe Statutes being ſettled, they proceeded to Debates about the Tax, and it was concluded by the Commons, 'That the 'King ſtanding in need of very great Sums of 'Money to defend the Nation from ſo many 'Enemies, as then appeared againſt it, viz. 'the Welſh, Scots, Britains, Flemings and French, 'could not be ſupplied by the Laity, but that 'it was neceſſary, that he ſhould ſeize upon 'the Temporalties of the Clergy; which be'ing one full third Part of the Nation did lit'tle Service to the Publick, and did the Cler'gy themſelves no good, making them care'leſs of their Duty, negligent in their Stu'dies, and abominably corrupt in their Morals. 'And this they judged the more reaſonable, 'becauſe the Laity ſerved the King in his 'Wars both with their Perſons and Eſtates, but 'the Clergy were exempted in their Perſons, 'and therefore their Eſtates ought to bear a 'greater part of the Charge. Theſe Votes much provoked the Clergy, and the Archbiſhop in a Paſſion replied; 'That the Clergy 'had always as well in this, as former Kings 'Reigns given as large Sums to ſupport the 'publick Charge, as the Laity: And though 'they did not ſerve the King in Perſon in his 'Wars, they ſent their Tenants to aſſiſt him, 'and contributed as much to his Succeſs by 'their Prayers, as the Laity did by their Wea'pons. Sir John Cheyny, the Speaker of the Commons, a Perſon who was very forward to make the Clergy's Revenues a prey to the King's Neceſſities, replied to the Archbiſhop; 'That they did not value the Clergy's Pray'ers, their Lands would do the King and Na'tion more good. This Anſwer more ſtirr'd the Arch-Biſhop's Choler, and he told him plainly; 'That that King and Kingdom could 'not expect to thrive, where the Prayers and 'Suffrages of the Clergy were undervalued; 'but yet if they feared not their Religion, they 'ſhould find their Power and Intereſts were 'not ſo inconſiderable, but that they ſhould 'have hot Work of it to take away their juſt 'Rights and Poſſeſſions from them, though un'der the ſpecious pretence of a Law. And he declared, 'That ſo long as he was Archbiſhop 'of Canterbury no Man ſhould meddle with 'any Lands belonging to his See, but he would 'oppoſe them with all his Intereſt and Might. The King was preſent at this Conteſt between the Arch-Biſhop and Commons, and ſhewed ſo little Concern for the Clergy, that he ſeemed to favour the Deſign of the Commons. Whereupon the Archbiſhop in ſome fear of it turn'd to the King, and kneeling down beſought him, 'That he would conſider, that God had given 'him the Kingdom, that he ſhould be the Prote'ctor of his Church, and to that End he had ſworn 'at his Coronation to preſerve the Church, and 'her Miniſters in their Liberties; which Oath 'he could not break without a great Prejudice 'to his own Conſcience, and Offence to God as 'well as Injuſtice to Men, and therefore implo'red him to fear the God by whom he Reign'd, 'and his own Conſcience. The King ſeeing the Biſhop's Earneſtneſs and Zeal, anſwer'd him; 'That though he could not condemn his Piety, 'yet his Fears were Groundleſs as to him, for 'he might aſſure himſelf, that he would leave 'the Church in as good, if not a better Eſtate 'than he found it. The Archbiſhop being encouraged with this Promiſe, told the Commons, 'That their wicked Advice was intended more 'for their own, than the King's Advantage; 'for as it happen'd to the King's Predeceſſors, 'who ſeized upon the Lands and Goods of the 'Friar's Aliens, which were worth many thou'ſand Pounds; the Courtiers begg'd them, and 'left not the King ten Groats of them: So if 'you could obtain your wicked Deſigns to have 'our Temporalties ſeized, you would find ſuch 'ways to gratifie your Covetouſneſs by them, 'that the King would not in a Twelve-month 'be one Farthing the Richer. The Commons made no Reply, but proſecuted their Deſign ſo vigorouſly, that had not the Archbiſhop gotten a ſtrong Party againſt it in the Houſe of Lords, the Commons had carry'd it; but by his Courage and Diligence they were driven from their Purpoſe, and ſo fell into the old Current of Taxing: For the Laity were to pay Two Fifteens, and the Clergy a Tenth and a Half, but upon upon Condition, that it ſhould be put into the Hands of the Lord Furnivall to be imploy'd for the King's Wars, and ſo the Parliament broke up.

A. D. 1404. Reg. 6.

A. D. 1404. Reg. 6.

A great Inundation.

About the End of this Parliament happen'd a great Inundation of the Sea in Kent, which overflowed many of the Archbiſhop's Grounds, and others, and drown'd much Cattel. The like Damages did the Waters do alſo in Flanders, Holland and Zealand. But the greateſt Loſs which England ſuſtained at this Time was by the Death of William of Wickham, Biſhop of Wincheſter, one of the greateſt Benefactors, to the Publick that ever England had: For though he was but of mean Parentage, being the Son of John Long, (a) Pariſh-Clerk of Wickham, in the County of Southampton; yet having obtained great Riches by the Preferments which were heaped upon him by King Edward the 3d, and King Richard the 2d, for his Deſerts, he employ'd them wholly in Works of publick Charity, and for the Encouragement of Piety and Learning: For he built a Chappel at Tytchfield for a Prieſt to pray for the Souls of his Father, Mother and Siſter; a Chauntry at Southwick, in the County of Southampton for five Prieſts; New-College in Oxford endowing it with ſufficient Revenues to maintain one Warden, ſeventy Students, twelve Chaplains, three Clerks, ſixteen Choriſters, an Organiſt, and other Officers; A publick School in the South-Suburbs of Wincheſter, to be a Nurſery for his College; in which are ſuſtained one Warden, ten Fellows, two Maſters, ſeventy Scholars, three Chaplains, three Clerks, an Organiſt, ſixteen Choriſters, and other Statutable Officers and Servants, by the Revenues of it; the Weſt part of the Cathedral from the Quire, and ſeveral other Buildings of leſs Note. He expended alſo twenty thouſand Marks in repairing the Manor-Houſes and Farms belonging to his Biſhoprick; added two hundred Marks per Annum to the See, repaired all the High-ways from Wincheſter to London, and releaſed all the Priſoners in his Dioceſs, who were in Goal for Debts under twenty Pounds. Other Acts of Charity and Piety he did in ſo great Numbers, that as none equall'd him in his Beneficence while he lived, ſo none died ſo much loved or deſired. He was eighty years Old when he deceaſed, and ſtill lives in the Hearts of many grateful Men in this World, but moſt happily in the Preſence of God, the Rewarder of all good Actions (b).

William of Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter's Death.

New College and Wincheſter School built.

A. D. 1405.

The Earl of March's Children ſtoln.

About St. Valentine's Day the Earl of March's Children, which the King had taken and kept in Windſor-Caſtle Priſoners, that he might bring their Father to Submiſſion, leaſt by his Attempts againſt King Henry, he ſhould provoke him to put them to Death, were taken from their Impriſonment, and convey'd away to be carry'd to their Father in Wales. The King was much concerned at their Eſcape, and uſed all ſpeedy Means, not only to take them again, but to find out the Inſtrument of their Releaſe, in which the Perſons employ'd were ſo ſucceſsful, that they ſoon diſcovered and apprehended them both: The Children were remanded to their Priſon, and put into more ſafe Cuſtody, and the Smith who made the Keys to open the Goal, had his Hands firſt cut off, and then was beheaded. The Duke of York was accuſed by his own Siſter, the Lady Spencer (c), to be the Head of the Conſpiracy, and was impriſoned upon it in Pemſey-Caſtle till the Parliament met, but was then diſcharged, either for want of fuller Proof, or becauſe the King was willing to drop the Proſecution of ſo inconſiderable a Fact, eſpecially he having already ſuffered Impriſonment for it.

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6.

Two Battels with the Welſh.

Very early in the Spring the King, who had been making Preparations againſt the Welſh all the Winter, ſent his Son the Prince of Wales into the adjoyning Parts with a very good Army, and well furniſhed with all Neceſſaries; by which he had reduced himſelf to ſuch Streights, that he was forced to call a Council of his Nobility at London, to get a Supply of Money of them for his preſent Wants; but the Peers having lately paid their Two Fifteens, were not willing, or not able to ſpare any more, and ſo were diſmiſſed with ſome diſguſt. Then the King ſummoned the Clergy to St. Albans to deſire a Contribution of them: But they guided by the Precedent of the Lords, would not grant him any thing; whereupon they alſo were ſent Home on Palm-Sunday, under the King's Diſpleaſure. But the Prince of Wales had better Succeſs in the Camp, than his Father in the Council; for he being as Active as Courageous ſoon after his Arrival engaged the Welſh-Men at a Town called Huske, on March the 15th, and after a ſharp Battel obtain'd a ſignal Victory, ſlaying fifteen hundred Welſh-Men, and taking Owen Glendour's Son Priſoner. Owen Glendour being troubled for the loſs of his Son, reſolved to try the Fate of another Battel, in hopes, that if Fortune ſhould favour him, he might recover his Son, and accordingly encountred the Engliſh on St. Dunſtan's Day, May the 14th, but not with the Succeſs deſired; for the Engliſh had much the better in this Fight alſo, and ſlaying many of his Men, took Owen's Chancellor Priſoner, who being ſent up with the reſt of the Priſoners, was ſafely kept in the Tower with his Maſter's Son.

The French and Engliſh infeſt each other.

While the Engliſh Arms were thus employ'd againſt the Welſh, Valeran, Earl of St. Paul, who ſought all Advantages to diſturb King Henry's Peace and Dominions, and was encouraged in all his Attempts that way by his Maſter the French King, laid Siege to the Caſtle of St. Marke, which was three Leagues from Calais, with five hundred Men of Arms, five hundred Genoeſe Croſs-Bows, and a thouſand Flemiſh Foot. Sir Philip Hall was Governour of it, a very violent Man, who though he had but (a) According to Leland the great Antiquary, he was Baſtard-Son to one Perrot, Town-Clerk of Wickham in Hampſhire. Hol. pag. 527.

(b) The Reward of good Actions is to be expected according to the Sincerity of the Heart. An Oſtentation of Charity, and the Merit of Alms in thoſe Days put People on wicked Courſes to ſhew their Beneficence to the Church and Church-men. This William of Wickham was hated by the Black-Prince for his Miſmanagement in the publick Offices he enjoy'd; he was baniſh'd afterwards, and liv'd abroad all the Time of King Edward's Reign, from that of his Exile; nor durſt he come into England in the Reign of Richard the Second till he had procured a Pardon for his paſt Offences. He was firſt Chaplain to King Edward the Third. Preacher at St. Martins, London, and Arch-Deacon of Buckingham. Then Surveyor of the King's Works and Forts; for the Clergy in thoſe Days eaſily reconciled the Eccleſiaſtical and Military Functions. After this he was advanced to be Keeper of the Privy-Seal, Maſter of the Wards, Overſeer of the Forreſts, Treaſurer of the King's Dominions in France, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and at laſt Lord-Chancellor: No wonder he raiſed ſuch a mighty Eſtate in his Miniſtry, conſidering he lived in ſo looſe a Government as that of King Richard the Second.

(c) She was Widow to the Lord Thomas Spencer, beheaded at Briſtol.

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6.

eighty Archers, and twenty-four Soldiers, yet defended it ſo manfully, that the Earl could not gain it at the firſt Aſſault, and at the ſecond took only the outward Court, with a conſiderable Booty of Cattle. The Garriſon at Callis in the mean time having Intelligence of this Action of the French againſt St. Mark, ſent out two hundred Men of Arms, two hundred Archers, and three hundred Foot, with twelve Waggons of Proviſions and Artillery, under the Command of Sir Richard Aſton, to relieve it. The French, who fearing this Deſcent of the Engliſh upon them, had fortified the Town, kept themſelves cloſe in it: However, the Engliſh poured in their Arrows ſo thick, that the French could not ſtand the Brunt, but having loſt ſome of their Number betook themſelves to flight, and were purſu'd ſo cloſely by the Engliſh, that near Fourſcore of them were taken, and among them ſome of Note, viz. the Lord Dampier, Seneſchall of Ponthieu, the Lord de Rambures, Monſieur de Weriners, and other Gentlemen, and ſixty ſlain, of whom the Lord of Queray, the Lord Courbet, Sir Robert Berenguevile, and ſome others were the Chief. The Engliſh laden with the Spoils of the Earl's Camp, and having gotten a good Number of Priſoners returned to Callis. This Succeſs encouraged them ſo, that within five Days five hundred iſſued out by Night, and aſſaulted the Caſtle of Arde, but it was ſo well defended by Sir Monfred de Bois, and the Lord Kigine, that the Engliſh were forced to return to Callis with the Loſs of forty of their Men. Theſe Inroads of the Engliſh and French one upon another made way for greater Deſigns; for as King Henry thought it convenient to ſtrengthen his Garriſon at Callis, not only to defend it ſelf, but make Invaſions upon the French Countries, by ſending a thouſand freſh Men thither; ſo the French King made effectual Proviſions againſt them, furniſhing Graveling, and other Fortreſſes with Plenty of Soldiers for their Defence; but becauſe all they could do was not enough to ſecure themſelves againſt ſo potent an Enemy as the Calliſians then were; therefore the Duke of Burgundy was ſent by the French King to beſiege Callis with ſix thouſand Men of Arms, fifteen hundred Croſs-Bows, and twelve thouſand Foot. The King of England diſturbed with the News of this Siege, ſent a Navy with three thouſand Land-Men, under the Command of his Son the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Earl of Kent, to raiſe the Siege by plundering and burning the adjoining Countries, which they did for thirty Miles together in Normandy: Though this did not draw off the Duke from Callis, till the King of France, as was thought, by the Advice of the Duke of Orleans, who envy'd him the Glory of gaining ſo important a Fortreſs, commanded him to withdraw, and come Home, which cauſed a Ceſſation of Arms between the Two Nations for a little Time.

Callis beſieged.

After the Departure of the Prince of Wales from the Welſh, that People being enraged by their Loſſes, became more Troubleſome and Miſchievous Neighbours to the bordering Engliſh than ever, of which when the King had News, he reſolved to undertake another Expedition againſt them to reduce them: But before he could get all Things ready, a ſtrong Conſpiracy of his Nobles to depoſe him was diſcovered, and ſo he was obliged to ſtay to ſecure himſelf in his Throne. The Conſpiracy was begun and carried on in this Manner. It ſeems, that King Henry having received a peremptory Denial from his Lords, that they would give him no Money at London, diſmiſs'd them with ſome angry Words, and ſharp Menaces, which meeting with Diſcontents in ſome of his Nobles, and more eſpecially in Richard Scroop, Archbiſhop of York, and the Earl of Northumberland ſo enrag'd them, that they formed a ſtrong Conſpiracy againſt him to depoſe him. Theſe two Peers having conſulted with and engaged ſeveral other great Men in their Deſign, viz. Thomas Mowbrey (d), Earl-Marſhal, the Lords, Haſtings, Falconbridge, Burdolf, and others, and appointed a Meeting of all the Forces they could get together upon Yorkwolds, compos'd certain Articles containing ſuch Things as the Nobles and Commons found themſelves aggrieved with, that by divulging them among the People, and ſhewing them their Friends, they might raiſe a Strength ſufficient for their Deſign. The Piety of the Archbiſhop, who had engaged in this Conſpiracy, drew ſuch great Multitudes of the Gentry and Commons to join in his Quarrel, that almoſt every one that could bear Arms in the Countries adjacent followed him. The Archbiſhop ſeeing this Succeſs, encouraged them to proceed in their good Enterprize, and immediately cauſed the Articles of their Grievances to be ſet upon the Doors of the Monaſtries, and in the Streets of York, that all Men might underſtand the Cauſe that moved them to take Arms againſt the King. The Articles were to this Effect.

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6.

The Rebellion of Archbiſhop Scroop, and the Cauſe of it in ſeveral Articles.

ARTICLES of the Wrongs and Injuries done by King Henry to the Royal Dignity, and People of England.

Articles againſt King Henry.

Imprimis. 'THat King Henry at his coming 'into England out of his Exile 'had voluntarily ſworn, that he came only to 'Challenge and Recover his Own and Wife's Inheritance, and not to intermeddle with the 'King's Crown or Authority, but after finding 'himſelf ſtrong enough to fulfil his Ambitious 'Deſires, had wickedly broke his Oath, and 'without any Right or Reaſon cauſed himſelf 'to be made and proclaimed King.

Secondly, 'That as an Arch-Traitor he had 'not only impriſon'd his Soveraign Lord King 'Richard, and by Threats and Terrors had forced him to reſign his Crown and Dignity upon Promiſes of Life, but had barbarouſly cauſed him to be Murthered in Priſon, that he 'might enjoy his Crown and Kingdom with 'leſs Trouble and Moleſtation.

Thirdly, 'That ever ſince the Death of King 'Richard, he had unjuſtly kept the Kingdom, 'and the Crown from his Kinſman Edward 'Mortimer, who was the Son and Heir apparent of Philippa, the Daughter and Heir of 'Lionel, Duke of Clarence, Elder Brother to 'John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, the Father 'of the now Uſurping King.

Fourthly, 'That he had unjuſtly put to Death 'ſeveral of the Nobles of this Nation, for endeavouring to promote the Publick Good, and 'had contrary to the Law of the Land cauſed 'ſeveral Biſhops to be Arreſted, and Impriſoned.

(a) Son to that Duke of Norfolk, who was baniſh'd with this King, when he was Duke of Hereford.

Fifthly,

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6.

Fifthly, 'That he had willingly ratified, allowed, and approved in his Parliament at Winceſter a moſt wicked Statute made againſt the Church of Rome, the Powers and Principality thereof given by our Lord Jeſus Chriſt to Bleſſed St. Peter and his Succeſſors the Biſhops of Rome, and ſo hath been the Cauſe of much Simony, Perjury, and other Diſorders among the Clergy, and Gentry of the Nation, who ſell their Vacant Benefices to unworthy and unfit Perſons, to the great Diſcouragement of Learning in the Univerſities, and Diligence in the Miniſtry.

Sixthly, 'That he hath uſurped a Tyrannical Government, and ſo grievouſly oppreſſed the Nation by his continual Exactions of needleſs Taxes and Subſidies, when there was no reaſonable Cauſe or Occaſion for them, that the People are miſerably impoveriſhed, and dare not complain, becauſe of his Menaces and Threats.

Seventhly, 'That no Juſtice could be expected from him, becauſe, that contrary to his Coronation Oath, he had hindred the Free Election of Parliaments by ſending his Letters into the Shires and Boroughs of the Kingdom, whereby he procured, that ſuch Perſons only ſhould be choſen Knights and Burgeſſes, as would not fail to ſerve his Turn in their Votes and Acts, as Occaſion was offered.

Eighthly, 'That whereas in Honour and Reſpect to his Affinity, he ought to have ranſomed and redeemed his Coſin the Earl of March from his loathſome Impriſonment, (and the more eſpecially, becauſe he was often ſollicited to it by the Lords of his Council) he not only deny'd to grant the ſame Requeſt, but falſely and untruly Publiſhed and Declared, That the Earl made himſelf a Priſoner to the Welſh voluntarily, that he might have a more colourable Pretence to join with Traytors and Rebels to conſpire and plot againſt him, and diſturb his Peace and Government.

Laſtly, 'That the Premiſſes being very deſtructive to the Nation, and calling for a ſpeedy Redreſs, they had taken Arms with no other Intention, than to exalt unto the Kingdom the true and lawful Heir, and to crown him with the Royal Diadem of England, to bring the Welſh, Iriſh, and other Enemies of the Kingdom to a perpetual Peace; and laſtly, to free the Nation from all thoſe Exactions, Extortions, and unjuſt Payments, which ruined the People: And therefore as they defied King Henry, as an Uſurping Tyrant, and pronounced him Perjured and Excommunicate; ſo they threatned the Curſe of God, and his Holy Church upon all thoſe that ſhould aſſiſt him againſt them, and not join with them againſt him.

Theſe Articles being ſeen and read, were very well approved by the Generality of People, and brought a mighty Concourſe to the Aſſiſtance of the Archbiſhop; inſomuch, that they had no reaſon in the leaſt to doubt of Succeſs. The King having Intelligence of theſe Things, gave over all Thoughts of his Expedition into Wales, and reſolved to turn his Forces againſt them: But Ralph Nevill, Earl of Weſtmoreland, and his Son John, Duke of Lancaſter (e) with ſeveral other great Perſons, who were at that Time marching towards Scotland to defend the Borders with a conſiderable Force, thought it neceſſary to ſtop the Growth of the Rebellion, by oppoſing it in the Beginning; and being not far from their Camp, preſented themſelves with all the Strength they could get to give them Battel. The Archbiſhop's Party was much the Stronger, being twenty thouſand Men, but yet were not forward to ſet upon them, which the Earl of Weſtmoreland perceiving, and not daring to aſſault them, he contrived to ſupplant them by this Stratagem. He ſent certain Meſſengers to the Archbiſhop to know the Cauſe, why a Perſon of his Character for Wiſdom and Piety, who ſhould by his Place endeavour all he could to promote Peace and Quietneſs in the Nation, ſhould appear in Arms, and diſturb the Government. The Archbiſhop reply'd, 'That 'he attempted nothing againſt the King's 'Peace; but all that he intended was to ad'vance the Good of the Commonwealth, by 'redreſſing the Abuſes and Corruptions of the 'Government, contained in certain Articles, 'which he gave them a Copy of, and deſired 'them to carry to the Earl to conſider upon, 'not doubting but he would agree with him, 'that his Purpoſe was Good and Profitable, as 'well for the King himſelf, as for the whole 'Realm. The Earl having received this Anſwer, and the Paper which they brought with them, from the Meſſenger's Hands, read the Articles contained in it; and immediately ſent the Biſhop Word again; 'That having well 'conſidered of the Articles ſent to him, he 'highly approve the Holy Intention and Pur'poſe of the Archbiſhop, and was ready to 'concur with him to his utmoſt in eſtabliſh'ing the ſame, deſiring to meet the Arch'biſhop in ſome convenient Place, and with an 'equal Number of Men, to confer farther a'bout the more effectual carrying on of their 'Deſign. The Prelate having received this Meſſage did not ſuſpect the Deceit lurking in it, but rejoyced much at the Earl's Propoſals, appointing a Place to meet him, as he deſired. The Earl-Marſhal was afraid of the Trick, but the Archbiſhop giving Credit to the Earl's Words, perſuaded him to attend him to the Conference, where the Earl of Weſtmoreland again ſolemnly declared, 'That he and his 'would do their Beſt, that a Reformation 'ſhould be made according to the forementioned Articles: And then deſiring that their Soldiers might be diſmiſſed to their Camps, they ſhook Hands, and ſat down to drink together, as perfect Friends; which when the Soldiers ſaw they departed with Joy, and left them; but one of the Troops wheeling about by the Earl of Weſtmoreland's Order, came ſuddenly upon them as they were ſitting, and took the Archbiſhop, Earl-Marſhal, and ſeveral other Priſoners. This Perfidiouſneſs the Archbiſhop too late upbraided the Earl of Weſtmoreland with, and that with ſome Smartneſs; but the Earl pacified him by repeated Promiſes of his Safety, and of them that were with him. The Earl of Weſtmoreland ſoon after hearing, that the King himſelf was come to Pomfraict, went thither with his Priſoners, and preſented them to the King; but whether he forgot to tell the King of his Promiſe, or whether the King would not perform it, certain it is, that they were both Executed. The Arch-

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6.

Earl of Weſtmoreland takes the Archbiſhop Priſoner by a Stratagem, and ends the Rebellion.

(e) John of Lancaſter, King Henry's Third Son, he was not Duke of Lancaſter; but afterwards he was famous by the Stile of Duke of Bedford, and Regent of France.

biſhop

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6.

Biſhop ſuffered with great Conſtancy, and was ſo much admired as well as pitied after his Death, that the People worſhipp'd him for a Martyr, till the King forbad them. From Pomfraict the King marched with his Army of 37000 Men to York, where he fined the Citizens at his Pleaſure for their Rebellion, and ſo furniſhed himſelf with Money and Proviſion for his further Progreſs in purſuit of the Earl of Northumberland: But that Earl, with the Lord Burdolf eſcaped into Scotland, and was received by David, Lord Flemming. The King in his way took the Lord Haſtings and Falconbridge, Sir John Colvill, and Sir John Griffith, and beheaded them at Durham. Then he aſſaulted Berwick, Wark-worth, Alenwick, and ſeveral other Caſtles which belonged to the Earl of Northumberland, and took them, and ſo put an end to the Rebellion at preſent.

King Henry's Expedition againſt the Welſh.

While the King was thus employ'd againſt his own Subjects, the Welſh under Owen Glendour were very ſollicitous to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt King Henry's Arms, whoſe Intentions (as they knew) were not laid aſide wholly, but deferred, and therefore they might expect him as ſoon as Things were quiet at Home. They thereupon ſent to the King of France for his Aſſiſtance, and obtained 12000 Men, which were ſent over in 140 Ships, under the Command of the Marſhal Montmerancy. In their Paſſage they loſt all their Horſes for want of freſh Water; and juſt after their Landing, the Lord Barkley, and Mr. Henry Pay, burnt and took near Thirty of their Ships: But theſe Loſſes they ſoon recovered upon the Engliſh; for joining with Owen Glendour, they beſieged Carmarden, Worceſter, and ſeveral other Places, from whence they took ſtore of Spoil and Plunder. King Henry hearing of theſe Troubles from the Welſh, haſted againſt them; but as if an ill Fate had purſued him, he loſt all his Carriages with a violent Tempeſt, in his Paſſage thither; and being arrived, could effect nothing againſt them; for the Welſh after their uſual manner retreating into their Mountains, the King for want of Money and Forrage was forced to return Home without any Action worthy of Mention, loſing ſome of his Carriages in his Retreat. The French alſo returned with little gain by their tedious Journey, having loſt more than they had gotten.

Reg. 7.

Several Accidents.

In the beginning of this Year the Lady Philip, King Henry's younger Daughter, was married to Erice, King of Denmark, Norway and Sweden, and not long after proclaimed Queen of thoſe Countries on the Conception of our Lady, December 8. in the preſence of the Embaſſadors, who had celebrated the Marriage before. On the Tranſlation of St. Martin, the Town of Royſton was ſet on Fire, and almoſt burnt down to the Ground. The Earl of Arundel alſo about the ſame time married the King of Portugal's natural Daughter, and the King and Queen were at the Marriage.

A. D. 1406.

Seventh Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

On the Firſt of March a Parliament met at Weſtminſter. The main Deſign of their Meeting was to grant the King a Subſidy for his preſent Supply; but that he might more eaſily gain his Ends upon them, the King paſſed ſeveral Acts at their Requeſt, about the more regular and orderly Election of Knights of the Shires, and Burgeſſes for Parliament; againſt Bulls to be diſcharged of Tythes, Proviſions, Licenſes and Pardons for Benefices, held by Incumbents, purchaſed of the Pope, and brought into the Nation, to the great Prejudice of the Church, and Diſturbance of the Order of the Nation; as alſo for the Confirmation of the ancient Liberties, and Preſervation of the Peace, with ſeveral other Statutes; by which Readineſs and Facility he thought to oblige them to be more liberal to him in granting him Money: But when the King's Neceſſities and Wants came to be propounded, the Houſe was generally averſe to it, and deny'd to grant any Tax at preſent. The King had no way to force them to it, but by prolonging their Seſſion, which would not only be chargeable to the Nation, but prejudicial to all their private Intereſts, in neglecting their Summer-buſineſs; and therefore, when they had long waited for their Diſſolution with Impatience, and found the King's Deſign, they at length granted him a Fifteenth of the Commons; which was ſo much the more heavy, becauſe the length of the Seſſion had been very Expenſive: And the Clergy to eaſe the Seculars, who had been much impoveriſh'd with paying ſo many Tenths, impoſed a new Subſidy upon Stipendiary Prieſts, Mendicant-Fryars, and Chauntry-Prieſts, viz. three and four Pence a Head, which was paid by them with much Murmuring and Repining, becauſe of the Poverty of thoſe inferiour Prieſts and Monks and the Novelty of it. By this Parliament the Succeſſion was entailed a-new upon the Poſterity of King Henry, and a Pardon given to all thoſe Perſons that had been inſtrumental in ſuppreſſing the late Rebellion, and ſuch riotous Meetings as were Precedent, or Conſequential to it.

A. D. 1406. Reg. 7.

King Henry contrives to get the Earl of Northumberland from the Scots.

The King while the Parliament ſat, conſidering how Turbulent the Earl of Northumberland had been to his Government; that he had been the chief Cauſe and Inſtrument of Two Rebellions, and that he could never hope for any Security ſo long as he was alive; for though he was fled into Scotland, yet being ſo near his Friends in the North, and among his Enemies the Scots, who if not out of Love to the Earl, yet out of Hatred to himſelf and the Engliſh, would lay hold of any Opportunity to aſſault his Dominions, and diſturb his Peace; contrived to prevent the Earl's Deſigns, by getting him into his Hands, and to that End agreed with ſeveral of the Scotch Nobles to reſtore certain Great Men of their Kingdom, whom he kept Priſoners, if they would reſign the Earl of Northumberland, and Lord Bardolf into his Hands. The Scots readily aſſented to the King's Propoſals, thinking it unreaſonable to value the Safety of Two Rebels, before the Liberty of many of their very good Friends, and accordingly conſpired to take them and deliver them to him: But the Lord Flemming, who had entertain'd them, having Intelligence of the Deſign, and being loath to violate the Sacred Rules of Hoſpitality, gave them Notice of it, and adviſed them to provide for their Safety elſewhere, ſince he could not longer protect them; whereupon the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf fled into Wales. The Scotch Lords being thus diſappointed of their Aim, turned their Anger upon the Lord Flemming, and ſlew him, but with no leſs Trouble to the Nation than Cruelty in themſelves: For the Children and Relations of the ſaid Lord, being excited by the Barbarouſneſs of the Fact, reſolved to revenge it, and being in ſo juſt a Cauſe, obtained Aſſiſtance eaſily to effect it. This begat a Civil War in Scotland, and raiſed ſuch dangerous Quarrels in ſeveral parts of the Nation, that the King not thinking it ſafe to keep Prince James his Son and Heir at Home, ſent him under the Care of the Earl of

A. D. 1406. Reg. 7.

of Orkney, and a Biſhop, into France to compleat his Education, and learn that Language. In their Paſſage, as they ſailed by the Engliſh Coaſt, about Clay in Norfolk, they were taken by certain Engliſh Ships belonging to thoſe Parts, and ſent to the King at Windſor; who though they preſented to him the King of Scots Letters, containing a Requeſt of his Favour to his Son, if he ſhould land in any part of his Dominions, yet he impriſoned them all in the Tower of London; ſaying, He would teach the Young Prince to ſpeak the French Tongue, and ſo the need go no further. The Biſhop remained not long in Cuſtody, but either through Cunning or Connivance eſcaped; and though a Truce was made a little after between the two Kings of England and Scotland, yet the Prince was kept a Priſoner, either as a Pledge of his Father's Fidelity, or to make him expel the Engliſh Rebels out of his Dominions, whom he entertained to the King's great Diſpleaſure.

Divers Accidents.

In the End of this Summer the Britains, who ſerved the Queen, were baniſhed the Nation, and two of her Daughters ſent along with them by Order of the Parliament. The Lady Philippa alſo was ſent over into Denmark to her Husband, being attended by Henry Bowet, Biſhop of Bath, and the Lord Richard, Brother to the Duke of York, with a great Train, and was ſoon after her Arrival married to the ſaid King with great Magnificence. At the ſame time ſolemn Juſts were held at London between the Earl of Kent, Sir John Cornwall, and the Lord Beaumont and Three Scots, the Earl of Marre, and Two Scottiſh Knights; but the Honour of the Victory fell to the Engliſh. This Year alſo the Mayor of London cauſed all the Wears or Banks, as far as Graveſend, which had been made into the Thames to catch the Fiſh, to be beaten down and demoliſhed, becauſe they were found too deſtructive to the Fiſhery. The Earl of Arundel, and ſome other of the Nobility oppoſed the Mayor in it, but he prevailed through ſome Conceſſions given the City of London by their Charter. Sir Robert Knolles finiſhed Rocheſter-Bridge, and the Chappel adjoining to it. The Pope made Thomas Langley, Biſhop of Durham, in the Place of Walter Skirlow, lately deceaſed. The French alſo ſent a further Aid to the Welſh in thirty eight Ships, but loſt eight in their Paſſage, and the reſt hardly eſcaping the Engliſh, got aſhore in much Fear and Danger.

Reg. 8.

Earl of Kent's Marriage.

The King, who greatly favoured Edmund Holland, Earl of Kent, and for that Reaſon had raiſed him to very great Honour and Offices about him, preferred him to the Lady Lucy, the Eldeſt Daughter, and one of the Heireſſes of Barnabas, Duke of Milan; which Match he had obtained for him by great Intereſt, and large Expences. She was married to him January the 24th, in the Church of St. Mary Overies, in Southwark, and the Duke on the Day of her Marriage paid him by the Hands of Don Alfonſo de Cainuola 100000 Ducats.

A. D. 1407.

Roger Walden's Death.

About this Time died Roger Walden, Doctor of Divinty, and ſo at length came to his Haven of Peace and Quiet, after a life of infinite Changes and Troubles; for of all Men living he was the greateſt Inſtance of the Mutability and Inconſtancy of Fortune. He was originally of mean Parentage, and born to a ſmall Eſtate; but being educated in Learning, and of a pregnant Wit, he raiſed himſelf by degrees to the higheſt Offices both in Church and State; for he was firſt made Lord High-Treaſurer, and a little after by the Depoſition of Thomas Arundel, he was made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſo continued during King Richard's Reign. From theſe Pinacles of Grandeur he was caſt down by the coming of King Henry to the Throne, who reſtored Thomas Arundel to his See. Several Years he remained in a private Station, and at length was again raiſed to Epiſcopal Dignity, being made Biſhop of London: But, as though Fortune raiſed him only to ſhew her Power to caſt down, he was again removed from that See in leſs than the ſpace of a Year, and Nicholas Hobwith put in his Place; dying, if not in as poor, yet in almoſt as mean a Condition as he was Born: So uncertain is worldly Greatneſs. A. D. 1407. Reg. 8.

Duke of Orleans beſieges Burges and Blay.

The Duke of Orleans early in the Spring having gathered a mighty Army, beſieged the Towns of Burges and Blay in Gaſcoigne, not doubting, but that with his Army he might eaſily win the ſaid Towns: But, as if Providence had fought againſt him, and diſapprov'd the Action; there happened ſuch continual Tempeſts of Rain, mixt with Hail and Snow, every Day for ſix Weeks together, that he was not able to attempt any Thing; but loſt by the Violence of the Weather (as was reported) ſix thouſand of his Men; ſo that he was forced to break up the Siege and depart with Diſgrace. The Engliſh not inſenſible of this Danger, in the mean time annoy'd the French Coaſts; and with fifteen Ships under the Command of Henry Pay, Eſq; and ſome others belonging to the Cinque-Ports took a hundred and twenty Prizes on the Britiſh Coaſts, laden with Iron, Salt, Oyl, and Rochel-Wines; ſo that the French ſuſtained many Damages by Sea and Land.

Seditious Libels ſet up in the City.

Some Seeds of Rebellion began to ſpring this Year, tho' being nipped in the Bud, they came to nothing: For ſome Perſons deſirous to ſtir up the People to Sedition, ſet up Bills in ſeveral Places of the City of London, and upon the Doors of St. Paul's Church; declaring, that King Richard was ſtill alive, and would ſhortly come with great Power and State to recover his Kingdom. But the Chief Actor in this Buſineſs was by the King's Vigilance ſoon found out, and puniſhed according to his Deſert, that the Terror of his Sufferings might make others to avoid the like falſe Attempts.

A Plague in London.

The City of London was ſo much infected this Summer with the Plague, that it is ſaid thirty thouſand died of it; and the Country was proportionably afflicted with it, for many whole families died of it. The King not daring to venture himſelf in the City, paſſed his Time in the Country, till the Infection ſhould ceaſe; where having kept his Court ſome time at his Caſtle of Leeds and Kent, he paſs'd into Eſſex to reſide a while at Pleſhey. He took Ship at Queensburgh, in the Iſle of Sheepy, to ſail to Leigh in Eſſex: But in his way certain French Pirates, who lay at the Thames Mouth, watching for Prey, fell in among his Ships, having Information of his croſſing, and took four Ships which were next to the King's, miſſing of the Ship he was in, which they intended to take; but carrying away Sir Thomas Rampſtone his Vice-chamberlain, with his Furniture and Apparel; the King himſelf eſcaping only through the Swiftneſs of his Ship. The Lord Camois, had undertaken with certain Men of War, to convey the King over ſafely; but either thro' the Sluggiſhneſs of his Ship or croſs Winds, not being at hand to guard the King from this Danger, was thought to have practiſed with the French to deliver the King into their Hands; and

The King near taken by ſome French Pirates.

A. D. 1407. Reg. 8.

and being Attach'd was impriſon'd, and oblig'd to undergo his Tryal, but was cleared by his Peers, and reſtored by the King to his Lands, Goods and Offices.

The King oppoſes the Pope's Proviſions.

Robert Halome, Chancellour of Oxford being at Rome with the Pope, obtained a Proviſion of him for the Arch-Biſhoprick of York, when it ſhould become Vacant by the Death of the preſent Biſhop. Richard Scroope being beheaded for his Rebellion, Robert poſſeſſed himſelf of the See: But the King was ſo offended with him for this Intruſion, that he was afraid to keep it; and therefore ſubmitted the Diſpoſal of it to the King's Pleaſure, who thereupon made Henry Bowet, from Biſhop of Bath, Arch-Biſhop, and put Robert Halome into the See of Salisbury, then vacant by the Tranſlation of Henry Chicheley to St. Davids. (f) The Prince of Wales much about the ſame Time won the Caſtle of Aberuſwith (g) in Wales, forcing the Beſieged to reſign it to him upon certain Conditions; but the Prince was no ſooner departed from thoſe Parts, but Owen Glendour by a ſubtle Stratagem got Poſſeſſion of it again; and putting out the Keepers, whom he charged with Treaſon for reſigning the Caſtle without his Conſent, put in others more faithful to defend it for his Uſe.

Sir Robert Knollis's Death, and his Acts of Charity and Piety.

About the Feaſt of the Aſſumption of the Virgin, Aug. 15. deceaſed that moſt Warlike Knight, and Brave Engliſh Hero, Sir Robert Knolles, at his Manor of Sconetborp in Norfolk; and being carried up to London, was honourably Interred in the Church of the White-Fryars in Fleet-Street, by the Lady Conſtance his Wife; which Church he had a little before re-edified. He was of mean Parentage, but by his Courage and Valour raiſed himſelf, to be the Commander of Armies, and Governour of Provinces; in which Places he behaved himſelf ſo well, that he not only enriched himſelf but was a Terror to all the Enemies of the Nation, eſpecially the French and Brittains. In his old Age he reſigned his Government of the Province of Aquitain, to Sir Thomas Belfort, and gave himſelf to Acts of Piety and Charity; in which he was as eminent, as in Heroick Atchievements: For he built the large Bridge at Rocheſter over the Medway, with a Chappel at the Foot of it; in which is a Table of all the Benefactors to the Bridge, who have given Land or Money to the upholding of it. The Coping hath been added ſince by John Warner, a Merchant of Rocheſter, and the Iron Bars and Spikes by Arch-Biſhop Warham. He alſo founded a College of Secular Prieſts at Pontefract for ſix Prieſts, thirteen poor Men and Women, and endued it with a hundred and eighty Pounds a Year in Lands, with many other Acts of Charity, to his great Honour and the eternal Commendation of his Memory.

Reg. 9.

Sir Thomas Rampſtone, Conſtable of the Tower of London, paſſing from Court to the Tower by Water, was drown'd in ſhooting the Bridge. Sir Richard Whittington the Famous Benefactor to the City of London, was this Year made Mayor, and held that Place three Years. With the beginning of this Year a Parliament met at Glouceſter, but was removed in November to Weſtminſter for more Conveniency. In this Seſſion little was enacted of publick Advantage, Eight Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

beſides the Confirmation of the Ancient Liberties, Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, but only ſome Irregularities about the Payment of Taxes by Strangers, ſealing Cloths, and the like were removed. In reſpect to the Church ſeveral Things of Importance were moved, and ſome enacted, viz. It was moved by Petition to the King, That foraſmuch, as divers Proviſors of Benefices in the Church of England, thro' Covetouſneſs have deviſed to deſtroy the Preſent Incumbents, by ſuing Proceſſes in the Court of Rome, and without any Citations given them within the Realm have deprived them of their Benefices; It would pleaſe the King to conſider the Miſchief of ſuch Proceedings, and to ordain, That all ſuch Perſons, as ſhall procure or ſue in the Court of Rome any Proceſs touching any Benefice or Collation in his Majeſty's Dominions, and obtain any Preſentation thereupon, ſhall not be admitted by any Ordinary into ſuch Benefices, but ſhall incur the Penalty of the Statute of Proviſors made 13 Rich. 2. with all their Counſellors and Fautors: To which the King anſwered, That he would take effectual Care that the Statutes before-mentioned ſhould be obſerved. Another Petition was alſo put up to the King, begging, 'That ſince many Benefices 'of the Realm were held and enjoy'd by Fo'reigners and others, who took no care of the 'People, he would be pleaſed to ſeize upon all 'Benefices, where the Perſons were not Reſi'dent, and take one half of the ſaid Benefices to 'his own Uſe. But to this the King anſwered, 'That he would cauſe the Ordinaries to do 'their Duties; which if they would not do, he 'would take care to prevent Pluralities. Theſe favourable Anſwers encouraged the Commons to paſs ſeveral Bills in reference to them, which the King enacted, viz. 'That no Monies ſhould 'be carried out of the Nation to the Court of 'Rome; and that if any of the Pope's Collec'tors ſhould levy any Money within the Realm 'for the Firſt-Fruits of any Eccleſiaſtical Digni'ty, he ſhould incur the Penalty of the Statute 'of Proviſors: That the Elections and Preſen'tations to Benefices ſhould be free, and no 'Patrons ſhould be interrupted in their Right, 'either by the King or Pope: That all Statutes 'againſt Proviſors, and Tranſlations of Biſhop'ricks and Arch-Biſhopricks, ſhall be ſtrictly ob'ſerved and executed upon all Offenders againſt 'them, and that no Clergy-man ſhall ſue for 'any Benefice but in the King's Court. Theſe Acts were ſo pleaſing to the Parliament, that they granted the King a general Subſidy thro' the whole Nation, and ſo it was diſmiſs'd.

A. D. 1407. Reg. 9.

A. D. 1408.

An hard Winter.

A little before Chriſtmas, began a Froſt of that Violence and long Continuance, that the like was ſcarce ever heard of in England. It laſted fifteen Weeks; and being accompany'd with an abundance of Snow, it was ſo deſtructive to the Birds eſpecially, that almoſt all the ſmaller Birds died with Cold and Hunger.

The E. of Northumberland rebels a third time and is ſlain.

Early in this Spring the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf, who from their Eſcape out of Scotland, had ſpent a whole Year to gather an Army in Wales, France and Flanders to invade England, returned again into Scotland, and entered into England. The King, who had no Suſpicion of this Attempt, was at London, conſulting with his Nobles and Peers about the (f) The Tranſlation of Dr. Chicheley from the Biſhoprick of Salisbury to St. David's, ſhews us, that there muſt be a vaſt Alteration in the Revenues of the See of St. David's, from what they were formerly: That of Salisbury being now valued in the King's Books at 1367*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* and that of St. David's, but at 422*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and yet as low as the Prieſts are now, the Value of it in the ſaid Books amounts to much more, than that of the other Three Welſh Biſhopricks put together.

(g) Aberyſtwith in Cardiganſhire.

Affairs

A. D. 1408. Reg. 9. Affairs of the Realm, and was in no Readineſs to make any Oppoſition; ſo that the Earl had time to gain ſeveral of his Caſtles with eaſe, before the King could get his Army together, though he endeavour'd it with all ſpeed. Theſe proſperous Beginnings encourag'd the Earl to go on, and invade Yorkſhire; where being at Thresk, he put out a Proclamation, aſſuring the People, 'That he came to relieve the Engliſh Nation 'from their many and unjuſt Oppreſſions; and 'requiring all Perſons that loved the Liberty 'of their Country to reſort to him immediately 'with their Weapons and Armour to aſſiſt him; by which fair Pretences great Numbers of People reſorted to him. The King being certified of theſe Things, haſted towards them with a great Army; but not being able to get there time enough to ſecure thoſe Countries from their Ravage and Spoil, Sir Thomas Rockley or Rokesby, High-Sheriff of the County, a Perſon of ſignal Courage and Loyalty, aſſembled the Forces of the County together, if not to fight them, yet to ſtop their Progreſs, which without any Signs of Oppoſition would prove of greater Damage. The Earl and his Party advanced forward, and the Sheriff as reſolutely marched againſt them, and meeting them at Braham-moor near Haſelwood, reſolved to give them Battel, though with a far leſs Number than the Earl had. The Rebels choſe their Ground, and were ready to receive them; which Advantage the Sheriff ſo little regarded, that he fell immediately upon them perhaps more boldly than wiſely; but Fortune ſeconds the Adventurous. The Earl and his Men encountred him with equal Reſolution and Bravery. However in the Iſſue he was forced to reſign the Victory to the Sheriff; many were ſlain on both ſides, but the Rebels loſt far the moſt. The Lord Bardolf was taken, and ſo much wounded, that he died ſoon after of his Wounds. The Earl of Northumberland was ſlain, but his Head being cut off was ſent up with the Lord Bardolf's to London, and there ſet upon a Pole on the Bridge. His Death was much lamented by the People, by reaſon of his Valour and Honour. The Biſhop of Bangor, who had gone over to Owen Glendour was taken; but becauſe he was not in Arms, the King pardon'd him, more in reſpect to his Order than Merit. But the Abbot of Hailes found not that Mercy from the King; for being taken in Armour, he was hang'd. The King was on his March towards the Rebels, when the News of this Victory was brought to him; but judging it neceſſary to proceed in his Courſe to ſettle thoſe Countries, and purge 'em from the Dregs of Rebellion, he went to York, where he puniſh'd many that were accuſed for ſuccouring and aſſiſting the Earl of Northumberland, ſome with Death, others with great Fines, and ſo brought thoſe Parts in a ſmall time into good Order.

This Summer the Engliſh Seas being much peſtered with French Rovers, which did much Damage, both to the Coaſts and Merchants, the King ſent out a well-mann'd Fleet, under the Command of Edmund Holland, Earl of Kent, to ſcowr the Narrow-Seas of them. The Pirates having Intelligence of the King's Deſign, withdrew themſelves into their Ports, ſo that the Earl, when he came to Sea, though he ſought carefully for them, could find none of them; but at length getting Intelligence that they were gotten into Britain, he purſued 'em, reſolving to revenge on them the Injuries they had done to the Engliſh; and becauſe he could not bring them to a Sea-fight, he landed his Men, and beſieged the City of Briak which harbour'd them, and ſent them out. The Inhabitants ſtoutly defended themſelves, endeavouring to drive the Engliſh back, by caſting Arrows and Stones upon them, and were ſo lucky as to wound the Earl himſelf mortally on the Head, of which hurt he died within five Days. This might have proved Fortunate to the Beſieged, had their Enemies been Men of common Tempers; but the Loſs of their Captain ſo much enraged the Soldiers, that they became more deſperate in the Aſſualt, and within a few Days took the Town by force, and ſlew all that had made Reſiſtance, but ſtaid not to ſecure it, being ſatisfied with the Prey and Priſoners. The Counteſs of Kent had no Iſſue, and therefore the King deſired her in Marriage for his Baſtard-Brother the Earl of Dorſet, an old and decrepit Man; (b) but ſhe choſe rather to pleaſe her ſelf, and married a young Gentleman, Henry Mortimer, by whom ſhe had one Daughter, named Ann; afterwards married to Sir John Awbemond. A. D. 1408. Reg. 9.

Reg. 10. The Schiſm between the Popes, and the means to end it.

The Schiſm between the Popes, which had laſted ſeveral Years paſt, was now grown very wearisome to the whole Church, having coſt ſo many Lives to maintain it, and being ſuch an open Breach of Unity and Chriſtian Love, the Two main Pillars of the Church. The two laſt Antipopes, Gregory XII, and Benedict XIII, had been ſworn at their Election to call a Council, and ſubmit to the Deciſion of it, that by that moſt effectual way Peace might be reſtored to the Church; but their Behaviour afterwards in chooſing new Cardinals to ſtrengthen their Parties, was an evident Sign they intended to perpetuate the Schiſm, as much as in them lay, not valuing the Oath they had taken to the contrary. This Action offended the more moderate Cardinals, and gave diſtaſte to particular Churches, inſomuch, that they began to take others Methods to bring the Popes to Terms of Agreement.

A. D. 1409. In France the King having taken Advice of the Learned Men of his Univerſities of Paris (i) Bolonia, Orleans, Tholouſe and Montpelier, how he might avoid the Danger of Schiſm; determined to ſubmit to neither of theſe Schiſmatical Popes, until Peace were reſtored to Chriſt's Church. In England alſo the Doctors of both Univerſities met in a Council at London, with the reſt of the Clergy to debate, whether they ſhould withdraw from the Pope their uſual Payments of Monies, and their accuſtomed Obedience; conſidering, that contrary to his Word and Promiſe, confirmed by his Oath, he had hindred the Agreement and Concord of the Church: But they came to no Reſolution, becauſe the King was willing to try more gentle Methods firſt, eſpecially ſince the Council of Piſa was appointed to meet to determine the Controverſie the next Summer: And therefore the mean while, that he might diſpoſe Pope Gregory and his Cardinals to ſubmit to their Deciſion, he wrote a Letter to each of them, to this effect. 'To the Pope he repreſented

The Council of Piſa appointed.

(b) It could not be the Earl of Dorſet, for the King did not confer that Title till four Years afterwards on his younger Brother Thomas Beaufort, Hol. The Author muſt mean John, Earl of Somerſet, the eldeſt of Eſquire Swinford's Sons, by the Duke of Lancaſter; and he being ſeveral Years Younger than the King, who was not now above one and forty Years of Age, deſerved not the Character of Old and Decrepid.

(i) Bologna is not one of the French King's Univerſities, and never belong'd to the Dominions of France.

A. D. 1409. Reg. 10.

'the Miſeries of Chriſtendom by this Schiſm, 'and how much Blood-ſhed it had been the 'Cauſe of; that 200000 Men had been ſlain in 'ſeveral parts of the Chriſtian World in this 'Anti-papal Quarrel; and lately in the Con-'tention for the Biſhoprick of Leige between 'the Two Competitors, ſet up by each Pope '30000 Men had been ſlain: And then added, 'That if his Holineſs would ſeriouſly conſi-'der theſe Things, he could not but be much 'troubled at it, and for Conſcience ſake ra-'ther relinquiſh his Papal Authority and Grau-'dure, than be a further Cauſe of ſuch deteſta-'ble Murders; imitating the Example of the 'True Mother, who pleading her Cauſe be-'fore Solomon, choſe rather to part with her 'own Child, than ſee it cut aſunder: And 'though by his late Creation of Nine Cardi-'nals he had given ſome Suſpicion, that he in-'tended not the End of the Schiſm; yet he 'hoped, that he abhorred to be guilty of ſo 'great Inconſtancy. To the Cardinals he gives 'only an exhortation to behave themſelves 'with that Candour and Impartiality at the 'Council of Piſa, that God may be pleaſed, 'and the Pope himſelf obliged to thank them. Theſe Letters to the Pope and Cardinals the King ſent to Rome by Sir John Colvil, Knight, and Mr. Nicholas Rixton, Clerk. Soon after their Departure the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſummon'd the Clergy of his Province to a Convocation in St. Paul's Church, to chooſe ſufficient Perſons to go to the General Council appointed to be held at Piſa; and they unanimouſly fixed upon Robert Halome, Biſhop of Salisbury, Henry Chicheley, Biſhop of St. Davids, and Thomas Chillingden, Prior of Chriſt-Church in Canterbury.

John Wickliff's Books condemned at Oxford.

This Summer, notwithſtanding the Burning of William Sawter, and other Severities uſed againſt the Lollards in this King's Reign; it was found, that ſeveral Learned Men of the Univerſity of Oxford, and in other parts of the Nation were inclinable to the Doctrines of John Wickliff, and did publickly in their Sermons and other Diſcourſes, deliver Opinions and Concluſions tending that way. The Biſhop and chief of the Clergy were much troubled at it; and the Lord Chancellor, by his ſpecial Mandate, ordered a Convocation of the Heads and Body of the Univerſity, to meet and examine the Doctrines of Wickliff; who accordingly on June 26. aſſembling in great Multitudes, viz. both Regents and Non-regents, reprov'd and condemned with one Conſent the Books of John Wickliff, D. D. Entitled, De Sermone in monte, Triologorum de Simoniâ, De perfectione Statuum, De ordine Chriſtianò, & de gradibus Cleri Eccleſiæ. As alſo his Treatiſe of Logick or Sophiſtry: Prohibiting under the Penalty of the Great Curſe and Deprivation of all Scholaſtick Degrees, that none from thence-forward ſhould affirm, teach, or preach by any manner of means or ways any of the Opinions or Doctrines contained and ſet forth in the ſame Heretical Books.

Several Accidents.

About the ſame time was a famous Play acted at Skinner's Well, near Clerkenwell, London, repreſenting the chief Matter of the World from the Creation: It laſted Eight Days, and moſt part of the Nobility and Gentry of England were preſent at it. From hence they went to Royal Juſts in Smithfield, between the Marſhal of Henault and certain Hanovers, Challengers; and the Earl of Somerſet, and an equal Number of Engliſhmen Defendants. The Victory was on the Engliſhmen's ſide; for the Earl overcame, and all the Engliſh but one. Owen Glendour alſo the famous Welſh Rebel died. He had behaved himſelf with Valour enough; but not being able to effect what he had promiſed his Country-men, viz. an abſolute Soverainty among themſelves, and a Freedom from the Engliſh Yoke; but inſtead of theſe having engaged them upon inſupportable Expences, and an endleſs War, they deſerted him; and he being forſaken, partly through fear of being delivered up to King Henry, and partly thro' diſcontent and trouble of Mind, fled into the Mountains and Deſerts; where being deſtitute of all Comfort and Succour, he ended his miſerable Life. The Counſel of Piſa after a long Deliberation about the State of the Church thro' the Schiſm of the Antipopes, at laſt determined againſt both, and created Alexander V. Pope in their Room, and ſo put an end to the Schiſm which had vexed the Chriſtian Churches ſo long.

A. D. 1409. Reg. 10.

Reg. 11.

A. D. 1410.

The King made Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Surrey (k) Lord-Chancellor, and the Lord Scroop, Treaſurer; and after Chriſtmas met his Parliament at Weſtminſter, Jan. 28. In this Parliament it was enacted. 'That Sheriffs making 'falſe Returns of Knights of Shires elected for 'Parliament, ſhall forfeit a hundred Pound to 'the King: That Records ſhall not be amend-'ed or corrupted after Judgment enrolled, and 'that Jurors ſhall be returned into Weſtminſter-'Hall by the Sheriffs. But that which was moſt amazing in this Parliament was a Petition of the Commons delivered to the King, purporting, That the Temporal Poſſeſſions, Lands and Revenues of the Clergy were lewdly ſpent, conſumed and waſted by the Biſhops, Abbots and Priors of the Realm, which if they were well managed, would maintain 150 Earls, 1500 Knights, 6200 Eſquires, and 100 Hoſpitals more than are now at preſent; by which means the Safety of the Nations would be better provided for, the Poor better maintained, and the Clergy would be more Humble and Pious; and therefore they humbly beſought him to take them into his own Hands, and order them accordingly. In their Bill they alledged, That the Temporalities of the ſaid Biſhops and Religious Perſons amounted to above 322000 Marks; which at the Allowance of 3000 Marks to an Earl, a 100 Marks to each Knight, 40 Marks to an Eſquire, and an 100 Marks to each Alms-houſe yearly, would be ſufficient for the ſaid Number. But it is ſaid, that the King was diſpleaſed at this Motion, which having before been made, he commanded them for the future never to meddle with any ſuch Matters. The Commons alſo petitioned, That the Statute which paſt in the Second Year of the King againſt the Lollards might be revoked or qualified with ſome Reſtrictions and Mitigations: But the King ſo much favoured the Clergy, that he plainly Ninth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

(k) This was Thomas Beaufort, younger Son of John of Gaunt, and not Suinford, whom Walſingham erroneouſly ſtil'd Earl of Surrey, and the Modern Hiſtorians have erred, copying after him. Thomas Beaufort was created Earl of Dorſet two Years after; and this Remark may alſo correct an Error in Holinſhead, who ſays, that Thomas Beaufort, (Camb. Brit. Tit. Surrey.) the Chancellor died this Year 1411. pag. 536. And the very next Page he relates, That Thomas Beaufort, the King's Brother was created Earl of Dorſet, Anno 1412. Now there was no other Thomas Beaufort, beſides he who was the Son of that Suinford, that we read of in Hiſtory, and he had the Fortune to be Duke of Exeter, Protector of the Realm, and to be a chief Man in the Government to his Death, which happened in the Year 1446. Holinſhead, pag. 1079.

told

A. D. 1410. Reg. 11.

told them, 'That he was ſo far from diſan-'nulling or mitigating the ſaid Act, that he 'would have it made more vigorous and ſharp 'for the Puniſhment of ſuch erroneous Perſons. Then they further deſired, 'That Clerks con-'victed ſhould not be delivered to the Bi-'ſhop's Priſon, becauſe they eſcaped the Pu-'niſhment of their Crimes by that means: But they could not obtain their Requeſts. Theſe Denials ſo ſharpened the Commons againſt the King, that when he deſired that he might have annually a Fifteenth of the Laity, and a Tenth of the Clergy, though the Parliament did not ſit, they would not agree to it; nor had he gained a preſent Supply, were it not, that he tired them with a long Seſſion, keeping them till Mid-May, and forcing them to purchaſe their Diſmiſſion with the Gift of a Fifteenth of the Commons, though with much Diſcontent.

The Martyrdom of John Bodby.

In the Time of this Parliament was one John Bodby, a Taylor, of the Dioceſſe of Worceſter, convicted before Thomas, Archbiſhop of Canterbury of Hereſie, and obſtinately perſiſting in the ſame, becauſe he had been convened before his Dioceſan, and being admoniſh'd to leave his Erroneous Opinions, neither did, nor as yet would forſake them, and therefore was carried to Smithfield, and there burnt in a Pipe or Tun to Aſhes. Henry, the Prince of Wales, was preſent at this Execution, and much compaſſionating his Sufferings, was very deſirous to have ſaved him, offering him a Pardon if he would recant his Errors before the Fire was kindled; but he refuſing, was tied to the Stake, and the Fire made about him. As ſoon as he felt the Flames he cried out moſt hedeouſly; which when the Prince heard, he cauſed the Fire to be put out, and then exhorted him again to renounce his Errors, and he ſhould be ſaved; and ſince the Fire had made him Impotent, he promiſed him Three Pence a Day out of the King's Treaſury, as long as he lived; but the Holy Man recovering his Spirits, deny'd the Prince's Offers; and being put into the Fire again, was burnt to Aſhes: With miraculous Conſtancy, ſealing the Doctrines he had reſolutely maintained with his Death.

The Duke of Burgundy's Deſign to take Callis, defeated.

The Duke of Burgundy intending to make a ſecond and more effectual Attempt to take Callis for his Maſter the French King, (l) had brought down to St. Omers many Engines and Proviſions for that End. The Engliſh Garriſon at Callis were ſo much the more fearful of this Siege, becauſe the Duke was enraged for his laſt ill Succeſs againſt it; and had now reſolved, either to take it, or utterly demoliſh it, for which Purpoſe he had brought thither many ſtrange Engines newly invented and laid them up in the Abby there, till all things were ready for the Siege. The Callaſians had a watchful Eye upon the Duke's Motions; and their Fears ſuggeſted Methods to avoid the Danger, and diſappoint his cruel Purpoſe: For hiring a young Man, who was both ſubtle and deſperate, with a large Sum of Money to enter the Town of St. Omers and ſet it on fire; he did it ſo privately, that he eſcaped himſelf unſuſpected, and burnt down, not only the Abby wherein the Duke's Proviſion and Ammunition lay, but the greateſt part of the Town periſhed in the Flames, and ſo the Duke's Charge, as well as Aim was loſt, and the Calliſians preſerv'd.

Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Surrey died. The Citizens fell under the King's Diſpleaſure for quarrelling with the Prince's Servants, attending their Maſter at a Feaſt in Eaſtcheap, and the Mayor, Sheriffs and Aldermen were ſent for; but it appearing, that the Mayor had done his Duty in ſuppreſſing the Diſorder, and puniſhing the Offenders, the King pardon'd them, and ſo diſmiſſed them. This Year alſo he laid the Foundation of a College at Battle-field in Shropſhire, where he overcame the Lord Henry Peircy, ſurnamed Hotſpur, and his Uncle, in grateful thanks to God for that Victory, it being by far the ſtrongeſt Rebellion that was raiſed againſt him all his Reign; and through the Courage and Conduct of the Leaders moſt likely to ſucceed, which was the Motive to the King of building this College of Praiſe to God.

A. D. 1410. Reg. 11. Divers Accidents.

Reg. 12. The Scots much endamaged by the Engliſh Vice-Admiral.

Robert Humphreville, Knight, Vice-Admiral of England being imploy'd againſt the Scots with Ten able Ships of War, much infeſted the Coaſts of that Nation; and entring the Forth, or Frith of Edenburgh he lay there fourteen Days, and landing every Day on one ſide of the River or other, took great Spoils, and many Priſoners; notwithſtanding the Duke of Albany, and Earl Dowglas lay with a conſiderable Body of Men upon the Shore to prevent their Incurſions. At his Departure he burnt the Galliot of Scotland, a Veſſel of great Account with them, and many other Veſſels, and brought away with him fourteen good Ships laden with Prizes of Cloath, both Woollen and Linnen, Pitch, Tar, Woad, Flower, Rye, and Wheat Meal, with which he ſo well furniſh'd our Markets at home with Plenty, that Corn grew much cheaper, and the Poor much loved and admired him, giving him the Name of Robert Mend-market, in token of the Good he had done them, and with a Deſire that it ſhould be an eternal Honour to his Name, That whereas others made it their Buſineſs to raiſe Markets, he had in Charity to them beat them down. And thus he was called Mend-market in both Kingdoms; for in Scotland he had got himſelf that Name, by falling upon the Town of Peebles on the Market-day, and ſelling the Cloaths he had taken from the Traders at cheap Rates by their Bows for a Meaſure to the Country People, and then burning the Town. Shortly after his Return from Sea, he made an Inroad into Scotland by Land, with his Nephew Gilbert Humfreville, Earl of Angus, and burnt Jedworth, with the greateſt part of Tividale. This Year died 14000 of the Bloody-flux at Burdeaux, and proportionable Number in the Provinces of Gaſcoigne and Guienne, whereby the Country was ſo much diſpeopled, that there wanted Men to dreſs there Vines, and preſs their Grapes.

A. D. 1411. The King ſends his Ships to drive the Pirates out of the Narrow Seas.

A little after Chriſtmas the King ſent out John Pendergrace, Knight, and William Long to clear the Channel of the French Rovers and Pirates, who much moleſted the Engliſh Coaſts and Merchants, which they did with ſo great Care and Diligence, that in a little time no Pirate dared to appear, nor any Merchant feared any Danger. But this Succeſs which brought ſo much Safety and Gain to others, proved a Misfortune to themſelves; for their Enemies envying the Honour and Favour which they had deſervedly merited, accuſed them as the (l) He is improperly called his Maſter, it ſhould rather have been his Ally. The French King, Charles the Sixth was this Duke's Nephew, himſelf was Soveriagn of great part of the Low-Countries, by marrying the Daughter of the Earl of Flanders and Heynault.

A. D. 1411. Reg. 12.

only Pirates; and that though they had driven away the little Thieves from our Shores, 'twas but to take all the Prey for themſelves, and do more Miſchief, becauſe they were more powerful: What Grounds they had to raiſe this Calumny upon them doth not appear; but 'tis certain, that they moved the King to ſo great Diſpleaſure againſt them, that they dared not when called home, appear in the King's Preſence, but Pendergrace fled to Sanctuary in St. Peter's Church at Weſtminſter, and was forced to lodge with a Guard about him in the Porch, Night and Day, becauſe no Man durſt receive him into his Houſe, for fear of the King's Anger, and his Enemies threatned his Life. William Long kept out at Sea; and though the Lord Admiral was ſent out to bring him in, yet he could not catch him, and he would not be induced to reſign himſelf, till the Admiral in the King's Name had promiſed him that no harm ſhould come to him for what he had done: Upon which aſſurance he delivered himſelf to the Admiral, who brought him to the King; but the Admiral's Faith proved no Advantage to him, for he was impriſoned in the Tower, and there for ſome time kept cloſe Priſoner.

1412. Divers Accidents.

This Year the Guild-Hall in the City of London, which was but a mean Cottage before, was made a ſtately Building by the Mayor and Aldermen at the Charge of the City. And the Company of Grocers laid the Foundation of their Hall upon a peice of Ground, which they purchaſed for three hundred and twenty Marks in Cunihope-Lane. Alſo Rice ap Dee an Eſquire of Wales, who had joined with Owen Glendour in Rebellion againſt the King, was brought up to London, and there drawn, hang'd and quartered for his Crime.

The cruel War between the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy in France.

This Summer broke out the furious Factions of the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy in France, by which the whole Kingdom was involved in the Troubles of a Civil-War: The Occaſion is ſaid to be this. The Duke of Orleans, a Prince not only of great Courage, but of an equal Ambition, ſeeing the preſent King his Brother to be a Perſon unfit for Government, becauſe of the Fits of Frenzy to which he was Subject, and often fell into, was deſirous to have gotten the Throne for himſelf; and having contrived with the Queen to remove the Dauphin, and convey him into Germany to her Brother the Duke of Bavaria, intended to perſwade the Pope, who in the Schiſm ſat at Avignion, Benedict XIII, to depoſe the preſent King, as Pope Zachary did King Chilperick. The Duke of Burgundy, the King's Uncle, who had married his Daughter to the Dauphin, was not inſenſible of the Duke of Orleans's ambitious Aims; and as he kept the Dauphin out of the Snares, ſo he laboured by all means to countermine his other Practices; but fearing leaſt at length through his great Intereſts and Policy he might prevail, he hired certain Perſons to murder him, which was ſoon after done in Paris, near the Barbet-Gate. This Cruelty being committed in the Night, the Actors were not known, but the Duke of Burgundy was vehemently ſuſpected, and when after his Burial inquiry was made about the Murderers, the Duke fled, and confirmed all the Suſpicions concerning him. He remained ſome Months about Antwerp; yet being again reconciled to the King, and invited to the Court, he became as much in Favour as ever: But ſtill retaining his Enmity to the Duke of Orleans's Family, he much diſcountenanced all his Friends, and put ſome of them out of their Places, and others to Death. Charles, Duke of Orleans, Son of the murdered Duke Lewis, being daily burdened with the Miſeries and Complaints of his Party, began to harbour angry and malicious Reſentments againſt the Duke; and as it often happens, that new Diſcontents revive the Memory of old Injuries, he became very hot and zealous to revenge the Death of his Father upon the Duke of Burgundy, which would ſeem to all the World a juſt and reaſonable Cauſe of making War upon him, ſince he had not only eſcaped Juſtice, but as if it had been a meritorious Act, was in as great Favour as ever. Before he would appear in Arms he conſulted with his Friends, and great Relations, the Dukes of Berry, Burbon and Alenzon, Kings of Navarre and Arragon, and the Earls of Albert, Richemont, Armeniack, and divers other Nobles and great Perſons, who approving his Deſign, and promiſing him their Aſſiſtance, encouraged him to go on in the Attempt. The Duke of Burgundy ſaw the Storm growing over his Head, and though he had the King and Dauphin on his ſide, yet he deſpaired of being able to withſtand the contrary Faction, and therefore begged the Aſſiſtance of King Henry. There had been a Motion a little before made in the Court of France, for a Marriage between the Prince of Wales and the French King's Daughter (m), which was an Encouragement to the Duke to addreſs himſelf to King Henry, hoping by the Promiſes of the Marriage and other large Proffers to engage him to his Aſſiſtance; and for that End he ſent an Embaſſy into England. King Henry received the Embaſſadours honourably, but told them, 'That 'the Duke of Orleans did only proſecute a juſt 'Revenge for his Father's Blood, and therefore 'was not to be fought with but appeaſed, and 'therefore he thought it reaſonable, that he 'ſhould be tendered all ſuitable Satisfaction, 'which yet if he refuſed to accept, then he 'would lend him all convenient Aſſiſtance; and ſo diſmiſſed them to their Maſter with hopes of Aid, but with an Obligation to try all Methods of making a peaceable Concluſion of the Quarrel.

A. D. 1412. Reg. 12.

King Henry engaged in aſſiſting the Duke of Burgundy.

Reg. 13.

King Henry after their Departure conſidering, that this Civil Diſſention in France might prove of good Advantage to him; and tho' it would not look well in him to encourage a Murderer openly, yet it would be impolitick to neglect his own Intereſts; ſent into France twelve hundred Archers and Spearmen, under the Command of the Earl of Arundel, Gilbert Humfrevile, Earl of Angus, and Sir Robert Humfrevile his Uncle, Sir John Oldcaſtle, Lord Cobham, Sir John Grey, and William Porter to join with the Duke of Burgundy, if they ſaw occaſion. They took Ship at Dover, and landed at Sluis, from whence by eaſie and careleſs marches they came to Arras, where the Duke of Burgundy lay with fifteen thouſand Flemmings and Picards. The coming of the Engliſh was as welcome as unexpected; and the Duke having by many Kindneſſes and Courtſhips oblig'd them to join with him, marched with them to Paris, where they arrived October the 23*d*, in the Evening. The Duke of Orleans with the main Body of his Army lay at St. Dennis, and with a ſmall part of it kept the Town of St. Clou, which held Communication with the Grand

The Engliſh aſſiſt the Duke of Burgundy, and take St. Clou.

(m) Other Authors ſay, the Propoſal was for the Duke of Burgundy's Daughter.

Army

A. D. 1412. Reg 13.

Army by a Bridge over the Saine. The Engliſh ſoon after their Arrival, not willing to lie ſtill, undertook the Seige of St. Clou, and on November the 9th, by a ſharp Fight won it, ſlaying and drowning nine hundred Men of their Enemies, which were ſet to keep the Bridge, and taking 400 Priſoners, beſides 1200 Horſes, and great Spoil, which they found in the Town. The Duke of Burgundy partly to encourage the Engliſh, but chiefly to gratifie his revengeful Temper, purchaſed the Captives of the Engliſh, and among them Sir Manſerd de Bo. a valiant Captain: The Engliſh glad of the Money ſold all their Priſoners, not ſuſpecting the Duke's Deſign; but when they ſaw, that contrary to the Law of Arms which ſecures the Lives of Priſoners, and permits their Ranſome, he put many of the Chief to Death, they were much troubled, and repented of the Deed in ſelling them; and though they could not then help it, yet afterward they took this occaſion to ſhew their Reſentments of it to the Duke, and how ungenerous and unmanlike an Action it was: Within a few Days the Armies of the two Dukes had a Skirmiſh, and the Engliſh having again the upper-hand got a great many Priſoners, which the Duke of Burgundy, not having Money or Will to redeem, endeavoured to perſwade the Engliſh to put them to Death, as Enemies to their Country: But the Earl of Angus and the Engliſh Men boldly replied. That they would not be guilty of ſuch a breach of the Law of Arms, as he had been, and would rather die themſelves, than any of their Priſoners ſhould, but they would keep them for Ranſome, and ſo they were ſecured from the Duke of Burgundy's Cruelty. After this Engagement the Duke of Orleans's Party finding themſelves too weak for the Burgundians, withdrew themſelves into the mountainous Parts of the Country, and dar'd not for the preſent appear openly againſt the Enemy; whereupon the Duke of Burgundy ſuppoſing himſelf able to keep them down, and to have no further need of the Engliſh, ſent them home with large Rewards, and equal Thanks for their help

The Duke of Burgundy's Cruelty,

Tenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

While theſe Things were tranſacting in France, King Henry aſſembled his Parliament on All-Saints-Day at Weſtminſter: In it the two Principal Matters that were enacted, were, 1. About the Coin of the Nation, which being much embaſed by foreign Money, or other baſe Pieces was grown ſcrupulous and not current; whereupon a Law was made to forbid a certain bad Coin, called then, Gally-half-pence, which were ſtill uſed, notwithſtanding they had been prohibited in a former Act in the Eleventh Year of this King, and all foreign Money, as well of Scotland as of other Nations. 2. About Riots, and other ſeditious Aſſemblies. It ſeems, that King Richard's Ghoſt haunted this King to his dying Day. The People were never throughly ſatisfied, but Tumults threatned his Peace very often: Wherefore it was enacted, That all Juſtices of Peace ſhould have a very ſtrict Eye upon his Subjects, to prevent all riotous Meetings, and Sheriffs be as watchful to ſuppreſs them; which if they neglected, they ſhould each of them forfeit a Hundred Pound to the King for every Neglect, or Offence in this Kind. There was no Tax given this Parliament; but the King ſo well managed the Buſineſs of the Coin, which needed Reformation, and was encouraged by Act of Parliament, that he raiſed as good a Fund by it; for partly by ſeizing the Forfeited Money, and partly by coining new Nobles, which he made a Groat lighter than formerly they had been, he much enriched his own Treaſury; and ſo as he had no Tax, ſo he wanted none. Soon after the riſing of this Parliament, the King made his Sons, the Lord Thomas of Lancaſter, who was Lord Steward of England, and Earl of Aumerl, Duke of Clarence, John, Duke of Bedford, and Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, and his Brother Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorſet.

A. D. 1412. Reg. 13.

Some new Creations of Noble Men.

John, Duke of Burgundy being now free from the Oppoſition of the Party of the Duke of Orleans, governed all at Court at his Pleaſure; and having poſſeſſed the King, that it was not his own Cauſe, but the Crown, that was in Diſpute, for all that he had done to the Duke of Orleans was only to ſecure the Kingdom againſt his ambitious Aims, was allowed to proſecute the Duke of Orleans and his Complices with the utmoſt Malice and Rigour, than which nothing was more agreeable to his Temper, as it was for his Intereſts, and he did not ſpare to act what he judged would be grateful to either. The Party of the Duke of Orleans being thus heavily oppreſſed, had no other Refuge left for their Relief but the King of England, who tho' he had been engaged for the Duke of Burgundy, yet his Army being ſent Home, and that not very fairly, though with a French Civility, they hoped, that as he was free from all Obligations to aſſiſt the Duke of Burgundy, ſo by fair and advantageous Propoſals they might win him over to them, and by that means reſcue themſelves from their Enemy's Hands. With this Confidence they diſpatched over into England, Albert Aubemont, a Man of great Wit, Learning and Courage, and ſome other Perſons as their lawful Procurators, who might in the Name of all the Confederates, of whom the Chief were, John, Duke of Berry, Charles, Duke of Orleans, Valois, Earl of Blois, Beaumont, Lord of Coucy and Ach, John, Duke of Bourbon, John, Duke of Alenzon, Bernard, Earl of Arminiack, and others, tender theſe following Articles and Covenants, viz. 'That if the King of England, 'as Lord of Guien would defend and ſuccour 'them againſt all Men, which as their Sove'raign (n) Lord he ought to do, eſpecially, 'until they had executed Juſtice upon the 'Duke of Burgundy for the Death of the Duke 'of Orleans, recovered the Goods which the 'ſaid Duke and his Fautors had taken from 'them, had due Satisfaction for all Damages 'done by them to their Friends, Vaſſals or 'Subjects, and a firm Peace, ſo far as was 'poſſible, were concluded and eſtabliſhed be'tween both the Realms of England and France, 'then they promiſed, covenanted and agreed, 'That they would ſerve the King of Eng'land, his Heirs and Succeſſors, with their 'Bodies, Lands and Finances, Caſtles, Towns, 'Treaſures and Goods, in all Juſt Cauſes and 'Actions, without Impeachment to their Al'legiance, which they knew he deſired not; 'That he ſhould and might beſtow their Sons 'and Daughters, Nephews and Neices, and 'all other their Kindred in Marriage as he 'pleaſed; That their Friends, Allies and Well'wiſhers, which were the greateſt part of the

The Duke of Orleans and his Party ſolicite the King's Aid.

(n) The Duke of Berry and Orleans, and the Count D' Armagnac, had by other Articles engaged to hold the Counties, Ponthieu, Angoleſme, Perigort, and ſome other Places by Homage and Fealty of King Richard, and to have them for Life only.

Nobles

A. D. 1412. Reg. 13.

'Nobles of France, Church-men, and chief Citizens ſhould be always at his Service; That they would put him in Poſſeſſion of the Dukedom of Guien, which they were ready to proteſt, did now as truly belong to the King of England, with all its Liberties and Franchiſes, as had done to any of his Majeſty's Predeceſſors; and would recogniſe their Lands in that Dutchy to hold of him, and do all the uſual Homages and Services to him for them: That as much as in them lay, they would deliver to him all the Towns and Caſtles which were in their Hands, and did anciently belong to the Kings of England, and aſſiſt him to recover the reſt out of the Hands of their Enemies, only deſiring, that the Duke of Berry might hold the County of Pontheiu during his Life, and the Duke of Orleans the County of Angoleſm for Life, and County of Perigort for ever, and the Earl of Arminiack four Caſtles upon ſuch Conditions and Sureties, as ſhould be agreed on between them.

Kings Henry's Anſwer to the Duke of Orleans's Meſſengers.

King Henry having received theſe Propoſals gave the Meſſengers a kind and civil Entertainment; and conſulting with his Privy-Council about their Meſſage, who unanimouſly reſolved, that it would be both for his Honour and Profit to aſſiſt theſe Lords, and ſo to uphold the Faction, which otherwiſe would ſoon be ſubdued, he gave them this Anſwer; 'That 'being their natural Soveraign he was ſenſible of his Obligation to protect and defend 'them his Vaſſals and Subjects; and to this 'he was the more inclined, not only becauſe 'he had found the Duke of Burgundy a falſe 'and deceitful Man, who was forward to entice Men by fair Promiſes to his Friendſhip, 'but never performed more than was to ſerve 'his own turn; but chiefly becauſe it was 'the Office of a King to help ſuch as cried 'unto him for Juſtice, which they could not 'otherwiſe have, as he looked upon this Occaſion chiefly to be; for he evidently ſaw, 'that the ſhameful Murder of the Duke of Orleans (which he could never think on without the deepeſt Horror and Deteſtation) 'could never be revenged, but by ſuch Methods as they now were taking: And therefore they might aſſure the Lords, that he 'would not be defective in the Duty of a 'Prince, but would ſend them ſpeedily ſuch 'a Force, as ſhould be able to defend them 'againſt all Men, and ſo ſent them Home with Satisfaction to their Maſters.

Theſe Things were not ſo ſecretly acted between the King of England, and the Duke of Orleans's Party, but that it was known in the French Court; and to prevent any Aſſiſtance that might come to the Lords that way, the Earl of St. Paul was ſent down into Picardy with fifteen hundred Horſe-Men, and a great Number of Foot to prevent the landing of the Engliſh; or if that could not be, to detain them in raiſing the Siege of Guiſnes, which they ſat down before, and the Duke of Burgundy in the mean time purſued the Party of the Duke of Orleans, called Arminiack; and having won many Towns, at laſt drove them into Bourges in Berry, and there cloſely beſieged them. In the City were the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon, the Earl of Auxerre, Archbiſhop of Sens and Burges, Biſhops of Paris and Chartres, with other great Men, and fifteen hundred Soldiers well armed, and four hundred Archers: Among the Beſiegers were the King himſelf, the Dauphin, Dukes of Burgundy and Barr, with many other Nobles: The Duke of Berry was very deſirous of a Peace, becauſe his Country was waſted, and the Beſieged declared, 'That they had no Quarrel with the King or 'Dauphin, but were Enemies only to the Duke 'of Burgundy's Ambition and Cruelty; and 'therefore in their Sallies cried out, God ſave 'the King: The Dauphin, who was next Heir to the Crown, knowing his Father was unable through his Frenzical Diſeaſe to judge of the Miſeries of his Country, was much diſturbed at Affairs, and told the Duke of Burgundy, 'Things ſhould not be long ſo; The Nation 'ſhould not be Sacrificed to his Paſſion or 'Humour: And therefore reſolved immediately to make Peace. Theſe Words no ſooner droped from the Dauphin, but they were eagerly catched up by Two conſiderable Men in the French King's Camp, viz. Philip de Lignac, Lord great Maſter of Rhodes, and the Marſhal of the Duke of Savoy, who was ſent by his Maſter with ſome others to labour a Peace between both Parties. Theſe Men knew very well from the Duke of Berry, how well the Beſieged were diſpoſed to Peace, and immediately upon the Dauphin's Words began to negotiate a Treaty between them, which was ſoon brought about; and though the Duke of Burgundy much feared, that what was a Peace to others, would be a War to him, yet he appeared as forward as any to make up the Breach, which in a little time was concluded, and was called from the Place, The Peace of Bourges. It was ſealed July the 15th, and the King entred the City the ſame Day. While theſe Things paſſed at Bourges, the Engliſh under the Command of the Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of York, and Thomas Earl of Dorſet, which were ſent by King Henry to aſſiſt the Duke of Orleans, being eight thouſand Knights and Men of Arms, and a thouſand Archers, arrived in Normandy. The Earl of St. Paul was not preſent to oppoſe their landing, being beaten from Guiſnes, and withdrawn to St. Quintins. The Duke of Orleans had promiſed to meet them at their Arrival, but neglecting it, they fell to plundring the Country for their Suſtenance and Pay, till the Duke of Orleans came down and made an Agreement with them, and ſo they withdrew into Aquitain; the Duke of Clarence taking of him his Brother John, Duke of Angoleſm as a Pledge for the 209000 Francks, which were further to be paid to the King towards the Charges of this Expedition.

The Siege of Bourges.

A Peace concluded between the Factions of Burgundy and Orleans.

But as War was the Diſturbance of the French Court, ſo Peace ſeems a little to have corrupted the Engliſh; for Prince Henry being eaſed from the Employment of the Welſh Wars, and being a Perſon of an active and briſk Spirit, who could do nothing moderately, fell as eagerly upon the Sports and Pleaſures, which uſually debauch the Minds of Youth in times of Eaſe and Leiſure, as he had been bold and adventurous in warlike Attempts. He kept a Court different from his Father, being of Man's Years, and able to move in a Sphere of ſuch Greatneſs, as might become the Heir of a Crown, in which Station he maintained a Princely Port and Magnificence; but being a little over-indulgent turned them into vicious Exceſſes: So that his Court was counted a Paradiſe for Voluptuaries, where was an uncontroulable Enjoyment of all carnal Pleaſures; and Venus and Ceres had routed out Mars and Bellona. His Palace was like a Camp, for multitudes of Perſons that flocked thither, either to Prince Henry's looſeneſs.

pleaſe

A. D. 1412. Reg. 13.

pleaſe the Prince's Genius, or gratifie their own, and as if he had put off the Nature of a Hero, which he once ſeemed to affect, he like a ſecond Sardanapalus delighted in the Company of effeminate Perſons; and pleaſed himſelf more in Dancings and Muſick, Revellings, and mad Maskings, than he had ever done in the Manlike Feats of Arms. This Change in a Prince of ſuch promiſing Hopes was very amazing to the Conſiderate, who ſilently lamented the Eclipſe of ſuch Virtues, as ſhined ſo bright lately in him, and did not ſpare to ſay, That they muſt expect no great Happineſs under ſuch a corrupted Prince. But though the Prince's irregular Behaviour was manifeſt enough to others, yet it ſeems either not known to the King himſelf, or elſe to be winked at by him: For though he affronted his Chief Juſtice on the Bench, by ſtriking him on the Face, becauſe he had condemned One of his Companions for breaking the Peace, and abuſing a grave Citizen, for which the Judge committed him to Priſon; yet he ſo pleaſed his Father by his Submiſſion to the Law, that he rejoyced equally that he had an Impartial Judge, and an Obedient Son: So that he looked upon this Action, rather as a youthful Prank, or an effect of his Paſſion, than as prejudicial to himſelf or Realm; till ſome, who were about him, and being the Prince's Enemies, by their frequent Diſcourſes of the Prince and his courſe of Life, buzzed clear different Thoughts concerning him into the King's Head: For having a Deſire to ingratiate themſelves into the King's Favour, by miſrepreſenting the Prince's Behaviour, they not only complained to the King of his Lewdneſs and Exceſſes, but inſinuated into him, that though he drew ſuch a Multitude about him under a ſhew of Sports and Paſtimes, yet he carried on a ſecret Deſign of depoſing his Father, and extorting his Scepter out of his Hand. Theſe Suggeſtions eaſily found Entertainment in the King's Breaſt, to whom Jealouſie was now become natural, being frequently frighted with Fears of loſing his Crown, and he did not conceal his Reſentments; for he did not only ſhew an averſion to the Prince in his Carriage, but removed him from being Preſident of his Council, and put his Brother John into his Place. The Prince not having received the Cauſe of this Change from his Father's Mouth, ſeemed to bear it with an even Mind, as being always contented to ſubmit to his Royal Pleaſure, and went on without any Concern in his uſual Sports and Paſtimes, as not conſcious of any real Guilt, though he was ſenſible enough what he was accuſed of; but in the mean time he expoſtulated by Letter with his Accuſers, convincing them how ſlanderous their Accuſations of him were, and how vaſt a wrong he had ſuffered by their injurious Abuſes of him to his Father, whoſe Favour as he valued more than his Kingdom, ſo he could never enjoy an Happineſs in the midſt of the moſt flouriſhing State without it. This way of clearing himſelf, though it rectified the Opinions of the Generality, yet ſo long as his Accuſers had his Father's Ear, did him no Service, as to Recovery of his Father's Favour; and therefore to do that, he made uſe of an unuſual Stratagem, which was this: Having provided himſelf with a rich Sattin Suit of Cloaths, which he cauſed to be made full of Eylet-holes of black Silk, the Needle hanging at every Hole, he put it on, and on his Arm he wore an Hound's Collar ſet full of SS of Gold, with Tyrets of the ſame Mettal: Being thus apparelled, he with a mighty train of Nobles and Gentry went to his Father's Palace at Weſtminſter; where having entred the Hall, and given a ſtrict Command to all that attended him, not to go further than the Fire-place, he deſired to be admitted into his Father's Preſence, which was without delay granted him; and though the King at that time was Ill, he cauſed himſelf to be ſet in his Chair, and carried into the Preſence-Chamber to receive him. When the Prince was come before his Father, he was commanded to declare the Cauſe of his coming, and eſpecially in that ſtrange Garb. Then the Prince kneeling down ſaid, 'Moſt dread Sovereign, and dear Father, I am at this time 'come into your Preſence to declare my ſelf 'your Dutiful Subject and Son, in all things 'obedient to your Commands; which though 'I have ever been careful in my Behaviour never to render ſuſpected, yet ſince by the falſe 'Suggeſtions of bad Men and crafty Flatterers, your Majeſty hath been induced to ſuſpect my Affections toward you, and to fear, 'that my Heart is not rightly diſpoſed towards your Highneſs, I am come to rectifie 'your Miſapprehenſions concerning me, and 'give you a convincing Proof of my Loyalty 'to you. My natural Relation to your Highneſs obliges me ſo ſtrictly to take care of 'your Happineſs and Safety, that if I knew 'any one Perſon in your Kingdom, whoſe Obedience were juſtly ſuſpected, and of whom 'you deſervedly ſtood in fear I ſhould uſe 'my utmoſt Endeavours to have him puniſhed, and as much as is poſſible remove thoſe 'Fears and Jealouſies from your Mind, which 'render your Life very uncomfortable and uneaſie: Now then, ſince I have been ſo unfortunate, as through my imprudent Carriage, 'though not deſignedly, yet fooliſhly and ungratefully to raiſe ſome Suſpicions in your 'Mind, that you are in eminent danger of your 'Life and Crown from me and my Practices, 'I here tender my Life as forfeited to your 'Majeſty for giving you Cauſe to ſuſpect me 'of Diſloyalty, and do beſeech you to take 'ſuch Revenge of my Perſon, as may remove 'all Jealouſie of me from your Heart, and reſtore you again to the Quiet and Eaſe of an 'undiſturbed Mind. I have this Day by the 'Chriſtian Preparation of an humble Confeſſion, and receiving the Sacrament, fitted my 'ſelf to ſuffer Death, and be made a juſt Sacrifice to your Wrath; and I humbly beg of 'your Majeſty, that you would make this Dagger (which I now give you) an Inſtrument 'of eaſing my Grief and your Fears, by thruſting it into my Heart; for it is as little Comfort to me to enjoy Life, while I remain under your Diſpleaſure, and am the Cauſe of 'your Fears and Troubles, as it can be to you 'to have ſuch an undutiful Son, as you are 'jealous of. I am, ever was, and will be your 'dutiful Servant and Vaſſal, and deſire not 'Life longer than I am thought ſo by your 'Majeſty; and if you can't entertain ſuch 'Thoughts concerning me as I deſerve, I deſire you to rid me of that Life which muſt 'ever be a burthen to me, while I remain in 'thoſe unhappy Circumſtances: And if you ſhall 'vouchſafe to do it, I do here in the Preſence 'of your Nobility, fully and freely forgive 'you, and will in the Preſence of God and 'all his Angels, at the laſt Judgment acquit 'you

A. D. 1412. Reg. 13.

Prince Henry accuſed of Diſloyalty to his Father, and his Stratagem to clear himſelf.

A. D. 1412. Reg. 13.

'you of the Guilt of my Blood. The King hearing theſe Words was much moved with Affection towards his Son; and was ſo fully convinced of the Prince's Loyalty, that he blamed his own Credulity, not his Behaviour, confeſſing, that he had indeed entertained Suſpicions of him, but (as he now ſaw) without Cauſe, and therefore promiſed him upon his Honour never to harbour any Jealouſies for the future concerning him. The Prince having thus eſcaped the Danger he was in, deſired that his Accuſers might be obliged to anſwer their falſe Calumnies againſt him, and be puniſhed for their Faults, though not ſo fully as their Crime deſerved: But the King replied, 'That he muſt ſtay till the Parliament met, and then they ſhould be judged 'by their Peers: Which as it ſatisfied the Prince, ſo it ſerved to put off the Diſcovery of them, for being delay'd it was forgotten.

King Henry's Acts of Piety, and Expedition to the Holy-Land.

King Henry being perfectly reconciled to his Son, lived in great Satisfaction and Eaſe of Mind, having Peace both at Home and Abroad, and ſpent his Time in Acts of Charity and Piety, and in providing for the Safety and Welfare of his People. He built a College at Fodringhey in Northamptonſhire, which his Son Henry afterwards endowed with certain Lands which he took from the Fryar's Aliens: And becauſe the Nation was much annoyed with Pirates, he ſent Sir John Pendergrace with thirty Ships to ſcowr the Seas, who by his Courage and Diligence did great Service to the Commons, not only by cauſing a free Commerce, but by taking many Prizes of Wine and Corn, by the Sale of which he brought great Plenty into the Nation. But the greateſt piece of Piety of thoſe Days was accounted to reſcue Jeruſalem out of the Hands of the Infidels; who being Enemies to Chriſt, contemptuouſly treated the Sepulchre of our Saviour, and grievouſly abuſed the Chriſtians and Churches of that Holy City. It much troubled the King, that the Chriſtian Princes, whoſe Arms might have better been employed againſt the Turks and Infidels, were at War among themſelves; and becauſe it was foretold him, that he ſhould die at Jeruſalem, he hoped that he might be an Inſtrument of freeing it from the Oppreſſion of the Turks, and was very deſirous to try his Fate againſt them, and for this end he called a great Council at London to get all things ready for that Expedition, and by it it was ordered, that ſeveral Ships and Gallies ſhould be built, and other neceſſary Things got ready.

Reg. 14.

The Engliſh in France plunder the Frontiers.

The Engliſh Forces which remained ſtill in Aquitain after the Agreement made between the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, ſpent their Time in ſpoiling and plundering the Frontiers of the French Dominions, from whence they took much Prey and Priſoners, which they carried into Burdeaux. The French being angry at theſe Depredations and Inroads of the Engliſh, ſent the Lord Helie, one of the Marſhals of France with an Army of four thouſand Men to beſiege one of the Fortreſſes of Guien, which Sir John Blunt being Governour of, kept with three hundred Men only, who behaved themſelves with ſuch Bravery and Courage, that they drove them from the Town, took twelve Noble Men, one hundred and twenty Gentlemen, and ſeveral other Priſoners. The Marſhal himſelf was taken and ſent over into England to the King, who impriſoned him at Wisbich; but he eſcaped from thence a little after, and got into France, where he ſerved the Duke of Orleans at the Battel of Agincourt, and was ſlain there.

A. D. 1412. Reg. 14.

The King kept his Chriſtmas this Year at Eltham, being very ſick of a kind of Apoplectick Diſtemper, in which by Fits he was thought to be dead; but it pleaſed God that he a little recovered, and paſſed the latter part of the Chriſtmas in ſome Pleaſure till Candlemas, when, according to his Summons, the Parliament met at Weſtminſter. The Deſign of this Seſſion ſeems to have been no other, but to furniſh him with Money for his Voyage into the Holy Land, which he intended to begin at the Riſe of the Spring, all things being ready for it. But God prevented his Deſign by a Relaſpe into his former Diſtemper: For being worſhipping at St. Edward's-Shrine to take his leave in order to his Journey, he was ſo violently ſeized with another Fit of his Apoplexy, that all the Standers by thought he would have died preſently; but being removed into a Chamber belonging to the Houſe of the Abbot of Weſtminſter, and laid in a Pallat before the Fire, by the Warmth of that, and the Application of proper Remedies, he at length recovered his Senſes and Speech again. After he had lain ſome time he enquired where he was, becauſe he perceived himſelf to be in a ſtrange Place, and was told he was in a Chamber of the Abbot's of Weſtminſter. He then asked them whether the Chamber had any particular Name, and they ſaid, It was called the Jeruſalem; whereupon he ſaid, 'That then he 'ſhould die there, becauſe he was long ſince 'told that he ſhould die in Jeruſalem, and accordingly he made ſuitable Preparations for his Death. And firſt calling for the Prince, he had ſeveral Diſcourſes with him, as his Sickneſs would give him leave. He ſaid to him, 'That he had great Fears, that after his 'Death his Brother the Duke of Clarence would 'contend with him for the Crown, becauſe 'he is a Man of an ambitious Spirit, and daring Courage, and would reach at the higheſt Dignity, by which the Nation would 'fall into great Miſeries, and when I think of 'this I repent me, that I ever meddled with 'the Kingdom. The Prince anſwered to theſe Words, 'That it was his earneſt Prayers to 'God, that his Majeſty might long continue 'with them to rule them both; but if God 'hath ſo ordered, that he ſhould ſucceed him 'in the Government of this Realm, he would 'honour and love his Brethren above all Men, 'ſo long as they continued true and faithful 'Subjects; but if any of them ſhould conſpire 'or rebel againſt him, he would execute Juſtice upon them with as much Severity, 'as upon any of his other Subjects. The King hearing this Anſwer rejoyced greatly at his Son's Reſolution and Courage, and not doubting, but that it would eſtabliſh him in his Throne, he proceeded to give him certain Admonitions to be obſerved by him in his Regal Dignity, and ſaid, 'My Son, when 'it ſhall pleaſe God to call me out of this 'World to go the way of all Fleſh, to thee, 'as my Son and Heir, I ſhall leave my Crown 'and Realm, and I adviſe thee not to take 'it as an Honour to puff up thy Mind with 'Pride, but as a Burthen and Charge to pro'vide for the Good and Safety of all Perſons

A. D. 1413.

in,

A. D. 1413. Reg. 14.

'in the Realm: For as the Heart in the midſt 'of the Body adminiſters Heat and Nouriſh-'ment to the whole, ſo muſt a King in his 'Realm provide for the Good and Safety of 'all. Let it then be thy continual Care to 'adminiſter all Things well for the Encourage-'ment of Virtue and Diligence, and the Pu-'niſhment of Vice and Sin, and then thy Peo-'ple will be obedient to thee, and ready at 'all times to aſſiſt thee: Go before thy Peo-'ple in true Piety and Devotion, and what 'thou wouldeſt have thy Subjects be, be thou 'firſt thy ſelf, for thy Example will make thy 'Subjects count it an Honour to be Good. 'Fear God, and dread him above all Things. 'Be zealous for his Worſhip, and diſcounte-'nance all Atheiſm and Profaneneſs. Aſcribe 'all thy fortunate Actions to him, and let 'him have the Praiſe of whatever Good be-'falls thee, as Victory over thy Enemies, the 'Fidelity of thy Friends, Obedience of thy 'Subject, Greatneſs of thy Power, Riches and 'Honour, and Number of thy Children. Think 'not thy own Deſert, but God's Goodneſs 'the Cauſe of all theſe Things to thee. But 'above all things, adminiſter Juſtice equally 'and impartially; for the Wealth of thy Body 'and Soul, and of thy Kingdom depends upon 'the due Execution of it. Defer not to do 'Juſtice till to Morrow, if thou canſt do it 'to Day, leaſt God for thy unjuſt Delays do 'Juſtice on thee in the mean time, and take 'thine Authority from thee. Puniſh Bribery 'ſeverely, relieve the Oppreſſed, zealouſly vin-'dicate the Wronged, protect the Religious, 'and love the Virtuous: So ſhalt thou obtain 'the Favour of God, and Love of thy Sub-'jects, and have a flouriſhing and proſperous 'Reign here upon Earth, and an everlaſting 'Reward in Heaven. The King having given his Son this Advice, diſmiſſed him with his Bleſſing; and not long after finding himſelf to grow every Moment almoſt Weaker, he cau-ſed the Crown to be ſet upon his Pillow, at his Bed's Head, that when he died, his Son the Prince might have it, as his right Heir. His Fits at length followed him very cloſe; and that ſo ſeverely, that he was often thought to be dead, and in one of them the Prince came and took the Crown from his Pillow to ſecure it: But he recovered again, and as he was accuſtomed in every Interval to look for his Crown, ſo he again called for it, and asked who had got it? When the Prince was ſaid to have taken it, he com-manded him to come before him, and with ſome Smartneſs ſaid to him, 'Son, why doſt 'thou thus miſuſe me? To whom the Prince replied with an undaunted Boldneſs; 'Sir, 'to me, and all Men preſent, you ſeemed dead 'in this World; wherefore I, as your next 'Heir apparent, took it as my own, and 'not as yours; but ſince I claim no Right to 'it, but from and after your Deceaſe, there-'fore I reſtore it to you again, and God 'Almighty give you many Days to enjoy it. Then the King replied, 'Well fare you with 'it, my Son: And ſighing added, 'What Right 'I had to it God knoweth. 'Well, ſaid the 'Prince, if you die King, I will inherit the 'Crown, and truſt I ſhall keep it with the 'Sword againſt all my Enemies, as you have 'done. Then ſaid the King, I commit all to God, and adviſe you to do well: And ſo turn-ing to the Wall, he ſhortly after gave up the Ghoſt on St. Cuthbert's Day, March the 20th, in the Forty-ſix Year of his Age, when he had reigned Thirteen Years Five Months and One and Twenty Days; and being carried by Water to Feverſham, his Corps was magnificent-ly Entombed at Canterbury.

A. D. 1413. Reg. 14.

He was a Perſon of a middle Stature, but well Proportioned and Compact, and had much greater Endowments of Mind than Body; for he was very Wiſe and Politick, exceeding Bold and Couragious, and yet withal very Merciful and Pitiful, chooſing rather by ſaving the Lives of his Enemies to make them his Friends, than by deſtroying them, to rid him-ſelf of his Fears. He was forced to execute ſeveral Perſons, and that of Note, for their rebellious Attempts againſt him; but his Mer-cy to the Earl of Northumberland is a ſufficient Demonſtration, that not Cruelty, but Ne-ceſſity obliged him to puniſh his mutinous Sub-jects; and if they would have ever amended, he would have forgiven them. He indeed was never loved, though he was really a very good Prince; becauſe the Occaſions of State requi-red great Taxes, and People never love to buy even their own Happineſs dear: Beſides, the badneſs of his Title to the Crown was never forgotten; and though Mortimer was not much regarded, yet all his Kindneſs could never patch up that Breach, ſo much as to make him be loved, as he really deſerved. In fine, in him we have an evident Proof of the People's Inconſtancy, whoſe Affections are fierce, but never laſting. He came in with their Applauſe, becauſe he ſaved them from the Miſeries of the former Reign; but he could never keep their Love, becauſe his Trou-bles created them much Charge, though they were no other than the neceſſary Conſequen-ces of yielding to their Deſires; yet Fortune ſo attended all his Undertakings, that he died a Victor over all his Enemies Abroad and at Home, and laid the Foundation of his Son's Greatneſs, in whoſe Reign the Engliſh Power was got to its higheſt Pitch and Greatneſs.

He left a numerous Iſſue, viz. four Sons and two Daughters, but all by his firſt Wife the Lady Mary, the Daughter and Co-heir of Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, who died before her Husband came to the Crown; for he had no Iſſue by his ſecond Wife, Joanna de Navar, the Widow of John de Mountfort, Duke of Brittain.

His eldeſt Son Henry, whom in his Life-time he made Prince of Wales and Earl of Cheſter, was appointed his Succeſſor in the Throne, and accordingly reigned after him, and proved the Glory of our Engliſh Kings, as in his Life will appear.

His ſecond Son Thomas Plantagenet, he made and left him Duke of Clarence. He married Margaret, the Daughter of Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent, and Widow of John Beaufort, Earl of Pomfraict. He was ſlain at Bongy-Bridge in France by the Duke of Orleans, and died with-out Children (o).

His third Son John he made Duke of Bed-ford, Earl of Richmond, and Lord of Kendal. He had two Wives, viz. Ann, the Daughter of John, Duke of Burgundy, and Joqueline, the Daughter of Peter, Earl of St. Paul, who out-lived him, and was afterwards married to Richard Woodvile, Earl of Rivers, by whom ſhe had one Daughter Elizabeth married af-terwards to King Edward the Fourth, but he had no Iſſue by either of them. He ſhewed great Valour in the French Wars, and dying at Paris was buried at Roan.

(o) He had a natural Son, called John, the Baſtard of Clarence.

A. D. 1413. Reg. 14.

His fourth Son Humphrey, he created Duke of Glouceſter. He was in very great Honour in his Nephew Henry the Sixth's Days, ſtiling himſelf, Humphrey, by the Grace of God, Son, Brother and Uncle to Kings, Duke of Glouceſter, Hennalt, Holland, Zealand, and Earl of Pembroke, Lord of Freezeland, Great Chamberlain of England, Protector of the Realm, and Defender of the Church of England. He had two Wives, but was unhappy in both of them, the one being divorced for a Pre-contract, and the other being Infamous for Sorcery and Poiſoning, but was ſo far fortunate as to have no Iſſue by them. He was found murdered in his Bed at St. Edmunds-Bury in Suffolk, and was buried at St. Albans in Hertfordſhire (p).

A. D. 1413. Reg. 14.

His two Daughters, Blanch and Philippa, he married to Foreign Princes in his Life-time, viz. Blanch to the Duke of Bavaria, and Philippa to the King of Denmark, but both died without Iſſue.

(p) Neither the Duke of Bedford, nor the Duke of Glouceſter were made Dukes by their Father, but by their Brother Henry the Fifth, in the Parliament at Leiceſter, Anno 1414. Godw. Hen. 5. p. 41.

The End of King HENRY the Fourth's Reign.

THE Remarkable OCCURRENCES,

IN THE

Reign of Henry the Fourth,

Are interwoven by

The Author in the Thread of the Hiſtory: So there is nothing to be added to it in this Place, but ſome Account of the Illuſtrious Men, and the Men of Learning of his Time.

THE moſt Famous Warriors were Prince Henry, the Earl of Northumberland, Henry, Lord Piercy ſurnamed Hotſpur, his Son the Earl of Weſtmoreland, the Earl of Worceſter, the Earl of Salisbury a Favourer of Wickliffe's Doctrine, Sir Thomas Rokesby of Yorkſhire, Sir Robert Umfrevile Vice-Admiral, and Sir John Pendergrace.

Among the Men of Learning, the Chief, and he to whom the Engliſh-Tongue was more oblig'd than to all the Writers before him is, Jeoffery Chaucer, a Man of Quality, Wit and Learning. He married Alice, Daughter to by whom he had Thomas Chaucer, Eſq; Speaker of the Houſe of Commons in the Second Year of King Henry the Fifth. The Daughter of this Thomas married the Duke of Suffolk, and by this Match as well as her Father's Deſcent, the Family of Chaucer became ally'd to the Greateſt Houſes in England. He was the Father of the Engliſh Poeſie. And the next is John Gower, of the Family of the Gowers of Sittenham in Yorkſhire. He was Chaucer's Friend and Companion, and joined with him in his Endeavours to refine our Language, and give a Turn and Harmony to the Engliſh Verſe, which were unknown to their Fore-fathers. The Learned before their Time uſed to write always in Latin or French; but they had made the Engliſh Tongue ſo Muſical, and it was of its ſelf ſo Significant, that it became common afterwards, and moſt Authors communicated their Thoughts in their Native Language, which wanted nothing of the Force, and as theſe Two Great Poets had Poliſh'd it, little of the Grace of the beſt of the Modern Languages. Beſides theſe there flouriſhed in other Profeſſions.

Hugh Legate of Hertfordſhire, he wrote Reflections on Boetius's Treatiſe de Conſolatione.
Roger Allington, Chancellor of Oxford, a violent Enemy of the Wickliviſts.
Nicholas Gorham, a Logician, the French King's Confeſſor.
Dr. Walter Diſſe, Confeſſor to the Duke of Lancaſter, and to his Dutcheſs Conſtance.
Thomas of Malden.
John Eclo of Herefordſhire, a Franciſcan Fryer.
Dr. Nicholas Halkingham of Norfolk, an Excellent Divine and Philoſopher, Provincial of the Gray-Fryers.
Laurence Holbeck, who wrote a Hebrew Dictionary.
John Colton, Archbiſhop of Armagh.
John of Marrie in Yorkſhire, a Carmelite of Doncaſter.
Richard Chefer of Norfolk, a Divine and an Auguſtine-Fryer.
John Lathbury, a Monk of Reading.
Nicholas Pontz.
Dr. Richard Scroop, Archbiſhop of York. He wrote a Libel againſt King Henry, and was beheaded for Treaſon.
John Wrotham, Warden of the Carmelites in Callis.
John Colebie, a Monk of Norwich.
William Scroop, a zealous Wickliviſt, he died in Priſon. He was a Man of ſingular Piety and Learning.
Reginald Langham, a Monk of Norwich.
Actonus Dominicanus.
Thomas Palmer, Warden of the Black-Fryers in London.
Boſton of Burry, who wrote a Catalogue of all the Writers of the Church.
Thomas Peverell, Biſhop of Worceſter.
William Holm, a Monk and a Phyſician.
John Botterel, a Logician.
Dr. Nicholas Baiard, Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford.
John Price, of Lilleſhull in the Weſt of England.
William Norton, a Franciſcan Fryer of Coventry.
Nicholas Riſton, who lamenting the Schiſm in the Church, occaſion'd by the Antipopes, wrote a Treatiſe on that Subject, called, De tollendo Schiſmate.
John Walter, an Excellent Mathematician. He was bred at Winchester-School.
Thomas of New-market, Biſhop of Carliſle.
William Augur, a Franciſcan Fryer of Bridgewater.
Peter Ruſſell, Provincial of the Gray-Fryers.
John Langton, a Carmelite-Fryer.
Robert Wantham, a Monk of Cernly in Dorſetſhire. He wrote a Book in Verſe of the Original and Signification of Words.
Richard Falſhamb, a Monk of Norwich.
William Norton, a Fryer of Coventry.
Hugh Sueth, a Black-Fryer, and a great Preacher.
Robert Wimbledin, a Famous Preacher.

In this King's Reign, the French Hiſtorian, John Froiſſard lived, and we have given him a Place here, becauſe he reſided ſometime in England, and is very Particular in ſome Parts of our Engliſh Hiſtory.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF HENRY V.

A. D. 1413. Reg. 1.

Henry the Fifth's Parentage and Succeſſion.

HENRY, ſurnamed of Monmouth, the Chief Town of the Shire of the ſame Name in Wales, and ſtanding on the Banks of the River Wye, becauſe he was born there, when his Father was Duke of Hereford, and reſided in thoſe Parts, entred upon the Throne of England after his Father King Henry the Fourth's Death, as his lawful Heir, and ſo by the Ancient Cuſtom of the Nation, his Succeſſor to his Crown and Dignity, the ſame Day that he died, viz. March 20. and was the next Day proclaim'd King by the Name of Henry V. He had given evident Proofs of his Love and Reſpect to Virtue and Learning, while he was at Oxford, under the Tuition of his Uncle, Cardinal Beaufort, then Chancellor of that Univerſity, in ſhewing a particular Favour to thoſe that appear'd moſt Eminent for both, of whom he afterwards made Thomas Rudburn, Biſhop of St. Davids, and John Carpenter, Biſhop of Worceſter, and of his unparallel'd Courage and Conduct in the Battel of Shrewsbury, and in the War which he maintain'd againſt Owen Glendour the Famous Welſh Rebel, whom he ſo often routed that he durſt not ſhew himſelf againſt him, but lurking in Mountains and Woods periſh'd with Hunger, for which he was receiv'd into the Regal Authority with an univerſal Joy and Deſire, and like the Roman Emperor Titus, as the Delight of all Mankind. The Liberties which a little before his Father's Death, in times of Peace, he had allow'd himſelf, had brought no ſmall Blemiſh upon his former good Inclinations and brave Actions, the Extravagancies of himſelf and Companions being an Indication to ſome, that he was wholly degenerated into Lewdneſs and Effeminacy; but as if all Men had foreſeen, what after indeed came to paſs, that the Change of his Condition would work as great an Alteration in the Manners of ſo Noble and Generous a Mind, and being become their King would be a New Man, they welcom'd him to the Throne with full Conſent and Liking, interpreting his former Looſeneſs, as nothing elſe but ſuch a peice of Experience as Solomon thought fit to make of the Pleaſures of the World, which he indulged himſelf in for a ſmall time, that he might with the greater Averſion ſubſcribe them with this Motto, Vanity and Vexation of Spirit, as he did indeed, and much ſooner than that wiſer Man.

The Nation's Submiſſion to King Henry and his Coronation.

The Nation being thus furniſh'd with a King of ſuch mighty Hopes, and though they had loſt a good Father, yet believing themſelves happier under his braver Son, began to give him more than uſual Teſtimonies of their hearty Submiſſion and Reſpect to him within three Days after he was made King; for the Nobles and Commons by an unpreſidented Zeal came to pay him their Homage and ſwear Allegiance to him, which was before neither required nor payed till after the Coronation. The King gave them his hearty Thanks for their Good-will towards him, and exhorted them to continue their forward Endeavours for the Publick Proſperity, but would by no means accept of their Tenders till he was crown'd, and had taken upon himſelf as ſerious Obligations to be a good King, as he could lawfully deſire ſhould be laid upon them to be Loyal Subjects: Saying, That he earneſtly prayed that God would not ſuffer him to be Crowned, or admit him to the Government of the Nation, but as he ſhould rule well for his Glory, and the Good and Proſperity of his Subjects; which if God did foreſee that he ſhould not do, he deſired he would rather take him to his Mercy, than permit him to live and reign. This generous and virtuous Anſwer much raiſed their Admiration of their New King, and was a greater Obligation of their Love and Loyalty, than the moſt ſolemn Oaths could be, while they ſaw him more æmulous to be a good King, than to have them good Subjects: And that he might give his People all the Aſſurances of his real Intentions of ruling well he haſten'd his Coronation, which was celebrated with all the uſual Solemnities upon Apr. 9. by Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and immediately after it he began ſuch a Reformation both of himſelf and Court, as would be the ſureſt Foundation of an happy Reign; for firſt ſummoning his old Companions and Servants together, who had been both his Aſſociates and the Promoters of his former irregular Courſes, he gave them ſuch Rewards as was due for their former Services: Telling them, That if they would reform their Manners, as he had begun, and was reſolved to hold on, they might continue in their Places, and ſhould upon that Account be the more in his Favour, but if any of them would ſtill perſiſt in their Evil Actions, he forbad them his Court, and charged them upon pain of Death not to come within Ten Miles of any Place were he reſided. (a) Having thus freed himſelf of his Vices, he provided himſelf of all things that might become a Virtuous King and Good Governour. He choſe himſelf a Council of all the Graveſt and Wiſeſt Men of his Nobility, and made ſuch Lawyers his Judges, as were as Eminent for their Integrity, as Knowledge. He ſent out his Injunctions

His Council and civil Officers.

(a) He renounced their Company, gave them liberal Gifts and diſmiſs'd them. Godwin's Life of Hen. 5. p. 1.

E. Luttrell delin.
P. Vanderbanck Sculp.
KING HENRY THE V.th

A. D. 1413. Reg. 1.

ons to the Clergy, commanding them as they tender'd his Diſpleaſure, not only to preach the Word of God diligently and ſincerely to the People, but to be Examples of Piety and Holineſs themſelves, and into ſuch Preferments as were in his Diſpoſal at that Time, he put ſuch Perſons as were recommended to him by their Merit. The inferiour Magiſtrates he ſelected with great Care, as being the main Inſtruments of a Regular Government; employing ſuch only as he knew to be Men of Loyal Principles, competent Knowledge in the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, and of great Probity and Sobriety, who might be a Curb and Reſtraint to the People in the Commiſſion of thoſe Crimes which were too much practiſed in thoſe Times, and threatned God's Judgments upon the Nation, viz. Common Swearing, Whoredom, Drunkenneſs and Perjury, which he was reſolved, as much as in him lay to root out, but was ſenſible, that nothing but good Magiſtrates could do it; for the beſt Laws will never be well executed, when the Officers, whoſe Place it is to ſee it done, are themſelves the notorious Violaters of them.

His Piety to King Richard's Body, and Charity to his Soul.

The King having thus provided for the Happineſs of the Nation, began to ſhew his Diſpoſition to Piety by a ſignal Act of Charity, as it was eſteemed in thoſe Days to the Body of King Richard, to which it is ſaid, he looked upon himſelf to be obliged upon this Account. His Father King Henry the Fourth, being in his Sickneſs touched in Conſcience for the Sins he had been guilty of in depoſing King Richard and conſenting to his Death, had ſent a ſolemn Embaſſy to the Pope to be pardoned for them, and in order to Abſolution had been enjoyn'd this Penance. That ſince he had deprived King Richard of his bodily Life and earthly Honour, he ſhould by the continual Prayers of the Church cauſe his Soul to live for ever in heavenly Glory. This eaſie Purchaſe of Pardon for two ſuch great Sins his Father would certainly have made, had he not been prevented by Death; but leaving it unperform'd, this King made all poſſible haſte to execute it, ſuppoſing, that his Father's Soul could not be at reſt 'till the Penance enjoyn'd was finiſh'd. Wherefore ſoon after Eaſter he cauſed the Body of King Richard to be removed from its more ignoble Interment in the Church of the Fryer's Preachers at Langley in Hertfordſhire, and being brought up to London, buried it by his Beloved Queen Anne, in the Abby-Church of Weſtminſter with very great Solemnity and Expence, where he founded a frequent Memorial for him, providing that every Week a Dirige ſhould be ſung for his Soul, and the next Day a Requiem; which being ended, he order'd Eleven Shillings to be given to the Poor in Pence, and further appointed, that upon his Anniverſary after the Maſs of Requiem twenty Pounds ſhould be diſtributed to the Poor in Pence, for which, and the Maintenance of Four Wax Tapers to burn upon his Tomb, Day and Night, he gave a certain Portion of Land to perpetuate them for ever: And that the Guilt of theſe his Father's Sins might not cleave to him, he is ſaid to have undergone a ſtrict Penance himſelf, and founded Three Religious Houſes, viz. 1. Of Ciſtertian Monks at Shene 2 Of Nuns of St. Bridget, which he called Sion; and, 3. An Houſe of Obſervants, which he called Bethlehem, both at Richmond.

A. D. 1413. Reg. 1.

First Parliament, and the Acts of it, with the Acts of the Coetemporary Convocation.

Three Weeks after Eaſter (b), the King aſſembled his Parliament at Weſtminſter, and ſeveral good Laws of common Concern were then made, viz. concerning the Elections of Burgeſſes and Knights for the Parliament. Againſt ſuch as forged or publiſhed falſe Deeds. Againſt Iriſh Beggars. About the Meaſures, that the King's Purveyors ſhould buy Corn by, with other Things of leſs Importance. But the Convocation of the Clergy, which according to the uſual Cuſtom of thoſe Times always ſat with the Parliament, being conven'd in St. Paul's Church was more Active. The Archbiſhop, Thomas Arundel, being ſenſible how zealous the King was for the Church, thought this the fitteſt Opportunity to root out thoſe Heretical Doctrines which had been indeed often attempted, but to ſo little purpoſe, that they ſtill ſpread and got Ground, becauſe that his Youth and Natural Courage concurring with his Religious Inclination would more earneſtly engage him in a Work by which he might merit at once both the Favour of God and his People. Wherefore the Archbiſhop having, by Twelve Inquiſitors ſent out the Year before, made a full Collection of the Principal Doctrines and Opinions maintain'd by the Lollards, which he reduced into (c) two hundred forty-ſix Heads; and having diſcover'd who where the Chief Maintainers and Upholders of them, and by which means the ſaid Opinions had been lately ſo much propagated in many parts of the Nation, and more eſpecially in the Dioceſſes of London, Rocheſter and Hereford, repreſented the ſame to the Convocation, and deſiring their ſerious Conſultation by what Methods the ſaid Doctrines and their Fauters might be ſuppreſſed; he put them upon many Debates about it, and at length drew them to theſe Reſolutions and Decrees, viz. 'That it would not be poſſible to extir-'pate the Doctrines of Wickliff, unleſs certain 'Great Men, who were the profeſſed Abettors 'and Maintainers of them were remov'd out of 'the Way. That Sir John Oldcaſtle, Lord Cobham, being the Chief of them, and the Perſon who had ſent ſeveral Preachers into the Dioceſſes of London, Rocheſter and Hereford to propagate the ſaid Heretical Doctrines, ſhould be firſt dealt withal, and accordingly it was concluded: That without delay Proceſs ſhould be iſſued out againſt him as a moſt pernicious Heretick. But becauſe the ſaid Lord was in Favour with the King for his Conduct and Valour, it was adviſed, That the King himſelf ſhould be acquainted with their Deſigns, and the juſt Occaſion of it, that having obtain'd his Leave their Proceedings might be more Succeſsful and Inoffenſive. This Counſel was approv'd, and order'd to be follow'd, and then the Convocation after it had ordain'd St. George's Day to be celebrated and kept as of the manner of keeping ſuch a Feaſt. See Mr. Fox's Acts and Monuments, pag. 513. Duplex Feſtum Majus, i. e. A greater double Feaſt broke up. The Archbiſhop endeavour'd to have raiſed St. Dunſtan's Day to an equal Holineſs, but could not obtain it.

Sir John Oldcaſtle, Lord Cobham's Accuſation of Hereſy, Impriſonment, Examination and Condemnation, with his Eſcape into Wales.

The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had appear'd particularly Zealous in the Convocation againſt the Hereticks of thoſe Times, did not abate his Heat when it was ended, but immediately went to the King with heavy Complaints againſt the Lord Cobham, as an Arch-Heretick and Enemy of the Church, and deſir'd his Per-

(b) On the fifteenth of May, 1413.

(c) Theſe two hundred forty-ſix Articles were drawn up by Inquiſitors at Oxford, to be Exhibited againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle. Bates's Hiſt. of Lord Cobham's Tryal. p. 13.

miſſion

A. D. 1413. Reg. 1.

mission to proceed against him according to the late Decree made by his Clergy, and according to the Laws of the Land against Hereticks. The King observing the Archbishop's Fury, and being cooler himself reply'd, 'That tho' he had 'a particular Desire to uphold and maintain the 'Church both in its Doctrine and Order, and 'was sensible that Unity was the Life of Chri-'stianity, because it keeps up that Love which 'is the fulfilling of the Law; yet he thought 'that the most prudent Course to reduce the 'Erroneous, was by mild Perswasions and con-'vincing Arguments; for if the Truth were on 'their Side, it would prevail by its one Strength 'in the End, which if it could be done, it would 'be much better than to make use of those En-'gines, which have been for the most part used 'to subdue and destroy the Truth, and seldom 'do any Service to the Church further than to 'work dissembled Union and Conversion: And therefore advised the Archbishop to use all gentle Methods to reform and reduce him, promising, that he would himself treat with the Lord Cobham about his Opinions, and if he could not reclaim him, would leave him to the Church and Law. The Archbishop departed with this Answer, and the King sent soon after for the Lord Cobham, and having related to him the Charge of Heresy, which the Archbishop had brought against him, admonish'd him forthwith to renounce his Opinions and submit himself to the Church and Obedience of the Archbishop. The Lord Cobham thank'd him for his Kindness and Favour, but return'd him an Answer. 'That 'by the Law of God he owed Obedience to no 'Person on Earth but himself, who was his na-'tural Prince, and God's Vice-gerent, and to 'his lawful Commands he would readily sub-'mit at all Times, but as for the Pope and his 'Hierarchy he owed them neither Sute nor Ser-'vice, and therefore would pay them none, be-'cause he knew him to be the Antichrist, and 'Them the Abomination standing in the Holy 'Place, by the Description given them in Scrip-'ture. This resolute Reply something offended the King, so that he dismiss'd him without any further Discourse or Perswasion, and the Lord Cobham departed to his Castle of Cooling in Kent, which having obtained by the Marriage of an Heiress of the Lord Cobham's, he became a Baron, and had upon that Account his usual Residence there. The Archbishop having waited some time for the Effect of the King's Promise, went again to Court to receive the Account of it, and finding the King displeased at the ill Success of his treating with the Lord Cobham, had full Authority given him to cite, examine and punish him according to the Canons of the Church, which he did not defer to put immediately in Execution: For having assembl'd a Council of his Clergy, and fram'd divers Articles of Heresy against him, he sent his Somner to cite him to answer personally before him to such Accusations as should be proved against him. The Somner not daring to deliver his Summons to the Lord, because he was reputed a Person of great Fierceness and Courage, returned again without doing his Message, and the Archbishop was forced to hire (d) one Butler to set up a Peremptory Citation upon the Doors of Rochester Church, (e) strictly charging him to appear before him, on September the 11th following at Leeds. The Lord Cobham was not at all careful to obey his Summons; but fearing least the Archbishop should engage the King against him, and draw him to join his Power to gratifie their Malice and Fury, which otherwise he valued not, he drew up the Sum of his Faith in Writing under several Heads, according to the Sense of the Apostle's Creed, and presented 'em to the King, hoping by satisfying him in the Orthodox Declaration of his Opinion to obtain his Protection and Favour: But contrary to his Expectation he found him so much prepossessed by the Archbishop, that he would not look upon it, but deliver'd it to the Archbishop, and his other Accusers, causing him to be again cited to answer his Charge before them; and because he would not swear to submit himself in all things to the Church, the King order'd him to be Arrested in his Presence, and commanded that he should be kept a close Prisoner in the Tower of London, till he should acquit himself of the Crimes laid against him, or be otherwise released by order of Law. The Lord Cobham used all means to deliver himself, alledging, that the Archbishop was his avow'd Enemy, and therefore in Reason and Equity ought not to be his Judge, that he had appeal'd to the Pope for Justice, and shew'd his Appeal ready drawn up with all due Reverence to the King: But this incensing the King much more, he protested, That he was willing to undergo any Punishment that could by the Law of God be inflicted on him, but could not be contented to have his cruel Enemies his Judges; yet if the King saw fit he would justifie himself by Combat, either personally against any Man living, Christian or Heathen, the King and his Council only excepted, or with an hundred Knights or Esquires on each side, that his Faith is Sound and Orthodox. But all these Offers nothing avail'd, the King would have him appear before the Archbishop at a Day and Place then appointed, and so he was kept in Prison in the mean time. The Day being come for the Lord Cobham's Answer, which was September the 23d, Sir Rob. Morley, Lieutenant of the Tower brought him to St. Paul's Church, were the Archbishop with Richard Clifford, Bishop of London, and Henry Bullingbrook, Bishop of Winchester, sat in a Consistory in the Chapter-House to examine him, and there left him to them: But little was done at this Time, because he deliver'd in to them a short Paper of his Opinion about the Holy Sacrament, Images, Penance and Pilgrimages, which tho' not Satisfactory to them, yet he would then give no other Answer upon those Points, and so he had further Time given him for a more distinct Answer, which was till September the 25th. On that Day he was examined again in the Hall of the Black-Fryars within Ludgate; and because he asserted, That in the Sacrament of the Altar there was, after Consecration both the Body of Christ and Bread, after the same manner as in the Person of Christ the Divinity was united with the Humanity. That the Pope and his Prelates are Antichrist, and not the true Church of God. That Saints are not to be Worshipped, nor to be sought to by Pilgrimages. That Images cannot be an Object of Worship; and would not be induced to alter or change his Opinion in these Points, he was condemn'd as an obstinate Heretick by the Archbishop, who having Excommunicated him, deliver'd him over to the Secular Power to be put

(d) John Butler, Door-keeper of the King's Chamber.

(e) Butler went to him and Summon'd him personally to appear before the Archbishop. Sir John answered, He owed the Priests no Submission, and would not seem to approve of their Practices by obeying his Summons. The Archbishop afterwards proceeded another way, by affixing the Citation on several Church Doors. Ibid.

A. D. 1413. Reg. 1.

put to Death, and he was again remanded to the Tower only to wait for his Fatal Day; but he fortunately escaped by the Assistance of his Friends, or Negligence of his Keepers, getting out of his Prison by Stealth, and flying into Wales, where he remained from the Feast of St. Simon and Jude almost four Years.

Norwich burnt.

About this Time a very terrible Fire happen'd in the City of Norwich, which burnt down a great part of that City, and the House of the Fryars-Preachers, with others, two Fryars being consumed in the Flames.

A. D. 1414.

A pretended Conspiracy against King Henry, by the Lord Cobham and the Lollards.

The King kept his Christmas at his Mannor of Eltham in Kent, about seven Miles distant from London; and while he was in the midst of his Plenty and Delights on Twelfth Day, an information was brought him of a Conspiracy laid by Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, and his Party, who assembling in St. Giles's-Fields to the Number of 20 or 25000 Men, intending to surprize his Person and kill him with his Brothers, that they might secure the open Profession of their Religion, which he was so Zealous to destroy. The King, tho' if he had allowed himself time to consider might easily have seen the Forgery; because if the Lord Cobham had been indeed resolved to revenge himself upon the King and Clergy for the late Wrongs done to him (which it was evident his Conscience would not suffer him to do) yet he being an Expert Commander would not have chosen St. Giles's-Fields for a Rendezvous for his Army, which was then a Thicket overgrown with Trees and Bushes, and so most unfit for that Business; but being amused with the sudden News believed the Truth of it; and having sent an Order to the Mayor of London Sir William Cromer to keep the City-Gates close shut, and let no Persons go out but such as he was well assured of their Loyalty to him, and to seize all suspected Persons, which the Mayor carefully did, and apprehended Seven Persons in one Burgal a Carpenter's House in Bishops-gate-street, who being sent to the King at Eltham, either by Perswasion or through Fear confessed that they had conspired with Sir John Oldcastle to fight against him and his Lords in St. Giles's-Fields in Holborn: Then the King went himself at Midnight, with a considerable Force which he had gathered out of Westminster and the adjoyning Parts, into St. Giles's-Fields, and there finding a certain Number of Men met, viz. about 80, he fell upon them, and having slain some of them without Resistance he took about 60 Prisoners, of whom the Chief were Sir Roger Acton, Kt. a Person of no great account for Wealth or Power, one (f) John Beverly a Preacher, John Brown an Esquire, and one Murby a rich Maltster. This Meeting seems to have been nothing else but a Religious Assembly for the Worship of God; which because the Lollards could no where safely enjoy for fear of their Adversaries, who were grown very Watchful and Insulting by reason of the King's Favour, they were forced like the first Christians in Persecution to celebrate in the Night in Woods and Thickets; but the Clergy having got Information of their Intendment improv'd it into a Plot, which was easily made credible, because the Party was numerous about London, and met in great Numbers, and that many times armed, not to create any Disturbance, but to defend themselves against the Injuries of the Papists: In which Posture the King taking them looked upon them as a rebellious Assembly, and because some of them confessed they came to meet the Lord Cobham (tho' 'tis certain he was not there) he dealt with the Chief of them as Rebels; for being tried at Westminster and condemn'd for High Treason thirty of them were hang'd, and seven burnt and hang'd in St. Giles's-Fields, January 12. following: John Beverly the Priest, Burgal the Carpenter, and two others were hang'd, Jan. 19. and Sir Roger Acton was hang'd, Feb. 10. and buried under the Gallows he was executed on: And so this imaginary Plot was suppressed.

A. D. 1414. Reg. 1.

Archbishop Arundel's Death, and the Election of his Successor.

Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, a strenuous Champion for the Papal Church, and a bitter Enemy of the supposed Hereticks died Feb. 20. It is said, that as he was pronouncing the Sentence of Excommunication and Condemnation upon the Lord Cobham, he was stricken with a soreness in his Throat and at the Roots of his Tongue, which notwithstanding all Medicines that could be used so inflamed those Parts that he could swallow neither Meat nor Drink, and so he was starved to Death. This lamentable End was then thought a just Judgment upon him, not only for his Severity to the Lollards, many of whom, being generally accounted a well-meaning and good People, he condemn'd, and caused to be burnt for Heresie; but because he had made a Canon the Year before in a Synod held at Rochester against the Lord Cobham, forbidding the Translation of the Scripture into the English Tongue, and the Preaching the Gospel by the Lollards. He sat eighteen Years in that See, and was succeeded by Henry Chicheley, Bishop of St. Davids, whom the Monks of Canterbury had elected into his room, but he would not accept it till he had the Pope's Consent and Confirmation. He was as zealous a Persecutor of the Lollards as his Predecessor, and sat 25 Years in that See.

King Henry restores Henry Percy to the Earldom of Northumberland, and the Lands thereunto belonging.

King Henry having an Account of the miserable Imprisonment of Henry Percy the Son of the late Lord Percy, surnam'd Hotspur, and Heir of the Earldom of Northumberland much pity'd his Condition and resolv'd to redeem him: And tho' by the Treason and Rebellion of his Father and Grandfather, his Honour and Estate was justly forfeited to the Crown; yet because he was an Infant and was no ways accessary to his Ancestor's Crimes, the King in Mercy purposed to restore him to his Birth-right, tho' in Justice he might have kept him out of it. This young Nobleman had been very unjustly dealt with by the Scots: For whereas his Grandfather had carried him to them when he fled thither after the Rebellion of Archbishop Scroop, and entrusted him with them to secure him, and educate him, they made him a Prisoner by way of Reprisal, because their young King James had been many Years kept a Prisoner in England, and would not release him till the King was restored. But King Henry found out another Exchange for him, viz. by returning the Duke of Albany's Son (g) who was taken by the English at Haledown-fight, and so he obtained him and restored him to his Honour, Dignity and Estate, tho' they had been given some time before to John, Duke of Bedford the King's Brother, by which Act of Mercy he gain'd much Love and Respect from his Nobility, and an equal Admiration from all his People.

Reg. 2.

Second Parliament its Acts and Taxes.

On the last Day of April the Parliament by the King's Summons and Order met at Leicester

(f) Sir John Beverly.
(g) The Earl of Fife.

and

A. D. 1414. Reg. 2.

and ſettled many Things of great Concern to the Nation, and for the Honour of the King, tho' it prov'd very ſevere and fatal to the Lollards, as will appear in the brief Account of the chief Acts of it. The firſt Act of this Parliament was a very Pious own for the due Management of Hoſpitals, ordering, That the Biſhops of the Dioceſe ſhould by the King's Commiſſion inquire into the Revenues and other Endowments belonging to ſuch Houſes as have been erected and endowed for the Relief of the Poor, and correct and reform what they find amiſs according to the Laws of the Church. Other Acts alſo of great Uſe were made for the keeping of Servants and Labourers within their own Counties. That Juſtices of Quorum be reſident in the Counties where they are appointed to ſerve by the King's Commiſſion, and that the Quarter-Seſſions for the Peace be kept in the ſame Week quarterly throughout England. That it ſhall be High-Treaſon to rob or ſlay any Perſons, either in the Ports or paſſing upon the Seas, having the King's Letters of Truce and ſafe Conduct, by which Act alſo Conſervators of Truce in every Port both of England and Wales were appointed. That Juſtices of the Peace and Sheriffs ſhould be diligent to ſuppreſs all unlawful Routs and Riotous Aſſemblies under the Penalty of an hundred Pound Forfeiture for every Omiſſion. But thoſe Matters which were carried on and manag'd with the greateſt Heat and Zeal were, 1. The Act againſt the Lollards, and 2. The Petition about the Revenues of Religious Perſons. The firſt of theſe was procured chiefly by the Clergy, who taking advantage of the King's Diſpleaſure againſt the Lollards for their ſuppoſed Rebellion lately raiſed againſt him, willingly cauſed it to be Enacted. 'That 'whereas divers of his Majeſty's Leige People 'as well by thoſe of the Sect of Hereſie, called 'Lollards, as by others of their Confæderation, 'Excitation and Abetment have been made 'to annul and ſubvert the Chriſtian Faith and 'Law of God within the Realm of England, 'and deſtroy the King himſelf, the Eſtates of 'the Realm both Spiritual and Temporal, and 'alſo all manner of Policy and the Laws of the 'Land: Therefore our Lord the King to the 'Honour of God, in Conſervation and Fortifi'cation of the Chriſtian Faith, and alſo in Sal'vation of his Royal Eſtate, and of the Eſtate 'of all his Realm, willing to provide a more 'open and due Puniſhment againſt the Malice 'of ſuch Hereticks and Lollards than hath been 'had or uſed in that Caſe heretofore; ſo that 'for the fear of the ſame Laws and Puniſh'ments; ſuch Hereſies and Lollardies may the ra'ther ceaſe in time to come; hath by the Ad'vice and Aſſent, and at the Prayers of the 'Commons Ordain'd and Eſtabliſh'd, That the 'Chancellor, Treaſurer, Judges of both Benches, 'Juſtices of the Peace, Sheriffs, and other Offi'cers that have, or hereafter ſhall have Go'vernment of our People, do made Oath in ta'king their Offices to extend their whole Pain 'and Diligence to put out, ceaſe and deſtroy 'all manner of Errors and Hereſies, com'monly call'd Lollardies within all Places where'in they exerciſe their Offices with all their 'Power, and aſſiſt, favour and maintain the 'Ordinaries and their Commiſſaries in doing 'the ſame as oft as they ſhall be thereunto re'quired, their reaſonable Coſts and Charges 'being paid by them. This Act as it ſhews how ill an Opinion the King had of the Lollards whom he knew only by the Miſrepreſentations of their inveterate Enemies, ſo it raiſed a very ſharp Perſecution againſt them, in which many were burnt, many for fear fled into foreign Parts to ſecure their Lives, and others through a more unmanly Cowardize denied and abjured the Truth: This with other Acts of Parliament being paſſed, the Houſes came to raiſe the King ſome Money, which being the firſt he had ever had, they were willing to do the more largely, and for that End put up a freſh Petition to the King (as they had before done to his Father) to this Effect, 'That foraſmuch as the 'Temporal Revenues which had been devoutly 'given to Religious Perſons, but were diſor'derly conſumed and ſpent as well to the diſ'honour of God and Religion as the Prejudice 'of the Religious Perſons themſelves, might be 'much better imployed for the ſafety and ſe'curing the Realm and relief of the Poor (as 'by a particular Computation in the ſame man'ner as it was given in to the King's Father they 'made it appear) they beſought the King to 'take the ſaid Revenues into his Hands, and to 'employ them for his own and the Nations Ad'vantage. This Petition though put up and promoted by ſuch Perſons as bore ſome Affection to the Lollards, and hated the Clergy for the Cruelty they had uſed ſo lately againſt the Lord Cobham; yet being done by ſome or moſt of the ſame Perſons who had concurred in the Act made this Seſſion againſt them, was not ſuſpected of Revenge by the King, but as if it had proceeded from the good Affection they bore to him, and the preſent Neceſſities of the Nation, he began to liſten to it and ſhew a Compliance with that ſtrong Party in both Houſes which appear'd Zealous for it, inſomuch that (as Hall ſaith) the fat Abbots began to ſweat, the Proud Priors to frown, the Poor Fryars to curſe, and the ſilly Nuns to weep, leaſt their Babel ſhould now utterly be demoliſh'd: But their Sins were not yet full. The Clergy laid their Heads together, and entred into deep Conſultations how to ſave themſelves: The Houſes of the Fryars Aliens which were 110, they were contented to part with to ſecure the Reſt, and accordingly they were given to the King with all their Rents and Revenues; but leaſt this ſmall Morſel ſhould ſharpen his Appetite to a greater Prey, it was contrived, that Henry Chicheley, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, a Perſon of great Eloquence and Policy ſhould ſet on Foot the King's Title to the Crown of France, and by all the Cogent Flowers of Rhetorick endeavour to infiame the King's Youthful affections with Deſires of attaining that Kingdom, as well to immortalize his Courage as recover his Right, which he did in a full Parliament in this Method and to this Effect. 'That King Henry be'ing a Prince ſo well qualified both for his Pie'ty, Courage, and wiſe Conduct to govern not 'only one part of a ſmall Iſland but the whole 'World, if an univerſal Monarchy can be ever 'ſettled upon one Perſon, it would be a great 'ſhame if the Engliſh ſhould ſuffer his Power and 'Rule to be confin'd within narrower Limits than 'Nature and Providence had given him; eſpe'cially ſince nothing can be ſuppoſed to oblige 'him to it, whoſe Courage was always forward 'to attempt any juſt Enterprize, but their 'backwardneſs to aſſiſt him with Men and Mo'ney for that End: That though indeed King 'Henry, ruled only England and Ireland at pre'ſent, yet the Dutchies of Normandy and Aqui'tain, and the Countries of Anjou, Gaſcoigne, 'and Maine in France did by Ancient Inheri'tance belong to the Crown of England, and 'the whole Kingdom of France was really and 'truly

A. D. 1414. Reg. 2.

The Commons urge the King to ſeize the Temporalities of the Monks.

Archbiſhop Chicheley's Speech, encouraging King Henry to a War with France.

A. D. 1414. Reg. 2.

truly his, as Heir to King Edward the Third his Great-Grandfather, whoſe Mother Queen Iſabel after the Death of her Three Brothers, Lewis Hutyn, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, who all died without Iſſue, was the only lawful Heir of the Kingdom of France, and left her Title to her Son Edward, from whom King Henry is lineally deſcended: That tho' Philip de Valois had poſſeſſed himſelf of that Kingdom, upon a pretended fundamental Law, call'd the Salick-Law, by which it was enacted, That in terram Salicam mulieres ne ſuccedant, Let not Women ſucceed in the Government of the Salick-Land; yet it is evident from the Original Conſtitution of the ſaid Law by Charles the Great, and the common Cuſtom of France it ſelf in reference to the Succeſſion of the Crown, that the ſaid Law hath been unjuſtly made uſe of, and pleaded to bar the Kings of England from their Inheritance; for as to the making of it our Hiſtories ſhew, that it was fram'd by Charles the Great when he conquer'd the Parts of Germany between the Rivers Elb and Sala, where having obſerv'd the Women to be very Lewd and Voluptuous, and conſequently unfit to govern, he made the Law, That in theſe Countries no Woman ſhould rule; which could in no wiſe include France, as is pretended it doth but falſly, as the Courſe of Succeſſion to the Crown of France doth prove. For Pepin, King of France, who depoſed Chilperick, claim'd the Kingdom as his Right by Inheritance, becauſe he was deſcended of the Lady Blithilda, Daughter of King Clothair; and Hugh Capet who held the Crown in Prejudice of Charles, Duke of Lorrain, the only Heir-male of Charles the Great, made his Claim good by proving his Deſcent from the Emperour Lewis the Son of Charles the Great by the Lady Lingard, which Pleas could have no tolerable Grounds, nor would they have been admitted, had the Salick-Law as is pretended been in Force from the Time of their firſt King Pharamond. But that which renders this Argument moſt plain is the Caſe of St. Lewis, who being diſſatisfied in Conſcience about his Right to the Crown, becauſe the Succeſſion was a little confuſed and intricate, and being ready to reſign what he feared he had no good Title to, he was ſhew'd, that he was lineally deſcended of the Lady Ermengard, Daughter and Heir to Charles, Duke of Lorrain, the ſole Heir-male of Charles the Great, and was ſatisfied in the Juſtice of his Title, which he could not have been if the Salick-Law had been known and in force at that time in France; and ſince the Title of the ſucceeding Kings to this Day is deriv'd from the ſaid Lewis of whom they all come, the Kings of England will have at leaſt as good a Title as any of them could challenge, and ſo conſequently is the lawful Heir of France as being from the Elder Family tho' by a Female Branch, and the Salick-Law is but a Trick ſet on Foot to debar the Kings of England of their Right: That if the Salick-Law were indeed of that Antiquity and Uſe in France as is pretended, yet it ought not to be obſerved in any Chriſtian Commonwealth, becauſe it is directly contrary to a Law of God (which no humane Law or Cuſtom may contradict) and that allows the Woman to inherit her Father's Poſſeſſions in caſe of a Defect in the Male-Line, as is evident from the Caſe of the Daughters of Zelophehad, upon which God commanded, That if a Man died without Heirs-male his Daughters ſhall inherit, and by this Law the Daughter of Shejhan, 1 Chron. 2. 34. obtained her Father's Inheritance, and held it to the Captivity. Wherefore it was not without good Reaſon that Ottoman the great French Lawyer call'd the Salick-Law an unjuſt Ordinance: That God himſelf had ſeem'd to declare in favour of the Engliſh Title to the Crown of France by the great Succeſs he had given to Edward the Third and his Son the Black-Prince in endeavouring to recover their undoubted Right to it by Arms, who were ſo Victorious, that they in a few Years conquer'd the greateſt part of France, took King John Priſoner, and braved his Succeſſor Charles the Fifth at the Gates of Paris without Reſiſtance; and though God for the Juſt Puniſhment of our Sins took away both thoſe Victorious Princes (who if they had lived, doubtleſs had long ſince decided this Quarrel, and ſubjected the whole Realm of France to the Engliſh Crown) and ſo given France a Breathing time, yet their Title ſtill remained; and though it was not claim'd by King Henry the Fourth by reaſon of his Troubles at Home, yet his Father having left him a quiet Poſſeſſion of his Crown had as it were prepared all things for his Son to recover it. Wherefore he concluded with an earneſt Exhortation to the King not to ſit down in Sluggiſhneſs and Eaſe, but to atchieve the Conqueſt of ſo Noble a Nation, whereby he would not only recover his Right and enlarge his Dominions, but get himſelf immortal Honour, aſſuring him, That the Clergy would aſſiſt him with ſuch a Supply of Money for that End as no King before him had ever received, and did not doubt but the Laity would willingly contribute their Proportion. This Oration of the Archbiſhop, tho' unexpected by the King and Parliament, yet being well ſtudied and ordered by him had the deſir'd Effect, for the whole Houſe were convinced thereby of King Henry's juſt Title to the Crown of France, and immediately reſolv'd to give him their utmoſt Aſſiſtance to the Recovery of it, and the King himſelf inflam'd with the Deſires of Victory, could think upon nothing elſe but Armies and Laurels. The Bill againſt the Clergy was wholly laid aſide, and a Subſidy of 300000 Marks given him from the Laity to carry on a vigorous War againſt the King of France; and ſo the Parliament broke up and this Seſſion was ended.

A. D. 1414. Reg. 2.

King Henry's Embaſſy to the King of France, to require his Kingdom.

While this Parliament was ſitting, and the intended Recovery of France was debated hotly among them, there came over Embaſſadours from France, being ſent to the King by the two great Factions of the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, and ſollicited him earneſtly, but ſeverally, to aſſiſt them againſt their Adverſaries, promiſing him (as was ſaid) more than was in their Power to perform: The King gave them no other Anſwer at preſent but this. That he would ſhortly ſend over his Embaſſadours into France and ſignifie his Reſolutions to both of them, becauſe he waited to ſee what would be the Reſult of the preſent Debates, and accordingly would manage his Affairs and purſue his Advantage. As ſoon therefore as the Parliament was broke up, and his Expedition into France reſolv'd on, and all eager Preparations for it determin'd, he ſent a ſolemn Embaſſy into France by the Duke of Exeter, the Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Lord Gray, the Lord High Admiral, and the Biſhop of Norwich with 500 Horſe to King Charles the Sixth, to require of him in a peaceable manner (for the avoiding the Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood) to ſurrender the Kingdom of France and all the Appen-

A. D. 1414. Reg. 2.

'Appertenances to him as the lawful and undoubted Heir of it, which if he would do quietly, King Henry would then take the Lady Katherine his Daughter to Wife, and endow her with all the Dutchies belonging to the Crown of France; but if King Charles refuſed to grant his juſt Demands, he would enter France with Fire and Sword to recover his Right from him or loſe his Life. The French King hearing their Demands entertain'd them with Contempt, telling them in Scorn, That their Buſineſs required Deliberation, deſir'd time, and ſent them away without an Anſwer. The Dauphin was not content with ſuch Modeſt Reflections, but knowing ſomething of King Henry's effeminate courſe of Life while he was Prince, ſent him a Tun of Tennis-Balls, ſcornfully intimating, That he was fitter for a Game at Tennis than a Warlike Expedition, and knew better how to bandy a Ball than ſhoot a Bullet, and that they muſt be as ſoft as himſelf who valued the Menaces of ſo unwarlike a Prince. King Henry not a little enraged at theſe Returns of his Embaſſy, ſaid, 'That as light as they made of his Demands, he'd make the French know that he deſerv'd the Reſpect of a Prince from them, and tho' they had ſent him Tennis-Balls, he would ſend among them ſuch Balls as the ſtrongeſt Walls of France ſhould not be able to withſtand: And ſo with all the Zeal and Haſte imaginable prepared for his Expedition into France; for having gathered up the 300000 Marks granted him the laſt Parliament, he raiſed a very puiſſant Army, and hired a great Number of Ships out of Zealand, Holland and Freizland to join with his own Fleet to carry over his Army: He alſo call'd a great Council at London about Michaelmas, in which he cauſed it to be ordain'd, that no French Men nor other Strangers ſhould be promoted in the Church without his Licenſe for the future, and all ſuch as did enjoy any Preferments already, ſhould find Sureties not to diſcloſe the Secrets of the Realm, nor aſſiſt the King's Enemies with Money, which Edict was at the ſame time confirm'd by a Canon of the Convocation ſitting in St. Paul's to elect certain Perſons to be ſent to the General Council appointed to meet at Conſtans in Germany by the Emperor Sigiſmund to heal the Schiſm then in the Church (b).

The French prepare to defend their Coaſts againſt King Henry, and excite the Scots againſt him.

The Preparations made in England againſt the French were not unknown to them, and the Dauphin who then had the Government of the Realm under his Father, call'd a Council of the Dukes of Alenzon and Berry, with other great Lords to conſult about the propereſt Methods of oppoſing the King of England, and by their Advice an Army was raiſed to lie on the Coaſts, and the Maritime Garriſons ſtrongly fortified againſt any Invaſion. But the main Thing they depended upon was the Aſſiſtance of the King of Scots, who by their Inſtigation and Help was drawn to invade the Engliſh Borders with ſuch a powerful Army as would, they hoped, hinder their Expedition into France. And indeed the Scots appear'd at firſt ſo Formidable, that it begat a Diſpute in the King Council, whether Scotland or France ſhould be firſt ſubdu'd. The Earl of Weſtmorland, who then was made Lord Warden of the Marches of Scotland, moved the King to go firſt againſt Scotland, alledging, that it would facilitate his Conqueſt over France to ſubdue that Nation firſt according to the old Proverb, Whoſo will France win, muſt with Scotland firſt begin. But the King's Uncle Thomas Beaufort, Duke of Exeter, a wiſe and learned Man, affirmed and urged the contrary, That it would be the moſt certain way to ſubdue Scotland to conquer France firſt, becauſe it was by the Policy and Money of the French that the Scots were able ſo well to defend and maintain themſelves. Take away France and the Scots will fall of courſe. Beſides the preſent Factions of Burgundy and Orleans would be ſo great an Advantage to the King in gaining that Nation, that it would be very impolitick to omit this Juncture to invade France. Theſe and other Arguments of like Nature were ſo prevalent with the whole Aſſembly that it was reſolv'd, that the King ſhould go on with the War againſt France, and that Sir Robert Umfrevile with a ſmall Body of Men, and with the Forces of the Bordering Counties ſhould be ſent to defend the Nation from the Incurſions of the Scots. This Valiant Commander ſoon after his arrival, viz. upon St. Mary Magdalen's Day, July 22. came to an Engagement with them, and was ſo fortunate that he routed their whole Army, and took 360 of them Priſoners with great Spoil, and got ſafe into Roxborough-Caſtle, of which he was Governour. The News of this Succeſs againſt the Scots much amaz'd the French, and taught them how little the Aid of the Scots was to be truſted to: Whereupon they altered their Methods, and ſent over an Embaſſy to King Henry by the Earl of Vendoſme, William, Arch-Biſhop of Bourges, the Biſhop of Liſeux, the Lords Ipre and Braquemont, the King's Secretary, and many others, who being accompany'd with 350 Horſe-Men as Attendants arrived at Callis a little after Chriſtmas, and landed within a few Days at Dover.

A. D. 1414. Reg. 2.

The Scots beaten at Getering.

A. D. 1415.

King Henry being very earneſt and diligent to make all poſſible Preparations for his deſigned Expedition into France, took his Journey early this Spring to ſee in what Condition and Readineſs his Fleet and Tranſport Ships were which lay at Southampton, and give ſuch neceſſary Orders as were requir'd for his Proceedings; but in his Paſſage News was brought him, that a Pompous Embaſſy from the French King was landed at Dover and haſtening towards him, which cauſed the King to deſiſt from his Journey a while and retreat to Wincheſter to receive them and give them a ſpeedy Audience, tho' without a prophetick Foreſight it was eaſie to gueſs at their Buſineſs, that they now were afraid of him they ſo lately ſcorn'd and derided. As ſoon as they arriv'd they were admitted to the King, and the Archbiſhop of Bourges in an Eloquent Speech having ſhew'd the Barbarous Cruelties of War and the Advantages of Peace, eſpecially between ſuch two neighbouring Nations as England and France, diſſwaded the King from his intended Deſign, and promiſed him from his Maſter many profitable Conditions if he would diſmiſs his Army, viz. That his Maſter the French King would give him in Marriage the Lady Katharine, and for her Dowry ſeveral Countries in France, with a large Sum of Money. (i) The King gave them no Anſwer to their Propoſals preſently; but having for ſeveral Days feaſted them Royally at his own Table, he at length order'd the Archbiſhop of An Embaſſy from France to King Henry to put off the War.

(b) The Clergy choſe the Biſhop of Bath and the Biſhop of Hereford, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, the Prior of Worceſter, and Robert Hilam, Biſhop of Salisbury afterwards Cardinal. The King appointed the Biſhop of St. Davids, the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Fitzhugh, Sir Walter Hungerford, Sir Richard Rochfort and John Honyngham to be his Commiſſioners.

(i) 85000 Crowns.

Canterbury

A. D. 1415. Reg. 2.

Canterbury to anſwer their Propoſals in this Manner. 'That the Dutchies of Aquitain and 'Anjou, with ſeveral Seigniories and Dominions, did of right belong to his Maſter the King 'of England, as they had formerly done to his 'Royal Progenitors; and though he was fully 'intended to recover them by force, as he did 'not doubt but he ſhould be able to do thro' 'the Divine Aſſiſtance, which he could not 'doubt of in ſo juſt a Cauſe; yet for Peace ſake, 'and to avoid the Loſs of ſo many Lives as 'would probably periſh in the Quarrel, he was 'contented to diſmiſs his Army and give over 'his intended Expedition, if their Maſter would 'reſtore them to him by a Marriage with the 'Lady Katharine, if not he would enter France 'with all his Force, and deſtroying the People 'and Towns with Blood, Fire and Sword, ne'ver deſiſt till he had recover'd them, which 'were his Ancient Right and Patrimony. The King himſelf was preſent, and as ſoon as the Archbiſhop had ended his Speech aſſented to it, and (k) promiſed upon the Word of a Prince, that he would perform it to the uttermoſt. The Archbiſhop of Bourges an high and lofty Prelate heard all this with Impatience, and as ſoon as the King had done ſpeaking, without Conſideration, what or to whom he ſpake, burſt out in his Paſſion and reply'd. 'That his Ma'jeſty the moſt Chriſtian King, who was the 'moſt Renowned, Mighty and Excellent Prince 'of Europe without Competition both in Blood, 'Power and Preheminence, did not offer thoſe 'Things which he had propounded out of fear 'of King Henry or his Nation, but merely 'out of a Compaſſion to avoid the Effuſion of 'Chriſtian Blood, and ſince his Propoſals tho' 'very Advantageous were diſpiſed, God and his 'good Subjects would ſoon put an End to the 'Quarrel, which was ſupported with ſo much 'Equity and Right, and then deſir'd his Paſs'port to depart. King Henry with a Princely Gravity and Mildneſs told the Angry Prelate, 'That he valu'd not his Bravadoes, and as he 'was ſatisfied in his Right, which they them'ſelves could not be ignorant of, ſo he doubted 'not but through God's help he ſhould find 'means to recover it; if his Maſter had many 'Subjects to aſſiſt him, he doubted not but to 'find their Equals in Number and Courage a'mong his own, by whoſe help he would make 'the higeſt Crown in France to ſtoop, and prou'deſt Mitre to kneel; and giving him his Letters of ſafe Conduct, bid him go tell his Maſter, 'That within three Months he would enter 'France as into his lawful Patrimony, and by 'God's Aſſiſtance take that by dint of Sword 'which he unjuſtly detain'd from him: And ſo ſent him away (l).

Reg. 3. King Henry's Expedition into France.

The War with France being now unmovably determin'd, King Henry who was already in great forwardneſs for it, doubled his Diligence to have all Things ready within the Three Months, appointed to the French Embaſſadors, and accordingly gave out ſtrict Orders to his Captains and Commanders to meet him every ways equipp'd at Southampton on June 24. and ſo paſs immediately into France (m). In the mean time he let all Things in order againſt his Departure out of the Realm, that his Abſence might not create any Diſturbance among his Subjects, and for that End he appointed his Mother in Law, Joan de Navar, (n) a Woman of great Prudence and Judgment in National Affairs, to be Regent in his Abſence with the Advice of his Privy-Council; The Earl of Weſtmoreland, the Lords Scroop and Greyſtock, and Sir Robert Umfreville, with ſome other Valiant Captains he appointed to keep the Frontiers of the Nation againſt the Scots who had engag'd in the French Aſſiſtance, and would certainly be very troubleſome as ſoon as they heard he was gone, and therefore he ſent them with a ſufficient Strength to prevent their Incurſions. On June 18. the King left London, and began his Journey to Southampton were his Army was to meet him on the 24th, and accordingly did; all Things being ready, and all Perſons cheerfully attending the King's Motions and Deſires, with all ſpeed poſſible to paſs into France. But before they could take Ship a ſudden Accident put a ſtop to all for a while. The French King who could not fairly oppoſe Henry's Courage, brib'd ſome of his Favourites to take away his Life by baſe Treachery, but the Conſpiracy and its Actors were fortunately diſcovered to him before the time for its Execution was come, by this Means and on this Occaſion. Richard, Earl of Cambridge, Brother to the Duke of York, Henry, Lord Scroop, the High Treaſurer, and Sir Thomas Gray, (o) a Privy-Counſellor, three Perſons moſt in Favour with the King, and almoſt conſtantly in his Company, having received of the King of France a Million of Gold, had promiſed him to kill King Henry in his Voyage to France, or if they could not do that, to deliver him into his Power, and that they might make their treacherous Deſign to look the more plauſibly, they diſcover'd it to the Earl of March, Edmund Mortimer, pretending that it was out of a real deſire of reſtoring him to his Right that they had taken up ſuch deſperate Reſolutions; and tho' they expected not his Concurrence, yet they muſt exact an Oath of Secrecy from him for their own Security, in a Matter of ſo great Danger to themſelves, as well as of Importance to him. The Earl of March either not very deſirous of the Crown when ſo worthy a Prince himſelf and ſo great a Friend to him was in Poſſeſſion, or elſe ſuſpecting that this Conſpiracy aroſe from other Cauſes than what was pretended, refuſed at firſt to ſwear to them, but when they were very importunate with him to do it before they parted, he at length conſented upon Condition they would allow him an Hour to conſider of it (p) which they granted. The Earl of March having thus got his Liberty to

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3.

A Plot againſt the King's Life diſcover'd, and the Conſpirators Executed.

(k) This Speech was made by the Biſhop of Winchester; and when he had done, to ſhew it was the King's Sentiments, he bad the French Embaſſadors ſee 'twas all written down on a Paper and Sealed with his Majeſty's Seal. Godwin, pag 60.

(l) This Arrogant Prelate upbraided King Henry in his Speech with the Badneſs of his Title even to the Crown of England and he ſaid, The Crown you wear appertains to the true Heirs of the Deceaſed Richard, and while they are alive 'tis with them and not you that our Royal Maſter ſhould have made a Treaty.

(m) From Southampton he ſent Antelope his Purſuivant at Arms with a Letter to the French King, dated at that Place on the Sea, to ſhew he muſt expect no more Meſſages from him: In it he demanded the Reſtoration of the Provinces in France belonging to the Crown of England, and offered ſtill to marry his Daughter, otherwiſe he would recover them by Arms. The French King anſwered, If that was his Mind, he would be prepared to receive him, and as to the Marriage he thought it a ſtrange way of Courtſhip to addreſs his Miſtreſs covered with the Blood of her Father's Subjects.

(n) Joan of Navar was made Queen Regent, and John Duke of Bedford, Protector and Lord Lieutenant of England.

(o) Of Northumberland.

(p) He deſir'd time to conſider of it, and they gave him till the next Morning. Godwin. pag. 65.

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3.

conſult what he had beſt to do, went to the King and diſcover'd the whole Plot as they had related to him, adviſing him to provide for his own Safety. The King, though much ſurprized at the Baſeneſs of his Friends, yet did not ſo much diſtruſt the Diſcovery as to neglect himſelf, but cauſing them to be apprehended, brought them to an Examination before himſelf, and Nobles preſent with him. They denied not the Accuſation which was taken ſo lately from their own Mouths, but confeſſed themſelves guilty of the whole Plot. (q) The King much amazed at their deteſtable Treaſon, told them, 'That he could not but 'with horrour think upon this their Execrable 'Fact, which not only tended to the Deſtructi- 'on of his own Perſon, and the Nobles his fol- 'lowers, but to the Ruin of the whole Nation, 'of which they were ſo unnatural Sons as to 'betray it to their Enemies by this Treaſon: 'That as to himſelf he deſired no Revenge; 'but as he was the Supreme Governour of the 'Nation he took himſelf oblig'd to inflict the 'Puniſhment upon them which they had de- 'ſerved, for the ſafety of his Dear Friends and 'the Preſervation of the whole Nation: And thereupon wiſhing them an hearty Repentance for their Offences and Mercy from God, he commanded that they ſhould be Executed, which being accordingly perform'd, the Earl's Head was permitted to be buried with his Body, but the Lord Scroop's Head was ſent to York, and Sir Thomas Gray's to New-caſtle to be Spectacles of Terrour to all Beholders (r).

King Henry proceeds in his Expedition, and lands in France.

The King having thus puniſhed thoſe Conſpirators promiſed himſelf Security, and began to put forward his Expedition, but leaſt any Remnants of this Treaſon ſhould prove afterwards fatal to him, or prejudicial to his Proceedings, he called his Nobles to him, and having repreſented to them the Glory of this Atchievement againſt France, and how much he depended upon their Fidelity and Courage, told them, 'That 'the Treaſon, which by God's Mercy he had ſo 'lately eſcaped, would make him value their 'Loyalty to him the more if they perſiſted in 'their Duty, and he would not be forgetful to 'reward it, and in Confidence of their Firm- 'neſs to him he was reſolv'd to proceed in his 'Deſign. The Nobles hearing theſe Words which ſavoured of a little Diſtruſt, fell down on their Knees, and promiſed faithfully to ſerve and obey him, and rather die than ſuffer him to fall into the Hands of his Enemies: With this Encouragement the King put an end to thoſe Delays which had given the French hopes that their Plot againſt his Life had been Succeſsful, and went on board with his Nobles and Soldiers, Auguſt 11. to ſail into France. His whole Army was but 6000 Spears and 24000 Foot, beſides Gunners, Engineers, Artificers and Labourers, and his Navy conſiſted of 1000, (or as others ſay 1500) Ships, with which he landed ſafe on Auguſt 15. at Caux, a Town ſituate at the Mouth of the Seine in Normandy; for his Arrival ſtruck the Inhabitants with ſuch Terrour that they made no Reſiſtance. The King at his firſt landing fell down on his Knees, and with much Devotion beſought God to favour his Cauſe according to the Juſtice of it, and give him Succeſs againſt his Enemies as the Equity of his Enterprize deſerved it, and that he might preſerve a due Order in his Army he put out a Proclamation, forbidding his Soldiers upon pain of Death to take any thing out of any Church or Monaſtry, to abuſe any Prieſt, Women or unarmed Perſons, or raiſe any Quarrels with any Man to the diſquieting either of the Country or Army. Theſe things being done, the King ſenſible that Delays would bring Inconveniencies, proceeded to put all things in order for Action, and to encourage his Captains and Leaders he conferred the Order of Knighthood upon ſeveral of them, and diſpoſed of the Banners and Standards to ſuch Men as he knew to be of greateſt Strength and Courage. The next Day he ſent forth his Spies to take a view of Harfleur, an important Haven in Normandy, which would be a commodious Paſſage for the Engliſh into France upon all Occaſions if it could be gained; and having received the Account of it ſet forward with his whole Army towards it, being three Leagues diſtant from Caux, and ſat down before it Auguſt 17. The Town was well fortified, and a ſtrong Garriſon put into it to defend it; for beſides the Inhabitants the French King had placed in it 400 Men of Arms under the Command of the Lord de Toutevil, chief Captain of the Town, the Lords Blanvile, Haquevile, and others very expert Warriours who made a very brave and gallant Reſiſtance, being as deſirous of an Ominous Beginning in preſerving, as the Engliſh were in conquering the Town. The Siege was carried on by the Care and Conduct of Humfry, Duke of Glouceſter, (s) who by Mines, battering the Walls with his Engines and Ordinance, and by continual Aſſualts ſought to reduce it ſoon into his Power; but the Inhabitants and Garriſon by ſtopping the Courſe of the River which ſo ſwell'd that it became dangerous to the King's Camp, and by Countermining ſecured themſelves for a while; that though they loſt many, and their Town was much endamaged yet they kept themſelves out of their Enemies Hands. The King of France thinking to relieve them ſent a Force down to Caudebeck-Caſtle, which was but a little diſtance from Harfluer, but it proved no help either to that Town or the Country about, for the Engliſh ſpoil'd the Villages, forrag'd the Countries, and brought much Prey to Harfluer, and the Town being reduced to very great Streigths capitulated with the King of England, that if it were not relieved by the Dauphin or King within a certain time limited they would reſign the Keys into his Hands, thirty of the Chief Perſons being delivered to the King's Mercy, and the reſt to be ſuffered to go whether they pleaſed, yet without Arms or Goods, and twelve Perſons were delivered to the Engliſh as Hoſtages for the Performance of this Agreement. The Beſieged immediately diſpatched their Meſſengers to the Dauphin to come down to their Relief, but he returned them Anſwer, That he was not able to give them any Succour: Whereupon, at the Time appointed Sir Lionel Braquemont, Governour of the Town came, and on his Knees delivered up the Keys to the King, and yielded up himſelf with other Lords and chief Perſons to the Number of thirty to the King's Mercy, September the 22d, and ſo all the reſt as Harfluer beſieged, and ſurrendred to King Henry.

(q) Before the King diſcovered that he knew of the Conſpiracy he ask'd the Conſpirators themſelves, what thoſe deſerv'd that could be guilty of ſuch a Treaſon. They merited, ſaid the Traytors, to expire in horrid Torments to deter others from the like Crimes. Then the King examin'd them, and they confeſſed their conſpiring to deſtroy him.

(r) The Earl of Cambridge and Sir Tho. Gray were beheaded, and the Lord Scroop was hang'd, drawn and quarter'd.

(s) The King manag'd the Siege in Perſon: He had his head Quarters at Graville, and next him the Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter. Godw. p. 68.

well

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3.

well Soldiers as Inhabitants were ſuffered to depart unarm'd. (t) The King having return'd God Thanks in St. Martin's Church made his Uncle Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorſet, Governour of the Town, and gave the Prey to the Soldiers whom he left in Garriſon, and Peopl'd it with Engliſh, whom he invited thither by giving all ſuch Families as would go over their Dwellings and their Childrens after them for nothing, which ſo many accepted, that the Town was well Peopl'd with Engliſh in a ſhort Space.

King Henry's Army being ſickly, he leaves Harfleur and went to Winter in Callis.

King Henry having obtain'd his wiſhed-for Succeſs in taking Harfleur would have purſu'd his Victory and proceeded to take other Towns which would not have dared to ſtand out, but that he was ſenſible of the Condition of his Army, which by lying ſo long in the Field was grown very ſickly, and many died of the Bloody flux, of whom ſome were Perſons of Note, as Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, the Biſhop of Norwich, Lords Beaumont, Molins and Barnell, and others, and of the Common Soldiers above 2000. The Duke of Clarence, Earls of Marſhal and Arundel were ſo dangerouſly ill of the ſame Diſtemper that he was forced to let them return into England to recover their Health, and many that remained were infected and Weak. This State of the Army with the Conſideration that the Winter was coming on, made him take up Reſolutions of paſſing immediately to Callis without further Action to recruit and reſt his Army in the Winter there; but becauſe the Dauphin was hovering about with ſome ſmall Forces, he thought it convenient to offer him ſome Propoſitions of Agreement, or to decide the Quarrel with him by ſingle Combat, (u) offering to ſtay eight Days for him about Harfleur, which if he refuſed, it would be a means to prevent his Attempt upon them in their Paſſage, but the Dauphin giving him no anſwer either way, the King began his March without delay to Callis, leaſt the Bridges ſhould be broken down, and ſo they muſt encounter many Difficulties to get thither, but could not be time enough to avoid it; for the French King having Intelligence of his Succeſs before Harfleur, and his Deſign to Winter his Army at Callis, gathered a conſiderable Body of Men and ſent them down under the Command of the Dauphin and Duke of Aquitain to obſtruct their Paſſage, who broke down the Bridges, deſtroying the Forrage in the Field, and carried all the Proviſions into the Walled Towns whether the People betook themſelves alſo for ſafety. King Henry either not knowing what was done by the French, or elſe ſeeing it neceſſary to perſiſt in his Deſign, kept on his March intending to paſs the Some at Blandretaquef, the Ford which King Edward the Third had waded over with his Army to the Battel of Criſſy, but found it ſtaked and made impaſſable; whereupon he march'd up the River further and reſolved to aſcend up to the very Fountains of it if they could not get over before.

Engliſh paſs the Some.

The uſual Bridges and Paſſages over it he tried, but found them either deſtroy'd or ſo ſtrongly guarded that he dare not force his Way with ſo weak an Army: For theſe Reaſons he paſſed by Port-Remy, Amiens, Corby and Bowes, but at length through the Negligence of the Garriſon at St. Quintins he found a ſafe Paſſage near Perons. In this tedious Journey they encounter'd many Difficulties, partly thro' want of Victuals, and partly from the Aſſaults of the Enemies from their Garriſons; for tho' the King's great Juſtice in reſtraining his Army from Pillaging, and in hanging one that had ſtoln a Pix out of a Church, procured him great Love from the People of the Country through which his Army paſſed, and made them venture to ſell 'em Proviſions contrary to their own King's Prohibition; yet the ſmall Supply that came that Way was not ſufficient for ſo great a Number to ſubſiſt upon. The Garriſons alſo at Ew and Corbay aſſaulted them Weak and Weary, and tho' the former was repulſed back with the Loſs of a valiant Captain, (x) Lancelot Peirce, yet the other came upon them with ſo much Advantage, that they won the Standard of that part of the King's Forces which was commanded by the Earl of Stafford, (y) but were ſo bravely oppoſed, that the Standard was again recovered by a valiant Gentleman John Bromley, of Bromley in the County of Stafford, Eſquire, and the French driven into the Town. The Earl of Stafford like a Worthy Commander, ſenſible of the Brave Action in regaining his Standard, whoſe Loſs would have been ſo great a Diſgrace to him, gave the Valiant Gentleman for a Reward forty Pound a Year out of his Mannors and Lands in Staffordſhire, and by a Deed ſettled it upon him for Life.

King of France reſolves to fight King Henry and his Army, and ſend him a Defiance.

King Henry having thus gotten over the Some was reſolved to keep on his direct way to Callis, not attempting any thing by Arms, unleſs where it ſhould be neceſſary for their Defence, becauſe his Army was much leſſened by Sickneſs ſince he left Harfleur, and the Remainder was haraſſed and weakened by their long Marches and ſcanty Proviſions, and ſo he went on ſoftly and warily. But the King of France being very angry that the Engliſh had gotten over thoſe Difficulties which he thought inſuperable, and were in a fair way to get ſafe to their intended Reſt, called a great Council of his Nobility at Roan, of whom the Dauphin and Duke of Brittain were Chief, to conſult how to proceed further againſt the Engliſh, and it being at length determined to engage them to a pitch'd Battel, Mountjoy, King at Arms, was ſent to King Henry to defie him, and demand Battel on the Thurſday following, and for that End an Army under the Conſtable, the Lord de Albret, and the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon was ſent down to block up their Way. King Henry receiv'd the Herald very kindly, but not being willing to hazzard his Army which was unfit to fight, return'd this Anſwer, 'That 'he would keep his direct Road to Callis with-'out any Diſturbance to any Man, and if they 'ſhould hinder his Paſſage it ſhould be at their 'Peril, he and his Army would endeavour to 'make their Way, and leave the Iſſue to God. It is ſaid by ſome, that King Henry was ſo fearful of an Overthrow, when he ſaw the French on all ſides ſwarming about him, that he offer'd to reſign Harfleur, and reſtore all Damages done to it, if they would ſuffer him to paſs undiſturbed to Callis, but the French ſure of Victory

(t) He made all the Soldiers Priſoners of War, but ſuffered them to depart on their Paroles to render themſelves at Callis in the Winter, and pay their Ranſom which they did.

(u) He ſent him this Challenge on the 16th of September while he lay before Harfleur, which City was not taken till a Week afterwards.

(x) This Lancelot Peirce challeng'd any Engliſh Man to fight him. His Challenge was immediately accepted, and the Engliſh Man killed him; but before he died he gave his Adverſary a Wound that ſent him out of the World ſoon after him.

(y) Sir Hugh Stafford, Lord Bourchier.

rejected

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3.

rejected his Propoſals, as the French Hiſtorians relate, but ours deny the Story, as unbecoming Henry's great Spirit. After this Anſwer King Henry kept on his Way to a Village called Forcevile, and ſo by Cheve, Bonyers, and Bangy to Agincourt, October the 22d, in the County of St. Paul, where he had a certain Information that the French Army, which was ſix or ten times bigger than the Engliſh, the former being 60000 or more, and the latter but 15000 (z), and thoſe half ſtarved and tired with Travel, and many of them Sick and Diſeaſed, was ranged in order of Battel ready to fall on him if he lay ſtill, or block up all Ways if he preſſed forward. King Henry ſeeing the Battel unavoidable made the beſt Preparation ſo ſhort a time would give him leave, and knowing that the Strength of the French conſiſted in their Horſe, he ordered his Men to get every one a ſharp Stake ſhod at both ends with Iron, which being fixed in the Ground leaning forward might keep of the Horſe from ruſhing in upon his Foot (a). The Night before the Battel was to begin, King Henry having engaged them to ſtand up manfully in their own Defence and rather die than yield, they ſpent in Prayer and Confeſſion, but the French as ſecure of the Victory, paſſed it in Jollity and Mirth, Drinking and Gaming, in talking of the Victory they ſhould have, and parting the Priſoners. The next Day which was St. Criſpine's Feaſt, October the 25th, the Battel began about Ten a Clock. King Henry being ſenſible of the Advantage which the French had of him by their Multitude, pitch'd with the Town on his Back, and a River on the one ſide, and thick Hedges on the other of his Army that the French might not ſurround them, the Stakes being fixed on the Front of the Army to keep of the Horſe. The Vanguard he put under the Command of the Duke of York who deſired that Service; the main Body was led by the King himſelf, and the Rere-Guard by the Duke of Exeter. The French Army was led by the Flower of the Nobility of the Nation. The Vanguard was led by the Lord Albret, Conſtable of France, the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Ew and Richmond, the Marſhal Bouciqualt, the Lord Dampier, Admiral of France, with other Captains. The main Body by the Dukes of Barr and Alenzon, the Earls of Nevers, Vaudemont, Blamont, Salinges and Grant-pree, and the Rereward by the Earls of Marle, Damp-martin, Falconbrig and Lord Louray. The Earl of Vandoſme commanded one of the Wings, and Sir Guichard Dolphin the other. The Signal for the Battel being ſounded, the French ruſhed forward upon the Engliſh with their Horſe (b), and the Engliſh as they drew towards them overſhadowed them with Clouds of Arrows, which by their fall wounded their Men and diſorder'd their Horſe, who in their Confuſion not obſerving the Stakes fell upon them and were peirced with them to Death. The Dukes of Brabant and Alenzon broke in upon the Engliſh with a ſmall Party but were ſlain, the Duke of Alenzon and two of his Servants being ſlain by King Henry's own Hand (c). The Battel was hot and furious, and laſted three Hours, but at length the Victory fell to the Engliſh, who by their Courage had ſlain, taken or put to flight the whole French Army. In the Flight the Rere-guard of the French, which got off almoſt entire, ſet upon the King's Camp which was but ſlenderly guarded and pillaged it, taking the King's Crown, and a rich Sword ſet with Diamonds, and other precious Stones, which they carried in Triumph as if the Victory had been their. King Henry hearing a great cry in the Camp ſuppoſed that the French had been gotten together in a Body again, and ſeeing the King of Sicil (d) come in with ſome freſh Troops began to fear the Loſs of his new-gotten Victory, and immediately gave order to ſlay all the Priſoners except ſome of the greateſt Quality, leaſt they joined with the Enemy ſhould prove their Deſtruction, which was accordingly done, but this fear ſoon vaniſhed, for the King of Sicil drew off and would not fight after he ſaw the French Army routed, and ſo the King cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded about four a Clock in the Afternoon, and the Soldiers having plundered the Slain and Wounded retreated with the King to the Village they lay in the Night before, and refreſhed themſelves well with the Proviſions of the French Camp. The King himſelf ſenſible of the greatneſs of the Victory, which nothing but the Divine Power joining with ſuch ſmall Forces could have effected, called his Army together, and cauſed his Prelates and Chaplains in the moſt ſolemn Manner to give Thanks to God for it, ſinging this Pſalm, When Iſrael came out of Egypt, and making every one to kneel on the Earth when they came to theſe Words, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy Name, give the Praiſe, and then adding Te Deum and other Anthems, gave moſt devout Thanks and Praiſe to God. This Victory was obtain'd with little or no Loſs to the Engliſh, for they loſt only the Duke of York, Earl of Suffolk, with two or three Gentlemen more, and 26 Soldiers, or as the French Hiſtorians themſelves relate, (e) 3 or 400. But the French loſt 10000, among whom were the Lord Albert, the Conſtable, the Dukes of Barr, Brabant and Alenzon, the Marſhal, Admiral, and Maſter of the Horſe, with 11 Counts and 18 great Lords, beſides a great Number of Eſquires and Gentlemen, and 1500 Priſoners; (f) among whom were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Ew and Richmond, Count de Vendoſme, Son of the late Duke of Bretagne by

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3.

The Battel of Agincourt, with the Succeſs and Conſequents of it.

A Party of French plunder the Engliſh Camp.

The Slain on both ſides.

(z) Harding, an Engliſh Hiſtorian who was preſent at the Battel ſays, King Henry's Army conſiſted of no more than 9000 Men. Walſingham reports, that they were but 8000. And the French Hiſtorians do not pretend that they were above 25000. Whereas the ſame Authors, as well Engliſh as French agree, that the Conſtable's Army conſiſted of 150, or at leaſt 140000 Men. Enguerant Monſtrelet affirms, the Horſe were 150000.

(a) King Henry ſent out Captain David Gam, Commander of a Company of Welſh Men to view the Enemy, who when he returned ſaid. May it it pleaſe you my Leige, There are enough to be killed, enough to be taken Priſoners, and enough to run away. Dr. Parnel's Chron.

(b) Sir Toomas Erpingham and the Engliſh Archers began the Charge.

(c) He was going to ſurrender himſelf Priſoner to King Henry, but before the King could take his Gage, he was killed by his Guards. Monſtrelet

(d) The Succours were brought by the Duke of Bretagne and the Mareſchal Louvigry. Fenin.

(e) The French Hiſtorians, Monſtrelet and de Fenin ſay the contrary, the former, that the Engliſh loſt 1700 Men, the latter 4 or 500, which is moſt likely. Caxton affirms, there were but 26 Engliſh Soldiers killed, and Walſingham ſays not many more, viz. the Duke of York, the Earl of Suffolk, four Knights, one Eſquire, and twenty eight common Soldiers. Of the French, Le Fevre, who was in the Battel, writes, that 10000 were killed, of which 100 were Princes and 7000 Nobles.

(f) The Priſoners according to Juvenal des Urſins were 14000, and all Authors agree, that they were as many as the Number of the Engliſh Army.

the

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3.

the Q. Regent of England, (g) and many other Perſons of Quality. The next Day after the Victory the French King ſent Mountjoy with four Heralds more to deſire leave to bury the Dead and to have the Number of the Priſoners, which the King readily granted. But the French themſelves had made them a miſerable Spectacle, by ſtripping them of all their Cloaths, which the Engliſh had not meddled with, (for they took only Money and rich Things) and leaving them all Naked. This odious Spectacle ſo moved the Earl of Charilois, Son to the Duke of Burgundy, that he buried 5800 in one piece of Ground at his own Charge, becauſe their Friends not knowing them neglected their Burial. The Biſhop of Eſquines a little after made the Ground into a Church-Yard in reſpect to the Bodies of ſo many Perſons laid there.

King Henry goes to Callis, and Duke of Burgundy puniſheth the French who plunder'd the Engliſh Camp.

The Fight being thus fortunately ended in favour of the Engliſh, King Henry having ordered the Slain to be decently buried went to ſee the Damage of his Camp, which tho' being conſiderable yet not to be recover'd, he reſolv'd to proceed with all Expedition in his Journey to Callis without any further Care about it. But the Duke of Burgundy would not ſo paſs it over, and conſidering that the Party who had plundered the Engliſh Camp, had cowardly deſerted the Army in danger, and by pillaging the Engliſh for their own Private Gain had been the Cauſe that their Braver Brethren who were taken Captive in the Fight had been kill'd in cool Blood, he determin'd to puniſh the chief Commanders of them very ſeverely; but his Son the Earl of Charilois being made their Friend by the Rich Preſent of King Henry's Sword, ſo effectually interceded with his Father they they were all ſpared. King Henry after two Days march arrived at Callis, carrying with him the Bodies of the Duke of York and Earl of Suffolk to be interred in England, and immediately diſpatched a Meſſenger over into England to the Queen Regent with the News of this Signal Victory, which filled the Nation with an univerſal Joy; for the Te Deum was not only ſung in all Churches of the Nation, but a mighty Proceſſion of the Queen, Nobility and Clergy, Mayor, Aldermen and Companies of London was celebrated with extraordinary Solemnity and Devotion from St. Pauls to Weſtminſter, where they all made a great Oblation at St. Edward's Shrine, and then returned in Triumph. The King himſelf remain'd at Callis a while intending to have purſued this Victory cloſely had the Seaſon permitted him, but it proving very wet and unfit for Warlike Enterprizes, he thought it convenient to look after his Affairs in England, and taking Ship November the 16th, he arrived at Dover, November the 23d, having had a very troubleſome and dangerous Paſſage. He brought with him his Chief French Priſoners, and was received with Proceſſions and Triumphal Joy by his Nobles and other Subjects; and being by them conducted towards London, was met by the Mayor, Aldermen and Clergy of that City with like Proceſſions, (h) and Atteſtations of Joy at St. Thomas of Waterings: But the King himſelf ſeem'd very little taken with theſe outward Ceremonies, and forbad that any Songs or Ballads ſhould be made of this Victory, becauſe it was ſolely from God, and he would have him have all the Honour of it. The Citizens made the King a Preſent of 1000 l. in Gold in two Baſons of equal Value, which the King receiv'd of them with a cheerful Reſentment of their Love and Reſpect to him, and ſo retreated to his Palace at Weſtminſter, where he made it his firſt Care to bury the Bodies of the Duke of York at Fodringhey in Northamptonſhire, and of the Earl of Suffolk at Ewhelm in Oxfordſhire; (i) their Exequies being devoutly perform'd by the Archbiſhops and moſt of the Biſhops in St. Paul's Church by the King's Order. But the good Fortune of this Battel was not more joyfully received by the Engliſh Court and People than the bad Fate of it was lamented by the French, for the King and his Court were under heavy Perplexities, and the Dauphin of Viennois the Heir of the Crown took it ſo grievouſly, that he ſoon after died of mere Sorrow. Great Care was alſo taken to chooſe new Officers into the Places of ſuch as were either ſlain, or had behaved themſelves ſo, as by their Cowardize to be unworthy of future Employment. All which ſhewed under what Fears and Diſtractions the French were in after this Victory; which though they thought to recover by freſh Forces and Officers, yet it was ſuch a Terror to them that they never dar'd to attempt any thing conſiderable after.

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3.

A. D. 1416.

The King being in England, the Earl of Dorſet, Governour of Harfleur having a ſtrong Body of Men under his Command, viz. 3000 Engliſh Men made an Inroad into Normandy almoſt as far as Roan where the King of France and his Court than lay, and got a great Booty of Money, Priſoners and Cattle; but it being heard at Roan the Earl of Arminack was ſent to purſue him with 5000 Horſe, who being newly made Conſtable was mighty deſirous to gain himſelf Reputation by this Exploit, and thereupon followed them very hotly till he had overtaken them. The Engliſh unable to reſiſt ſo ſtrong a Force, were forced to withdraw into an Orchard well fenced with Ditches and Banks for their Security with the Loſs of 300 of their Men and all their Prey. The French withdrew to Villemont, an adjoining Village that Night, and in the Morning purſued the Engliſh again as far as the Sand of Cheif de Caux, where ſetting upon them at a Diſadvantage by reaſon of an Hill that hinder'd them from aſſiſting each other, the Engliſh fell ſo fiercely upon them that they routed them wholly, and ſo got ſafely to Harfleur. The Conſtable was much blamed for his Raſhneſs and Unſkilfulneſs in this Exploit, and loſt more Honour by his laſt ill Conduct than he got by his firſt good Fortune, and the Engliſh became more terrible for their Courage and Hardineſs.

The Earl of Dorſet's Fight with the Earl of Arminack, Conſtable of France.

Triumphs and Thankſgivings in England for the Victory at Agincourt

This Year the Order of the Church-Service was changed throughout England from the Uſe of St. Paul to the Uſe of Sarum. On Candlemas-Day ſeven Dolphins were diſcovered playing in the River Thames, and four of them were taken.

Divers Accidents.

The King on Monday, March the 16th ſummon'd his Parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, and though he requir'd no Taxes in ſo great a War, yet he thought it neceſſary to ſummon his Great Council to ſettle Things well in his Abſence, which he did by making ſeveral Beneſi-

Third Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

(g) The Famous Marſhal Boucicault who had done great Things in Italy and the Eaſt was taken Priſoner in this Battel, and being carried to England died there two or three Years after.

(h) In this Proceſſion Stow ſays, the Prieſts brought forth the Relicks of ſeventy Saints.

(i) The Mannor of Ewhelm came to the Family of Suffolk by the Marriage of this Earl's Son, afterward created Duke of Suffolk, to Alice, Daughter of Thomas Chaucer, Eſq; Son of Jeoffrey Chaucer the Poet. Holinſhead, pag. 1236.

cial

A. D. 1416. Reg 3.

cial Acts for the common Good, viz. That a certain baſe Money, called Gally-half-pence brought hither from Genoa, and vented to the Damage of the People, ſhould not be hereafter uſed in any lawful Payment in England; That all Britons who were not Naturaliz'd and made Free of this Nation ſhould immediately depart out of it upon pain of Death, becauſe the Duke of Bretagne was confederate with the King of France againſt him; That all Proviſions, Licenſes, Acceptations or Pardons ſent into England by the Pope to diſturb or deprive any Perſon who is in the actual and legal Poſſeſſion of any Benefice, ſhall be ipſo facto void, and the Perſons that ſhall bring any ſuch Proviſions, and by them moleſt or diſturb any Incumbent ſhall ſuffer and incur the Puniſhments contain'd in the Statutes of Proviſors, to be inflicted by Proceſs of Præmunire facias; That the Clipping, Waſhing and Filing of the Current Money of the Land ſhall be adjudged Treaſon, and they who ſhall ſo Clip, File or Waſh the ſaid Coin ſhall ſuffer as Traytors. And laſtly. That Juſtices of the Peace ſhall Award a Capias to apprehend all ſuch Perſons, and impriſon them to be tried by the Judges of Aſſize who ſhould have Power to hear and determine all ſuch Matters: And then was the Parliament Prorogued becauſe of the Emperour's coming.

Reg. 4.

Sigiſmund the Emperor came into England.

In the beginning of May, Sigiſmund the Emperour, Couſin-German to King Henry, and a very Wiſe and Learned Prince, came into England out of a pious Deſign to make Peace between the King's of England and France. He had been before in France and brought over with him the Archbiſhop of Rhemes, an Agent for his Maſter the French King, who ſeem'd forward to conclude it. He was received at Callis honourably by the Earl of Warwick who was Governour there, and conveyed over to Dover in 30 great Ships. The King having Intelligence of his coming, ſent the Duke of Glouceſter with a large Train of the Nobility to receive and entertain him, yet ordering them to meet him on the Shore with their drawn Swords, and to demand of him the Cauſe and Reaſon of his coming, whether it were as a Mediator of a Peace only, and the King's Friend, or as an Emperour to claim England as a part of his Kingdom, if as the latter to reſiſt his Entrance, but if as the former to give him a kind Welcome? Which they exactly performed entring into the Water with their drawn Swords in their Hands. The Emperour with a Smile mildly replied. That he came as the King's Friend and to make a Peace, and was then honourably conducted to Shore by 'em, and from thence to London. The King met him in Perſon at Black-heath, May the 7th, and carried him through London to Weſtminſter, where he was lodged in the King's Palace.

Albert Duke of Holland came into England.

Albert, Duke of Holland came alſo about the ſame Time but ſtaid not long. The Emperour was very earneſt with the King for a Peace, and his Perſuaſions had almoſt wrought the King to a Compliance, but the French not giving over their Acts of Hoſtility while they knew Peace was in Agitation, but firſt falling upon the Engliſh about Roan, and then laying cloſe Siege to Harfleur both by Sea and Land, ſo incenſed the King of England, who by their Actions judged that they deſigned only to amuſe him with Propoſals of Peace till they could by Force reduce their Country, that he would not hearken to any further mention of it, but recalled his Ambaſſadors the Biſhop of Norwich and Sir Thomas Erpingham out of France, reſolving to proſecute the War with the utmoſt Vigour; whereupon the Emperour gave over further preſſing the Peace between France and the King, and entred into a firm League with K. Henry himſelf to this Effect, viz. That the Emperour and King of England their Heirs and Succeſſors would be Friends and Confederates to each other againſt all Perſons whatſoever (the Church of Rome and Pope for the Time being only excepted). 2. That neither they nor their Heirs or Succeſſors ſhould be in any Council or other Place where either of them his Heirs or Succeſſors ſhould ſuſtain any Damage in their Lands, Goods, Honour or Perſon. 3. That if either of them their Heirs or Succeſſors ſhould know of any Damage or Loſs that was like to befal or happen to each other, they ſhould give each other as ſpeedy Information of it as they could conveniently. 4. That either of them their Heirs and Succeſſors would uſe all lawful Means poſſible to advance the Honour and Intereſt of each other. 5. That neither of them would permit their Subjects to levy War againſt each other, and that it ſhall be lawful for the Subjects of both Nations to Traffick and Merchandize with each other without any Impediments. 6. That neither of 'em would wittingly receive and harbour, much leſs defend any Rebels or Traytors to them, but either reſign them up to the injur'd Prince or drive 'em out of their Realm. 7. That neither of them ſhould begin a War with any other Perſon but ſuch as they now were at War with, without the Conſent and Advice of each other, unleſs it were in caſe of neceſſary Defence of themſelves or their Subjects and Dominions. Laſtly, That it ſhould be lawful for both of them to proſecute the War againſt France to recover their Rights ſo as ſhould to them ſeem Expedient, and that they would afford each other Aſſiſtance in ſo doing. Theſe Conditions and Agreements were ſealed (k) October the 19th, 1416. and the Emperour having ſtay'd almoſt ſeven Months in England at the King's Charge, and being made a Knight of the Garter departed Home, and King Henry accompany'd him to Callis partly in Honour to him, and partly to look into the State of his Affairs on that ſide, where having taken his leave of the Emperour, and renew'd a League with the Duke of Burgundy for his Provinces of Flanders and Artois to continue to the Michaelmas Twelve-month following: He returned again into England to meet his Parliament, which had been adjourn'd till this Time for the Emperour's coming.

A. D. 1416. Reg. 4.

The Emperor makes Peace with King Henry, and the Articles of it.

The Duke of Bedford raiſes the Siege of Harfleur.

While the Emperour yet remain'd in England King Henry ſent his Navy under the Command of his Brother John Duke of Bedford to raiſe the Siege of Harfleur, which was ſecured and carried on by Sea by the French Fleet under the Command of the Viſcount of Narbon, who was aſſiſted by ſix large Genoa Gallies and ſeveral Carricks. The Duke zealous for the Honour of the King and Nation immediately paſſed over to Harfleur, and engaging with the French Navy, after a ſharp Fight obtain'd a ſignal Victory, taking three Genoa Carricks, and in them the Baſtard of Bourbon, Priſoner, the reſt being all ſunk or driven ſhatter'd into Brittain. The Earl of Arminack, Conſtable of France, who maintained the Siege by Land ſeeing the Engliſh Maſters (k) They were ſealed Auguſt the 15th, and confirmed in Parliament, October the 19th. The Emperour return'd to Callis, and was not accompanied, but follow'd by King Henry, who Embark'd at Sandwich, September the 4th, and arrived at Callis the ſame Day, the Emperour waiting on the Shore for his Landing.

at

A. D. 1416. Reg. 4.

at Sea, by which means the Beſieged would have ſuch Relief both of Men and Proviſion as would render it almoſt impoſſible to take it, immediately raiſed the Siege and marched to Paris. The News of this ſpeedy Deliverance of Harfleur being brought into England was aſtoniſhing to the Emperor, who heard of the Succeſs of the Engliſh Fleet before he could have imagin'd them there, and with Admiration ſaid to the King; 'Happy is the Nation who hath ſo good a King, 'but much more happier the King who hath 'ſuch Valiant and Obedient Subjects.

Fourth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

King Henry being return'd from Calis met his Parliament at Weſtminſter, and having ſhew'd his Lords and Commons by his Chancellor, Henry Beaufort, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, that tho' for the eaſe and quiet of his Subjects he had waved the purſuit of his Conqueſts which God had ſo Succeſsfully begun, and condeſcended to diſadvantageous Terms of Peace, yet the French had rejected all; and therefore ſince he could not give over the War with Honour, he hoped that they would give him ſuch Supplies of Money as were Neceſſary for ſo great an Undertaking, which he did not doubt but would bring in greater Advantages to the Nation in a ſhort time. The Parliament readily aſſented to his reaſonable Deſires, and having obtain'd his Aſſent to ſome Acts of Importance, 1. For puniſhing Maſters who give greater Wages to Servants than is allow'd by Statute. 2. For confining Merchant-Strangers to certain places of Reſidence in the Port-Towns. And 3. About granting Letters of Marque or Repriſal to Perſons that have been wrong'd by any Foreigners who are at Peace with the King; they gave him a liberal Supply of Money, a Fifteenth of the Laity, and two Tenths of the Clergy. After this Gift of Money the King appointed his Brother John, Duke of Bedford, by and with the Advice and Conſent of his Parliament, to be Regent of the Nation in his Abſence, and made Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorſet, in Conſideration of his many faithful Services, Duke of Exeter, allowing him a Thouſand Pound a Year out of his Treaſury, and giving him Forty Pound a Year out of his Free-farm Rents in and about the City of Exeter, and the Parliament confirm'd both to him, and was ſoon after diſolved and ſent into their Countries. In the Time of this Seſſion of Parliament a Beggar was hang'd for a barbarous Cruelty which he had uſed in diſmembring Children.

A. D. 1417.

King's Zeal for the Honour of his Clergy.

The King kept his Chriſtmas at Killingworth-Caſtle in Warwickſhire, where while he remain'd multitudes of Lampoons were ſcatter'd up and down the Nation againſt the Church-men, but eſpecially in Noble-Men's Houſes, and in great Towns, as St. Albans, Northampton and Reading. The King was very much diſpleaſed at it, being ſenſible that the next way to bring Religion it ſelf into Contempt and Diſuſe was to render the Miniſters contemptible, both which Things were equally abominable to him: Wherefore he uſed all Means to apprehend the Authors and Diſperſers of them, and was ſo Zealous to vindicate their Reputation, that he was call'd, The Prince of Prieſts: But the Clergy were ſo generally hated, that they found none ſo much their Friends as to diſcover their malicious Enemies, that they might receive their condign Puniſhment, neither for Love to the King nor hopes of Reward.

King Henry II. Expedition into France.

After Chriſtmas the King ſet himſelf with all Diligence to make Preparations for his Second Expedition into France, liſting great Numbers of Soldiers, who being invited by the Succeſs of the laſt Year offered themſelves willingly to his Service, and hiring ſeveral Ships to tranſport his Troops over into France. In the Spring he had gotten an Army of 25527 brave and luſty Men, and fifteen hundred Ships, but found his Charge ſo far to exceed the Supplies given him the laſt Parliament, that he was forced to borrow great Sums of Money to go on with his Deſign; for the Biſhop of Wincheſter lent him twenty Thouſand Pounds, for which he pawn'd his Crown to him, and the City of London lent him ten Thouſand Marks more, for which the King left them his Jewels as a Pledge. With this Money he put all Things in Readineſs for his Paſſage into France as ſoon as the Weather and Seas ſhould favour him. Theſe great Preparations in England being known in France, the French King endeavour'd to hinder his Paſſage by hiring many Ships and Carricks of Genoa, which being join'd to his own Navy, might not only infeſt the Engliſh Coaſts, but keep the King of England and his Army from Landing in his Dominions; but the King of England was neither ſo haſty nor careleſs as to neglect this Danger, and though he was oblig'd to ſtay a little the longer, yet he took care to remove this Obſtacle by ſending his Fleet under the Command of John Holland, Earl of Huntington (l) to ſcour the Narrow Seas of all French Veſſels, who accordingly did his Buſineſs ſo effectually, by taking ſome and ſinking others, that the King waiting ready at Southampton for the firſt Opportunity of ſailing over ſafely, took Shipping, and ſailing from Portſmouth July the 28th, landed in Normandy Auguſt the 1ſt, at Beville, and immediately upon the Shore made Forty-eight Knights, of the moſt valiant and beſt of his Captains, that he might encourage them by theſe Marks of Favour to greater Boldneſs in the future Attempts. The News of the Arrival of the Engliſh was no ſooner ſpread in Normandy, but all the People were affrighted, and fled either into the Wall'd Towns and Caſtles, or got them into Bretagne, leaving the Country open to the Will and Power of the Invaders, who having ſo much room left, ſoon made themſelves Maſters of the Towns and Cities.

A. D. 1417. Reg. 4.

Reg. 5.

Earl of Huntington clears the Seas for his Paſſage.

Several Caſtles and Towns taken by the Engliſh.

And the firſt Thing that the King undertook, after he had been at Harfleur and taken Notice of the Condition of it, was the Siege of Tonque-Caſtle, a Place not ſo Important in it ſelf (m); but becauſe the King would not leave it behind him to annoy or infeſt his Army when it ſhould be buſied about any thing greater. The Duke of Glouceſter managed the Siege with one part of the Army, and took it Auguſt the 9th, by Reſignation. He made Sir Robert Kirkby Captain of it. The Earl of Salisbury while this was a doing beſieged the Town and Caſtle of Ambervillers, and with like Succeſs became Maſter of it. The King gave him the Lordſhip of the Town and Territories adjoining, and to his Heirs; which Gift, tho' the firſt of that Nature, much raiſed the Hopes of the Nobles, and made them dare great Things in confidence, that from ſuch a Beneficent King the braveſt Attempts ſhould have the greateſt Rewards. The Army being a little fluſhed with theſe Victories, the King reſolved upon a greater Enterprize, which was the Siege of Caen, one of the ſtrongeſt and beſt Towns in Normandy, and in his March deſtroyed and plundered all the Villages in the Country leading up to it. The Town was well provided with Men, Ammunition and Proviſion, becauſe they expected nothing leſs except they would tamely ſubmit. In the Suburbs of Caen were ſeveral Goodly Churches and Monaſtries, which the King was very unwilling ſhould be deſtroyed, not only for Piety ſake, but becauſe they might be a Refuge for his Army, and therefore he ſent his Brother the Duke of Clarence to prevent the Deſtruction of them from the Inhabitants, who according to the uſual Methods of thoſe Times would ſet them on Fire upon the Approach of the Enemy, that they might not be an Harbour to them. The Duke of Clarence made all poſſible haſte with a 1000 Men to ſave them, but before he could get thither the Citizens had ſet them on Fire, yet by his Diligence he ſaved the Abby-Church of St. Stephens and one Nunnery. The King with the whole Army came before the Town, Auguſt the 17th, and began the Siege of it, caſting up high Banks and making deep Trenches to keep the Beſieged from ſallying out upon them; ſeveral Aſſaults he made againſt it, but to his own Loſs, wherefore he reſolved to truſt to his Mines, and therefore ſet all his Pioneers to Work, by whom he ſo undermined the Walls, that they ſtood upon a few Poſts only, ready to fall when there was Occaſion. The Beſieged he kept always awake with continual Alarms, that being weakened with much Watching they might be unable to make any conſiderable Reſiſtance. When all Things were ready for a general Aſſault, he ſent an Herald to them to offer them Mercy if they would reſign their Town; but they having Promiſes of Relief rejected all Propoſals of Peace, and ſo the King ſtorm'd the Place and took it by Force, September the 8th, ſlaying all Perſons that were in Arms againſt him. All the Arms that were in the Town he commanded to be brought into the Market-place, and all the chief Magiſtrates he ſummoned to the Senate-Houſe, and, ſuch as had been moſt Stubborn and Inflexible in reſiſting him, he cauſed to be put to Death, and the reſt he fined. The Fury of the Soldiers in plundering, inſulting and cruelly killing their Enemies, upon ſuch Succeſs, he ſo far reſtrained by his Care and Prudence, that he was not thought a more Fortunate than Wiſe Commander; yet he took ſuch Care to reward every one's Labour and Valour in the Siege by giving them a Share in the Plunder, that they were better contented with the King's Liberality than if they had been left to Carve for themſelves. The Caſtle ſtill held out after the Town was taken; but becauſe they perceived that no Relief came according as they were promiſed, and it was impoſſible for them to hold out long without it againſt ſo great an Army, they yielded, September the 20th, upon a Capitulation, that the Captain and Soldiers might ſafely depart whether they pleaſed. King Henry Peopled the Town with Engliſh. The Example of this City was ſo terrifying, that Fourteen other ſmaller Towns and Caſtles immediately reſigned to King Henry, and upon their taking an Oath of Fidelity to him he continued the Captains in their Offices, and ſuffer'd the Inhabitants to enjoy their Lands and Eſtates in as large or more ample manner as they had enjoyed them at any time before. Caen being then orderly ſettled under Engliſh Officers, viz. Sir Gilbert Umphreville, who was made Captain of the Town, Sir John Popham, Bailiff, and Sir Gilbert Talbot, Captain of the Caſtle, the King purſued his Victories, taking Courſy-Caſtle, Argenton, Alanzon, and Sees with little or no Oppoſition, and appointing Engliſh Captains over 'em, and then he returned to Caen, where he put in Execution his Proclamation which he had before put out, commanding all the Inhabitants of Normandy who were fled from their Habitations, to return again by a certain Day perfixed, or elſe he would give their Lands to his Soldiers; whereupon he conferred on the Duke of Clarence the Viſcounties of Auge, Orb, and Pontinz, with all the other Lands of ſuch as did not return according to his Command. While the King was thus buſied himſelf with part of his Army, the other parts whom he had ſent out under his ſeveral Commanders with equal Succeſs enlarged his Conqueſts: For the Earl of Warwick, and Lord Talbot took the Strong Caſtle of Dampfront, The Duke of Clarence took Courton, Barny, Bechelovin, Harcourt, Fantgernon, Crevener, Anvilliers and Froſny. The Duke of Glouceſter, with the Earl of March, and Lord Grey of Codnor took the whole Iſland of Conſtantine, except Cherburg, and placed Engliſh Captains in them.

(l) Son to the Duke of Exeter, who was Beheaded at Cicester, for the Duke of Aumarl's Plot.
(m) 'Twas a very ſtrong Caſtle in thoſe Days. Godw. p. 155.

A. D. 1417. Reg. 5.

Caen, a Chief Town in Normandy beſieged and taken by Storm.

The Caſtle of Caen ſurrendred.

A. D. 1417. Reg. 5.

While the Engliſh thus carried on their Victories, the Kingdom of France was unable to put any ſtop to the impetuous Current. The King himſelf was not fit to attempt any thing of that Nature through his Indiſpoſition of Mind, being afflicted with long and frequent Fits of a [illegible] which made him not able to govern, much leſs to act in ſuch Difficulties and Dangers. The Duke of Burgundy, who at that time was by the Queen's means conſtituted the Regent of the Kingdom in hatred to her Son Charles the Dauphin, was engaged ſo much upon her Account to execute a Female Revenge upon the Dauphin, that he could not attend to the more neceſſary War againſt Henry, who fought the Conqueſt of them both; though it may be thought, that if the Duke of Burgundy had been at Liberty, he would have made but a very feeble Reſiſtance againſt the King of England, with whom he was in League for the Preſervation of his own Countries in Flanders and Artois. The Dauphin, Charles was the only Perſon really ſollicitous for the Good of his Country, and was willing to have run the utmoſt Hazzards to have reſcued it from the Power of the Invader; but he had neither Friends nor Money to go on with his Deſign, till the Count De Arminack had adviſed him to ſeize upon his Mother's Jewels, Plate and Money, by which indeed he was enabled to raiſe ſome Forces for the Defence of the Kingdom, but thro' his Mother's Malice he was compell'd to make uſe of them another way, viz. to chaſtiſe her Fury and Burgundy's Folly, who to gain her Favour was forced to be the Inſtrument of her Revenge. While theſe Civil Broils were carried on by the French, King Henry was very diligent to improve this Advantage, and with wonderful Celerity run over Normandy, and laid ſuch a Foundation for the Conqueſt of France, that the moſt hearty Union and ſtrongeſt Forces could hardly have prevented it.

The State of France in this War.

But though the French themſelves thro' their Civil Diſcords did nothing againſt the Engliſh, yet they inſtigated their Old Friends the Scots to invade England, and that ſo powerfully as to draw the King himſelf, if it were poſſible, out of France; for they entred with a ſtrong Army, and beſieged the Caſtles of Barwick and Roxborough. And that they might have either the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh themſelves, or meet with a more faint Oppoſition, they brought along with them a Perſon whom they pretended to be King Richard, but to little Purpoſe; for though the Earl of Weſtmoreland, who was the Lord Warden of the Marches, was not then at Hand to defend the Borders, yet the Gentry of the Northern Parts were Active to raiſe the Forces of the Countries, Scots invade England with a ſtrong Army.

A. D. 1417. Reg. 5.

Countries, and the Duke of Exeter who had lately levy'd freſh Recruits for the King's Army in France, was then in thoſe Parts at Bridlington on a Pilgrimage, and caus'd his Forces to be march'd thither; ſo that they made an Army of an 100000 Men, who were muſtered on Baw-moor, in order to go againſt the Scots. The Archbiſhop himſelf, though unfit to Ride, yet to encourage the Soldiers march'd with them, being carried in a Chariot: But the Scots hearing of the Greatneſs of the Engliſh Army, which in the King's Abſence they thought impoſſible to be raiſed, departed in a Fright, and dar'd not ſtay their Approach, leaving the Sieges unperfect which they had begun.

Fifth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

About the Feaſt of St. Andrew, John, Duke of Bedford, then Regent of the Nation in the King's Abſence, did by his Order call a Parliament at Weſtminſter to repreſent to them the Charge of the War, and obtain further Supplies for carrying it on, which he obtain'd with no Difficulty, viz. a Fifteenth of the Laity and Tenth of the Clergy. Few or no Acts paſs'd this Seſſion: But the Tryal and Condemnation of the Lord Cobham made it as Remarkable as others, which was after this manner. The Lord Cobham having for four Years ſpace ſhifted from Place to Place to ſecure himſelf from his Enemies, but being for the moſt part in Wales, was at length diſcovered to the Lord Powis to be in a part of his Barony, call'd Powiſland. This Peer, a zealous Patriot of the Church, knowing how acceptable a piece of Service it would be to the King, as well as a Reward to himſelf, ſent a certain Number of Men to ſeize and apprehend him, but it proved ſo deſperate an Attempt, that they ran great Danger of their Lives; for the ſaid Lord who had been always bred up in War, and a Perſon of undaunted Courage ſtood upon his own Defence, and dangerouſly wounded ſeveral of the Aggreſſors, but being over-powered and diſabled by ſeveral Wounds he had receiv'd in the Conteſt, he was at length taken, and being carried up to London by the Lord Powis, was impriſon'd in the Tower for his Tryal: With him were taken ſeveral Books which ſeem'd to reflect ſome Diſgrace on the Way of Worſhip then in Uſe, viz. Maſs-Books with the Faces of the Saints and Heads ſcraped out, and their Names blotted out of the Litany, which were delivered to the Archbiſhop, and by his Means expoſed to the Sight of the Auditors at the Sermons of St. Paul's Croſs by the Preachers, who aggravated the Guilt of the Fact, and accuſed him and his Party of doing Injury to the Saints in Heaven. The People being thus wrought upon to think his Death deſerved, he was at length brought before the Parliament to be examin'd and try'd; and the former Sentence againſt him being read, which he did not much oppoſe, he was condemn'd to be hang'd and burnt, hanging in St. Giles's Fields, which Sentence he accordingly ſuffered upon Chriſtmas-Day. The Lord Powis who had been the chief Inſtrument in his Apprehenſion, had the particular Thanks of the Houſes given him for his Pains, and the Parliament took effectual Care to put all former Statutes againſt the Lollards in Execution. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury in his Convocation then ſitting made an Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitution, That all Suffragan-Biſhops and their Arch-Deacons ſhould twice a Year make a diligent Inquiſition after all Perſons ſuſpected of Hereſy; and for the moſt certain Diſcovery of all ſuch Perſons, their Favourers and Books, he ordered, that they ſhould Swear two or three Perſons in every Pariſh to give a diſtinct Information, if any ſuch Perſons inhabited in their Pariſhes; thus hoping to cruſh the whole Sect, now the Head and Leader of them was taken off. But yet notwithſtanding this Zeal ſhewed for the Doctrine of the Church, it is remarkable, that the ſame Parliament ſtood up very manfully againſt the Encroachments of the Pope: For whereas Pope Martin V. had ſent over into England to require a Tenth of the Clergy to carry on the War againſt the Bohemian Hereticks, they made an Act, That the Church and all Eſtates of the Realm of England ſhould enjoy their Ancient Liberties, which were not Repealed nor Repealable by the Common-Law, by which they chiefly intended to exclude the Pope's Juriſdiction.

The Lord Cobham's Condemnation and Death.

A. D. 1418.

In the time of the Regency of the Duke of Bedford, Queen Joan was accuſed of a Contrivance with her Confeſſor Fryer Randolph, to put the King to Death by Sorcery, and was thereupon apprehended with her Confeſſor, and ſhe was firſt Impriſon'd in the Caſtle of Leeds, and after in the Caſtle of Pemſey, and he in the Tower of London, where while he lay he happen'd to fall into an hot Diſpute with the Chaplain of St. Peter's Church in the ſaid Tower, and coming to Blows was ſlain by him. The Queen was not long after brought to her Tryal, was found innocent of the Crime laid to her Charge, and was thereupon releaſed from her Confinement (n).

Queen Joan accuſed of Treaſon.

While theſe Things were tranſacting in England, the King was buſied about the Siege of the Town and Caſtle of Falaiſe, which he had begun in the beginning of November. The Town made a brave Reſiſtance, but being reduced to great Straits for want of Proviſion, they deſired to Capitulate the 20th of December, and agreed, that they would reſign the Town to the King upon the 2d of January if they had no Relief from their King or the Dauphin, to which King Henry aſſented, and accordingly the Town was delivered up to him upon theſe Articles.

Falaiſe beſieged, and ſurrendred to King Henry upon certain Articles.

I. That all the Strangers that were in the Town ſhould be left to the King's Mercy, and the Engliſh to his Juſtice to be puniſhed for their Treaſon in fighting againſt their King, as they deſerved.

II. That all the Engliſh Priſoners in the Town ſhould be ſet at Liberty without any Ranſom, acquitted from the Oaths made to them whoſe Priſoners they were.

III. That no Goods ſhould be carry'd out of the Town, but the Soldiers ſhould depart without any Damage to their Horſes or Arms.

IV. That none of the Inhabitants of the Town ſhould receive the Perſons or Goods of any within the Caſtle, nor give any Relief in Victuals or Ammunition to them.

All which Articles were obſerved, and the King took Poſſeſſion of the Town: But the Caſtle ſtill held out; and tho' the King uſed all the Arts of War to reduce it, yet it kept him out a Month longer, and then beat a Parley, Feb. 2. and came to Conditions of Reſignation on Feb. 16. following, if they had no Relief come to them before that time from their King, Dauphin, or Earl of Armiack, which not receiving the Caſtle was put into the King's Hands by Sir Oliver Manny, Governour of the Caſtle, and all the Perſons in it reſigned themſelves to the King's (n) She was Convicted, and forfeited all her Lands and Goods by Parliament. She was alſo continu'd in Impriſonment the Term of Ten Years: After that Randolph was kill'd.

A. D. 1418. Reg. 5.

Mercy, who had promiſed them not to damnifie them in Life or Goods, and accordingly they were all diſmiſſed and ſent away free, only Sir Oliver Manny was detain'd till the Caſtle was repair'd at his Charge. Falaiſe being thus conquered, the King divided his Army into three Parts, and ſent them out under the Conduct of the Dukes of Glouceſter and Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick, to take the leſſer Towns in his Way to a greater Attempt which he deſign'd ſhortly to Enterprize, which was the Siege of Roan, the Chief City of Normandy, with which all the Country muſt be his.

Reg. 6.

A Riot in St. Dunſtan's Church on Eaſter Day.

On Eaſter Day in the Afternoon in St. Dunſtan's Church in the Eaſt, in Sermon time, happen'd ſuch a terrible Example of Female Pride as no Hiſtory can match. The Ladies of the Lord Strange and Sir John Truſſel, two Women of high Spirits and implacable Hatred one to another, met at the Sermon, and being in the ſame Pew vyed ſo eagerly for Superiority (tho' in that place Humility had been the greateſt Sign of Gentility) that thro' their rude Behaviour one to another they cauſed their Husbands to engage in their Quarrel, and draw their Swords to revenge the Diſgrace done to each other's Wife. The Congregation was much alarm'd at this impious Fray, and ſeveral Perſons who were much troubled at the unſeaſonable Diſturbance of the Publick Devotion of that Day, in which moſt of the People had receiv'd the Sacrament, beſtirred themſelves much to appeaſe their Fury and part them, but all in vain. Theſe incenſed Gentlemen would not hearken to any Advice, but looked upon them who ſought to pacifie them as their Enemies, and wounded ſeveral of them, and killed one Thomas Petwarden a Fiſhmonger, dwelling at Sprat's Key. But at length they were both ſeized for this Fact and impriſon'd in the Counter in the Poultrey. The Archbiſhop having an Account of this Notorious Miſdemeanour, excommunicated the Offenders both in St. Paul's Church, and in all the other Pariſh-Churches of London, and ſuſpended the Church wherein it was done from all Holy Services as defiled with Blood, and that a due Penance might be inflicted upon the Authors of it, ſat in St. Magnus Church, April the 21ſt, upon an Inquiſition to examine who were the Perſons chiefly concern'd in it. The Lords Strange and his Wife upon full hearing were prov'd the Delinquents, and for this Prophane Act injoyned this following Penance, viz. That on May the 1ſt, all their Servants ſhould go before the Parſon of St. Dunſtan's in their Shirts from St. Paul's to his Church, the Lord and Lady following him, the former bare headed, and the latter bare-footed, Renald Kenwood the Arch-Deacon of London following them: That at the Conſecration of the Church (which they had prophaned and polluted) the Lady ſhould fill all the Veſſels with Water, and offer an Ornament of Ten Pound Value to the Altar, and her Huſband a Pix of Five Pound Value, which being done accordingly by way of a Satisfactory Penance they were abſolved. The Murther of Thomas Pedwarden in this Examination ſeems not to have been regarded, becauſe there was no Proſecutor; for the Lord Strange had made his Widow a large Satisfaction, and ſo eſcaped the Puniſhment of his Crime.

About this Time the general Council of Conſtance broke up having ſat three Years: In it the three Antipopes were all depoſed, and Otho Colonna was choſen Pope by the Name of Martin V. Richard Clifford, Biſhop of London (o) was firſt nominated for Pope by the Committee appointed by the Council for the Election, for as all the Engliſh Clergy were reputed among the moſt Eminent for Learning, ſo none was thought fitter for Pope than one of them. But the Biſhop named, through Modeſty and other Conſiderations, put off the Dignity to the Perſon who was firſt named by him and after choſen. The Prior of St. John ſupported the Triple Crown at his Inſtalment and Coronation. By this Council Wickliff's Books were condemn'd for Heretical; John Huſſe, and Jerom of Prague (tho' they had the Emperour Sigiſmund's Letters of ſafe Conduct) were accuſed, condemn'd and burnt for Hereſie, notwithſtanding the many Petitions ſent by the Bohemians to the Council to beg their Lives, and they were much lamented by them. St. Bridgit was Canoniz'd, and England accounted one of the Five chief Nations of Europe and reckon'd before Spain.

A. D. 1418. Reg. 6.

Normandy being almoſt all come into the Pow[illegible]er of the Engliſh, the Lawful Proprietors of [illegible] the King reſolv'd upon the compleat Co[illegible] of that whole Country, and thereupon [illegible] Duke of Glouceſter to beſiege Cherbu[illegible] a [illegible]rable Port and a ſtrong Town in [illegible] ſtantine, while his Recruits wi[illegible] for into England of 15000 M[illegible] with which he intended to Beſiege Roan. Cherburg being very well provided for a ſiege which they expected made a ſtrong and vahant Reſiſtance; and tho' the Engliſh by their Batteries, frequent Aſſaults, Mines and other Warlike Devices annoy'd the Beſieged, and fought an Entrance into it, yet they made ſuch a good Defence, that they kept them out, till at length they were forced by Famine more than the Sword to Condition to deliver up the Town to the King of England if no Relief was ſent to them within Sixty Days, which they did not doubt of, becauſe the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy, who had hitherto ſpent that Time and Force one againſt another, which ſhould have been employ'd againſt the Invading Enemy, were made Friends by the Interceſſion of the Pope and Cardinals, and were at Liberty to mind the Nation's Intereſt better: But their Hopes and well-grounded Expectations proved in vain, and they were obliged to ſurrender their Town and Caſtle the laſt Day of November to the Duke, who made the Lord Gray of Codnor the King's Lieu[illegible] there, but dying ſoon after, Sir Walter Hungerford ſucceeded him. While theſe Things were doing at Cherburg the King receiv'd his Recruits out of England, and ſoon after ſet forward to Beſiege Roan, taking ſome ſmaller Fortreſſes in his Way, viz. Louviers, and Pont de Larche, which ſtanding on each ſide the Seine was with ſome Difficulty encompaſſed: But the King by an ingenious Device of Wicker-boats laid over the River begirt it ſo cloſely that they were forced to ſurrender it within Fifteen Days. (p) From hence the King with all his Forces march'd to Roan, and ſat down before it, July the 30th. The Citizens who had long expected this woful Day, had made as ſtrong a Proviſion as was poſſible, for they had train'd 15000 of their Body in Arms, and had got a 1000 choice Soldiers from the Duke of Burgundy; they had laid into the Town Ten Months Proviſion, and burnt the Suburbs that they might not be an Harbour or Relief to their Enemies. The King of England

Roan beſieg'd, and after a long Siege ſurrendred.

(o) The Biſhop of Wincheſter, Henry Beaufort was nominated before him. Godw. p. 147.
(p) The Siege laſted Three Weeks. Monſtrelet.

being

A. D. 1418. Reg. 6.

being come before the Town ſummon'd the Inhabitants to ſurrender the Keys to him by Windſor the Herald; but they gave him this reſolute Anſwer, That they had received none of him, and therefore would deliver up none to him, and thereupon made a briſk Sally out of the Town upon the King's Forces, but were driven back again with the Loſs of thirty of their Men. The King after this made many Aſſaults upon the Town, but to little or no Purpoſe; for the Citizens were very Numerous, being above 200000 Men, and behav'd themſelves with ſo much Boldneſs and Valour (for they had ſworn never to reſign the City to the Engliſh ſo long as they could hold their Swords in their Hands) that the Beſiegers could get no Advantage of them; wherefore it was thought the moſt prudent Courſe to block up all Avenues into the City and ſtarve them, which their great Number made them liable to the ſooner, and to that end the Engliſh Navy which was made up of 100 Sail of Ships, was brought up the Seine to hinder all Relief by Water, and certain Ships ſent by the King of Portugal to aſſiſt the King were laid at the Seien's Mouth to prevent all acceſs up the River to them. The Lord (q) Kilmain alſo came out of Ireland with 1600 Iriſh Men well Arm'd and Diſciplin'd to help the King in this Siege, and they were very Serviceable to the Engliſh in the Blockade; for by the help of theſe Men he kept the City ſo cloſely Beſieg'd, that there were no Avenues poſſible to it. While the King lay idle and without Action about the Town, he ſent the Earl of Warwick to ſummons Caudebec, and Fourteen other Fortreſſes which lay at a ſmall Diſtance round about, to ſurrender to him, but they anſwer'd him, That they would follow the Fate of Roan, and would reſign quietly if that City were taken without Relief, which the King was contented to yield to, becauſe he could not well ſpare ſufficient Forces to ſubdue them from Roan, and ſo much the rather, becauſe the Duke of Burgundy had promiſed the Inhabitants to raiſe the Siege. This made the King not only to keep his Army together, but to caſt up a Trench round about it, and fill it with Spikes that the French might not Surprize them or remove the Siege. The Duke of Burgundy either not able to attempt ſo great a Matter, or elſe deſpairing of Succeſs did not undertake it, but only ſent his Soldiers to annoy the Engliſh Conqueſts at Kilbeuf, Eureux and Laviers, where they were with no great Difficulty repulſed by the Engliſh Garriſons. About December, which was full four Months after the Siege was begun, the City of Roan began to be much preſſed for Victuals, and put out of their Gates many uſeleſs People who conſumed their Proviſions, but did no good in the Defence of the Place, and they miſerably periſhed under the Walls, becauſe the King of England would not ſuffer them to paſs through the Army, yet in honour to Chriſt he gave them Relief upon the Day of his Nativity. The Inhabitants of the Town, notwithſtanding this Eaſe of their uſeleſs Brethren, yet underwent by Chriſtmas ſo great a want of Corn and other Food, that they were forced to eat Dogs, Cats, Horſes, Rats and Mice, and drink Vinegar; yet they held out ſo long, that there died above 50000 of Famine, and had not at laſt yielded had there been any poſſibility of Relief; but being ſorely Oppreſſed with Famine they came to a Parley upon New-Years-Day, and after ſeveral Meetings for Eight Days together, nothing being concluded, the People of the Town were ſo enrag'd with the Governour and Burgeſſes, becauſe they did not yield to the King of England's Demands, that they threatned to ſlay 'em and deliver up the City to his Mercy unleſs they did it ſpeedily: Whereupon they deſiring another Meeting, it was fully agreed and accorded,

A. D. 1419. Reg. 6.

Roan ſurrendred upon Articles.

I. That the City and Caſtle of Roan ſhould be deliver'd up to the King of England, at any time after Jan. 19. if no Relief came to them before, upon his Demand.

II. That all the Captains and People whatſoever, being and dwelling within the ſaid Town and Caſtle, ſhould be left entirely to the Mercy of the ſaid King.

III. That they ſhould pay to the ſaid King 300000 Scutes of Gold, of which every two Scutes ſhould be worth an Engliſh Noble.

IV. That every Soldier and Stranger being in the ſaid Town or Caſtle, ſhould ſwear upon the Evangeliſts before their Departure, not to bear Arms againſt the King of England in any Place whatſoever before the Firſt of January next enſuing.

V. That the Inhabitants of the Town ſhould receive the Poor People lying in the Ditches about it to their Habitations, and allow 'em ſufficient Proviſion till Jan. 19.

Theſe Articles with others of leſs Importance were ſealed, Jan. 16. and on the 20th the King entred the City in a moſt Triumphant manner. The Clergy of the City with Forty Croſſes, and Burgers meeting him to welcome him, by whom he was conducted to the Cathedral Church of our Lady to give ſolemn Thanks for the Conqueſt of it. Then the King went to the Caſtle to receive the Homages of the Burgeſſes, and having made Proclamation, that all Perſons that would ſwear Allegiance to him ſhould enjoy their Lands and Eſtates, many ſubmitted to him, and he confirm'd all their Liberties and Properties and Priviledges to them. The Captain of the Town Alain Blanchart was beheaded, the Garriſon was pillag'd and put out of the Town. Guy de Boutellier, Captain-General of the City-Forces ſubmitted to King Henry, and had his Eſtate reſtor'd, and a Place given him under the Duke of Glouceſter. Thus was Roan again in the Power of the Engliſh, after the French had been Maſters of it 215 Years, and King Henry having re-edified the Caſtle and Walls, and built another ſtrong Tower to keep the Towns-men in their Obedience, made it the Chief Chamber in Normandy, and order'd his Treaſury, Mint and Exchequer to be ſettled there at the Suit of the Biſhops and Abbots.

Caudebec and other Towns promiſe to ſurrender if Roan were taken.

Other Places taken, and ſome Overtures of Peace made by the Duke of Burgundy and Dauphin.

After the Surrender of Roan the ſeveral Caſtles which had agreed to reſign upon that Surrender, yielded themſelves up to King Henry, and he ſent out his Captains to take in others, as Caſtle-Galliard, Vernon, Nantes, Baudmont, and many others, the King himſelf remaining ſtill at Roan. The Duke of Burgundy (who rul'd all under the King of France and was upon that account hated by the Dauphin, tho' the outward Signs of Enmity were laid aſide) ſeeing the Current of King Henry's Fortune to be irreſiſtible, deſir'd a Conference with him to eſtabliſh a Peace between the Two Realms, and accordingly a Meeting for them was appointed at Melun and agreed on; but it prov'd nothing but a complimental Enterview, for they came to no Concluſion, becauſe the Demands of the King of England were thought too unreaſonable to be comply'd with, whereupon they parted with ſome Heat: King Henry telling the Duke, That

A. D. 1419.

(q) The Prior of Kilmahain.

he

A. D. 1419. Reg. 6.

he would have his Demands or he would drive them all out of France: And the Duke replying, That he should be weary of it first, and thereupon entertain'd Resolutions to come to a Reconciliation with the Dauphin, that by their united Forces they might put some stop to his Victories. This Meeting enflam'd K. Henry's Courage, and with fresh Vigour he prosecuted the War, for he immediately surpriz'd Pontboise and got the Town without Resistance; for the Captain Lisle Adam fled with all the Inhabitants, the English having scal'd the Walls and let in 3000 upon them before they could be provided to oppose them. The News of this Conquest being carried to Paris so terrify'd the King, Queen, and Duke of Burgundy that they fled from Paris to Troyes in Champaigne, leaving that City under the Command of the Count de St. Paul, and the Chancellor Eustace de Laitre. About Candlemas the King left Roan and went to Eureux, where the Dauphin profered him a Meeting at Dreux to make a Peace, but disappointed the King, so that in great Displeasure he return'd to Eureux, and sent out of the Earl of Warwick to besiege La Roche-guion, which being taken Apr. 6. the King gave the Command of it to Sir Guy Butler, the Duke of Exeter to Castle-Galliard, and the Duke of Gloucester to Very, which he obtain'd with the Castle, May 13. The Duke of Clarence won Gisors, and the Earl of Huntington burnt Priaux, Breteuil, Clermont and the Castle of Vendueil, by all which Conquests the English over-ran all the Country about Chartres, and brought the French into great Distress, which was to all considering Men among 'em the more Insupportable, because there appear'd no Hopes of Recovery.

Reg. 7.

King Henry aims to get Paris.

King Henry having now made great Progress into the Country began to cast his Eye upon Paris, which being the Metropolis of the Nation would be a certain Means to gain the whole, if he could become Master of it, and to that end sent out his Army under the Duke of Clarence to subdue the little Towns that lay in his Passage, as St. Germans-en-Lay, Meulan, Montjoy and many others, by which having clear'd his Way, he sent the Duke of Clarence to take a View of that City, and tho' he spent two Days in surveying the Walls of it, yet none appear'd against him, they were all so terrified at the Approach of the English. But the more prudent and grave Persons seeing their Danger, and considering that the Fate of France depended upon the Welfare of that City, entred into a Consultation how to secure themselves and save their Nation: And since a Peace had lately been proclaim'd between the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy in their City and Amiens, they endeavoured by all means to draw them to unite their Forces that they might rescue the Kingdom from the Power of the Conquerer; for tho' the English had under their Valiant King got no small part of their Country, yet it was chiefly thro' the civil Dissentions of the Heads and Governours of their Nation. They were still strong enough to recover all if they could bring their Leaders to an hearty Union, which they thought it no hard Matter to do by uniting their two Heads together: And to this End by much Labour and Intercession with those two great Persons they brought them to an Interview at Monstreausur-fault-yonne. The Dauphin here not forgetting the Wrongs which he had had from the Duke of Burgundy, whose present Greatness was built upon his Ruins, and was thought as well by others as himself to tend much to his Dishersion, believ'd this a seasonable time to vindicate his own Title and Right to the Crown. He reproach'd him for usurping that Authority which was properly belonging to himself, charging him with breach of Promise in not withdrawing his Garrisons agreed upon to be remov'd by their League of Amity, and continuing the Civil War. The Duke knowing this no seasonable Time for Justification, least it should make a Breach, humbled himself on his Knees to the Dauphin, and made a modest Excuse for his Actions, hoping to pacifie him by a mild Answer and so unite for the Nation's Good; but while he remain'd on his Knees his Sword entangling in his Legs, he laid his Hand upon it to remove it, which the Dauphin's Followers observing immediately cry'd out, Do you draw your Sword upon the Dauphin? At which Words Tanneguy Duchastel, a Knight in great Favour with the [illegible] struck him with his Battle-Ax and cut off his Chin, and others encourag'd by his Example fell upon him with their Swords and kill'd him. This Fact made the Breach wider than before, and the Dauphin got himself a more zealous and furious Party of Enemies than ever, for the Queen was enraged for the Loss of her Favourite, and the Earl of Charlois of his Father, who being encourag'd to revenge his Death by her, [illegible] solv'd by all means to prosecute so barbarous a Murther, which was the more odious to all Men, because it was [illegible] the sacred Shew of Friendship [illegible] much to the Damage of the Publick [illegible] the Duke neglected his Guard to [illegible] the Defence of.

The French endeavour to unite the Dauphin and Burgundy to save Paris.

A. D. 1419. Reg. 7.

The Duke of Burgundy slain.

While the Union between the Duke of Burgundy and Dauphin was thus driving on, King Henry was very Active to compleat his Conquests, and strengthen himself against their conjoin'd Forces, like a wise Prince providing against the utmost Danger which could be suspected; for after he had taken several other Towns, as Vealquissin, Chaumont, Neufle and Dangu, he put strong Garrisons into them, and put them under the Command of such of his Captains as he knew most faithful to himself, most emulous of the English Honour, and most courageous in the most daring Attempts. Normandy which was now wholly under his Power unless Mount St. Michael, he was as careful to keep in their Obedience by putting their chief Towns into his best Friends Hands, viz. he made the Lord Bourchier his Lieutenant at Deep, the Earl of Warwick at Aumarl, Sir John Gedding at Cherburg, and others of like Fidelity in other Principal Towns. The King himself kept his Christmas at Roan, having a stout Army about him ready to oppose any Accidents or sudden Assaults. But when he saw that the desir'd Union between the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy was quite broken by the Murther of the latter, he than began to be secure against any present Resistance, and sent out part of his Army under the Earl of Salisbury to besiege Tresny, which resisted them courageously, but was at length surrendred up to him for the King's Use; the Earls of Marshal and Huntington, Sir John Green-Cornwal, Sir Philip Leech, and divers others to subdue the Country of Maine, where the Dauphin had a Garrison at Mens, and a strong Force in the adjoyning Territories: With these the English were encountred briskly, but after a sharp Battel became Conquerours, with the Slaughter of 5000 French Men, and taking 200 Prisoners, among whom was the Marshal de Rous, and dives other Persons of Eminency. The greatest part also of the Country came into their Power.

King Henry provides against the French Union.

A. D. 1420.

Maine subdued by the English.

These Successes following upon the former soon brought the Queen and Young Duke of Bur-

A. D. 1420. Reg. 7.

Queen of France and Duke of Burgundy reſolve to make a Peace with K. Henry.

Burgundy to a Reſolution in their Deſign, which was to revenge themſelves upon the Dauphin for the Murther of the old Duke of Burgundy his Father. Fortune had made Henry ſo much her unchangeable Favourite, that they judg'd it in vain to oppoſe the Current of his Victories. It ſeem'd to them to be an immutable Decree of the Fates, that France muſt be ſubject to him; and therefore they thought it much better to ſubmit upon the beſt Terms they could make, than ſpin out a little Time and come under the Conquerour's Will; for by this means the King might perhaps hold his Crown for Life (which was as much as he need deſire, the Dauphin being ſo undutiful and unworthy to Inherit) and the Blood of Thouſands of People be ſav'd which otherwiſe muſt neceſſarily periſh in the Quarrel. Wherefore it was fully reſolv'd and agreed upon by the Queen, Duke, and all their Party, who were then at Troyes in Champaign, that Ambaſſadours ſhould be ſent to the King of England to treat about a Peace for the good of both Sides, and Preſervation of the Kingdom, which was accordingly done preſently: But King Henry being often before deluded with the French Men's pretended Offers of Peace, would give no heed to their Propoſals, as being intended only to ſtop the Current of his Arms, which he would by no means ſuffer to be interrupted, and therefore ſent them away without an Anſwer according to their Deſires, and went on in his Conqueſts, which ſcarce a Day paſſed but he ſomething enlarg'd, and he never accepted but with a very thankful Heart to God the Giver of them. The Return of the French Ambaſſadours was very unacceptable at Troyes; but underſtanding that the former deluſive Tender made by the Dauphin and the Old Duke of Burgundy were the Cauſe of the King's Diſtruſt, and not any Averſeneſs in himſelf either from his Vain-glory or Succeſs, they diſpatch'd the ſame Embaſſadours back again to aſſure King Henry of the Queen and Duke of Burgundy's real Intentions, and their Willingneſs to come to a Peace as Honourable and Advantageous to him, as they deſir'd it ſhould be Safe to them. King Henry, hearing this, was not willing to be thought Implacable and Cruel; and tho' he came over into France to gain his Inheritance by Conqueſt, yet 'twould be much better to obtain it peaceably if it were poſſible, eſpecially ſince the Continuance of the Quarrel would cauſe the Effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian Blood on both Sides, began to liſten to their Propoſals, and ſending the Earl of Warwick and Biſhop of Rocheſter to the Duke of Burgundy to be better aſcertain'd in Matters, after Two or Three times paſſing backward and forward, and much Interceſſion made by the Biſhop of Arras, and other Perſons of Quality, they at length came to an Agreement on certain Articles upon Condition, That the French King and his Parliament or Aſſembly of Eſtates would aſſent to them, which could not be much doubted of ſince all Things at Court were managed by the Queen, the Duke of Burgundy and his Friends: However for Form ſake King Henry ſent a ſolemn Embaſſy to the Duke of Burgundy, ſufficiently Authorized to treat and conclude of all Matters then under Debate, who was to conduct 'em to Troyes in Champaigne, where the French King then was, to procure his Confirmation of them. The Perſons employ'd in this great Affair were the Duke of Exeter, the Earl of Salisbury, the Biſhop of Ely, Lord Fanhope, the Lord Fitz hugh, Sir John Robſert, and Sir Philip Hall, who arriv'd at Troyes, March 11. in the Company of the Duke of Burgundy, and after a few Days entering into Conſultation with the French Miniſters, it was agreed and concluded between them, that King Henry ſhould come to Troyes and marry the Lady Katherine, and after the Celebration of the Marriage a firm Peace, already concluded, and finiſh'd upon certain Articles, ſhould then be ſeal'd and fully ratified by both Kings, and all the Nobles of the Realm of France, and other Eſtates, as well Spiritual as Temporal, and alſo the Cities and Commonalties, Citizens and Burgeſſes that were at that Time ſubject to the French, the King ſhould take their Corporal Oath for the due and true Obſervation of them.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 7.

Reg. 8.

King Henry goes to Troyes to marry the Lady Katherine.

The Model of the Treaty being thus drawn up in the full Senſe and Purport of it, tho' not reduced to Form, the Embaſſadours for the King of England return'd again to their Maſter, leaving only Sir John Robſert behind to attend on the Princeſs Katherine, and gave him a full Account of what had paſſed, and how far they had gone in the Peace; with which King Henry, who was then at Roan, was ſo well contented, that he immediately gave Order for a ſpeedy Preparation for his going to Troyes; and all Things being ready, he began his Journey, May 8. He was accompany'd with his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, the Earls of Warwick, Saliſbury, Huntington, Ew, Tankervil and Longevil, with (r) 15000 Men of War. He went from Roan to Pontboiſe, and by St. Dennis to Charenton, where he paſſed the Bridge over the Seine, but left a ſtrong Detachment under the Command of Sir William Gaſcoigne to keep the Paſſage. Then entring Brie in Champaigne he beſieg'd and took the Town of Criſpy which was kept againſt him by the Dauphin's Party, hanging the Chief Governour, and carrying ſome others of the Principal Men Priſoners with him. From hence he paſſed by Provins and Nogent to Troyes. He was met by the Duke of Burgundy, and a great Number of the Nobility Two Leagues from the Town, and by them conducted to his Lodgings prepar'd for his Reception. He arriv'd, May 18. and after Two or Three Days reſt to refreſh himſelf, he went to viſit the French King and Queen and Princeſs Katherine, and within few Days being affianced to the Princeſs Katherine in St. Peter's Church, the Agreement before concluded by his Embaſſadours was alter'd in many Particulars, and then ſign'd and fully ratified, both Kings ſwearing upon the Holy Evangeliſts inviolably to obſerve and keep all the Conditions and Covenants therein Specified and Concluded. After this the Duke of Burgundy and the Nobles preſent took an Oath to King Henry, who by the Articles ſign'd was to have the Regency of France during the King's Life, and after him to enjoy the Soveraign Power of that Kingdom abſolutely for himſelf and Heirs, in this Form.

Peace concluded between King Henry and the French King.

Duke of Burgundy and Peers of France ſwear Allegiance to Henry.

Ego Philippus Burgundiæ Dux, &c. which is thus render'd into Engliſh: I Philip, Duke of Burgundy do ſwear upon the Holy Evangeliſts, for my ſelf and my Heirs, to Henry, King of England, and Regent of France (s) under King Charles, that We will humbly and faithfully obey King Henry in all Things which concern the Crown and Civil Government of France, and after the Death of King Charles our preſent Soveraign will be faithful and obedient Subjects to the ſaid King Henry and his Succeſſors for ever; nor will we receive or quietly ſubmit to any other King of France but King Henry and (r) Others ſay 1600. Godw. pag. 264.

(s) His Title was Regent and Heir of France. Ibid. 269.

his

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

his lawful Heirs; Neither will we be aiding, or enter into Council with, or conſent to any Perſons or Things, whereby the ſaid King Henry or his Succeſſors may have Damage in Life or Member; but if any ſuch Deſign come to our Knowledge, we will endeavour either by Letters or Meſſengers to diſcover the ſame to them, that they may moſt effectually provide againſt it. The ſame Oath did all the Biſhops and Peers of France then preſent take to King Henry, and then upon the Third (t) of June, being the Monday after Trinity Sunday, the Marriage between King Henry and the Princeſs Katherine was ſolemniz'd and compleated, and King Henry thereupon declar'd and proclaim'd Regent and Heir to the Crown of France. After theſe Things King Henry entertain'd the King, Queen, and all the Peers of France which had ſworn Allegiance to him, and attended his Nuptials, at a Magnificent Banquet, and at the Table declar'd, That as it had been the main Subject of his Labours and Endeavours to unite the Kingdom of France and England under One Government, which now by God's Providence he had effected, ſo it ſhould be his daily Care to rule them both with that Juſtice, and in that Order as may make them the Happieſt Monarchy upon Earth: And tho' I am an Engliſh Man born, yet much French Blood runs in my Veins, which with that freſh Alliance that I have to you by Marriage ſo inclines my Affections to you, that you may aſſure your ſelves of an equal Share of my Favours and Love as my natural Subjects of England; and ſo long as you defend my Right by your Aid and Aſſiſtance, you ſhall never fail of that Love and Defence which may be expected from your King, who like a Father of your Country will cheriſh and protect you as his Children. When the Banquet was ended the Kings and Queens tarry'd a few Days at Troyes, and then took their Journey to Paris, where they were receiv'd with outward Demonſtrations of Joy and Welcome, and the Engliſh were entertain'd with Feaſtings by the Pariſians.

King Henry Feaſts the French King and Peers, and promiſes his Care and Favour to them, as to his Subjects of England.

Peace being thus ſettled in both the Kingdoms of France and England to the general Satisfaction of the Subjects of both, it was thought neceſſary by King Henry that Copies of the Treaty thus made ſhould be fairly Written, and being ſent into every City and Market-Town in both Kingdoms be proclaim'd and openly publiſh'd to all Perſons; which Articles, becauſe they ſhew not only how honourable a Concluſion King Henry made of the War, and how very careful he was to ſatisfie his People in important Matters of State, but alſo the Right and Title which the Kings of England then had and ſtill have to the Crown of France, it is convenient to ſet them down all particularly in the Form that King Henry ſent them into England, and in which they were Publiſh'd in London, June 23. 1420.

The Articles of Peace between King Henry and the French King at large.

Henry by the Grace of God King of England, Heir and Regent of France, and Lord of Ireland, to all Chriſtian People, and all Our Loving Subjects.

WE being deſirous to have it kept in perpetual Remembrance, do hereby Notifie, Publiſh and Declare, That altho' there have been many Treaties of Peace between the Moſt Excellent Prince Charles, the preſent King of France, Our Father and Us, without any Good Effect; yet We conſidering the great Harms and Damages that have redounded, not only to the Subjects of both Realms of France and England, but to the Holy Church by the long Wars and Diviſions between them, have at length made and concluded a Peace with our ſaid Father in Manner and Form following, viz.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

I. That ſince by the Marriage of our dearly belov'd Queen Katherine, the above-mention'd Charles, King of France, and his Queen Iſabel are made Our Father and Mother, We will honour them as Our Father and Mother above all Kings and Princeſſes of the World.

II. That We will not diſturb or diſſeize, but quietly ſuffer the ſaid King and Queen Our Father and Mother to enjoy and hold the Crown and Royal Dignity of France, with all the Rights and Profits, Dignities and Prerogatives belonging to the ſame during their Natural Lives.

III. That the Lady Katherine Our Queen ſhould have and enjoy ſuch a Dower in England as the Queens of England in Times paſt were wont to receive, viz. Forty Thouſand Scutes yearly, of which every Two ſhall be in Value an Engliſh Noble.

IV. That the Annual Payment of the ſaid Forty Thouſand Scutes ſhall be ſecur'd to our ſaid Queen Katherine by the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, that it may be conſtantly and duly paid to her after Our Death, if Our ſaid Queen ſhall over-live Us.

V. That Our ſaid Queen Katherine if ſhe ſhall ſurvive Us, ſhall immediately after Our Death, have and receive for her Dower out of the Kingdom of France the Sum of Twenty Thouſand Franks yearly, of and from the Lands and Lordſhips that Blanch, Wife to Philip, the Grand-father of King Charles did hold and enjoy.

VI. That during the Life of King Charles, King Henry ſhall not aſſume the Title of King of France, and that the French King ſhall in Writings entitle him, Our Thrice Noble Son Henry, King of England, and Heir of France.

VII. That after the Death of King Charles Our ſaid Father, the Crown and Realm of France with all the Rights and Appurtenances thereof ſhall come, deſcend, and remain to Us and Our Heirs for ever.

VIII. That his Queen Iſabel Our Mother, in caſe ſhe ſhall ſurvive him, ſhall keep her Eſtate and Title, and all ſuch Rights and Revenues, as Blanch the Wife of Philip Our Grand-father enjoy'd and held.

IX. That ſince Our ſaid Father is unable thro' Sickneſs and various Diſtempers of Body to attend to the Government of his ſaid Realm of France, the Management and Diſpoſal of all publick Matters and Affairs in the ſaid Realm ſhall be inveſted in Us, with the Advice and Council of ſuch of the Peers of France as we ſhall think meet to conſult with, to whom it ſhall be Lawful for Us to join ſome of the Engliſh Nobility, if thought convenient.

X. That the ſaid King Henry as Regent of France, will labour and endeavour diligently and faithfully to manage the Government of the Realm of France in ſuch manner, as ſhall make moſt for the Honour of God, the Eſtabliſhment of Divine Worſhip, the Proſperity of Our ſaid Father and Mother, and common good of the People.

XI. That we will by Our Power cauſe that the Court of Parliament in France, ſhall retain and keep their accuſtom'd Soveraignty and Authority, in all Places ſubject to Our ſaid Father Charles now King of France.

XII. That we according to Our Power will Protect and Defend, all and every of the Peers, (t) The 30th of May. Ibid. 270.

Nobles,

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

Nobles, Cities, Towns, Bodies Corporate, and Single Perſons, now, or in Time to come ſubject to the King of France in all their Rights, Cuſtoms, Priviledges, Freedoms and Franchiſes belonging and due to them in all manner of Places ſubject to Our Father the King of France.

XIII. That we will diligently and carefully provide that Juſtice be adminiſtred, and equally diſtributed to all Perſons impartially in the ſaid Realm of France, according to the Rights, Laws and Cuſtoms of the ſaid Realm, and that We will preſerve Our ſaid Subjects in Tranquility and Peace, and defend them to the utmoſt of Our Power from the Violence and Oppreſſion of all their Enemies.

XIV. That We will according to the beſt of Our Skill and Judgment prefer no other Perſons to the Adminiſtration of Juſtice, or Offices of Truſt in the Government, but ſuch as are able and skilful in the Laws of the Realm, and of undoubted Integrity, that all Perſons may receive impartial Juſtice from them.

XV. That We will with all Our Might endeavour, as ſoon as conveniently may be, to reduce to the Obedience of Our ſaid Father, all Cities, Towns, Caſtles, Places, Countries and Perſons within the Realm of France, as are now Diſobedient and Rebels to Our ſaid Father, ſiding with the Dauphin and Earl of Armiack.

XVI. That for the more effectual Accompliſhment of this Our Deſign, it is Accorded and Agreed, That all the Nobles and other Eſtates of the Realm of France, as well Temporal as Spiritual, which are at this Day Obedient to Our ſaid Father, ſhall take this Oath following to Us.

1. That they ſhall all, and every One of them, in their ſeveral Places and Degrees, be Subject and Obedient to Us, having the Rule and Government of the Realm in all Our lawful Commands, and Impoſitions for the Common Profit.

2. That all the Peers and Nobles of the Realm of France, as well Spiritual as Temporal, as alſo the Citizens, Burgeſſes and Commons, ſhall and will keep and obſerve whatſoever concerneth them in their Degrees, in the Treaty made between Our Father and Us.

3. That, from and after the Death of Our ſaid Father King Charles, they will receive Us or Our Heirs, as their Sovereign and the very King of France, and that they will not be in Council with, nor conſent to, or help any that ſhall conſpire againſt Us, our Throne or Dignity, but if they know of any ſuch Perſons ſhall oppoſe it according to their Powers, and diſcover it as ſoon as they can to Us, that we may prevent it.

4. That all manner of Conqueſts that ſhall be made upon the ſaid Rebels and diſobedient Perſons (except it be in the Dutchy of Normandy) ſhall be for the Profit of Our ſaid Father Charles, but that all manner of Lands and Lordſhips of Perſons who have ſworn, or ſhall ſwear to obey Our ſaid Father and Us, and keep the Articles of this preſent League, ſhall be reſtor'd to the ſaid Perſons again in all our Conqueſts.

XVII. That all Eccleſiaſtical Perſons who are Benefic'd in the Dutchy of Normandy, or in any other Places ſubject to our Father the King of France, who ſhall favour the Party of the Duke of Burgundy, and ſwear to keep this preſent Treaty, ſhall peaceably enjoy their Benefices and Preferments in Holy Church, as well in Normandy as elſewhere.

XVIII. That all manner of Churches, Univerſities, Studies General, and all Colleges of Studies, and other Colleges of Holy Church, being in Places ſubject to our Father, or in the Dutchy of Normandy, ſhall enjoy their Rights and Poſſeſſions, Rents, Prerogatives, Liberties and Franchiſes belonging or due to them in any wiſe in the ſaid Realm of France, ſaving the Rights of the Crown.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

XIX. That when it ſhall pleaſe God that We come to the Crown of France, then the Dutchy of Normandy and all other Places conquer'd by Us ſhall be annex'd to the Monarchy of France, and pay their Obedience and Submiſſion to the Kings thereof.

XX. That Recompence ſhall be made by our ſaid Father, or by Us, when We ſhall by God's Grace arrive at the Crown of France, if it be not made in our ſaid Father's Life-time to all ſuch Perſons as obey him, and favour the Party of the Duke of Burgundy, for the Lands, Lordſhips, Rents and Poſſeſſions taken from them by Conqueſt, either in the Dutchy of Normandy or elſewhere, and if the ſaid Lands, Lordſhips, Rents or Poſſeſſions belonging to ſuch Perſons in the ſaid Dutchy and other Places be not reſtor'd by Us, they ſhall have lawful Power to enter upon them without further Delay.

XXI. That during our Father's Life in all Places ſubject to him, all Letters of Common Juſtice, and all Grants of Offices, Gifts, Pardons, Remiſſions and Privileges ſhall be given out, and written in the Name of our Father, and if it be neceſſary in any Caſe to do otherwiſe, and write any Letters or Grants in our own Name, we ſhall take care to add our Father's Name, and our ſelves as Regent of France.

XXII. That we will not lay any Taxes or Impoſitions upon the Subjects of our Father without reaſonable and neceſſary Cauſes, and for the Common Good of the Realm of France according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the ſaid Realm.

XXIII. That We will cauſe, that by the Aſſent of the Parliament of both Realms it ſhall be ordain'd and enacted, That from the Time that We or our Heirs ſhall obtain the Crown of France, both the Crowns of England and France ſhall be united under one Perſon, that is to ſay, From and after the Deceaſe of our ſaid Father to Us, and from and after our Death, to our Heirs ſucceſſively, and that both Realms ſhall be govern'd not ſeverally under divers Kings, but under the ſame Perſon, which for the Time ſhall be King of both Realms, reſerving nevertheleſs to either of the ſaid Kingdoms their Rights, Uſages, Cuſtoms, Liberties and Laws, and not making either Kingdom ſubject in any wiſe to the Rights or Cuſtoms of the other.

XXIV. That We will from henceforth take effectual Care, that all, and all manner of Diſſentions, Hatred, Rancours, Envy and Wars between the Realms of England and France and the People of the ſaid Realms ſhall ceaſe, and a perpetual Friendſhip and Concord be eſtabliſh'd between the ſaid Realms.

XXV. That the Two Nations being united in Common Friendſhip, ſhall help and aſſiſt each other againſt all Men that ſhall attempt any Harms or Wrongs againſt them, or any of them with all their Forces, Councils and Aſſiſtance.

XXVI. That both the ſaid Nations ſhall freely Converſe and Traffick together, with all manner of Merchandize, paying the uſual Cuſtoms in the ſaid Nations.

XXVII. That all the Confederates and Allies both of our Father the King of France and his Realm, and alſo our Confederates of our Realm of England ſhall, within Eight Months after the Publick Declaration of this Peace, declare by their Letters, that they desire to come under the Articles of the said Treaty, saving nevertheless their Obedience to either of the said Crowns, and the Rights and Revenues to Us and our Subjects, and our Father and his Subjects, against all his and our Allies and Confederates.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

XXVIII. That neither our Father, nor our Brother the Duke of Burgundy shall begin or make any Treaty, Peace, or Accord with Charles, who calls himself the Dauphin of Vienne, but by the Counsel and Assent of all, and each of Us Three, or of the Three States of either of the said Realms above-nam'd.

XXIX. That We with the Assent of our said Brother the Duke of Burgundy, and other the Nobles and Peers of the Kingdom of France, who ought to be consulted with in that Case, shall Constitute and Appoint, for the Governance of our said Father, such Persons as shall be most suitable to the State and Degree of our said Father, and will be careful to promote the Worship of God, Honour of our said Father, and Good of the Common-wealth.

XXX. That all manner of Persons, both Nobles and Gentlemen who give any Attendance, or shall hold any Office about our said Father, shall be such as have been born in the Realm of France, or Places thereunto belonging, wise, true and able to do him Service, and that our said Father shall reside in the Places subject to him, and no where else.

XXXI. That we for the Things aforesaid, and every One of them will give our Assent by our Letters Patents seal'd with our Seal unto our said Father with the Approbation and Confirmation of Us, and all other of our Blood-Royal, and of all the Cities and Towns obedient to Us; and our said Father shall do the like to Us for himself, Peers, and all other his Subjects under his Obedience.

Given at Troyes (u) the 30*th Day of* May, 1420.

Sign'd, Seal'd, Concluded and Agreed between the said Two Kings in the Presence of Queen Isabel, the Duke of Burgundy, the French King's Council, the Prince of Orange, Seignior Chastalleux, Marshal of France, with many others of the Chief Nobility both of England and France, both the Kings with the Queen taking a Solemn Oath upon the Holy Evangelists for the Observation of them, and the Duke of Burgundy and the other Nobility, swearing Homage to K. Henry, as the Regent of France (in the Form above-mention'd.)

The Peace receiv'd in England with Joy.

The News of this Peace in England was entertain'd with an universal Joy, and a solemn Procession was Celebrated at London, at which a Sermon was Preach'd at St. Paul's Cross, in which the Preacher shew'd the Advantageous Effects of the King's Marriage, and the Peace which has ensu'd upon it. That the King had obtain'd the Kingdom of France with equal Honour, as if he had won it all by the Sword, but with less Expence of Blood and Treasure to the English: That tho' indeed he was at present but Regent of France under his Father-in-law King Charles, yet he was to bear the Arms of France with the English, and exercised the Authority of a King tho' he had only the Name, and was declar'd Heir apparent of the Crown, which was as much as K. Henry, who is a Pious Prince, could reasonably desire, having marry'd the Daughter of the French King, whom to Depose wholly would have been as Dishonourable to himself as Barbarous to his Father, and therefore could not decently be done.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

A League between K. Henry and the Duke of Burgundy.

Besides the League made between K. Henry and the French King, and whole Body of the Realm of France, there was also a Private League made between King Henry and the Duke of Burgundy to this Effect, and under these Articles.

I. That the Duke of Burgundy should to the utmost of his Power procure, that the Peace lately concluded between King Henry and King Charles should be observ'd and kept in all its Covenants and Articles. In consideration of which one of King Henry's Brothers should marry one of the Duke of Burgundy's Sisters.

II. That King Henry should ever shew particular Favour to the said Duke of Burgundy as his most dear Brother, and support him in all his Rights.

III. That the said Duke of Burgundy after the Decease of King Charles should take an Oath of Fidelity to be true to King Henry and his Heirs, according to the Form of the League before-mention'd, and should in all Things be a Friend to King Henry and his Heirs for ever.

IV. That King Henry should do his utmost endeavours that due Punishment be inflicted upon the Murtherers of John late Duke of Burgundy, as well upon Charles, who calls himself the Dauphin, as upon all others that shall be found Guilty of the said Murther.

V. That if the Dauphin should chance to be taken either in Battel or in any Town besieg'd, or if any other chanc'd to be taken that should be found Guilty of or Privy to the Murther of the said Duke John, he shall not be releas'd without a just Punishment for so foul a Fact, nor without the Consent of the Two Kings of France and England, Charles and Henry, and of the Three Estates of both Realms.

VI. That in consideration of the Fidelity and Diligence of the said Duke of Burgundy in settling the Peace and furthering the Marriage of King Henry, the said King Henry should labour with King Charles and Queen Isabel, that the said Duke may have an Annual Fee of Twenty Thousand Pound Parisien settled upon him by Patent from King Charles, and assign'd to him out of such Lands as border'd upon his Country, to be by him, his Lady and his Heirs-males enjoy'd for ever; and if he could not bring it to pass before King Henry should obtain the Crown of France himself, then he should cause the same to be perform'd at the receiving of his Homage.

Thus did the Duke of Burgundy revenge his Father's Death upon the Dauphin, and by his Serviceableness so advanced his own Interests with the King of England, that he was in Gratitude oblig'd to reward bountifully the Assistance he had lent him.

The Dauphin displeas'd at the Peace with K. Henry.

The Progress of the King of England's Settlement by the Treaty was not unknown to the Dauphin and his Followers, who tho' they could not but be displeased at these Proceedings, yet neither fear'd nor fainted, hoping for the Reverse of Fortune when all this Clue should be unravell'd and this curious Train defeated, but they were not insensible that they were in great Danger from King Henry's Power, which was very terrible before, and was now grown almost Irresistible. Wherefore they call'd a General Consultation to consider, what was best to be done for their own Security in this difficult Juncture. They dispair'd to do any good by Opposition

(u) The 21st of May. Ibid. 268.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

ſition when they were ſo much over-match'd in Power and could only provide for their own Safety, till Fortune ſhould give a more favourable Opportunity of advancing their Cauſe. All therefore that could be reſolv'd on was this, That the Dauphin's Life, upon which all their Hopes depended, ſhould be in no caſe hazzarded, and that ſuch Towns and Strong-holds as contin'd firm on their Side, and were moſt able to ſecure themſelves and annoy their Enemies, ſhould be better fortified, and ſo they would wait Fortune's Leiſure, and ſtand only upon their Defence. The Burgundian Faction, who were moſt in Favour with King Henry, were equally Zealous to apprehend the Dauphin who had kill'd the Duke of Burgundy's Father, and therefore the Dauphin's Friends would not ſuffer him to go out with any Party, nor attempt any thing of Hazzard, but kept him under ſtrong Guards to preſerve him.

K. Henry endeavours to ſubdue the Dauphin and his Party.

King Henry having now arriv'd almoſt at the higheſt pitch of his Deſires, had nothing to darken his Glory or Power in the leaſt, but the Dauphin and his Party who were conſiderable for little but their Obſtinacy: For their Number was ſmall and their Strength not able to do much, ſave that they held out, and upon any Change or Diſcontent might eaſily increaſe into a formidable Body: Wherefore as ſoon as the Formalities and Solemnities of his Marriage were over, he ſet himſelf to reduce the Dauphin and his Party, and on June the 7th he began with the Siege of Sens, whither he went himſelf in Perſon with his Queen, Father and Mother, and Dukes of Clarence and Burgundy. It was a Town of good Strength, but made a very faint Oppoſition; for before the Engliſh could make any Aſſaults upon it they ſurrendred upon Condition, That all Perſons ſhould have their Lives ſpared, except the Murtherers of the Duke of Burgundy, if any of them ſhould be found in the Town. From hence King Henry march'd to Monterau-faut-Yonne, and laid Siege againſt it. In this Town which was very ſtrong and very firm to the Dauphin, was John, late Duke of Burgundy ſlain, and lay buried, which was the Reaſon that the Duke of Burgundy ſat down with the firmer Reſolution to take it, becauſe he would interr his Father's Body more Decently. The Town was not daunted with the Approach of King Henry, but reſolv'd upon a vigorous Oppoſition, yet held out but a few Days, becauſe the Engliſh having receiv'd a freſh Recruit of Soldiers out of England under the Command of the Duke of Bedford, follow'd them with continual Aſſaults, ſo that the Place was taken by Force, June 23. but the Caſtle being well Victual'd and Mann'd would not ſurrender, and therefore the Siege was remov'd thither. While the Caſtle held out, the Duke of Burgundy was inform'd where his Father was buried, and thereupon commanded his Corps to be taken up, and being Embalm'd was carried to Dijon in his Dutchy of Burgundy, and there magnificently Entomb'd among his Anceſtors. The Caſtle ſtill ſtood out, and King Henry being willing to preſerve it, ſent Twenty Gentlemen whom he had taken in the Town, and who had render'd themſelves Obnoxious to his Diſpleaſure by abuſing the King's Herald when he was ſent to require them to yield, to perſwade the Captain, whoſe Name was Guily, a valiant French Man, and true Friend of the Dauphin's to ſurrender, being threatned, that if they did not prevail they ſhould be all hang'd. Theſe Gentlemen were Guily's Friends, and true Men to their Country; but being in danger of Life, and ſeeing his Oppoſition to ſo great Forces fruitleſs, begg'd of him on their Knees, that he would ſurrender the Caſtle and ſave their Lives and his own, which otherwiſe would be loſt. Guily was deaf to their Deſires; whereupon the Petitioners were all hang'd in his Sight, yet he ſav'd his own Life, tho' he held out the Caſtle long, by a Capitulation, that all ſhould have their Lives, but ſuch as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Murther, upon the Delivery up of the Caſtle to him. Monterau being thus gain'd King Henry ſtopp'd not here, but following the Courſe of his Victory remov'd his Siege to Melun, a ſtrong Town in the Iſle of France which held with the Dauphin, and ſat down before it, July the 13th. The Garriſon which was 700 had well fortified themſelves, and had very brave Commanders, viz. Seignior Barbaſon, a Gaſcoigne of approv'd Valour and Conduct, Pierre de Bourbon, a Prince of the Blood, Monſieur Preaux and Bourgeois. At the firſt Approaches of the King's Army Barbaſon call'd all his Soldiers to him with the Townſ-men, who were equally concern'd to maintain the Siege, and having encourag'd them to behave themſelves Valiantly againſt their Enemies, warn'd them all on pain of Death not to make any Motion, much leſs treat about ſurrendring the Town, or coming to any Compoſition or Agreement, until they had firſt acquainted him their Captain with it, and ſo ſet himſelf to the Defence of it. The King of England on the other ſide having a very ſtrong Army commanded by his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence, Bedford and Glouceſter, Burgundy and Barr, and being accompany'd with the Young King of Scots, Prince of Orange, his Father-in-law the French King, and many other great Perſons, was as diligent in plying the Siege, which as it was likely to prove Difficult, ſo would produce a more noble Victory. The French Queen and her Daughter the Queen of England, with the Dutcheſs of Burgundy lay during the Siege at Corbeil, and made divers Viſits to their Husbands and Friends who lay about the City, whom the King of England nobly Entertain'd in his Camp. To this Siege for the King's Aſſiſtance came the Duke of Bavaria, who had married Queen Katherine's Siſter, with 700 Men well accoutred, who being retain'd in the King's Service behav'd themſelves very well. King Henry being thus provided with an Army, ſought out all means by Mines, frequent Batteries, and Aſſaults to win the Town, but was ſo valiantly Oppoſed and Countermin'd, that he ſaw ſmall Hopes of getting it otherwiſe than by ſtarving them. While he lay before the Town, it chanc'd that two of the Engliſh Lords began a Contention about entring a new Mine, which to decide, the King himſelf went in firſt, and meeting there with the Lord Barbaſon fought with him over the Barriers made in the Mine by the French for that Purpoſe. The King and Lord engag'd each other with equal Courage, and having got little Advantage on either part diſcover'd themſelves, and ſo parted with Admiration of each others Valour. After this the King begirt the Town in on all ſides to prevent Relief, and laid a Bridge over the Seine to ſtop any Paſſage into it that way, and to uphold an Intercourſe between the Armies on each. The Beſieged made many brave Sallies, but were as bravely Repulſed though with Loſs on both ſides. The King of France himſelf came into the Camp of King Henry, and commanded them upon their Allegiance, which they ow'd him as their Natural Lord, to reſign the Town to his Son the King of England; but they anſwer'd, That if he

Sens ſurrendred.

The Town and Caſtle of Montereau taken.

The Duke of Burgundy's Body taken up and carried to Dijon.

Melun beſieg'd.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

were at Liberty, and free from King Henry's Power, who was their Enemy, they would do him the Duty of Subjects, and obey him in all Things, as their Sovereign, but being as he was, they desir'd to be excused, for they would never yield to the Mortal Enemy of France. But though no Humane Force nor Perswasions could prevail with stout Barbason's Heart to submit to his Enemy; yet the Inflictions of Heaven, Pestilence and Famine turn'd his Resolutions, and he came to a Capitulation upon these Conditions.

Melun surrender'd upon Conditions.

I. That the Town and Castle of Melun being deliver'd up to the King of England, both the Soldiers and Burgesses should submit themselves to his Pleasure, to be dealt with as he should think fit.

II. That all such Persons as should be found Guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Murther, should suffer Death.

III. That all the rest of the Soldiers should be receiv'd to Mercy, but should remain Prisoners until they should put in sufficient Securities for their faithful Obedience for the future.

IV. That the Natives of France should be dismissed to their own Homes.

V. That all the Moveables and Arms in the Town should be carry'd into the Castle.

VI. That all the Prisoners that had been taken during the Siege, or before, should be set at Liberty without a Ransom, and acquitted of all Promises.

VII. That Twelve Captains and Six Burgesses should be Hostages for the Performance of these Articles.

VIII. That all the English and Scots should be deliver'd up to K. Henry, and left to his Mercy.

Thus was Melun resign'd up to King Henry about the midst of November, and most of the Besieged sent under the Conduct of the Duke of Clarence to Paris, of which the French King had made him Captain, and gave him Possession of the Louvre, Bastile of St. Anthony, Hotel of Nesle, and Bois de Vincennes, where he placed English Garrisons. Among the Prisoners which were 600 and more, was Monsieur Barbason, Pierre de Bourbon, and Seignior de Preaux. King Henry put an English Garrison into Melun, and left it under the Command of Pierre de Verrolt, a valiant French Man, going himself by Corbeil where his Queen and Mother lay during the Siege, whom he took along with him to Paris, where they were receiv'd with Processions, and all other Magnificent Solemnities, and convey'd to their Palaces, King Henry and his Queen to the Louvre, and King Charles and his Queen to the Hotel de S. Paul, an homely mean One in comparison of the former.

The D. of Burgundy's Murtherers punished with Death.

The first Thing done after their Arrival at Paris was to put the Murtherers of the Duke of Burgundy to Death, of which several of the Captives were found Guilty, and were accordingly Punish'd, and among them Two Monks, Bertrand de Chermont, a Gascoigne, much in favour with King Henry, was also punish'd with them with Death, because he had at the King's Entrance into Melun convey'd away one Amenion de Lau, who was prov'd guilty of the same Crime. The Duke of Burgundy himself, and the Duke of Clarence had much interceded with the King to save his Life, but could not prevail; for though the King protested he had rather have lost 50000 of his Nobles, yet he resolved that he should suffer Death to be an Example of Terror to all those, who out of Presumption of their Prince's Favour would venture to do Things Offensive to him, and Prejudicial to the Publick: And accordingly he was Executed with them.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

A Parliament met at Paris.

While the Two Kings, Charles and Henry King of England remain'd at Paris, a great Assembly of the Clergy and Nobles met in the great Hall of the Hotel of St. Paul, where a Magnificent Seat of Justice under one Cloth of State was erected for both the Kings, as Supreme Judges of all Matters which might be examin'd in this Assembly. The main Design of this Parliament being to ratifie the late Alteration made by the Marriage and Peace with King Henry, very few or no Laws were made, but only every Member of the Assembly was sworn severally to keep, support, maintain and defend the Treaty and Final Agreement which was lately made and concluded between the Kings of France and England, and every Noble Man, Spiritual Governour and Temporal Ruler set their Seals to certain Instruments containing the Sum of this Engagement and Oath, which Instruments were sent to the King's Treasury of the Exchequer at Westminster to be safely kept, and there they still remain. The French King also himself, being then in perfect Health of Body, and Soundness of Mind, publickly own'd and declar'd, That the said Treaty and Agreement was made with his full and free Assent, and with Advice and Consent of all his Council of France, and that he for his Part would observe it, as his Heirs and Successors were obliged to do, in all its Articles and Parts; and that he did strictly require, That all his Subjects of what Degree soever, should observe it, and do nothing prejudicial to it.

An Appeal to this Parliament about the D. of Burgundy's Murther.

To this Parliament did the Dutchess of Burgundy, and her Son the Duke of Burgundy send their Advocates, Nicholas Rollin, and a Doctor of Divinity to accuse the Dauphin, Charles, Viscount Narbonne, Seignior Tanneguy, and Barbason, and Four others, of the Murther of John, Duke of Burgundy, and desire impartial Justice against them, which they did in a long Invective; adding by way of Petition, That a Church might be Founded, and Furnish'd with Sacred Ornaments, and a sufficient Revenue to maintain Twelve Canons, Six Chaplains, and Six Clerks, to pray for his Soul for ever, every Canon to have Two Hundred Pound per Annum, Paris Money, every Chaplain a Hundred Pound, and every Clerk Fifty Pound, to be levy'd upon the Lands of the Dauphin, and his Associates in the Murther of the said Duke: To this Petition the Chancellor of France in the Behalf of K. Charles promised, that no endeavour should be wanting on his Part, and that all Justice should be done for them, and thereupon caus'd his Son to be solemnly call'd to the Marble Table to answer the Accusations brought against him by the Name of Charles, Duke of Toureme, and Dauphin de Vienne, which being done Three times, and he not appearing, he was by Arrest of the same Court of Parliament banish'd the Realm, and judg'd unworthy to succeed in any of the Seigniories, as well present as to come, that belong to the Crown of France. But the Dauphin valu'd not this Sentence of his Enemies, from whom he could expect no milder, and had been sure of a more severe, if he had been in their Power; he stood upon his own Defence, trusting to God's Providence and his Sword, which he doubted not would settle him again in his Right.

Seignior Barbason accused of the D. of Burgundy's Murther, but acquited.

But Valiant Barbason stood more Obnoxious to their Sentence, though less guilty, being vehemently accused for the same Murther by the Duke of Burgundy's Mother and Sisters, and many Circumstances produced against him tending to make him Guilty, but he so bravely defended himself against the Charge, though he freely acknowledg'd himself to be a true Servant of the Dauphin's, that he was in no wise thought Guilty ty of it; yet whether he eſcap'd Judgment is uncertain, for tho' ſome ſay he was acquitted, others ſay, that King Henry in favour to the Duke of Burgundy pronounc'd him Guilty and gave Sentence on him, that he ſhould ſuffer Death, which though he avoided by alledging a Military-Law, That any Man having his Brother in Arms within his Power, ſhould not put him afterwards to Death for any Cauſe or Quarrel, proving himſelf to be the King's Brother in Arms, becauſe he had Encounter'd with him Hand to Hand in the Mine above-mention'd, by which Law the King's Sentence was annull'd, yet he was kept Priſoner at Paris ſtill, and after remov'd to other Places, not being able to recover his Liberty, till Caſtle-Galliard was taken by the Dauphin Nine Years after this.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

K. Henry ruling in Paris as King.

King Henry being thus Eſtabliſh'd in the Government of France as well as England, paſſed his Chriſtmas in great Majeſty in Paris, ordering all Affairs of State as he pleaſed, and being look'd upon by all Foreign Embaſſadors, as well as the Native French, as their King; Charles, the French King having indeed the Name, and keeping a Court, but very Private, and as a Prince whoſe Power was out of Date. All the Grandure of France was ſeen only in King Henry's Palace, where were many Military Shews and Paſtimes daily, and all the State and Magnificence of a Court. All Commiſſions were given out in his Name, and he placed and diſplaced Officers as he pleaſed. He alſo made a New Coin, which he call'd a Salute, wherein the Arms of France and England were quarter'd. Chriſtmas being over, the King reſolv'd to leave France a while and go into England to have his Queen Crown'd; wherefore leaving Paris under the Command of his Uncle the Duke of Exeter, with a Guard of 500 Men, he went to Roan and continu'd there ſome Time. Hither all the Nobles of Normandy came to him to pay their Homage, and the Earl of Stafford did his Homage for his Earldom of Perch, and Arthur Duke of Brittain for the County of Yury. Here he ordain'd his Brother the Duke of Clarence to be his Lieutenant in his Abſence over all France, and his Deputy in Normandy, the Earl of Salisbury; leaving Roan he came by Amiens to Callis, and taking Ship came to Dover about Candlemas, and ſo paſſed to London, where he was receiv'd by the Citizens with as great Joy, as if he had been an Angel from Heaven, or a Victorious Alexander, who had ſubjected the World to him.

Henry goes into England to have his Queen Crown'd.

A. D. 1421.

King Henry being thus ſafely arriv'd in England, he according to his uſual Piety would not enter upon any Material Buſineſs till he had given his Subjects an Example of ſignal Devotion in returning God publick Thanks for the Succeſs which he had given him in France, and therefore by his Proclamation appointed, that Proceſſions and Solemn Thankſgivings ſhould be kept by all his Subjects in all Cities, Towns and Villages through the whole Nation, which was accordingly perform'd with much Devotion. This Act of Piety being ended the King appointed, that all Things ſhould be provided with convenient Speed for the Coronation of his Queen upon St. Matthias's Day approaching, February the 24th, on which ſhe was Crown'd with great Magnificence by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, John (x) Stafford. Beſides the conſtant Ceremonies uſed upon ſuch Occaſions, which were all perform'd with great Exactneſs; there was more than ordinary Coſt and Magnificence beſtow'd in the Coronation-Dinner; for though it was in Lent, and ſo it conſiſted of Fiſh and Sweet-Meats chiefly; yet there was ſuch vaſt Varieties of both, and ſuch rare Devices in every Courſe, as were never ſeen upon the like Occaſion. The Earl of March kneeling on the Right-hand of the Queen with the Scepter in his Hand, and the Earl-Marſhal on the Left-hand, the Duke of Glouceſter waiting bare-headed and over-ſeeing the Management of the whole Feaſt, made it one of the moſt ſplendid Banquets that was ever known in England. As ſoon as the Coronation was ended, the Queen return'd to her Palace at Weſtminſter, where ſhe remain'd till Palm-Sunday, when ſhe remov'd to Windſor to meet the King, and keep her Eaſter there with him.

A. D. 1421. Reg. 8.

K. Henry gives publick Thankſgiving for his Victories in France, and Q. Katherine is Crowned.

In the Interval between the Coronation and Eaſter, the King took a Royal Progreſs through ſeveral Parts of the Nation, to ſee in what State his Affairs were, and rectifie any juſt Matters of Complaint, which his People in his Abſence might have receiv'd from his Officers and Juſtices. In his Journey he omitted no Opportunity of paying his Devotion to the Shrines of ſeveral Saints; ſo making it a Pilgrimage, as beneficial to himſelf (as he then imagin'd) as he intended it for his People. Many grievous Complaints with Petitions for Redreſs were preſented to him againſt his Juſtices for the Male-adminiſtration of their Office, which the King received with much Willingneſs and Cheerfulneſs from the meaneſt Perſons; all Abuſes immediately reform'd, not ſparing the greateſt of his Miniſters whom he found Guilty of Miſdemeanours in their Places; telling them, 'That 'ſince they had no reſpect to his Honour, which 'was wounded by their Injuſtice and Partiality, he had no reaſon to ſhew them any Favour, but puniſh them the more ſeverely, becauſe for the ſake of a little Gain or Friendſhip, they had robb'd him of what he moſt valu'd, his People's Love and Affections. Theſe Affairs detain'd him longer in the farther Parts of the Nation, than he intended to to have ſtaid; and therefore not being able to reach Windſor to keep his Eaſter as he had intended, he ſent for his Queen to Leiceſter, and there kept his Eaſter with her.

K. Henry takes a Progreſs into ſome parts of the Nation.

Reg. 9.

The Duke of Clarence invades Anjou, and is ſlain.

While theſe Things paſſed in England, the Duke of Clarence who had the Supreme Government of France having ſummon'd all the Garriſons of Normandy to meet him at a Town call'd Buchy, from thence began an Invaſion in Anjou, and ravag'd the Country as far as Angiers, burning and plundering the Villages and Towns as he went along; but having an Information, that the Duke of Alenzon was come into thoſe Parts with a conſiderable Body of Men of the Dauphin's Party, and that the Scots in a Body of about 700 (y) Men were coming to joyn with them under the Command of Archibald, Earl of Dowglas, and John, Earl of Buchan, he return'd back to a Town call'd Beaufort, intending to give the Duke of Alenzon Battel before the Scots could come to him. Being on his March he took one Andrew Forguſa a Lombard and a Spy, who pretending he was fled from the French Camp, gave the Duke of Clarence an Account, that the French were but a ſmall Party and might eaſily be vanquiſh'd by his Forces which were much greater, but this he ſaid to encourage him to engage him raſhly, and ruin himſelf and Army, as he did: For the Duke of Clarence being haſty and

(x) John Stafford was at this Time Biſhop of Bath and Wells, and Henry Chicheley, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury.
(y) Seven Thouſand Scots. Ibid. 308.

credu-

A. D. 1421. Reg. 9.

credulous put forward and ſet upon them tho' much more Powerful than his Engliſh, and after a ſharp Battel was himſelf ſlain by one John Swinton (z) a Scotch Man (for the Scots had joyn'd them before the Duke of Clarence could get up) as alſo the Earl of Rime, and the Lords Grey and Reſs with 1500 Engliſh. The Earl of Huntington, Somerſet and Perche, the Lord Fitz-Walter, with ſeveral other Perſons of Note, as well as common Soldiers, were taken Priſoners, and the Victory fell to the French. But yet it coſt them many Lives, for they loſt 1200 Men. The Earl of Salisbury, (a) the Baſtard Son of the Duke of Clarence had Intelligence of this Defeat of the Engliſh, and made all the haſte he could to recover the Loſs receiv'd, but he came too late to do any Service, only the French being fled at his Approach left the Dead at his Diſpoſal, and ſo he ſent the Duke's Body to Roan in order to be convey'd into England, and buried many of the Slain. The Earl of Buchan who was a chief Leader in this Battel was made Conſtable of France for this Action by the Dauphin, and the Earl of Alenzan immediately beſieg'd the Town of the ſame Name. The Earl of Salisbury endeavour'd what he could to raiſe the Siege, but loſt 300 Men in the Succeſsleſs Attempt, not being ſtrong enough to relieve it, tho' the Dauphiniſts had not the Fortune to obtain it. The King was ſtill in his Progreſs, and had left Leiceſter to go to York; in the Way to which Place having viſited the Shrine of John of Beverley he heard of the News of his Brother's Death, which he receiv'd with abundance of Sorrow, and reſolv'd to revenge it ſeverely upon the French. He ſent the Earl of Mortaign into his Place for the Preſent, intending as ſoon as he could ſettle Affairs in England and provide Things neceſſary for his Expedition, to go over again into France and proſecute his Victory in the Conqueſt of the Dauphin.

K. Henry very ſorry for his Brother's Death.

Sixth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

About the beginning of May a Parliament met at Weſtminſter in order to the King's intended Expedition into France, and in it the King having given them an Account of his Victories in France deſir'd their Aſſiſtance for the further Proſecution of them. The Laity return'd him Anſwer, That the Commons were ſo impoveriſh'd with the long continuance of Taxes, that they were unable to lend him any conſiderable Supplies, yet they opened their Purſes before the Seſſion was up. The King having in this Parliament paſs'd ſome Statutes of Benefit to the Publick, and particularly an Act commanding, That no Gold ſhould be Current in ordinary Payment but by Weight, according to the Standard in the Exchequer; for the Coin being then much abuſed by Waſhers, Clippers, and Counterfeiters of Money, was a great Hindrance to Commerce, and a Damage to the Subject, which was by this Statute in a great meaſure prevented. For this Act and ſome others of like Nature the Houſe granted a Fifteenth of the Laity, and the Clergy being at the ſame time met in Convocation in St. Paul's, gave him Two Tenths. The King accepted the Aſſiſtance of his Subjects; but being too little to ſupport ſo great a Charge, he borrow'd (b) 20000 l. of his Uncle the Rich Biſhop of Winchester, giving him his Crown in Pawn for it, and with this he prepar'd for his Third Expedition into France. And having ſettled the Regency of the Kingdom in the Hands of the Duke of Bedford his Brother, and provided his Queen with a well-attended Court, with whom he left a ſtrong Army of 30000 to defend the Nation againſt the Invaſion of the Scots, who had engag'd in the Dauphin's Intereſt, and would therefore be Troubleſom in his Abſence, he with a freſh Army of 4000 Horſe, and 24000 Foot, began his Journey into France, and taking Ship at Dover landed at Callis about the beginning of June, having the King of Scots with him to allure the Scots from the Dauphin's Part, either by Promiſes of Rewards, or Menaces of Puniſhment.

A. D. 1421. Reg. 9.

K. Henry's third Expedition into France.

K. Henry being landed in France in this Third Expedition would not enter upon any Action till he had pay'd the Dutiful Honour of a Viſit to his Father and Mother the King and Queen of France, who lay then at Bois de St. Vincennes near Paris, and therefore took his direct way towards that Place. At Montrevil in the Road the Duke of Burgundy met him with a Petition from the Baſtard of Thian, who valiantly had held out Three Weeks the Siege of Chartres againſt all the Dauphin's Forces, and began to be ſtraiten'd ſo much, that he could not hold out longer. The King after ſome Conſultation with the Duke thought it neceſſary to raiſe the Seige, and having made him Commander of his Armies, ſent him to relieve it ſpeedily, the King proceeding in his Journey but ſlowly, till he could ſee the Succeſs of this Attempt. (c) The Duke of Burgundy by moderate Marches proceeded towards Chartres, and being arriv'd at Monte the Dauphiniſts diſcover'd his Approach, and had an Information of the Strength of his Army, which being too great to encounter, they raiſed the Siege and retreated to Tours in Touraine. The Duke of Burgundy having thus reliev'd Chartres he return'd to the King, who ſent him with a good Force into Picardy againſt Sir Jaques de Harcourt, who annoy'd the King's Conqueſts there. In the mean time the King went on to Paris to pay his deſign'd Viſit, and was honourably receiv'd and entertain'd by the King and Queen of France. In his Paſſage he took a ſmall Fort call'd La Ferte, (d) which being commanded by the Baſtard of Bellay ſurrender'd unto him upon Summons, but was as eaſily loſt as taken, for Bourſiers, a Picard to whom the King gave the Command of it, betray'd it to the Dauphin. Great Invitations he had at Paris to paſs his Time in Pleaſures, every Perſon being Ambitious to pleaſe him with the moſt grateful Delights; but his Mind was wholly engag'd on the Glory of Conqueſt, which ſeem'd a little eclipſed by the ſmall Advantages the Dauphin had gotten by taking Bonneval, Galendon, and ſome other Places; he could not be at Eaſe, till his Forces were employ'd for the Recovery of them, and utter Suppreſſion of the Dauphin's Party if it were poſſible: Wherefore having raiſed a ſmall Addition of French Forces to his Army he

K. Henry arrives in France, and ſends the Duke of Burgundy to raiſe the Siege of Chartres.

K. Henry viſits the King and Queen of France at Paris.

(z) John Swinton gave him the firſt Wound, but the Earl of Buchan killed him. Ibid. 309.

(a) The Earl of Salisbury was of the Family of Mountacute, and not the Duke of Clarence's Baſtard; that Duke left a natural Son, whoſe Name was John, and he was commonly called the Baſtard of Clarence. Holinſhead, 1233.

(b) His Uncle the Biſhop of Wincheſter had lent 20000 l. for it once before, and it ſeems the Pawn was ſettled at that Sum, which is ſcarce the Value of one of the Jewels of the Imperial Crown of England at this Day.

(c) The Duke of Burgundy was ill of a Fever when the King came to Montrevil, from whence they went to Panthieu, Montenay, St. Riquier, La Ferte, which Places King Henry took, and then return'd to Montrevil, where he diſmiſſed the Duke of Burgundy, upon his Promiſe of returning ſuddenly to the Army. He march'd himſelf to relieve Chartres, and when he arrived at Monte, diſpatched away Meſſengers to the Duke of Burgundy, to join him with his Forces. Enguerant Mont.

(d) The King took this Fort before he raiſed the Seige of Chartres. Ibid.

marched

A. D. 1421. Reg. 9.

march'd himſelf towards the Loire to fight the Dauphin, who had given it out, That he would try the Fortune of a Field-Battel with K. Henry; but the Dauphin's Courage fail'd when he ſaw the Greatneſs and Boldneſs of K. Henry's Forces, and he withdrew towards Bourges, where he continu'd without giving King Henry any Moleſtation and Hindrance, in his Victories, for which Quietneſs he was Nick-nam'd, The King of Berry. (e) King Henry having no Oppoſition to his Arms, proceeded with all Expedition to reduce all Places to his Obedience, and ſitting down before Dreux (f) himſelf; he ſent the Earl of Dorſet and Lord Clifford with 1200 Horſe and Foot againſt the Dauphiniſts, who ravag'd the Countries about Paris, and before his Arrival had put the Duke of Exeter in Paris to great Straits for Proviſion, but they ſoon left the Neighbourhood of that on the Approach of the King's Forces. Dreux endur'd an Aſſault or two, but the Inhabitants and Garriſon being timerous of a Storm deſir'd a Parley, in which they promiſed to ſurrender the Town upon Auguſt the 20th, if no Relief came in the mean time, which was accordingly done, and 800 of the Dauphin's Men were permitted to depart in ſafety, having ſworn to the King not to bear Arms againſt him nor his Allies for a Year enſuing. The Towns-Men alſo who would ſwear Allegiance to King Henry were permitted to enjoy their Houſes and Eſtates, but ſuch as refuſed were ſent out of the Town with the Garriſon, and the Earl of Worceſter was made Captain of it.

Dreux taken by ſurrender.

K. Henry purſues the Dauphin, but was forc'd to retire for want of Forage.

King Henry being made Maſter of Dreux purſu'd the Dauphin farther into the Country hearing that he lay at Baugency, but not finding him there he beſieg'd and took divers Caſtles and Towns, as Baugency, Rougmont, and many other Places, intending to have at length gotten to Bourges it ſelf, where the Dauphin lay ſtrongly Fortified; but the latter had carry'd away or deſtroy'd all the Forage and Proviſions of the Country, ſo that the King's Army was forc'd through mere want to retreat back to Orleans, where he ſtay'd two Days to refreſh his Troops, and then paſſing through Gaſtinois and Vigny-ſur-Yonne he arriv'd at Paris, and he was receiv'd with univerſal Joy and Reſpect. He remain'd there ſome time not only to recruit his Army, which was much Weaken'd by his late purſuit of the Dauphin, but to ſettle the Diſcontents of the City it ſelf, which was diſturb'd by ſome of the Dauphin's Party, and having finiſh'd it he marched out again with his whole Army to lay Siege to the City of Meaux in Brie. This City was very well fortified, mann'd and furniſh'd with Proviſion, and could not be taken without very great Difficulty, yet becauſe it was almoſt in the midſt of King Henry's Conqueſt, and was many ways Prejudicial to the Country which had ſubmitted to him, the Siege of it was reſolv'd upon, and the King himſelf undertook to ſubdue it. It was a large City, and beſides the Suburbs which were very populous and great, it was divided into two Parts by the River Marne which runs through the midſt of it, viz. the Town and Market-Place. The King being ſenſible that if his coming were certainly known the Inhabitants would burn the Suburbs, ſent the Duke of Exeter before him with 4000 Men to prevent it, following himſelf within a few Days. The King lodg'd in the Abby of Pharon, and the Duke of Exeter in the Abby of Chage, the Earl of March in an Houſe of the Gray-Fryers, and the Earl of Warwick over-againſt the Market-Place. They began their Aſſaults about October the 6th, (g) and continu'd with all their Vigour to force the Town to yield. The Inhabitants being ſtrengthen'd with a good Garriſon under the Command of the Baſtard of Vaurus and other Men of Name both for Birth and Courage, held out valiantly, and made as brave Reſiſtance within as the Engliſh did without, being as reſolute to defend their own, as their Enemies were to gain it. Winter was a great help to the Beſieg'd, and had certainly raiſed the Siege if any thing could have broken the ſteady Hearts of the Engliſh; for the River over-flowing much endamag'd their Camp, the Cold and Wet brought in many Diſtempers among them, of which not a few dy'd, and there was great want of Proviſion, ſo that the ſurviv'd ſcarce had any Strength to attempt their Enemy. Beſides theſe Difficulties which Providence ſeem'd to caſt upon them to croſs their Attempts, Jaques de Harcourt a ſteady Friend of the Dauphin's with 800 Men infeſted the Beſiegers, but he was repulſed with the Loſs of 300 of his Men, and was himſelf ſav'd only by the Swiftneſs of his Horſe: So much did the Courage of the Engliſh enable them to conquer all Dangers, and hold on boldly in their Undertaking till they obtain'd their Deſires.

A. D. 1421. Reg. 9.

Meaux beſieged by K. Henry.

While Things were carry'd on thus bravely by King Henry in France, ſeveral Things of Moment paſs'd in England. On December the 1ſt, the Duke of Bedford call'd a Parliament in the King's Abſence, and becauſe notwithſtanding the Act of the former Parliament about the Coin, it was ſtill found unfit for Commerce; therefore in this there were ſeveral Acts made for bringing in all Monies to be Recoin'd, and for the Weight of the ſeveral Pieces of Money with the Allay; and, which ſhew'd the King's Favour to his People, there was an Order ſent to all Receivers of Money, that they ſhould receive all Monies brought to them if it did not want above Twelve Pence in a Noble of the true Weight, and give them the New-coin'd Money for it, by which the King, though then under great Neceſſities for Money, yet was contented to loſe almoſt Three Shillings in the Pound for the Benefit of the People. This Redreſs of the Coin by the King's Favour gain'd ſo much of the Parliament that they gave him a Fifteenth from the Laity, and the Clergy contributed a Tenth towards the carrying on the War, and ſo the Parliament was ſent Home. In the Time of this Seſſion, viz. on December the 6th, being St. Nicholas's Day was Queen Katherine deliver'd of a Son at Windſor to the equal Joy both of the Nation and King. The Queen in the King's Abſence put forward his Chriſtning, and therefore that ſolemn Act of Chriſtian Initiation was perform'd by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury ſoon after his Birth, the Duke of Bedford, and his Great Uncle Henry, Biſhop of Winchester being his Godfathers, and Jaqueline, Counteſs of Brabant and Holland being his God-mother and Governeſs. The News of the Prince's Birth was ſent over to the King with all convenient Speed, and was receiv'd with great Joy. He was then at the Siege of Meaux, and as ſoon as he heard it gave ſolemn Thanks to God, that it had pleaſed the Divine Providence to beſtow a Son upon him that might ſucceed him in his Crown and Scep-

Seventh Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The Birth of Prince Henry at Windſor.

(e) Of which Province Bourges is the Capital.
(f) He took Dreux before he march'd to the Loire. Engu. Mont.
(g) They inveſted the Town, October the 6th. Du Cheſne Antiq. des Ville's de France.

ter.

A. D. 1421. Reg. 9.

ter. However it is ſaid, that he was not pleaſed at the Place of his Nativity, which was at Windſor, becauſe having ſome Information, that that Place would be Fatal to him, he had given a ſtrict Charge that he ſhould not be born there; but ſince an unavoidable Fate had caſt his Birth there, he prophetically ſaid, either from preſent Inſtinct, or from the Prediction of ſome other, unto the Lord Fitz-Hugh his Chamberlin and great Confident.

I Henry born at Monmouth, ſhall ſmall Time reign and much get;
But Henry of Windſor ſhall long reign and loſe all, but as God will ſo be it.

A. D. 1420.

K. Henry loſt many Men before Meaux, but at length took it by Aſſault.

Chriſtmas now approach'd, and though King Henry always kept it with ſome Solemnity, yet he choſe rather to abridge himſelf of that Cuſtom than break up the Siege of Meaux, though the Extremity of the Weather both for Cold and Wet, the Sickneſs of his Army, and the great Loſſes which he had ſuſtain'd by the Beſieged, who had kill'd many of his Men; and among the Reſt the Earl of Worceſter and Lord Clifford, might have been an Argument ſufficient to have diſcourag'd his Proceedings, and forc'd him to have left it. But all theſe Things rather increaſed than diſheartned him; whereupon with more fierce Aſſaults he batter'd the Walls of the Town, and having made Bridges of Planks over the River Marn, begirt it ſo cloſe, that it was much diſtreſſed, and could hardly hope to hold out againſt his various Arts to ruin them. But yet they ſtood out as undauntedly as Men in ſo much Danger could, having Intelligence that the Dauphin's Arms had proſper'd in Normandy, and that Auranches was fallen into their Hands, by which means King Henry would be oblig'd to ſend away part of his Forces to ſecure his Conqueſts there, which accordingly he did under the Command of the Earl of Salisbury, who ſoon regain'd the Town. At this the Citizens took heart, and endeavouring to get another Captain of great Courage and Experience, viz. the Seignior de Offemont into their Town, thought to maintain their Ground againſt him; but being unfortunate in their Attempts, their Captain as he was Scaling the Walls falling into the Enemies Hands they were ſo diſcourag'd that they deſpair'd to hold out long, and began to carry all their Goods into the Caſtle. The King perceiving their Fear made a general and fierce Aſſault, and by dint of Sword obtain'd the Town. The Caſtle and Market-Place ſtill held out, and though the King batter'd it with his Cannon, that it could not long ſtand out, yet they ſo inſolently behav'd themſelves to him by reproachful Words and Abuſes as if they had been Unconquerable, which was the Cauſe, that when they were oblig'd at length to yield, they were reduc'd to ſuch hard Conditions as no Town before had had impoſed upon them, which were to this Effect.

The Caſtle of Meaux ſurrender'd, but upon hard Terms.

I. That the Market-Place of Meaux ſhall be ſurrendred up the Eleventh Day of May next enſuing.

II. That Monſieur Lewis de Gaſt, the Baſtard of Vaurus, the Captain of the Town, who had barbarouſly ſpoil'd and oppreſſed the People of the Country ſubject to King Henry, Jehan de Romieres, Bailiff of the Town, and Fromagon, and Barnard de Meureville, two Burgeſſes of the Town, who had been Aſſiſtants to their Captain in his Outrageous Acts ſhould be left to King Henry to be put to Death for their Cruelties as he ſhould think fit.

III. That Guichard de Siſſay, Pierron de Luppe, Robert de Gerames, Philip de Gamaches, and John de Ouray ſhould be deliver'd into the King's Power, and ſo remain till they had ſurrendred, or cauſe to be ſurrendred all the Towns, Caſtles, and Fortreſſes which they or any of them held in France, and then to be diſmiſſed and ſecured of Life and Limb.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 9.

IV. That all the Engliſh, Iriſh, Welſh and Scots that heretofore had been in the King's Service, or were his Natural Subjects, ſhould be left to the King's Will and Pleaſure.

V. That all Perſons who were found guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Murther (and many there were in the Town who were accuſed of it) ſhould be left to Juſtice for that barbarous Crime.

VI. That all the reſt of the Inhabitants of the Town, as well Soldiers as Burgeſſes ſhould alſo be left to the King's Diſpoſal, their Lives only excepted.

VII. That the Count de Conuerſon who had been Priſoner to Pierron de Luppe, but at the beginning of this Siege was deliver'd up to King Henry at his Requeſt, and upon Promiſe of a certain Ranſom, ſhould now have his Liberty without the Payment of the ſaid Ranſom.

VIII. That all the Arms and Goods in the Market ſhall be brought to One Place, and being there ſafely guarded, an Inventory of the ſame ſhall be exactly taken and given to King Henry.

IX. That the Sacred Reliques found in the Churches, with all the Church-Ornaments and neceſſary Utenſils ſhall be ſafely preſerv'd and reſtor'd to the ſeveral Churches.

X. That all the Priſoners, as well in the Market-Place as in any other Place within the Juriſdiction of the Town, ſhould be ſet at Liberty Ranſom-free, and be acquitted of their Promiſes.

XI. That no Man until the Day appointed for ſurrendring of the Caſtle ſhall go out of the Market-Place, nor any Perſons admitted into it, unleſs by the Allowance and Aſſignment of King Henry.

XII. That theſe Articles ſhall be Subſcrib'd and Seal'd by an Hundred of the Chief Inhabitants of the Place, and Four and Twenty of them, ſuch as King Henry ſhall think fit to chooſe out from among them, be left as Hoſtages in his Hands for the more certain Performance of this Agreement.

The Articles were accordingly perform'd, and the Market-Place of Meaux ſurrendred to the King at the Time agreed on; whereupon he ſent ſome Selected Perſons immediately Priſoners to Paris, Roan and England. The Baſtard of Vaurus himſelf was hang'd upon the ſame Tree whereon he had formerly hang'd many Engliſh and Burgundians the King's Friends, and his Head fix'd upon a Pole on the top of the ſame Tree, his Standard, which uſed to be born before him in Battel, being alſo ſet up by it. The Bailiff of the Town and two Burgeſſes were ſent to Paris and there Executed. The Goods of the Town found in the Market-Place were diſtributed by the King himſelf among his Captains and deſerving Men. The Breaches of the Town and Caſtle were immediately order'd to be repair'd, and a ſtrong Garriſon left both in the Town and Market-Place of Meaux able to defend it from any ſudden Aſſaults and Surprizes. The Surrender of this great and important Place was ſuch a Terror, as well as Example to ſuch other Towns of leſs Strength that held out ſtill for the Dauphin, that moſt of them immediately yielded to King Henry's Arms, viz. Creſpi, the Caſtle of Pierre-pont, Merlaw, Offemont and many many other Places, ſo that all the Iſle of France, Brie, Laimnois and Champaign, became entirely ſubject to King Henry, who put his moſt faithful and valiant Captains into the moſt important Places of them, and then return'd to Bois de St. Vincennes to his Mother and Father the King and Queen of France, who joyfully welcom'd him, having eſcap'd the great Dangers and Hazards of War.

A. D. 1421. Reg. 9.

Reg. 10.

Queen Katherine failed into France, under the Conduct of John, Duke of Bedford.

Queen Katherine being now perfectly recovered of all the Diſtempers and Weakneſſes of Child-bearing, was very deſirous of enjoying the Company of King Henry, whoſe Glory ſounded over all the World, and accordingly having prepar'd all Things ready for her Voyage, took Ship at Southampton and ſail'd into France. John, Duke of Bedford, who was Regent of the Nation in the King's Abſence, thinking it his Duty to take an equal, if not greater Care of the Queen than Kingdom, ſhe being a more valuable Jewel than all earthly Power in the King's Eye, deputed his Brother Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, to govern in his Abſence, and with an Equipage of 800 Men conducted her over the Seas to Harfleur, and ſo by eaſie Journeys to Bois de St. Vincennes where her Father and Mother reſided. King Henry had ſcarce ſettled Matters after the Surrender of Meaux, but hearing of the Arrival of his Queen, he haſten'd to meet her there. With great Joy was ſhe receiv'd by her Parents, but with much greater by her Huſband, who with a State of Splender equal to his Love and Affection welcom'd her to his Embraces. They all ſtay'd a ſmall Time at Bois de St. Vincennes, and on Whitſun-Eve, being May 30. remov'd all together to Paris, where King Henry in the Caſtle of the Louvre, and the French King in the Hoſtle of St. Paul celebrated the Feaſt of Penticoſt in the greateſt State and Magnificence. K. Henry and his Queen ſitting upon that Feſtival in their Robes with their Crowns on their Heads, and keeping their Courts with a wonderful Confluence of People, while the King of France ſeemed but like ſome Petty Prince or Nobleman to him. King Henry govern'd and diſpoſed all Things, and the K. of France contentedly ſuffer'd him to act like a Soveraign, as tho' while King Henry's Power and Glory daily increaſed, his own could never be eclipſed: So much did the Honour of the Son ſatisfie the Mind of the Father.

The Dauphin while King Henry lay at Paris invades his Conqueſts.

The Dauphin, who had conſtant Intelligence of the Motions and Condition of King Henry, and his Army, was not careleſs of this Opportunity of regaining what had been conquer'd by him; for though the King had conquer'd all Picardy, Normandy, Brie, the Iſle of France and Champaign, yet ſtill the greateſt part of the Nation remained unconquer'd, and held with the Dauphin, whoſe Fortune though it was not equal to King Henry's, yet his Power and Greatneſs of Mind was not much inferior. The Dauphin therefore having an Army of 20000 Men, and thinking his Adverſary now taken up with Pleaſures and Eaſe, enters upon his Conqueſts, and takes with no Difficulty the ſmall Town of La Charite upon the Loire. Being encourag'd by this Succeſs he proceeded and laid Siege to a Town call'd De Cone on the ſame River, which not willing to undergo the Miſeries and Straits of a Siege, agreed to ſurrender to him if the Duke of Burgundy did not come to their Relief before Auguſt the 16th, to which the Duke of Burgundy, who lay not far off with a Body of Men, but much inferiour to the Dauphin's, aſſented; and having appointed a Day for the Fight, the Duke ſent Word of their Appointment to King Henry, deſiring, That he would ſend a greater Enforcement to his Army. King Henry hearing this Meſſage, and being ſenſible that a Field-Fight might poſſibly put an end to the Quarrel between 'em, return'd an Anſwer, That he would certainly be with him in Perſon with all his Forces upon the Day prefix'd, but his brave Mind was croſſed with a Crazy Body; and tho' he had begun his March, yet he was forced to yield to the Violence of the Diſtemper upon him, being a Fever and Flux, which he had contracted by the long Fatigues he had undergone in the Wars, and therefore remain'd at Senlis, ſending his Army under the Command of the Duke of Bedford to aſſiſt the Duke of Burgundy upon the Day appointed, who accordingly joyning with the Earl of Warwick march'd haſtily thither, and the Day before the Battel was to be, encamp'd near the Walls of de Cone. The King, who never miſcarry'd in any of his Perſonal Enterprizes, and was deſirous to be preſent in all dangerous Attempts, becauſe a good Fortune ſeem'd ever to attend him, was diſcontented that the Army had left him, and therefore march'd forward after them in an Horſe-litter, intending to animate his Men by his Preſence, though he could not engage with them, and was carry'd as far as Melun, but there finding himſelf unable to travel he was oblig'd to ceaſe his Deſign and return to Bois de St. Vincennes. The Dauphin who readily accepted the Proffer of Battel, and by his Herald had faithfully promiſed to abide the Field and try his Fortune; as ſoon as he ſaw the Engliſh Colours diſplay'd, and his Army as he imagin'd inferiour to them, notwithſtanding his Vaunts diſlodg'd them and march'd to Berry. This unexpected Flight of the Dauphin, as it gave Relief to Coſney, ſo it encourag'd the Duke of Bedford to go on and undertake ſomething which might be for his Maſter's Honour, and gratifie the Soldiers eager Courage, who were unwilling to return back without Action: Whereupon the Duke led 'em to Troyes in Champaign, and began the Siege of that important Place, but before any thing conſiderable could be attempted, the ſad News of the King's Danger by his Sickneſs arriv'd in the Camp, which drew away their Leader, who immediately poſted to Bois de St. Vincennes to the King, and ſo damp'd the Hearts of the whole Army, that they could not go on with the Siege, tho' left under the Conduct of the Duke of Burgundy, but ſoon after departed, and ſo the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury with the reſt of the Nobility return'd to the King.

Coſney beſieged.

A. D. 1421. Reg. 10.

King Henry falls ſick of a Fever and Flux.

The Duke of Bedford being arriv'd at St. Vincennes, and ſeeing the low and dangerous Condition of his Brother, much lamented his approaching and untimely End, as did alſo the other Noblemen about him; but the King as unconcerned at his own Death, look'd cheerfully upon them, and comforting them for his Departure from them, gave them ſuch Directions, for the Management of his Kingdoms for his young Son after his Deceaſe, as he thought neceſſary and ſuitable in his Farewel-Speech, to this Effect.

King Henry's Death approaches, and his Preparation for it.

'That he knew his Death would be born by them 'with great Sorrow, but when their Paſſions 'were a little cool'd, they upon Conſideration 'would have as little cauſe to be troubl'd at it 'as he himſelf had: For tho' indeed his Life and 'Reign had been but ſhort, yet that was ſo far 'from diſturbing him, that he placed it among 'one of his Felicities, that he ſhould not out-'live his Glories, as long Reigns do almoſt ineviteably cauſe the moſt ſucceſsful and brave 'Princes to do: Fortune either being tried with 'long Attendance, or Old Age being Nauſeous 'to her. That he ſhould carry flouriſhing Lau-'rels

1. He comforts his Nobles, and 2. Gives them direction about the Education of his Son, and Management of the Kingdom in his Minority.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 10.

'rels out of the World with him; and though 'he was laid in the Duſt, the Glory of his Cou-'rage and Victories, Virtue and Goodneſs ſhould 'live for ever: That though indeed much Blood 'had been ſhed in his Quarrel, and Blood-ſhed 'be one of the moſt crying Sins in the Ears of 'Divine Juſtice, yet his Conſcience accuſed him 'of no Guilt in that kind, ſince he could pro-'teſt in the Sight of God, that it was not any 'ambitious Deſire of enlarging his Dominions, 'or of purchaſing himſelf the Vain-glorious 'Name of a Conquerour, nor any other ſiniſter 'Conſideration had mov'd him to take in hand 'this War, but the Recovery of his Inheritance, 'to which he had an undoubted Right from his 'Anceſtors by the Judgment of the moſt Learn-'ed and Conſcientious both of the Clergy and 'Laity of his Realm, who both inſtigated and 'encourag'd him in the Proſecution of this War 'till he had gotten his due; aſſuring him, that 'he might do it without any Danger of God's 'Diſpleaſure, or Peril to his own Soul; That he 'was ſenſible his untimely Death would create 'great Troubles to them, and all his People, be-'cauſe he ſhould leave them in ſuch a Multitude 'of Buſineſs depending, and without a Prince to 'ſucceed him, who ſhall be able to govern in his 'ſtead, but the Conſideration of the Frailty of 'all worldly Things ought to mitigate their 'Sorrow; for when we have done all we can, 'there will ſtill be ſomething wanting which we 'deſire.' Having thus comforted them concern-ing his own Death, he went on and gave them Directions about his Son: And firſt conjur'd them all to follow and obſerve the Council that he ſhould give them. 'He earneſtly entreat-'ed them to love his Infant Son and their King, 'Prince Henry, and to take care that by their 'Wiſe and Prudent Inſtruction he may be made 'Able and Worthy to rule ſo great Kingdoms, 'and manage ſo great Scepters, and that they 'would comfort his Queen, the moſt afflicted 'Creature living, and love her with the ſame 'Affections as he had always done them while 'he was alive. He exhorted them to live in 'Unity and Concord one with another, and con-'tinue the League of Amity with Philip, Duke 'of Burgundy, which would conduce much to 'the Security of the French Dominions in their 'due Subjection, if by their Breaches among 'themſelves they did not endanger all. He pro-'pounded to them for Deputy-Governour of his 'Kingdoms in his Sons Minority, and deſir'd 'they would quietly ſubmit to them, his Bre-'thren, Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, to govern 'England, and enjoyn'd him not to depart out 'of the Realm upon any Occaſion ſoever, till 'his Son was arriv'd at an Age able to aſſume 'the Government, and John, Duke of Bedford, 'with the Aſſiſtance of Philip, Duke of Burgun-'dy, to govern his Kingdom of France, command-'ing them (who were both preſent) to pro-'ſecute the Dauphin with all their Force, till 'they had either totally ſubdu'd him and his 'Party, or driven him out of the Realm, for, 'ſaid he, you will never be quiet ſo long as he 'hath any Power to diſturb you, and it is abſo-'lutely neceſſary, that either you muſt loſe what 'you have, or he be driven out of all. Then he 'commanded them (however Time or Occaſi-'on might invite them to the contrary) that 'Normandy, which is the Ancient Inheritance of 'the Crown of England, and hath been purchaſ-'ed and regain'd with ſo much Labour and Ex-'pence of Blood, ſhould not be alienated from 'that Crown upon any Occaſion whatſoever. 'Laſtly, He enjoyn'd them, that the Duke of Or-'leans, the Earl of Eu, the Lord Gaucourt and 'Guicchard de Siſay ſhould be kept Priſoners in 'England till his Son came of Age, leaſt if they 'were ſet at Liberty they might raiſe greater 'Troubles in France, than they ſhould have Pow-'er or Policy enough to allay. The Noble Men full of Grief ſtood ſilent about him, but promi-ſed to perform all his Deſires to the full.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 10.

His Prepara-tion for Death.

The King having thus order'd the Matters of his Kingdoms, that his Son might be well Edu-cated and enjoy a proſperous Reign, betook him-ſelf to prepare for the State which he was ſenſi-ble he was juſt ready to enter upon, becauſe of the Violence and Strength of his Diſtemper; wherefore calling his Chaplains and Phyſicians, he enquir'd of theſe latter how long it is poſſible he might live, who anſwer'd, Not above two Hours; whereupon he order'd the former to do their Office, and fit his Soul for its Diſſolution. He firſt made a very devout and penitential Confeſ-ſion of his Sins, and then receiv'd the Holy Sa-crament, after which he cauſed the Seven Peni-tential Pſalms to be recited, and as the Chaplain who read them mention'd the Name of (b) Jeru-ſalem, he burſt out into this Ejaculation. Lord thou knoweſt that it was in my real Purpoſes to conquer Jeruſalem, and reſcue it out of the Hands of the In-fidels, if it had pleaſed thee to lengthen out my Life, but thy Providence hath defeated my Deſign; Thy Will be done; and then before the Chaplain could read many Verſes further, he gave up the Ghoſt at Bois de St. Vincennes, on the laſt Day of Auguſt, 1422. having liv'd Thirty Six Years, and reign-ed Nine Years, Five Months and Fourteen Days, (i) leaving a Son of Eight Months Old Heir of all his Dominions, whoſe Education was, at the Deſire of his Father, committed to the Duke of Exeter. His Bowels were interr'd in the Church of St. Maur de Toſſes, and his Body being embalm-ed, was incloſed in a Coffin of Lead, and being accompany'd with all the Lords and great Men, as well of France as England, and the whole Ar-my, was brought with much Honour and Lamen-tation to Paris, and there being ſet in the Church of our Lady, ſolemn Obſequies were ſaid for him (k) ſeveral Days, and a great Diſtribution of Money given to the Poor. From thence he was remov'd to Roan, where his Body remain'd till all Things could be made ready for his Bu-rial and Conveyance into England, and then be-ing carry'd to Calais, he was convey'd to Dover, and from thence to London, where his Corps be-ing ſet in St. Paul's Church, his Exequies were again celebrated. The Entrance into, and Paſ-ſage through London (l) was very Magnificent. An Effigies repreſenting his Perſon as near as could be, the Head whereof was Maſſy Silver, was laid in a Bed upon the Top of the Hearſe where his Body lay, painted curiouſly in Imita-

The manner of his Buri-al and Inter-ment.

(b) The Place is in the Fifty Firſt Pſalm, the Words, Build up the Walls of Jeruſalem.

(i) He began his Reign March the 20th, 1413. He died the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1422. So he reign'd Nine Years, Five Months and Eleven Days. We muſt here Correct a Contradiction in Mr. Goodwin's Hiſtory of this King, He ſays, Page 1. He was Crown'd the 9th of April, 1413. in the Twenty Sixth Year of his Age. And pag 337. He died the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1422. in the Tenth Year of his Reign, and Fortieth of his Age: If he was but Thirty Six Years Old in 1413. he certainly was but Thirty Five or Thirty Six in 1422.

(k) The Archbiſhop of Paris ſung the Maſs of Requiem for his Soul.

(l) It paſt in the ſame Pomp from Roan to Ableville, Heſdin, Montrevil, Boulogne and Calais, the Queen following at a League's Diſtance with a great Retinue. Engu. Mont.

tion

A. D. 1421. Reg. 10.

tion of a Man in coſtly Robes; on his Head was ſet an Imperial Crown of Gold and Precious Stones, and in his Right-hand a Scepter, and in his Left a Globe of Gold. The Covering of the Bed was of Cloth of Gold, and a Canopy of very great Value was born over his Body by certain Noble Men. His Corps was attended by the King of Scots, all the Nobility, and moſt of the Gentry of England beſides thoſe of France, who likewiſe after the Exequies perform'd at St. Paul's attended his Body to Weſtminſter, where it was interr'd among his Royal Anceſtors in November following, by St. Edward the Confeſſor, and his Effigies laid upon his Tomb erected over the Body, where it remains ſtill, but Headleſs, the Covetouſneſs of ſuch as were employ'd to ſweep the Church clean from Superſtition at the Diſſolution of the Monaſtries, being ſo great, that they ſpared not the Monuments of the Dead to advance their own Intereſts and Eſtates. But the Preſervation of that was the more neceſſary, and ſo their Sacriledge the more intolerable, becauſe they ſwept away thoſe Monaſtries at Richmond, viz. One of Carthuſians, and another of Monks and Nuns of St. Bridget which he had erected and endow'd to ſay Three Solemn Maſſes for his Soul every Week for ever: So that were not his Virtues and brave Actions more laſting than Iron or Braſs, his Memory had periſh'd e're this, but ſo long as either England or France remain, or any Memoirs continue in them, he will be Celebrated as the Glory of the One, and the Terror of the Other. His Queen, who not long after his Death came over into England with her Son King Henry, was afterwards marry'd to Owen Theodore or Tudor, a Gentleman of Wales, one not Eminent either for his Noble Birth, (m) or Plentiful Fortune, but being of a very graceful and beautiful Perſonage found ſuch Favour with her as to receive him into her Bed, and by him had Three Sons, Edmund, Jaſper, and Owen. Edmund was after by her Intereſt made Earl of Richmond, and marry'd to Margaret, Daughter and ſole Heireſs to John Beaufort, Duke of Somerſet, (n) natural Son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, and by him ſhe was Mother of Henry the Seventh. Jaſper was made Earl of Pembroke by K. Henry the Sixth, and requited his Favour by continually adhering to him againſt the Family of York in all his Wars. Q. Katherine ſurviv'd Owen, and retreated into the Nunnery of Bermondſey in Surrey, where ſhe dy'd in the Fourteenth Year of her Son Henry's Reign, and was bury'd in our Lady's Chappel in St. Peter's Church at Weſtminſter: Her Corps was taken up in King Henry the Seventh's Reign, her Grand-Child, and ſet by her Husband's Tomb, where it ſtill remaineth unbury'd to be ſeen and touch'd by any that pleaſe. Thus ended the moſt Glorious King Henry, and his Beautiful Queen Katherine.

Queen Katherine married to Owen Tudor.

Having given the Reader a View of this glorious Reign, it may be thought Preſumptuous to add a Character of a King whoſe Victories and Virtues were ſo Illuſtrious, that Eloquence it ſelf is too weak to deſcribe them. He was poſſeſt of every Quality which forms a good Man and a Hero. His riper Years made a ſufficient amends for the Extravagancies of his Youth; and yet even thoſe were but the Sallies of that Martial Fire which afterwards ſhone out ſo brightly, to the Immortal Honour of his Name and Empire. That he was as Brave as the Braveſt Captains of Old Rome, appears by the Facts which adorn his Annals. He undertook no Enterprize that he thought too Perilous for himſelf to engage in, and never put his Troops upon Action to which he durſt not lead them in Perſon. As he was the moſt Brave, he was the moſt Generous Prince of his Age, and did nothing that a true Father of his Country might have occaſion to repent of. He treated his Subjects like his Children, and never was ſo much diſpleaſed with his Condition as when it oblig'd him to burthen them with Taxes, which he always laid as ſparingly and equally as poſſible. He was truly Religious according to the Religion of the Times, and his Zeal for the Proſperity of the Church was as warm as his Paſſion for the Intereſt of England. Indeed he was too ſevere with the Lollards. He was the firſt who Proſecuted them for their oppoſing Popery, which is the only Blot in his Reign; and yet that, if we conſider they were Hereticks in his Judgment, was the Fault of his Religion, and not an Error of his Mind. He attributed all the Glory of his Conqueſt to God the Giver of all Victory. He was always devout in his Prayers for Succeſs on his Arms, and hearty in his Praiſe for the Bleſſings with which they were Crown'd. He was ſtrict and impartial in the Diſtribution of Juſtice, and as he furniſh'd the Church with the beſt Biſhops, he ſupply'd the Courts with the beſt Judges. He delighted in the frequent Meeting of his People in Parliament, and never refuſed the Royal Aſſent to any one Bill that was preſented him for the Publick Good. In his Wars abroad he was as merciful as in his Government at home, and ſpar'd even the Blood of his Enemies. He lov'd his Queen with Tenderneſs and Conſtancy, and in a Word was too Great and too Good for ſo Wicked and Idolatrous a Generation, having left an Example of Heroick Virtue behind him, which the Favourites of Fame have endeavour'd to imitate but could never reach. He was graceful in his Perſon, tall of Stature, his Preſence Manly and Majeſtick. His Hair was Black, his Neck long, his Look Gracious and Lovely, his Speech Grave, his Wiſdom Conſpicuous in all his Actions, and his whole Life from his Man-hood to his Death the Wonder of his own Age, and the Admiration of Poſterity.

A. D. 1421. Reg. 10.

King Henry's Character.

(m) He was deſcended from Cadwallader the laſt King of Britain, of the Britiſh Race.

(n) He was not natural Son to John of Gaunt, but Son to John, Earl of Somerſet, who was Son of Kat. Suinford by the Duke of Lancaſter, and all the Children of that Duke by that Lady were Legitimated in Parliament after the Duke had married her.

THE Remarkable OCCURRENCES,
IN THE Reign of HENRY the Fifth,

Are related among

The Actions of his Life, in the ſame manner as the Author has done in the Hiſtory of his Father, and in all the King's Reigns which he wrote from RICHARD the Second down to HENRY the Seventh; only ſome few memorable Things which he omitted, we ſhall inſert in their proper Places.

ON the Day of his Coronation there happen'd a Tempeſt of Wind, Snow and Hail, the Snow was moſt taken Notice of becauſe 'twas moſt Prevalent, on which the People made various Superſtitious Obſervations. Some thought it preſag'd, that the New King would be Cold and Negligent in the Adminiſtration of the Government, or Wrong and Oppreſs them, others took it for a good Omen, that having diſpell'd thoſe Clouds of Vice which had darken'd the Nation, Brightneſs and Serenity would ſucceed the Storm.

'Tis no Wonder that a Reign ſo Glorious as this ſhould produce a great Number of Hero's. 'Twould be endleſs to put down all the Illuſtrious Engliſh Names that ſhine in the Hiſtory of the Conqueſt of France: Some of the Chief and theſe who diſtinguiſh'd themſelves moſt, we think it our Duty to mention, as Thomas, Duke of Clarence, John, Duke of Bedford, and Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, the King's Brothers, of whom the Two latter made greater Figures in the Reign of his Son Henry the Sixth. Thomas, Duke of Exeter, and John, Earl of Somerſet, his Uncles, Princes worthy of their Relation to Henry the Conqueror of France. Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, Thomas Mountacute, Earl of Salisbury, John Holland, Earl of Huntington, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Beaumont, the Lord Bardolf, the Lord Fitz-hugh, Sir John Falſtaff, Sir Thomas Erpingham, Sir Walter Hungerford, Sir James Harrington, Sir Philip Hall, Sir John Cornwall, Sir Lewis Robiſſart, Sir Gilbert Umphreville, and the Brave Welſh Captain David Gam, whom King Henry Knighted, when he was dying of the Wounds he receiv'd in the Battel of Agincourt, fighting in Defence of his Royal Perſon.

As the King was great in War, ſo he ſhew'd by his Favour to Men of Learning that he would have been a Promoter and Patron of the Arts of Peace, if he had liv'd to have given Reſt to his Arms. He was himſelf bred up at Oxford under the Tuition of his Uncle Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and took delight in the Converſation of Thomas Redburn, Biſhop of St. David's, Stephen Patrington, Biſhop of Chicheſter, and John Carpenter, Biſhop of Worceſter, Men noted for their Learning and Eloquence: Beſides theſe, there were many others Eminent in his Time, viz.

Dr. Alain of Lun in Norfolk, Prior of the Carmelites in that Town, a Divine and Philoſopher.

John Seguarde a Poet. He taught Polite Learning in Norwich, and wrote againſt the Abuſe of Poetry by writing Lewd Verſes.

Dr. Robert Roſe, Prior of the Monaſtery of Carmelites in Norwich. He was Noted for his Moderation in the Diſputes between the Wickliviſts and Papiſts.

Dr. John Luck. Ant. Wood ſays, he was a great Friend, and Bale, that he was a violent Enemy of the Wickliviſts. See Wood's Athen. Oxon. and Bale, de Scriptor. Britan.

Richard Caiſtre of Norwich, a ſecret Friend to the Wickliviſts.

William Wellys, General of the Order of the Black-Fryers in England.

Richard Smetiſham, a Famous Diſputant.

William Taylor, A. M. a zealous Wickliviſt. He wrote a Book, De non invocando Sanctos, and was a Martyr, being burnt in Smithfield in the laſt Year of this King, whoſe only Blot was the Blood ſpilt in his Time by the Papiſts to ſupport their Idolatry, and the King out of Bigotry or Intereſt too much encourag'd their Cruelty.

Dr. William Lyndwood, a Civilian, Author of the Book call'd, Provinciale ſeu Conſtitutiones Angliæ.

Bartholomew Florarius, call'd ſo from a Book he wrote, which he Intitul'd, Florarius.

Adam Hemlington, famous in the Univerſities of Oxford and Paris.

William Batecomb, an Excellent Mathematician.

Robert Maſcall, one of the Engliſh Deputies at the Council of Conſtance, and Biſhop of Hereford.

John Purvey, A. M. Wickliff's Pupil, a Man of extraordinary Learning. He wrote a Comment upon the Revelations, publiſh'd afterwards by Luther without the Author's Name, in which he aſſerted, that the Pope was the Whore mention'd in the Apocalypſe. He dy'd in Priſon. He wrote many other Treatiſes.

Bertram Fitzallen of Lincolnſhire, a Philoſopher.

John Beſton, one of the beſt Orators of his Time.

John

John Leland, Senior, a Grammarian and Poet.
Dr. John Bale, Learned in the Greek Tongue.
Dr. Richard Ullerſton, a violent Enemy to the Lollards.
Peter Clark, A. M. He diſputed againſt Thomas Walden in the Schools at Oxford, vindicating Wickliff's Doctrine, he fled for it to Bohemia, and dy'd there.
Roger of St. Ives, He wrote againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle.
John Tartas, a Logician.
Roger Whelpdale, Biſhop of Carliſle.
John Wayneſleet, a Divine and Philoſopher.
Richard Fleming, He was firſt a great Favourer of Wickliff's Doctrine, but was brib'd off by the Biſhoprick of Lincoln.
Nicholas Pont, of Merton-College in Oxon. He diſputed with Richard Fleming, while the latter was a Wickliviſt.
Thomas Cranly, Archbiſhop of Dublin, a Poet, being Diſtreſſed by the Iriſh Rebels, he wrote an Epiſtle in Latin Verſe to King Henry for Succours.
Thomas Walden, He was ſent to the Council of Conſtance to Diſpute with the Huſſites, being a violent Papiſt.
Thomas Otterburn, a Franciſcan-Fryer.
Dr. John Langden, Biſhop of Rocheſter.
Robert Graſdale.
John Shirburn wrote Chron. Britan.
John Henfield, a Monk of Battle-Abbey, and Peter Baſſel, Eſquire, the King's Chamberlain, who wrote his Life, were Hiſtorians.

And that brave Soldier, Courtier and Chriſtian, Sir John Oldcaſtle, who defended himſelf at his Tryal with more Learning and Eloquence than all the Doctors his Adverſaries accuſed him with. He wrote Three Pieces. The Firſt, To the Parliament of England. The Second, The Complaints of the Husbandmen. The Third, A Confeſſion of Faith.

THE

THE LIFE and REIGN OF HENRY VI.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1.

HENRY the Sixth, the Son of that moſt Heroick Prince Henry V. but rather of his Piety than Courage, was left Heir of the Crowns of England and France when he was not above Nine Months Old, by the untimely Death of his Father, and accordingly was Proclaim'd King of all his Dominions, Auguſt the 31ſt, 1422. both at London and Paris. (a) The State of Affairs was ſo Intricate and Troubleſom, that it required a Prince of equal, if not greater Magnanimity and Conduct than the Nation had ſo lately loſt; but ſo great was the Religious Reſpect which the People then had to the Right of Succeſſion, (b) that tho' a much fitter Perſon might have been Elected for the Government, yet they choſe rather to ſubmit to a Child the Rightful Heir, than to the moſt Brave Hero who wanted that Lawful Claim. And indeed the late King Henry who was not able to preſerve a Kingdom by his Wiſdom, as to get it by his Valour, had taken ſuch effectual Care upon his Death-Bed to ſupply all the Deficiencies in Government during the Minority of his Son, by putting in ſufficient and able Deputies in both Kingdoms, as well as Tutors for the Education of his Perſon in all Virtuous and Prince-like Endowments and Accompliſhments, that inſtead of One he may ſeem to have left us many Kings. For he made his Elder Brother John, Duke of Bedford Regent of France, and his Younger Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter Governour of England during the Non-Age of his Son, both Perſons of that Wiſdom, Valour and Integrity, that as they knew how to manage ſo great Truſts with the greateſt Skill and Fidelity, and uphold the Intereſts of the Crown in their own Family without an Ambitious Uſurpation of it, ſo they were both admitted to thoſe high Stations with the general Approbation and Content of the Nobility and Commons of the Nation. Thomas Beaufort, Duke of Exeter, and his Brother Henry, Biſhop of Winchester were appointed Guardians of his Perſon, and to take care of his Education, as ſoon as he was capable of any Impreſſions of Honour and Goodneſs; which Choice ſhews that his Royal Father, who indeed himſelf was the perfect Model of a good Prince, accounted Religion as neceſſary for a Prince, as Policy and Martial Skill, and in the mean time he remain'd under the Care and Government of his Mother Queen Katherine, who with the Indulgence and Kindneſs fit for ſo great an Infant and ſo good a Mother, nouriſh'd him in his Child-hood, till he was Old enough to receive the Inſtructions of his Wiſer Tutors and Guardians.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1.

King Henry's Age and Succeſſion.

His Deputies and Tutors.

Due Care being thus taken of the King's Royal Perſon, and the Government being put into the Hands of ſo Wiſe and good Men, Neceſſities of State requir'd ſpeedy Action; and tho' greater Time might have juſtly been allow'd to their Grief for the Loſs of ſo loving a Brother, and ſo great a King, yet ſince Ceremony might bring irrecoverable Damages upon both Nations, the Two Dukes upon whom the Charge of them lay were forced to offer ſome Violence to Nature, and betake themſelves immediately to the Management and Settlement of Publick Affairs. The Duke of Glouceſter being as deſirous to pleaſe as benefit the Nation, and ſenſible that the beſt Government is always eſtabliſh'd upon good Council, made Choice in the firſt Place of ſuch of the Nobility to be his Council, as were more Eminent for their Wiſdom and Virtue, and provided ſuch Under-Magiſtrates, as by their Juſtice and Impartiality might give a general Satisfaction to the People, and by their Fidelity and Loyalty might ſecure the Conſtitution, and preſerve the Peace under their Infant-King. The Duke of Bedford alſo was equally diligent and careful to preſerve his Dominions in France, which being hardly impoſſible to be done but by the ſubduing of the Dauphin (as his Brother King Henry the Fifth in his dying Speech had order'd) he kept on Foot the ſame Forces which he had left in France, and with the ſame Zeal and Courage ſought to ſuppreſs both him and his Adherents, which no doubt he might have done, had not that fatal Alteration, the Death of the French King Charles the Sixth, ſo ſoon happen'd, for he dy'd within Fifty Three Days after King Henry his Son-in-law, on October the 21ſt following. The Life of King Charles was many ways an Advantage to the Engliſh; for tho' the Settlement made by him upon K. Henry and his Heirs after his own Death, could be reaſonably thought of little Validity againſt Charles the Dauphin's Claim, becauſe he was ſo diſtem-

Duke of Glouceſter's Government.

Duke of Bedford's Care of France.

Charles the French King's Death.

(a) He cou'd not then be Proclaim'd King of France, becauſe Charles the Sixth was living, and by the Treaty of Troyes, the King of England was not to be Stiled King of France till after Charles's Death.

(b) 'Twas rather their Reſpect to the Memory of his Father than to the Right of Succeſſion; for beſides, that they ſhewed they did not value much that Right when they placed Henry the Fourth, the King's Grand-father on the Throne, The Divine Right of Succeſſion was in Edmund, Son of Roger Mortimer, late Earl of March, who was the Son of Edmund Mortimer, by the Princeſs Philippa, Daughter and Heir of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, Elder Brother to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, the King's Great Grand-father, which Title we ſhall hear more of to this King's Coſt before the End of his Reign.

per'd

E. Luttrell delin:
P. Vanderbanck Sculp:
KING HENRY THE VI.th

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1.

per'd in his Underſtanding by his Diſeaſe, and ſo over-rul'd by his Queen, who to revenge her own Quarrel, valu'd not her Son's Right, that no Act of his in theſe Circumſtances could be of any laſting Obligation, yet ſo long as he was alive, and had confirm'd the Title of the Engliſh to all they had already gotten by their Arms, and joyn'd further with them to ſubdue his Son, the Engliſh met every where with more Aſſiſtance, their Proceedings were more juſtifiable, and the Oppoſition that the Dauphin and his Party made againſt them, thus joyn'd with his Father, look'd like a moſt unnatural Rebellion, and ſo no doubt was accounted by many, who otherwiſe would have aſſiſted him; and though they thought it a glorious Act to reſcue their Kingdom out of the Power of the Conqueror, as the Dauphin rightly pretended, yet their Conſciences would not ſuffer them to engage in that Action which carry'd ſo great Sin, under the fair Pretences of recovering their Country and Liberty, as Rebellion is; for they could not fight for the Son, but againſt their Father, nor ſave their Country from the Conquerour without Wrong to their lawful Prince. But the Death of Charles now releaſed them from theſe dubious Perplexities, and put a new Spirit into the French, who were weary of the Engliſh Power and long'd for Liberty.

King Charles his Death.

Charles the French King dy'd at Paris, and was bury'd at St. Dennis, after he had been a Crowned King of France Forty Six Years (or according to the French Hiſtory, Forty Two Years.) He was a Prince of that Excellent Diſpoſition and Temper in his Younger Days, while his Underſtanding was clear and vigorous, and govern'd his People ſo well, that he was univerſally lov'd by his Subjects, who therefore call'd him, Le Roy Charles le bien aimè, i. e. K. Charles the Well-belov'd: But the Happineſs which France might have promiſed her ſelf under ſo good a Prince, was ſoon eclipſed by the Diſeaſe which ſeiz'd him within four Years after he came of Age, thro' a great Fright, which he was put into as he rode thro' the Forreſt of (c) Mans, by the ſudden Appearance of a Man (or rather a Spirit in Human Shape) which boldly laying hold of his Horſe's Bridle and ſtopping him, ſaid, O King ride no further, but return back immediately, for you are betray'd. Theſe Words much ſurpriz'd the King; and tho' his Guards forced the Man by Blows to let go his Bridle, yet his ſudden Diſappearance, as if he were more than a Man, made ſuch a ſtrong Impreſſion upon his Mind, that he fell into a Fit of Frenzy, which plainly diſcover'd it ſelf to be nothing elſe but the Effects of thoſe Fears, and the exceſſive Jealouſy of Treaſon, which he had conceiv'd in his Mind from the former Words; for he look'd upon all about him as Traytors, and with all his might would ſtrike any Perſon that he could come at, with any thing he could lay hold of. In which miſerable Condition, ſaving ſome ſhort Intervals, he reign'd Twenty Nine Years, or rather was govern'd by Factions and Parties, for he was in no wiſe able to govern himſelf. This Misfortune brought many Troubles upon the Kingdom, creating ſtrong Diviſions among his Nobles, and giving his Enemies an Opportunity to encroach upon his Territories, which the Engliſh had done ſo effectually, that he was in his Life-time become a King only in Name, tho' not without his own Conſent, and ſaw his Kingdom and Regalities in the Power of a Foreign Prince, Henry the Fifth, King of England. Death was never a greater Happineſs to any Perſon than to him; for though he had nothing blame-worthy in him but his Affliction, yet that made his Life ſo troubleſom to himſelf as well as others, that nothing could be ſo deſirable to him as Death, which reſtor'd him to a right Mind, a ſweet Repoſe, and eternal Happineſs at once. After his Death his Kingdom was immediately ſeiz'd on by Two Rivals, who with equal Zeal, and as they thought, or pretended Title, ſought to eſtabliſh themſelves Kings of it. The Duke of Bedford almoſt as ſoon as he had given up the Ghoſt, cauſed his Nephew Henry VI, then King of England, to be proclaim'd in Paris after this manner: Two Heralds at Arms in their uſual Formalities, and many Nobles to attend them, were ſent into the moſt eminent Streets of that City, and one of 'em having cry'd out, King Charles is dead, another immediately ſaid with a loud Voice, God ſave King Henry the Sixth, God give a long and happy Life to Henry the Sixth, (d) King of France and England, Our Sovereign Lord: And after the ſame manner was he proclaim'd King in other Parts of the Realm. Charles, Duke of Touraine, commonly call'd the Dauphin, on the other ſide was alſo proclaim'd and crown'd King of France by his Party at Porchiers, as being Legitimate Heir to the Deceaſed King, and by the Laws and ancient Edicts of the Nation as well as Nature, the lawful Heir to the Crown of France. The Engliſh indeed at this Time were grown ſo Powerful, and had gotten ſo large Dominions in France, that they derided this their Competitor, and call'd him in Contempt, The King of Berry, becauſe his Fortunes were at ſo low an Ebb at his Father's Death, that little of France was in his Power, but the City of Bourges in Berry, and the Territories adjoyning; yet the Juſtice of his Title, his undaunted Courage in his worſt Condition, and conſtant Reſolution to recover his Right, and reſtore the Liberties of France, were ſuch Endearments of him to his Country-Men, that it ſoon appear'd, that tho' Henry had largeſt Territories, Charles had moſt Hearts, which tho' under ſome Fears and Confinements, yet as Opportunity offer'd fell ſo by Degrees to him, that the Engliſh were quite expell'd France, and Charles regain'd all his Hereditary Rights, and an abſolute Dominion over that Kingdom, yet not without ſome Difficulty and Struggling with a various Fortune, as the Hiſtory of the following Years will ſhew us.

His Frenzy, and the Cauſe of it.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1.

Henry VI. proclaimed King ſolemnly in Paris.

Charles the Dauphin crowned King of France.

The great Change which had thus happen'd by the Death of King Charles, the beſt Friend of the Engliſh, much awaken'd the vigilant Mind of the Duke of Bedford, who could eaſily foreſee the approaching Dangers of the Engliſh from the preſent King, who was not more Contemptible to others, than Formidable to him. He knew that

Duke of Bedford's Care to preſerve France.

(c) Mezeray, the moſt Authentick Hiſtorian among the French, writes, that he fell Diſtracted by this means. He was going upon an Expedition againſt the Duke of Bretaign, and as he rode on a very hot and ſultry Day arm'd from Head to Foot, his Page that carry'd his Lance following him, he happen'd to drop aſleep, and the Page by chance let the Lance fall on his Helmet, which not only awaken'd him, but threw him into ſuch a Fury that quite bereft him of his Senſes, inſomuch, that he fell upon all that were about him, and had certainly killed ſome of them had he not been prevented by being laid hold on. His Diſtemper, ſays the ſame Author, grew greater by a Fright the next Year, when Dancing in a Mask, the Cloaths of his Fellow Maskers being daubed with Pitch and Roſin, took fire, and before they could be undreſſed they were burnt or ſtifled, the King was ſnatched out of the Flames by a Lady of Maſculine Courage; and this Accident ſo frighted him, that he never entirely recovered the Uſe of his Underſtanding.

(d) As King of England, ſtiled Henry the Sixth, and as King of France, Henry the Second.

the

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1.

the Engliſh Yoke could never be made eaſie to the French Necks, and that ſince now by the Death of the late King they had no Bond to hold them to their Allegiance, tho' never ſo often ſworn and promiſed, but Conqueſt, they could expect Subjection from them no longer, than either Fear or lack of Opportunity could prevent their Revolt. This put him upon uſing all means to ſecure the Dominions of his Maſter, which he was ſenſible could not be always effectual, yet he hop'd it might preſerve them to ſome advantageous Accidents. And the firſt Thing he did was to reinforce the Army which King Henry his Brother had left in France, and place over it ſuch Commanders, as were not only eminent for their Loyalty, but ready to undertake the boldeſt Attempts to maintain the Rights of their Country. With part of which he well fortified all the Garriſons on the Confines of the Engliſh Pale, and the reſt he kept on Foot to oppoſe any ſudden Invaſion upon them by the Dauphin or his Party: Then he aſſembl'd all the Nobility, as well French as Engliſh to him at Paris, and having in a grave Speech reminded them of their Duty and Allegiance to King Henry VI. their undoubted Sovereign, to whom they had not only oblig'd themſelves to be faithful and true by the ſolemneſt Oath made to his Father, but were ty'd by their preſent Intereſts; for as by their voluntary Subjection they were now ſettled in the quiet Enjoyment of their Honour and Eſtates, ſo by their Revolt they muſt neceſſarily expoſe themſelves to all the Miſeries of a renew'd War, which they muſt expect would be ſo much the more Mercileſs, by how much a treacherous Friend is always accounted as the worſt of Enemies, he perſwaded them to renew their Faith to the King, and take a freſh Oath of Fidelity to him. This Advice was readily comply'd with by all the Nobles and others preſent, who did their Homages to him in the King's Behalf, and took a ſolemn Oath of Allegiance to him, which being ſo good a Preſident to all of inferior Degrees, the Regent impoſed the like Oath upon all Perſons as well Engliſh as French within King Henry's Dominions in France. Beſides theſe Things, he took the moſt effectual Care he could to keep Normandy, the Ancient Inheritance of the Engliſh, in Subjection, by encouraging the Nobility, and placing ſtrong Garriſons among them, and that he might eſtabliſh the Engliſh Sovereignty as firmly as he could among the French, he call'd in all the Ancient Coin, and had it new made and ſtamped with the Engliſh Arms quarter'd with thoſe of France, ſtrictly forbidding, that any Money coin'd by the late King Charles ſhould be Current in King Henry's Dominions, and ordering, that no Money ſhould paſs in Payment, but what had both the Engliſh and French Arms upon it. Two new Pieces were Coin'd as Badges of the Engliſh Sovereignty, one of Gold, call'd a Salus, of Twenty Two Shillings Value, and another of Silver, call'd a Blans, of Eight Pence Value. Thus did the Regent as wiſely and cautiouſly provide for the Continuance of the Engliſh Power and Dominion in France as Human Prudence could deviſe, ſo that whatever might after fall out, he ſecur'd himſelf from any Negligence or deſerv'd Blame.

French ſwear Allegiance to K. Henry.

But the Regent's Care was not thought ſufficient to maintain ſo conſiderable a Part of the Engliſh Dominions, as France was deſervedly accounted; the Duke of Glouceſter, who was equally concern'd to defend his Nephew's Right, thought it a Subject fit for the Conſultation of a Parliament, which he ſummon'd for that End to meet, Novemb. 9. The Deſign of their Meeting being only to provide for the War in France, little of Publick Concern was enacted, but what Neceſſity requir'd, and therefore only Three Acts of that Nature paſſed, viz. 1. To inveſt in the Lords of the King's Council, a Power to appoint Officers and Workmen to coin Gold and Silver, in as many Places as ſhall ſeem to them convenient. 2. To enjoin all Sheriffs, four times a Year, to proclaim in their Juriſdictions all Statutes in Force concerning Purveyors, that they may not abuſe the People's Ignorance or Credulity in Buying. 3. To baniſh certain Iriſh Men out of the Realm, who having taken Sanctuary in Oxford, committed many Rapes, Murthers, and heinous Diſorders in the Nation, to the great Diſturbance of the adjoyning Countries. Moſt part of the Seſſion was ſpent in contriving Supplies for the carrying on the Conqueſt of France, and it was at length unanimouſly granted, That for every Sack of Wool exported, Five Nobles ſhould be paid to the King for Three Years next enſuing; and an Act was made at the ſame time for an Allowance to be given the maim'd and decrepit Soldiers, who had ſerv'd King Henry V, in his Wars with France, out of the Territories conquer'd by their Aſſiſtance, and Spoils taken in the War. With this Supply of Money the Protector, the Duke of Glouceſter, raiſed a Body of able Men, and in the Spring ſent them over to aſſiſt his Brother againſt the Power of the New French King, whom they had reaſon to ſuppoſe would be ſtruggling for his Right, as indeed they ſoon found he did.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1.

First Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

While the Engliſh Governours were thus providing to ſecure their Conqueſts in France, Charles, then call'd King of France, was no leſs Active to raiſe an Army to regain his Kingdom, of which he had left little more than the Title, for ſcarce any Province adher'd to him but Languedoc, and that able to do him little Service, being aſſaulted on the one Hand by John De Chaalons, Prince of Orange, and on the other by the Lord Rochebaron, Governour of the Dioceſſe of Velay, Friends to the Engliſh; but yet the loweſt Ebbs of Fortune could not make him deſpair, having as he frequently uſed to ſay, God and Right on his ſide. With his Friends in Languedoc he began to lay the Foundation of his enſuing Power, and with ſuch an Army as he could pick up, which he put under the Command of the Count de Fois, encountred the Prince of Orange, and Lord Rochebaron, whom he eaſily overcame, being but weak in themſelves, and at too great a Diſtance to receive any timely Aid from the Engliſh. This Province being thus ſettled, he put it under the Government of Charles de Bourbon, Count de Clermont a Prince of the Blood, and as grateful to the People as faithful to himſelf, and being encourag'd by this Succeſs he return'd to Poictiers to proceed in his Affairs, and raiſe an Army great enough for his Deſign, if it could be done with all his Intereſts. The Scots were his Friends, as they had always been to the Kings of France, but he was forced in ſo deſperate a Condition to give them greater Encouragements than Ordinary, preferring ſome of their Nobles to the greateſt Offices about him, as Charles Steward, Earl of Buchan, he made Conſtable of France, and gave him the Lordſhip of Aubeny, which his Poſterity long enjoy'd, and James, Earl of Glaſcoe, Marſhal, and beſides chooſing one Regiment of his Guards out of them (which is continu'd to this Day.) Theſe Favours ſhew'd to the Scots, gain'd them readily to his Aſſiſtance, and made them not ſparing in lending him Aid to recover that Dignity, which they were ready to believe by theſe Earneſts would be their Gain

King Charles his endeavours to regain France, and recovers Languedoc.

The Scots aſſiſt Charles.

A. D. 1423.

as

A. D. 1423. Reg. 1.

as well his own. He ſent alſo to his Friends into Italy and Spain to require their Aid, who were not backward to his Deſires, but lent him a convenient Force, which ſo elevated the Hopes of his Friends at Home (of which he had ſome Perſons of Note in every Province of his Kingdom) that they alſo ſet all Engines at work to draw off the People from their Subjection to the Engliſh, and invite them to recover their ancient Freedom and Rights, in which they were ſo ſucceſsful, that in a few Weeks they had gathered a great Army able to compaſs their Deſigns, and were aſſur'd privately of the Fidelity and Obedience of many conſiderable Towns, yea, even of the greateſt part of the Pariſians themſelves, who tho' they dar'd not declare for him, yet would be ready as Opportunity ſhould offer to act for his Advantage, which perhaps they ſhould be the better able to do by being reputed Friends to the Engliſh. Thus did the Affairs of the Two Rival Kings ſtand. Henry had moſt of the Kingdom of France, but Charles had the moſt of the French. Henry was fear'd moſt, but Charles lov'd beſt. Henry was forc'd to truſt his Enemies, but Charles to fight againſt his Friends: And then it was eaſie to gueſs which way the Victory would at length turn; for what Prince can be ſo Powerful that Treachery cannot undermine, and what Prince ſo Weak as not to conquer where his Enemies are loth to ſtrike and glad to yield, thereby to throw the Victory into the Hands they'd have it.

The Italian's aſſiſt King Charles.

Duke of Bedford makes Alliances for the Safety of King Henry.

The D. of Bedford with a watchful Eye obſerving the Growth of the Dauphin's Intereſt, feared that he would ſoon be, what he had as yet only the Title of, King of France, unleſs all ſpeedy Means were uſed to cruſh him in the Beginning; and tho' he had a very good Force by him, yet he found it neceſſary to ſtrengthen himſelf by a ſtrict Alliance with ſuch neighbouring Princes as might prove moſt prejudicial to the Engliſh by joining with their Adverſaries: Whereupon he invited the Duke of Burgundy, Peter, Duke of Bretagne, with his Brother Arthur, Earl of Richmond, John, Prince of Orange, and Amadeus, Duke of Savoy to an Interview at Amiens, and there enter'd into a League both Offenſive and Defenſive with them againſt Charles the pretended King of France. And that he might oblige them firmly to hold to their Promiſe, he marry'd Anne the Duke of Burgundy's Siſter, and the Earl of Richmond his other Siſter Margaret. From this Confederacy ſprung almoſt an irreſiſtible Oppoſition to all the Pretences of Charles to the Crown, for they all agreed to guard their ſeveral Parts of France againſt him and his Adherents, and to keep ſo ſtrict a Watch upon all his Motions, that he ſhould never be able to make any conſiderable Reſiſtance. The Duke of Burgundy undertook the Defence of Picardy, and put in John of Luxenburg to drive out the Dauphiniſts (as they were call'd) out of the Towns they had poſſeſſed themſelves of. The Earl of Salisbury was placed with a ſtrong Body of Men in Champaigne and Brie, not only to ſuppreſs any Inſurrections, but keep the Pariſians in awe. The valiant Earl of Warwick was ſent into Gwyenne to take thoſe Towns that held out for the Dauphin, and the Prince of Orange was ſent with a good Army to ſuppreſs his Intereſts in Languedoc and Dauphiné. Thus did the Duke of Bedford provide as ſtrong a Force to reſiſt, as Charles had to oppoſe, and made as firm Alliances to uphold and to maintain K. Henry's Dominions, as Charles had to regain them, ſo that they ſeem'd almoſt an equal Match, ſcarce able to ſubdue each other, unleſs ſome ſpecial Decree of Heaven ſhould turn the Scale, as it may ſeem to have done in favour of the French, as the following Hiſtory will manifeſt.

A. D. 1423. Reg. 1.

Several Places taken by the French and Engliſh.

Both Parties being thus provided for Action, they were as eager to try their Fortune one againſt the other, as they had been to fit themſelves for it. The Engliſh are ſaid by the French Hiſtorians to have begun the Game, and the French by the Engliſh, Report perhaps having out-run the real Attempts of either ſide: But this is credible, that they began to aſſault each other's Territories with equal Fury and Courage almoſt at the ſame time. The Engliſh beſieg'd Bazas in Guienne, and took it without much Difficulty, being a ſmall and weak City; but Charles undertook a more important Attempt by the Siege of Pont-Meulan, a fair City, then well fortified by the Engliſh, and ſtanding upon the River Seine at a convenient Diſtance from Paris, where he was certified he had many Friends who would be helpful to him, if he could make himſelf Maſter of a Place ſo fit for Communication with them. The eager Deſire he had to gain this City made him carry on the Siege with the greater Diligence and Severity; for having obtain'd it by Force before the Engliſh could ſend any Relief, he put the whole Garriſon to the Sword. The Duke of Bedford was ſenſible of the Inconvenience of this Loſs, and ſo much the more becauſe he found the Pariſians more uneaſie under his Government, and endeavouring by all means to get him out of their City, under a Pretence, that the adjoining Caſtles were troubleſom and hurtful to them, which he eaſily diſcern'd was only contriv'd to declare for their own King without Danger, and therefore reſolv'd upon the Recovery of it whatever it coſt him. Thomas, Earl of Salisbury, a Perſon not inferior to the moſt eminent Roman Captains, was thereupon ſent with a ſtrong Army to beſiege it; but becauſe K. Charles was ſenſible that the Garriſon was unable to make any conſiderable Defence, and he was loth to loſe the Advantage he had got, he ſent a Relief to them under the Command of the Earl of Aumerl the Conſtable of France, and the Lord Anechy, who having with them a good Body of hardy Scots endeavour'd by a pitch'd Battel to raiſe the Siege. The Engliſh as valiantly under their brave Commander maintain'd the Siege, and ſo a bloody and fierce Fight began, which concluded after ſome Hours in favour of the Engliſh, and with a great Loſs to the French, for there were ſlain 1800 French Men, and above 3000 Scots, and among them ſeveral great Men and Commanders, viz. of the French, the Earls of Leſtrake, Comigens and Tonnoire, the Lords Coquart de Cameron, De Port and Montmorancy, the Baſtards of Arminack and Forreſts, and the Viſcount of Touraine; and of the Scots, the Lord of St. John's Town, Sir John Balgary, Sir John Turnbel, Sir John Holiburton, Sir Robert Liſlie, Sir William Dowglas, Sir Alexander Hume, and many others. The Conſtable who had loſt his Eye in the Battel was taken Priſoner, with the Earl of Vantadour, Sir Alexander Meldrum, Sir Lewis Ferignie, and 2200 Gentlemen of the French ſide. The Engliſh, tho' Conquerors, yet kept their Ground with the Loſs of ſeveral of their Commanders, as Sir John Grey, Sir William Hall, and Sir Gilbert Halſall, one of their Marſhals of the Field, and 2100 common Soldiers. The Misfortune of the French in this Attempt ſo diſheartned the Beſieged, who were Spectators of the Battel, that they immediately ſurrendred the Town upon theſe Conditions.

Montacute, Pont-Meulan retaken by the Engliſh, and the Conditions of the Surrender.

I. That the French Garriſon ſhould depart out of the Town without Damage or Impediment, but ſhould leave behind them all their Horſes, Armour, and other Habiliments of War.

A. D. 1423. Reg. 1.

II. That all the Riches of the Town, as Gold, Silver, Jewels, and the like, ſhould be a Spoil for the Engliſh.

III. That all Perſons who had ſerv'd Henry V. in his Wars againſt France, or had ſworn to a final Peace with the Engliſh, as alſo all the Soldiers within the Garriſon, that were either Scots, Iriſh or Engliſh, ſhould be left to the Mercy of the Engliſh; and all others who would ſwear Fealty and Homage to King Henry ſhould have their Liberties given them immediately without Ranſom.

IV. That if there were any Perſon found in the Town who was either actually guilty of the Death of the Duke of Burgundy, or had been conſenting any ways to his Death, that he ſhould have no Benefit of this Agreement, but ſhould be deliver'd up to the Regent to be puniſh'd, with ſome other Articles of leſs Importance. The Recovery of this Town was of great Advantage to the Engliſh.

Duke of Bedford puniſhes the Pariſians, and preferrs the Earl of Saliſbury and Sir John Falſtoff.

The Regent having thus remov'd the Danger which the near Approach of K. Charles's Forces threatned him with, ſet himſelf with all Diligence to ſecure the Engliſh Intereſts more firmly; he firſt inquir'd into the deſign'd Revolt of the Pariſians, and puniſh'd the Leaders of it with Death. Then he ſent Sir John Falſtoff to reduce the Caſtles of Pacy and Courſay, which being in the Hands of the French, who pretended themſelves Friends to the Regent, were become troubleſom to the Engliſh at Paris upon K. Charles's Succeſs. Theſe Sir John Falſtoff with a good Force of Engliſh Soldiers ſoon reduced, and returning with a good Booty and many Priſoners to the Duke, they were put into the Keeping of more Faithful Perſons. But the Regent, who was of as eminent Wiſdom as Fidelity, thought it not more Prudent to curb his Enemies than encourage his Friends, and therefore preferr'd the Earl of Saliſbury and Sir John Falſtoff to Places of greater Truſt for their Services of this Year. The Earl of Saliſbury he made Lieutenant and Vicegerent for the King in the Counties of Brie and Champaign, and Sir John Falſtoff, Great Maſter of his Houſhold, his Deputy in the Dutchy of Normandy, lying on this ſide the River Seine, and Governour of the Countries of Anjou and Main, which Honours, as they ſhew'd what Reſpect the Regent had for their Fidelity and Valour, ſo they became a ſtrong Obligation upon them to be Indefatigable in his Service, as indeed they were ever after. (e)

Tranſactions in England, and Accidents.

During theſe Tranſactions in France by the French and Engliſh, many Things not unworthy Obſervation happen'd in England, but none of ſo fatal an Influence as the Marriage of the Protector Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, which ſhall be more diſtinctly related in its Order. November the 7th, the Body of the Heroick Prince, King Henry V. being brought out of France, was bury'd in the Abbey-Church of Weſtminſter at the Feet of St. Edward, as is more largely related in his Life. About March the 2d was William Tailour a Secular Prieſt, and Miniſter of Briſtol burnt for Hereſie in Smithfield. He had been accuſed ſeveral Years before of holding ſome Erroneous Opinions contrary to the Doctrines of the Preſent Church, and infecting the People of Briſtol with them by his Preaching, viz. 1. That whoſoever ſhall hang any parts of Holy Scripture about his Neck to defend him from any Danger or Infection, or to free him from any bodily Diſeaſes or other Maladies (as was frequently done) taketh away the Honour due unto God only, and giveth it to the Devil. 2. That no Human Creature, neither in Heaven nor Earth is to be Worſhipped. 3. That the Saints in Heaven are not to be Worſhipped or Invocated. For theſe Doctrines he was ſummon'd to appear before Thomas Arundell then Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury at Lambeth; and altho' they were then condemn'd as Erroneous and Heretical, yet becauſe he deny'd that he had at any time deliver'd them as his own Opinions or Senſe, but only propounded the ſame to argue about them, and with all promiſed, that he never would hold or favour any ſuch Opinions hereafter, he was diſmiſſed from his Impriſonment upon his Corporal Oath, and Security given into Chancery for his good Behaviour for the future. But he was not ſet at Liberty long, when a freſh Accuſation was brought againſt him under his own Hand, concerning ſome Heretical Doctrines which he had vented in ſome Letters written to Tho. Smith a Prieſt of Briſtol, wherein he had aſſerted, That every Prayer wherein we Petition any Supernatural Gift, ought to be made to God only, and to pray to any Creature on that Account is Idolatry. Theſe Aſſertions being examin'd by the Convocation then held by Henry Chicheley, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury in St. Paul's Church were condemn'd as Heretical; and he being Sentenc'd to Death as a lapſed and incorrigible Heretick, was firſt degraded of his Prieſtly Office, and deliver'd to the Secular Power to ſuffer the Puniſhment of his Crime, which he did in Smithfield with great Conſtancy and Chriſtian Reſolution. Whether the Shedding of this good Man's Blood provok'd the Divine Diſpleaſure to inflict the Puniſhment on the Nation that follow'd, is not for Us to determine, yet it was certainly the Effect of ſome Sin of like Nature, for from Midſummer to the End of September, there fell every Day ſuch Quantities of Rain, that the Harveſt was in great Danger of being utterly loſt for want of Seaſonable Weather to have the Corn in; yet ſo great Diligence was uſed, that Wheat at London was not ſold for more than Eight Shillings a Quarter, and Malt than Five Shillings. But the moſt Unfortunate Accident in England was (f) by the Marriage of the Duke of Glouceſter. The French Hiſtorians ſay, That by this Match, Providence, who had for a long time frown'd upon the French for their Sins, began to ſhew that he had ſome remainders of Favour for them, beginning now to revive the French Monarchy again, and reſtore them to their Ancient Liberties and Privileges. Upon this Occaſion, Jaquet or Jaqueline, ſole Daughter and Heireſs to William of Bavaria, was by the Death of her Father left the Government of the Earldoms of Henault and Holland, two large and populous Countries. She was marry'd to John, Duke of Brabant before, but leaving her Huſband upon a Pretence that he was a too near Relation to marry her (or as others, for his unkind Uſage of her) ſhe came into England, and being a Woman of an ambitious Humour, ſought her a New Husband. The Duke of Glouceſter, though then at the Helm of a great Kingdom, yet knowing that his Glory would have a Period by his Nephew's Age, ſought to make himſelf an Abſolute Prince by marrying her, and accordingly ſhe became his Wife to the great Diſpleaſure, not only of the Duke of Brabant,

The Marriage of the Duke of Glouceſter, and ill Conſequents of it.

(e) And ever had been ſo.

(f) He did not marry till the next Year, the Third of Henry the Sixth, Anno 1424.

but

A. D. 1425. Reg. 3. but of the Duke of Burgundy his Father's Brother's Son, whoſe Friendſhip, as it had raiſed and eſtabliſhed the Power of the Engliſh in France, ſo his Enmity which was cauſed by this Quarrel, prov'd the utter Deſtruction of the Engliſh Intereſt there.

Reg. 2. The Earl of Saliſbury's ſucceſsful Atchievements, and taking Montaquillon.

The Valiant Earl of Salisbury having lately receiv'd ſuch an Encouragement to exert his Natural Courage for his Maſter's Honour and Intereſt, began this Year with many brave Attempts, which were attended with the deſir'd Succeſs, ſo that the Ruin of K. Charles ſeem'd almoſt unavoidable: For he beſieg'd and took the Town of Cravant in Auxerre, and the Towns of Vertus, and Eſperney in Champaign, with many other ſmaller Towns that were either affrighted or allur'd by their Example. But Montaquillon, a ſtrong City in the Country of Brie coſt him a great deal of more Time and Labour, for it held out the Siege above Five Months, and was at laſt gain'd with no ſmall Loſs to his Army; but the Victorious Triumph which the Engliſh made at the taking recompenc'd their Pains and Loſs abundantly, for the Conditions of Surrender were very Honourable (which the French Hiſtorians call ſtrange and miraculous), viz.

I. That the Town with all its Treaſure and Riches ſhould be reſign'd to the Engliſh, their Lives and Houſes ſaved.

II. That the Captains of the Town, Pregent de Cotinie, and of the Caſtle Guille Burgois,, both Bretons, ſhould ſwear never to bare Arms againſt the Engliſh on this ſide the River Loire.

III. That all the Soldiers ſhould be left to the Mercy of the Regent, and ſhould go to the Tournelles in Paris, where the Regent then reſided, with bare Heads, and a Rope about their Necks, and a Dagger at their Breaſts, which was done, and they all had ſuffer'd Death, had not the Dutcheſs of Bedford obtain'd their Lives of her Huſband thro' meer Commiſeration to them.

While the Earl of Salisbury thus victoriouſly manag'd the Engliſh Affairs, the Earl of Suffolk was no leſs Induſtrious to carry on their Conqueſts another way; for he took the two ſtrong Caſtles of Coucy and La Roche, and the Regent himſelf beſieg'd and took the Caſtles of Crotoy and Riol, by which means the Kingdom of France was almoſt entirely ſubject to the Engliſh, having an abſolute Command of all Places as far as the Banks of the River Loire.

Second Parliament, its Acts.

This Year in July was born to Charles the Titular King of France his firſt Son, whom he nam'd Lewis. His Birth was receiv'd with great Joy by his Adherents, and was thus far advantageous to him, that it mightily confirm'd his Party to uphold him thro' the Hopes of a Succeſſor, and brought over to them all thoſe who had any Affection to the French Monarchy. But all the Comfort his Father had in him was in his Child-hood, he proving in his riper Age Ambitious and Rebellious, aſpiring ſo eagerly to his Father's Throne, that he could not wait Nature's Leiſure, but ſought to depoſe him.

The Protector being now loaden with many difficult Affairs of State, iſſu'd out his Summons to call the Parliament to meet, Octob. 20. and becauſe he thought the Preſence of the Infant-King might be a means to engage both Lords and Commons to be Zealous for his Intereſts: He thereupon was brought up by his Mother from Windſor, and at the opening of the Seſſion (g) ſat upon his Mother's Knee in the Chair of State among his Lords. The Speaker in an Eloquent Speech to the Lords, firſt extoll'd his Perſon, and told them, That ſuch a Divine Sweetneſs appear'd in his Face as foretold all the Happineſs which could be expected from a good Prince, and the Son of ſuch an unparallel'd Father, and then recommended to their Care the Government of the Nation in his Infancy, Exhorting them not only in Compaſſion to his tender Age, but in Conſideration of their own Honour ſo to manage the Publick Affairs, as that neither the King nor his People may have juſt Cauſe to blame them when he came to his Government himſelf. The Lords and Commons were eaſily perſwaded to do what they knew reaſonable in it ſelf and their Duty, and therefore immediately enter'd into Conſultation for the Publick Benefit. The King ſtay'd but a few Days in the City, but with his Mother on November the 26th remov'd to Waltham-Croſs, and not long after to Hartford, where he kept his Chriſtmas with the uſual Magnificence, the King of Scots being there with him. In the mean time the Parliament employ'd their whole Care and Thoughts for the Publick Good, and after much Deliberation Enacted and Order'd many Things of great Advantage to both Nations; for as to England they confirm'd all the Ancient Rights, Privileges and Franchiſes of the Church, and Lords Spiritual and Temporal, Cities and Boroughs, and all other the King's Subjects, and further enacted, That all Merchants trading in Wool ſhould ſell their Merchandizes at Calis only ſo long as the Staple continu'd there, by which means the Subjects of both Kingdoms were greatly enrich'd; That no Coin of Gold or Silver ſhall be carry'd out of the Realm upon any Pretence whatſoever, unleſs it be for the Payments of Soldiers, and other Expences of the King's Wars beyond the Seas, upon the Penalty of forfeiting the ſaid Sum ſo carry'd out. That a ſort of baſe Money call'd Blanks ſhall not be accepted or tender'd in any Payment upon Pain contain'd in the Stat. of Hen. 5. againſt Gally-halfpence, Saskins and Dotkins, both which Acts were well contriv'd for the Advantage of Trade and the Wealth of the Nation, becauſe the Exportation of Money is the Ruin of the Riches of a Kingdom. And that Juſtice might thrive with Trade, it was alſo enacted, That all Officers made by the King's Letters Patents in any Courts of Juſtice ſhould not only be Men of Integrity themſelves, but ſhould be ſworn to entruſt no Under-Clerks, for whoſe good Behaviour they themſelves would not be reſponſable, that there might be no Falſehood, Bribery or Extortion in adminiſtring Juſtice, to the great Wrong of the People. And for the Security of the King's Perſon, it was further enacted, That if any Perſon, who is committed to Priſon for Grand or Petty-Treaſon, ſhall break Priſon and eſcape, his Crime ſhall be taken pro confeſſo, and his Goods and Chattels may be ſeiz'd by the Lord of the Manor where they were found, as if he were actually Condemn'd and Executed. Beſides the Statutes made for the Benefit of England, it was ordain'd, That nothing ſhould be omitted neceſſary for the Preſervation of France, and that the Lord Protector ſhould ſend ſuch Supplies of Men and Money to his Brother into that Nation, as ſhould be judg'd requiſite for the Defence of it againſt the Pretenſions of K. Charles. And ſo the Parliament broke up with much Applauſe and Commendation.

A. D. 1423. Reg. 2.

A. D. 1424.

In the Time of this Seſſion of Parliament, and by and with the Conſent of the ſame, the Protector (ſollicited by Mordicai, Duke of Albany) conſidering, not only that James, King of Scots, had been long detain'd Priſoner in England without a juſt Cauſe, but that being ſet at Liberty he might probably ſo manage him to a firm Friendſhip with the Engliſh, that he would deny the French King the Aſſiſtance of his Subjects the Scots, whoſe Valour had almoſt wholly ſupported him, ſet him free from his Captivity, and provided a large Retinue to convey him honourably into his own Country; but leaſt this Obligation ſhould be forgotten he marry'd him to the Lady Jane, the Daughter of the Duke of Somerſet, and Couſin-German to the King, (b) with whom he had a large Dowry, beſides many Gifts of Plate and Jewels which her Kindred of the Nobility preſented him with, and at his Departure induc'd him to take this following Oath of Friendſhip and Fidelity to the King of England, viz.

(g) This Parliament was ſoon called after Eaſter in the following Year, and 'twas then the Infant-King ſat in the Houſe. Hol. pag. 589.

A. D. 1424. Reg. 2.

James, King of Scots ſet at Liberty.

His Oath to King Henry.

I James Steward, King of Scotland ſhall be true and faithful unto thee Henry, by the Grace of God, King of England and France, the Noble and Superiour Lord of Scotland, and to thee I make my Fidelity for the ſaid Kingdom of Scotland, which I hold and claim of thee; and I ſhall bear you my Fidelity and Faith of Life and Limb and Worldly Honour againſt all Men, and faithfully I ſhall acknowledge and do you Service for the Kingdom of Scotland aforeſaid. So God me help and theſe Holy Evangeliſts.

His Treachery.

With theſe Ties of Friendſhip was he diſmiſſed and ſent Home, but nothing could oblige him to deſert the French Intereſts; for ſoon (i) after his Return Home, either thro' a natural Affection to that Nation, or elſe deſirous to reſcue himſelf from all Badges of Subjection to the Engliſh, he entred into a ſtrict League with the French King, and ſeal'd it with the Promiſes of a Marriage between his Daughter Margaret and Lewis the Dauphin.

Sir John Mortimer accuſed of Treaſon, and Executed.

In the Month of February, and while the Parliament was yet ſitting, one William King a Servant of Sir Robert Scott, Keeper of the Tower of London, accus'd Sir John Mortimer, a Priſoner in the Tower, upon the Act of the laſt Parliament concerning Eſcapes, alledging many other Articles againſt him, viz. 1. That the ſaid Sir John Mortimer had contriv'd with him to break out of his Impriſonment, and had promis'd him immediately a Reward of Forty Pound a Year to be aiding and aſſiſting to him in his Eſcape, and afterward an Earldom. 2. That the ſaid Sir John told him, that after his Eſcape he would go into Wales to the Earl of March, and having rais'd 40000 Men would enter the Kingdom again and cut off the Heads of the Protector and Biſhop of Winchester. 3. That he had told him, that the Earl of March was rightful Heir to the Crown of England, and that after him he was the next Heir; wherefore if the Earl of March refus'd to recover his Right, he himſelf would take upon him the Regal Power as is due. 4. That when he came into Wales, if the Earl of March would not accept his Service, nor engage in his Cauſe, he would then fly into France and aſſiſt the French King againſt King Henry, and did not doubt but in the End he ſhould gain his Deſign. This Impeachment was brought againſt the ſaid Sir John Mortimer before the Lords and Commons aſſembl'd in Parliament, and was ſo fully prov'd againſt him by the ſaid William King, that he was found Guilty of High-Treaſon, and condemn'd for it to be hang'd and quarter'd, which Sentence was accordingly Executed upon him at Tiburn, and his Body was bury'd in St. John's Church at Clerkenwell. The Earl of March tho' nothing of a Conſpiracy could be prov'd againſt him, yet was ſent into Ireland with ſome others, to ſecure the Kingdom from Danger, and dy'd there ſoon after.

A. D. 1424. Reg. 2.

A freſh Army of Engliſh ſent into France, who conquer'd many Places.

While the Parliament was thus buſied, the Protector made it his Care to get Supplies for France to reinforce the Engliſh Army there, which tho' Succeſsful in all its Atchievements almoſt, yet was much diminiſh'd, and by his Induſtry rais'd an Army of 10000 able Men, which he ſent over in the beginning of the Spring well arm'd and provided. This prov'd a ſeaſonable and happy Recuit, for Charles began to overpower the Engliſh, and get ſome Advantages againſt them, for he had lately taken Compeigne and Crotoy from them. But the Arrival of theſe freſh Men reviv'd the Spirits of the diſcourag'd Engliſh; for the Regent putting them under the Command of the Valiant Earl of Salisbury and Earl of Suffolk, ſent them out to recover their late Loſſes, and oppoſe the further Progreſs of the French King, which they did ſo effectually, that within a ſmall time not only Compeigne and Crotoy were regain'd, but many other Places taken from K. Charles, viz. Baſide, Riol, Rula, Gyronde, Baſyl, Mormond, Milham, Femal, Mauron, Daras, and many other Towns and Caſtles of no ſmall Strength and Importance. Some ſmall Skirmiſhes in other Places had paſs'd between the French and Engliſh which being to the Diſadvantage of the latter, did ſomething abate the Glory of their Conqueſt; for Sir John de la Pool Brother of the Duke of Suffolk, Captain of Auranches in Normandy having aſſembl'd to him all the Garriſons in the Marches of Anjoy, made an Aſſault upon the City of Angiers, plunder'd and burnt the Suburbs, and pillag'd all the adjoyning Country, carrying away as many Priſoners and as much Cattle as they could conveniently. The Earl of Aumerl, and Viſcount Narbon were then the Governors of the Town and Caſtle; and though they could not prevent the Miſchief the Engliſh had done by reaſon of the Suddenneſs of it, yet ſeeing them retreat in much Diſorder, and clogg'd with the Priſoners and Spoil they had taken, they reſolv'd to revenge their Loſs, and redeem both their Credit and Captives: Whereupon Sallying out with 6000 French Men they purſu'd and fell upon them. The Engliſh were in ſo great Confuſion that they could make no conſiderable Reſiſtance, and ſo were eaſily routed and overthrown, 300 being ſlain, all their Spoil loſt, and above 600 taken Priſoners, among whom were Sir John de la Pool himſelf, Sir John Baſſet, Sir John Aufort, and ſeveral other Commanders and Perſons of Note. But in theſe Petty Skirmiſhes the Advantage was not always on the French Men's ſide, for Sir Matthew Gough with a Party of Engliſh routed the Baſtard de la Baulm, and the Lord Craignac who with a good Body of Men had made an Aſſault upon

The Engliſh Loſs at Angiers.

(b) She was Daughter to John, Earl of Somerſet, and Siſter to John, Duke of Somerſet, and Couſin German to Henry the Fifth, the King's Father: The Scot's King marry'd her in the Second Year of his Reign, and before he return'd Home he did Homage to the young King of England in the Caſtle of Windſor in theſe Words.

I James Steward King of the Scots ſhall be true and faithful unto you Lord Henry, by the Grace of God, King of England and France, the Noble and Superiour Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, which I hold and claim of you; and I ſhall bear you my Faith and Fidelity of Life and Limb and worldly Honour againſt all Men, and faithfully I ſhall acknowledge and ſhall do you Service due for the Kingdom of Scotland aforeſaid. So help me God, and theſe Holy Evangeliſts. Hol. p. 587.

(i) It cou'd not be ſoon after, for his Daughter Margaret was not born till ſeveral Months after her Mother's Arrival in Scotland, and 'tis not probable that they talk'd of marrying her before ſhe was a Year or two Old.

A. D. 1424. Reg. 2.

upon Maſconnois, and took the ſaid Baſtard Priſoner with his own Hands, whom he preſented to the Earl of Salisbury, but receiv'd him again of the Earl for a Gift, with a Horſe of great Value: So that the former Loſſes abated little of the Victories of the Engliſh. Yet the Regent was not contented with the Succeſs of the Arms of his Men, who though they gain'd ſomething daily, yet the Competitor of the Crown being yet alive, and rather increaſing in Strength and Intereſt, than declining, he knew there could be no ſafe Enjoyment of what they had, nor any Hopes of a Ceſſation of Arms; whereupon he contriv'd all he could to bring Things to a Concluſion by drawing the French King to a pitch'd Battel, and either Conquer or be Conquer'd; for a State of continual Wars damps all the Comforts of Victory, and makes Conqueſt it ſelf no Pleaſure. To effect this the Regent could find no better way than to lay Siege to Verneuil (k) in Perche, a moſt important Place belonging to the French King, which all his Intereſts were engag'd to defend, and accordingly the Engliſh Army ſat down before it in the beginning of Auguſt. The Captain of the Town, Moſieur Gyrard held out a while Valiantly againſt the Engliſh, but at length came to a Capitulation, and promiſed to reſign the Town if it were not reliev'd by a Day appointed, and immediately ſent King Charles Word of the Agreement. The Relief of the Place was thought neceſſary, and an Army of French and Scots was diſpatch'd thither to raiſe the Siege with all convenient Speed under the Command of the Duke of Alenzon, Earl of Boughan, Conſtable of France, Archibald, Earl of Dowglas, Viſcount Narbon, Lord Ventadour and others; but before they could get thither the City was reſign'd into the Hands of the Engliſh according to the Capitulation, becauſe the Succour came not time enough. The Reſignation of the Town being known to the Duke of Alenzon put him into ſome doubt, whether he ſhould not Retreat without Battle, ſince the Town could not be ſav'd; but entring into Conſultation with his Commanders, it was reſolv'd to go forward and give the Engliſh Battel, ſince they could not retire without Danger to themſelves, and a Brand of Cowardize upon their Perſons; wherefore they march'd toward the Engliſh and on a fair Plain near the Town drew into a Form of Battel. The Duke of Bedford, glad of this Opportunity of deciding the Quarrel, which he had long deſir'd, and now ſought, advanc'd towards them from the Town in great Order, and on Auguſt 28. gave them Battel. The Diſpute was very ſharp and furious, as though the fate of either ſide depended on the Succeſs of that Combate. Equal Courage, and equal Strength appear'd on both Parts, ſo that the Victory was long dubious, till at length the Engliſh prevail'd and utterly routed the French Army, ſlaying, as our Engliſh Writers relate (l) 10000, but as the French ſay, but 5000, and taking Priſoners the Duke of Alenzon, the Lords Tajeſt and Hormit, Sir Peirce Harriſon, and other Gentlemen to the number of 200 beſides common Soldiers. The Viſcount Narbon, though ſlain in the Fight, was after Hang'd on a Gibbet, becauſe he had been One of the Murtherers of the Duke of Burgundy. The Engliſh loſt 2100 Men, but none of Note, which made the Victory the greater, becauſe the French loſt not only moſt of their Men, but moſt of their beſt Commanders, as well Scotch as French, viz. the Earls of Aumerl, Dowglas, Boughen, Ventadour, Foreſt and Marie, the Lords Gravile, Fountains, Ambois, Gaules, Touars, and Poiſy, with above 300 Gentlemen more, a Loſs much harder to be recover'd, than that of the Common Soldiery. This Victory reduc'd the French King to very great Streights, as well of Fortune as Mind. He was extreamly troubl'd at the Defeat, but more at the Effects of it, which render'd him unable to defend himſelf or the Countries that adher'd to him, (m) yet he was reſolv'd to hold up his State as well as he could; and tho' he fear'd every Day to be turn'd out of all, yet he kept up ſomething of a Majeſtick Grandure at Poictiers, having his Nobles about him in form of a Court and his Parliament, Chancery, and other Courts for the Adminiſtration of Juſtice, and Management of his Revenues, and other Affairs of the Crown, as if he were in the higheſt Dignity.

A. D. 1424. Reg. 2.

The Duke of Bedford beſieges Verneuil, and takes it.

A pitch Battle between the Engliſh and French, in which the Engliſh overcame.

Reg. 3.

The Regent after his ſignal Victory having puniſh'd ſeveral Deſerters for their Baſeneſs and Treachery, which he apprehended after the Fight, and ſettl'd his Affairs in Normandy return'd to Paris, where he was receiv'd by the Duke of Burgundy and his own Dutcheſs with great Joy, and continued there all the Winter. The good Effects of this Victory which were eaſily foreſeen, fill'd the Regent's Mind with ſo much Eaſineſs, that he gave himſelf a little more Liberty than uſual to enjoy his Pleaſures, and ſpent his Chriſtmas in making great Feaſts for the Nobility of France, and the Engliſh Commanders. In one of them he feaſted the Old Queen of France, Duke of Burgundy Earl of Salisbury and Suffolk, with many other Perſons of divers Nations, and to divert them he was pleas'd himſelf to Juſt, which he never did before. The Duke of Burgundy alſo, who was a Perſon of a very aimable Feature, and graceful Behaviour, much pleas'd the Company with Dancing and Juſting, though the extream Civility which he ſhew'd to the Counteſs of Salisbury kindl'd ſuch a Diſguſt in her Husband's Breaſt, that he ever after bore him a Grudge. But theſe Days of Jolity were kept within their due Limits, by the Regent, who wiſely knew how to uſe Pleaſure without any hindrance to his Buſineſs; and therefore as ſoon as his Mind was a little refreſhed with innocent Divertiſments, he returns again to his Care of his Charge, and the firſt thing he enter'd upon was to make the beſt Advantage of his late Succeſs, before Charles could recruit his Loſſes, and to that End he ſends out the Lord Scales, Sir John Montgomery, and Sir John Falſtoff with an Army of 2000 Men to take in ſuch Towns and Caſtles in Anjou and Main, as ſtill held out againſt the Engliſh. This Army had no ſooner began their March into thoſe Countries, but ſuch a Terror ſeized upon all the Inhabtants, that thy yielded all up to them, as though it were a thing impoſſible to withſtand the

The D. of Bedford's Joy after his Victory.

Several Caſtles and Towns in Anjou and Main yielded to the Engliſh.

(k) 'Twas Ivry that the Duke of Bedford beſieg'd. Verneuil was in the Hands of the Engliſh, and the French took it by ſending a falſe Meſſage to the Garriſon, that they had routed the Duke of Bedford's Army, and raiſed the Seige of Ivry, upon which the Duke of Alenzon and his Troops were receiv'd into the Town. In the mean time the Engliſh took Ivry, the Duke of Bedford march'd immediately to give Alenzon Battle, and it appears by this Account that the Engliſh and not the French were thoſe that firſt offer'd the Battle. Hol. p. 588.

(l) Mountjoy, King at Arms in France, and the Engliſh Heralds there preſent reported, That there were 9700 French and Scots kill'd, and 2100 Engliſh. The Number of the Slain on the French Side was as great as that of the Engliſh Army which conſiſted but of 1800 Horſe, and 8000 Foot. Hol. p. 588, 589.

(m) Which were only the Provinces, or rather Counties of Bourbon, Auvergne, Berry, Touraine, part of Anjou, Poictou, and part of Languedoc.

A. D. 1428. Reg. 3.

the ſmall Engliſh Power, and ſo the Engliſh without any Aſſault became Maſters of the ſtrong Caſtles of Beaumont, Le Viſcount, Teune, Sally, Oſce, Rouſſie, Vaſce, and above Twenty more in a few Days. But Mans, the Principal City of the Province of Main, being a Place well Peopled and ſtrongly fortified refuſed to accept the Engliſh, and therefore the Earl of Salisbury was ſent with an additional Force of 8000 Men to beſiege and reduce it into Subjection. This Town though very ſtrong held out but a little while, becauſe the Earl made not uſe of the common battering Engines, but of Guns, which with their Shot ſoon laid their Walls and Towers flat, and brought the Inhabitants to a Capitulation to ſurrender the Town upon theſe Articles.

The City of Mans beſieged, and ſurrendred upon Articles.

I. That all Perſons, as well Soldiers as others that would abide and continue ſtill in the Town, ſhould be ſuffered to remain without any Harm or Damage either to themſelves or Goods.

II. That ſuch as would depart, eſpecially of the Soldiers, ſhould have Liberty to leave the Town with their Horſe and Harneſs. And

III. That all Perſons in the Town who were any ways guilty or conſenting to the Murther of the late Duke of Burgundy ſhould be delivered up to the Earl to be puniſhed for it: And ſo this City was ſurrendered to the Engliſh.

The Earl of Salisbury being now at the Head of a puiſſant Army able to carry on the Progreſs of his deſigned Victories, thought this a fit Opportunity to enlarge the Engliſh Conqueſts, and therefore immediately lays Siege to the Town of St. Suſan, of which one Ambroſs de Loire a valiant French Man was Governour, who ſo well defended it, that in many Aſſaults the Earl was rather a Loſer than Winner; whereupon he was forced to make uſe again of his great Guns to batter and beat down their Walls. Theſe new Engines of Death, which no Valour nor Strength of Man can be a ſufficient Defence againſt, made the Beſieged change their Counſels, and contrive the ſafeſt way for their Preſervation by agreeing to reſign their Town. The Engliſh having receiv'd ſome Damages by the Garriſon held them to the harder Terms, ſo that they could not gain their Lives, but upon Condition, that beſides reſigning the Town, they ſhould pay them 200000 Crowns, and then they ſhould have Liberty to depart the Town in their Doublets only, which they ſubmitted to; and ſo the Engliſh became abſolute Maſters of it, and Sir John Popham was made Captain of it. From this Place the Earl carrying on his Victories, went and laid Siege to the Caſtle called La Fert Barnard, but deferred to aſſault it by reaſon of the News brought him of the Danger that the Town of Alenzon was in to be loſt on this Occaſion. The French King's Party being ſo weakned by their late Overthrow were not able to recover their Loſſes by Strength, and therefore were conſtrained to uſe Policy and Stratagem, for which they had an Opportunity at Alenzo thus. One Charles de Villiers a French Captain had an intimate Acquaintance with a Gaſcoigne, who was a Soldier in the Engliſh Garriſon there, and having by him diſcovered how the Town was guarded by the Soldiers by turns, agreed with him for a preſent Reward of a conſiderable Sum of Money in Hand, and Promiſes of future Preferments and Advantages, to let him with a Body of Men into the Town, upon a certain Day appointed, but the Gaſcoigne countermining the French Men, as ſoon as the Bargain was made, gave the Earl of Salisbury Notice of it, that he might ſecure the Town and ſeize the French. The Earl thereupon ſent the Lord Willoughby and Sir John Falſtoff with 2000 Men to effect it, who lying in Ambuſh for them at their coming, who were not above 300 Foot-men and 200 Horſe, ſuddenly encompaſſed them on all ſides, and falling upon them ſlew all of them, but 25 Men, who in the Scuffle eſcaped by the Strength and Swiftneſs of their Horſes. Alenzon being thus ſecured and the Engliſh Army return'd, the Earl of Salisbury went on with the intended Siege of La Fert Bernard and took it, which ſtriking Terror into the adjoining Garriſons induced many to yield to the Earl without Reſiſtance. The Regent, who was not a little affected with the good Services of the Earl, made him Governour of all the Places and Caſtles he had taken, that the Growth of his Honour might encourage him in Brave Actions. The News of the great Succeſſes of this Year being carry'd over into England, was not received with greater Joy than Thankfulneſs to God, who had bleſſed the Engliſh Arms, and according to the Manner of thoſe Times a ſolemn Proceſſion was celebrated with all ſerious Demonſtrations of Praiſe to God for it.

A. D. 1425. Reg. 3.

The Town of St. Suſan taken.

Alenzon agreed to be betrayed, but ſaved.

The Earl of Saliſbury takes Fert Bernard, and is made Governor of all the Places and Caſtles he had taken.

On the laſt Day of April the Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and becauſe the King's Preſence, though but an Infant, was thought neceſſary, he was carry'd through the City upon a great Horſe toward the Parliament-Houſe on the Firſt Day of the Seſſion. The People flock'd in great Multitudes to behold him, and imagining with themſelves that they could eaſily diſcern the Virtues of his Father to be tranſplanted into him by Nature, loaded him with loud Acclamations of Divine Bleſſings, and Hearty Wiſhes of a long and happy Life. The Parliament having their Infant-King in their Eyes (for he was often carry'd to the Houſe this Seſſion) was very careful and earneſt to do every Thing that could be thought neceſſary for the Support of his Honour and Majeſty, being the more induſtrious to Act for him, by how much he was leſs able to ſhift for himſelf. Several Acts were made for the Publick Benefit, of which the chief were, 1. Againſt the Exportation of Sheep beyond Sea without the King's Licenſe, becauſe by carrying of Sheep into Flanders and other Parts, the Wool of England would at length become of little Value, and the Woollen-Manufacture of the Nation be diminiſh'd to the Damage of the Realm, to prevent which they laid an heavy Tax upon Exported Wools, of Forty Three Shillings by the Sack, Ten Shillings more than ever was paid in England for the like quantity. 2. For the Exportation of Butter and Cheeſe to encourage Husbandry, giving the Chancellor of England leave to grant Licenſes at his Diſcretion to ſuch Perſons as ſhall deſire them to ſell and vend the ſame in all Foreign Parts, as well as a the Staple of Callis. 3. That all Merchants, Strangers, within 15 Days after they are landed in any Port of this Kingdom, ſhall take up for themſelves Lodgings, or ſome other Habitation in the Town or Place, where the Port is, under ſome Engliſh Man, and ſhall not make any ſale of any Goods or Merchandizes till they are ſo ſettled, and then ſhall ſell all their Merchandizes within 40 Days next enſuing, and if any Goods after that time ſhall remain unſold, they ſhall be forfeited to the King's Uſe. This Act was intended for a double Benefit, 1. That the King might not be defrauded by Strangers of his Cuſtoms: And next, That Strangers might not by keeping of their Goods and Merchandizes underſtand the Wants of the Nations, and ſo raiſe the Prizes. After theſe Acts the Parliament gave gave the King a Tax of Twelve Pence per Pound upon all Merchandizes, whether brought into, or carry'd out of the Realm, except Wool, which they had otherwiſe taxed, and Wines, upon which they laid Three Shillings per Tun for Three Years next enſuing. And then they were diſmiſſed into their ſeveral Countries.

Third Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

A. D. 1425. Reg. 3.

Duke of Glouceſter and Jaqueline his Wife go to recover her Inheritance in Henault and Holland.

Soon after the Parliament was riſen, the Duke of Glouceſter, who had ever ſince his Marriage been making Preparatons of Ships and Men to recover his Wife's Inheritance in Henault and Holland, went over with his Dutcheſs, and an Army of Engliſh Men of 12000 at the leaſt, all of known Courage and Ability, and well accoutred. He landed at Callis, and paſſing through the Duke of Burgundy's Country with all his Force without doing any Damage, arriv'd at Mons in Henault; and being there receiv'd and welcom'd as their Lord, many of the Nobles and Towns came and ſubmitted themſelves to him. The Duke of Brabant, who was in Poſſeſſion of thoſe Countries, was highly diſpleaſed with this Action of the Duke of Glouceſter, and ſince he not only had cohabited with Jaqueline as his Wife for Ten Months, and Pope Martin V. had declared the Marriage of the ſaid Jaqueline with the Duke of Glouceſter to be utterly unlawful and ſinful, he was reſolved to diſpute his Title with him by Arms. Great part of thoſe Countries adhered to him, and many of the Nobles employ'd their Intereſts to ſupport him in the Poſſeſſion, but he moſt depended upon the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Burgundy (n) his Brother, who ſtood much upon the Juſtice of his Cauſe, and had promiſed him all his Aſſiſtance he could make, by which means an Army of 50000 Men appeared in Oppoſition to the Duke of Glouceſter under the Command of Philip, Earl of St. Poll, and Pierre de Luxenburg, Earl of Conuarſon his near Kinſman. The Duke of Glouceſter ſeeing ſuch an unexpected Union againſt him, too great for him to conquer, ſent an Herald to the Duke of Burgundy to expoſtulate with him about his aſſiſting the Duke of Brabant, charging him with Treaſon againſt the King of England, and challenging him to a ſingle Combat. The Duke of Burgundy made his Defence, 'That he could not think himſelf guilty of any 'Breach of his Fidelity to the Engliſh, in oppo-'ſing his Injuſtice in depriving another Man of 'his Wife, contrary to the Ordinance of God, 'and Rules of Holy Church; and to clear him-'ſelf of this Charge he ſent the Duke of Glouce-ſter Word, That he would accept the Combat. The Duke of Glouceſter being thus diſappointed of his Deſign, which was by this Meſſage to have brought off the Duke of Burgundy, drew off his Forces and departed with them immediately into England, upon Pretence of making Preparation for the Combat, leaving his Dutcheſs behind him at Mons. His Departure left a way open to the Duke of Burgundy's Deſigns, who ſo wrought with the Citizens of Mons, that they delivered up the Dutcheſs into his Hands, who convey'd her to Gaunt, and there kept her. The Dutcheſs being thus betray'd Politickly carry'd her ſelf without any Reſentment of the Treachery, and pretending her ſelf very happy in falling into his Hands, promiſed to be govern'd by him in all Things, ſaving that ſhe would not be perſwaded to return to her Husband again. The Duke not ſpying the Deceit of the Woman, gave her a Civil Entertainment, and made her Confinement very eaſie, which ſhe no longer endured than ſhe could get a fair Opportunity to eſcape, which ſhe did in a little time, and fled into Holland. Here ſhe was joyfully receiv'd by divers Lords and Perſons of Intereſt, by whoſe Aſſiſtance ſhe was able to maintain a defenſive War againſt the Duke of Burgundy; and that ſhe might depoſe her Husband, ſent to the Duke of Glouceſter to aid her. The Duke, tho' now little valuing her, yet thinking himſelf in Honour oblig'd not utterly to forſake her, ſent over to her Aſſiſtance 1000 Men, under the Conduct of the Lord Fitz-walter. The News of theſe Aids rouſed the Duke of Burgundy, who fearing leaſt Jaqueline ſhould reſign the Country of Holland into the Hands of the Engliſh, aſſembled all his Forces he could, and going into Holland poſſeſſed himſelf of all he could, and reſolv'd to hinder the Landing of the Engliſh Troops. On the other ſide, Jaqueline and the Lords on her part, ſought all the Means they could to ſecure them a ſafe Landing, and poſted themſelves near Bruſſels; but the Duke of Burgundy falling upon them before they could unite for mutual Defence, routed both the Engliſh and Hollanders, ſlaying about 800, taking many Priſoners, and putting the reſt to Flight, the Lord Fitz-walter himſelf hardly eſcaping. This Defeat put an end to this Quarrel; for the Duke of Glouceſter gave over all Hopes of thoſe Countries, and knowing his Marriage to be unlawful with Jaqueline, marry'd Eleanor (o) the Daughter of Reginald Lord Cobham; and the crafty Dutcheſs Jaqueline, ſeeing herſelf unable to ſtand out longer againſt the Duke of Burgundy, pretended herſelf to be perſwaded by him, and ſo was reconciled to her Husband. Nothing of all theſe Wars remained, but the Combat of the Dukes. Honour obliged both not to ſhrink from their Engagement, and therefore they both made the neceſſary Preparations for it: But the Regent of France conſidering that it might be of very ill Conſequence to the Engliſh, became a Mediator between them, and made a friendey Concluſion of all.

Duke of Burgundy oppoſes them.

Dutcheſs of Glouceſter deliver'd to the Duke of Burgundy, but eſcapes.

Duke of Burgundy routs Jaqueline's Forces.

About the latter end of this Year of the King's Reign, the Earl of March, who had been ſent into Ireland above a Year before, died there at Trimmes, leaving no Iſſue, and left his Honour and Eſtate to Richard Plantagenet, Earl of Cambridge, his Siſter's Son, who being thereby Heir to Lionel, Duke of Clarence entertain'd many aſpiring Thoughts of the Crown of England, which he after put into Action, as we ſhall in the Sequel of this Hiſtory have a ſufficient Evidence of.

Earl of March dies.

Reg. 4.

About Michaelmas, Peter, Duke of Coimbra, Eldeſt Son of the King of Portugal, came into England, and finding a kind and generous Entertainment from the Protector and Nobles, ſtay'd the whole Year to inform himſelf of the Cuſtoms, and enjoy the Pleaſures of the Country. (q) In the time of his Abode here, there happen'd a fierce and mighty Quarrel between the Protector and the Rich Biſhop of Wincheſter, Henry Beaufort, the King's Great Uncle, the Engliſh Pope, who in his Magnificence and Grandure ſeem'd ſo much to out-ſhine the Protector himſelf, tho' on the Throne almoſt, that he drew his Odium and Hatred upon him, which was ſo increaſed by the haughty Spirit of the Biſhop, who being the Protector's Uncle and Pope's Legate, carry'd himſelf as if he were much above him both in Nature and Grace, that the Prote-

Prince of Portugal came into England.

A Quarrel between the Protector and Biſhop of Wincheſter.

(n) He was not his Brother, but his Couſin. Hol. p. 1079.
(o) Who before had been his Miſtreſs.
(p) This Prince's Mother was the Duke of Lancaſter's Daughter, Great Aunt to Henry the Sixth.

ctor

A. D. 1425. Reg. 4.

ctor could not endure his Pride, and ſo an implacable Enmity grew between them, and great Parties were raiſed on both ſides for each others Defence. The Biſhop's Dependances, Money and Church-Power making him able to contend with the Protector himſelf. The Duke of Coimbra, and the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury interpoſed themſelves to reconcile them, and were ſo zealous to heal this dangerous Breach, which would, if continued in, prove a fatal Damage to Church and State, that they went from the one Party to the other ten Times in one Day: but all proved to no purpoſe. No Mediations could pacifie the Mind of the Protector, and Wincheſter would yield no further than was becoming his Place and State, tho' he was willing for the Good of the Nation, that the Difference might be compoſed without Arms; and therefore wrote a Letter into France to his Nephew the Duke of Bedford, that he would come over and heal Matters between them. By the Copy of the Letter it may be diſcerned how great the Quarrel was, and how far it had proceeded; and withal how deſirous the Biſhop was to have it made up, though he counts himſelf not to blame, and therefore it is ſet down in the very Words, and Old Language it was written. (q)

The Biſhop of Wincheſter's Letter to the Duke of Bedford.

* Right High and Mighty Prince, and my Right Noble, and after One, Leineſt [Earthly] Lord. I recommend me unto you [your Grace] with all my Heart. And as you deſire the Welfare of the King Our Soveraign Lord, and of his Realms of England and France. Your own weal [health] with all yours [with ours alſo] haſte you hither: For by my Troth, if [and] you tarry [long] we ſhall put this Land in Jeopardy [adventure] with a Feild; ſuch a Brother you have here, God make him a good Man. For your Wiſdome well knoweth, that the Profit of France ſtandeth in the Welfare of England, &c. The Bleſſed Trinity keep you. Written in great haſte at London on All-hollowen-Even. By your true Servant to my Lives end.

Henry Wincheſter.

* The Words within theſe Marks [ ] ſhew the Difference in the Copies of this Letter

Duke of Bedford goes into England to reconcile them.

This Letter, which was ſent over to the Regent by his Chamberlin Sir Robert Butler, was received by him with no ſmall Grief, becauſe he knew the Advantage his Enemies would make of it, for a Civil War in England would utterly ruin the Conqueſt of France, and therefore reſolved with all ſpeed to paſs into England to put an end to it if poſſible. Richard Beauchamp the Famous Earl of Warwick was lately come into France with a Recruit of 6000 Men, which much favoured his Deſign, being a Perſon for his Courage and Fidelity every ways fit to be entruſted with the greateſt Charge: Whereupon he conſtituted him Regent of France in his Abſence, and took his Journey to England, with his Dutcheſs, and a Train of 500 Men. He arrived there on the Tenth of January. The Biſhop of Wincheſter with a numerous Train met him at his Landing, and attended him towards London. At Merton he was met by the Mayor and Citizens of London, who joyning with the other Company honourably conducted him to Weſtminſter, where he was lodged in the King's Palace, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter in the Abbot's Lodgings. The next Day the Mayor preſented the Regent with a pair of Silver Baſons gilt, and in them a Thouſand Marks of Gold from the City, which he accepted very kindly. But theſe Ceremonies were uneaſie to the Regent, who came over upon a more important Matter, and therefore as ſoon as Decency would permit, he obtain'd that a Council of the Nobles might be called to examine and determine the Cauſes of the Differences between theſe two great Men, and accordingly it met on the 21ſt of February at St. Albans, where were many hot Conteſts between both Parties, but nothing being concluded it was adjourned to Northampton, and there met, but to as little purpoſe; whereupon it was put off to the Meeting of the Parliament, which was appointed to be on March the 25th following at Leiceſter.

A. D. 1426. Reg. 4.

A. D. 1426.

Fourth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The Meeting of the Parliament drawing nigh, when it was uſual for the Lords to come with great Numbers of Servants and Attendants, and it being feared, that the great Trains of the Protector and the Biſhop of Wincheſter might fall into open War one with another, if no Reſtraint were laid upon them: It was therefore thought fit, that the King ſhould ſtrictly forbid any Perſon coming to it with Swords, or other Warlike Weapons; Which Order though it was literally obſerved, yet the Lords Attendants came with Batts, or great Clubs on their Shoulders, from whence this Parliament was called, The Parliament of Batts, but this, as ſoon as it was taken Notice of, was alſo Prohibited. In this Parliament little was done for the Publick, only an Act paſſed for granting the People Liberty to tranſport Corn into all Places beyond the Seas, unleſs to the King's Enemies, with ſome other of particular Concern for Sheriffs and Juſtices, becauſe it pleaſed the whole Aſſembly to look into the Diſſention between the Protector and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, which was grown ſo high, that no leſs Means could pacifie them, and the Authority of this Court was irreſiſtible; wherefore they were allow'd to debate all Cauſes of Quarrel between them fully and freely. The Protector was the Perſon aggrieved as he pretended, and therefore he brought a large Accuſation in Six Articles againſt the Biſhop, and the Biſhop was allow'd to give his particular Anſwer to them; which becauſe they were thought not unworthy of the Parliament's Notice, may not be beneath the Reader's Peruſal, and are as follows.

(q) The Letter is in Holinſhed, p. 591.

The

A. D. 1426. Reg. 4.

The ARTICLES of Accuſation preſented to the Parliament by the Duke of Glouceſter, againſt Henry, Biſhop of Wincheſter, with his ANSWERS to them ſeverally.

I. THAT Richard Woodvile, Eſq; Keeper of the Tower of London, did by the Inſtigation and Encouragement of the ſaid Biſhop of Wincheſter deny Admittance to him the ſaid Duke of Glouceſter, then being Protector of the Kingdom, into the Tower contrary to Reaſon and Duty, and in Derogation to the King's Authority.

To this Article the Biſhop anſwer'd, 'That 'while the Duke of Glouceſter was gone into 'Henault, it happen'd, that many Pamphlets 'and Reports being diſperſed up and down the 'City of London tending to Rebellion, it was 'order'd by the Lords of his Maieſty's Council, 'that Richard Woodvile, Eſq; ſhould with a ſufficient Number of arm'd Men have the keeping of the Tower, and ſhould not permit any 'Man to come into the Tower ſtronger than 'himſelf without the ſpecial Commandment 'of the King, by the Advice of his Council. 'After this ſtrict Charge the Duke of Glou'ceſter returning out of Henault, and not approving the fortifying the Tower, told the 'Citizens, who were diſſatisfied at it, That had 'he been in England it ſhould not have been ſo, 'and immediately going to the Tower demanded 'Admittance, but Woodvile not daring to give 'him Entrance came to the Biſhop of Wincheſter 'for Advice, who told him, That the Duke of 'Glouceſter took upon him greater Authority than 'he ought, and that before he admitted him into 'the Tower, he ought to provide himſelf a ſufficient 'Warrant of the Council and King for his ſo doing 'contrary to the former Order.

II. That my Lord Biſhop of Wincheſter without the Advice and Conſent of my Lord Duke of Glouceſter, or of his Majeſty's Privy-Council, contrived and purpoſed to lay Hands of his Majeſty's Perſon, and to have remov'd him from Eltham, the Place that he was then in, to Windſor, there to put him under the Government of ſuch Perſons as he pleaſed.

The Biſhop's Anſwer to this Article was, 'That he never could propound to himſelf any 'Advantage by removing the King, or taking 'him into his Cuſtody or Charge, nor did ever 'intend to mettle with any Thing about the 'King's Perſon without the Advice of the Pri'vy-Council, as in Time and Place he could 'prove.

III. That my Lord Biſhop of Wincheſter knowing, that the Duke of Glouceſter had reſolv'd to prevent his Deſign of ſeizing the King's Perſon at Eltham, laid wait for him, by placing arm'd Men at the End of London-Bridge, and in the Windows of the Chambers and Cellars in Southwark to have kill'd him, if he had paſſed that way, all which is againſt the King's Peace, and Duty of a true Subject.

The Biſhop's Defence to this heavy Charge was this, 'That true indeed it is, that he did 'provide a certain Number of arm'd Men, and 'ſet them at the Foot of London-Bridge, and 'other Places, without any Intention to do any 'bodily Harm to the Duke of Glouceſter, but 'merely for his own Safety and Defence, being 'inform'd by ſeveral credible Perſons, that my 'Lord Duke of Glouceſter had purpoſed bodily 'Harm to him, and gather'd together a company of Citizens for that End.

A. D. 1426. Reg. 4.

IV. That the late King Henry the Fifth told him, That when he was Prince, a Man was ſeized in his Chamber, who was hid behind the Hangings, and confeſſed after his Apprehenſion, that he was ſet at Work by the Biſhop of Wincheſter to kill the Prince in his Bed. He was deliver'd to the Earl of Arundel, who drown'd him in a Sack in the Thames.

To this Accuſation the Biſhop reply'd, 'That 'he was ever a true and faithful Subject to his 'Soveraigns, and never purpoſed or contrived 'any Treaſon againſt any of their Perſons, and 'eſpecially againſt his Soveraign Lord King 'Henry the Fifth. And this he thought was 'ſufficiently evident to any that conſider'd the 'great Wiſdom and Courage of the ſaid King, 'and the great Truſt he repoſed in him ſo long 'as he remain'd King, which he would not have 'done had he found him Guilty of ſuch Unfaithfulneſs to him while he was Prince.

V. That the Biſhop of Wincheſter in the Sickneſs of King Henry the Fourth, adviſed his Son Prince Henry, to aſſume the Government of the Nation before his Father's Death, as the ſaid Prince himſelf told him.

The Biſhop reply'd, 'That this was mere 'Calumny, which could not be prov'd, and 'he hop'd the Parliament would appoint them 'Judges, that he might vindicate his Honour, 'or elſe leave him to ſue out his Right before 'ſuitable Judges.

VI. That my Lord Biſhop of Wincheſter had in his Letter to the Duke of Bedford plainly declared his malicious Purpoſe of aſſembling the People, and ſtirring up a Rebellion in the Nation contrary to the King's Peace (r).

The Biſhop's Anſwer to this Accuſation was, 'That he never had any Intention to diſturb 'the Peace of the Nation, or raiſe any Rebel'lion, but ſent to the Duke of Bedford to come 'over in haſte to ſettle all Things that were 'prejudicial to the Peace; and though he had 'indeed written in the Letter, That if he tar'ry'd, we ſhall put the Land in Adventure by a Field, 'ſuch a Brother ye have here, he did not mean 'it of any Deſign of his own, but concerning 'the Seditious Aſſemblies of Maſons, Carpenters, Tilers and Plaiſterers, who being diſta'ſted by the late Act of Parliament againſt exceſſive Wages of thoſe Trades, had given out 'many ſeditious Speeches and Menaces againſt 'the great Men, which tended much to Rebel'lion, and yet the Duke of Glouceſter did not 'uſe his Endeavour, as he ought to have done 'in his Place, to ſuppreſs ſuch unlawful Aſſem'blies, ſo that he fear'd the King and his good 'Subjects muſt have made a Field to withſtand 'them: To prevent which he chiefly deſir'd the 'Duke of Bedford to come over.

(r) The Copy of theſe Articles is in Holinſhead, p. 591. but they are only Five in Number, the Sixth and Laſt mention'd by this Author is not in Holinſhead's Copy.

A. D. 1426. Reg. 4.

This Charge, and the Anſwers to it being thus deliver'd into the Parliament, the further Examination of it was by the Houſes devolv'd upon a ſelect Number of Lords, viz. Henry, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas, Duke of Exeter, John, Duke of Norfolk (s), Thomas, Biſhop of Durham, Philip, Biſhop of Worceſter, John, Biſhop of Bath, Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, Ralph, Lord Cornwal, and Mr. Alnwicke, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, who having thoroughly examin'd all Matters, acquitted the Biſhop, and by a formal Award enjoyn'd them to be firm Friends for the future, and by ſuch Inducements wrought upon them, that they ſhook Hands, and parted with all outward Signs of perfect Love and Agreement, which gave a mighty Satisfaction to all People both of the Clergy and Laity. And the King by the Advice of his Council made a magnificent Feaſt at Whitſuntide to rejoyce for this happy Reconciliation. At this Feaſt the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, Knighted King Henry, who immediately made Richard Plantagenet, Earl of Cambridge, Duke of York, and reſtor'd John, Lord Mowbrey, Earl-Marſhal, Son of Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, who was baniſh'd by Richard the Second, to the Title and Stile of Duke of Norfolk, and made above Forty others Knights. After this the Parliament ſat till June the 15th following, but did nothing more than raiſe a Supply of Men and Money to carry on the Conqueſt of France, which were gather'd out of the great Cities and Towns of the Kingdom chiefly.

The Pretector and Biſhop of Winchester made Friends.

Duke of Bedford knighted King Henry.

The Parliament being diſſolv'd, the King now about Five Years of Age, went to Killingworth-Caſtle, and the Nation remain'd in great Peace. Several remarkable Accidents happen'd after it. Henry Chichely, Archbiſhop of Canterbury founded a College at Higham-Ferrers in Northamptonſhire of Eight Fellows, Four Clerks and Six Choriſters, and an Hoſpital for poor and impotent Folks of the ſaid Town, for which he alſo obtain'd many Immunities and Priviledges. His Two Brethren, Robert and William Chicheley, Aldermen of London, afterward gave very conſiderable Revenues to the ſaid Foundations. This Summer alſo died that wiſe and faithful Stateſman Thomas, Duke of Exeter, great Uncle to King Henry, at his Mannor of Greenwich, and was buried at St. Edmunds-bury in Suffolk, whither he was carry'd with great Ceremony to be interred, and not long after him the ſaid Duke's half Siſter the Lady Elizabeth, own Siſter to King Henry the Fourth, who had been married to the Lord John Holland, Duke of Exeter, and after to the Lord Fanhope, died and was buried in the Black-Fryers in London. John Fortham, ſometime Treaſurer of England, and Biſhop of Durham and Ely at the ſame time died, and Pope Martin put into the See of Ely Philip Morgan, tranſlated from the See of Worceſter thither. The King and Nobility had recommended to the Choice of the Convent William Alnwicke, Doctor of both Laws, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, and the King's Confeſſor, but they neglecting that Propoſal, elected Peter the Prior of Ely: The Pope ſeeing this Diſagreement between the King and Convent, ſet up his own Uſurpations, and put in Philip Morgan. While the Regent continu'd in England the Earl of Warwick was very active, and carry'd on the Engliſh Victories in France with great Succeſs, for he entred into the Country of Main, and beſieged, and took ſeveral Places of Importance, as Chaſteau de Loire, of which he made Matthew Gough Captain, the Caſtle of Maiet, into which he put John Winter, Eſquire, with a ſufficient Number of Men, the Caſtle of Lade, which he gave to William Gladeſdale Gentleman, the Caſtle of Mountdublean, which he committed to the Lord Willoughby, by which Atchievements his Name became a Terror to the French, inſomuch, that when the French in the Country of Beauſſe were gather'd into a Body to have ſet on the Engliſh, the very Fame of his Approach cauſed them to diſperſe themſelves. And ſo having no Enemies to oppoſe him: He return'd to Paris full of Honour and Victories.

Several remarkable Accidents.

Earl of Warwick's Actions in France.

A. D. 1426. Reg. 4.

Reg. 5.

On Saturday being the Eve of St. Michael in the Morning between Two and Three a Clock began a very dreadful Earthquake, which being accompany'd with Thunder and Lightning ſtruck Terror into all Creatures. It continu'd in great Violence for Two Hours, and as it was afterwards found, was general over the whole World, ſo that Men thought the World would then have been at an End, and the Judgment have follow'd according to the Prognoſticks our Saviour himſelf hath given us. The Beaſts of the Field were terrified with this unuſual Motion, and roaring for Fear drew near to the Towns and Houſes to protect them: Nor were the Birds of the Air inſenſible of it, who by their Shreeks and Cries ſhew'd their Fears of it. By ſo great a Judgment did God endeavour to awaken ſecure Men, that if they did not repent even the Birds and Beaſts might witneſs againſt them, and condemn their Hardneſs and Impenitency. About the ſame time was John Rainwell Fiſhmonger choſen Mayor of London, a Perſon of a publick Spirit, a good Magiſtrate, and a great Benefactor to the City; for he gave certain Lands and Tenements for the Uſe and Benefit of Three Wards in the ſaid City, viz. Biſhopſgate Ward, Dowgate Ward, and Aldgate Ward, to pay the Parliament-Taxes for the poor Houſe-keepers of the ſaid Wards for ever (provided they did not exceed Three Fifteens in One Year:) He alſo began the Building of the Tower at the Draw-Bridge of London, Works both of great Charity and general Uſe.

A violent Earthquake.

John Rainwell choſen Mayor.

The Duke of Bedford, Regent of France yet remaining in England, the Duke of Burgundy, now diſaffected to the Engliſh, but ſtill pretending a ſtrict Alliance and Friendſhip with them, made his Requeſt to the Regent to permit the Duke of Alenzon, who had been taken at the Battel of Verneuil, to be redeem'd, and by his Intereſts obtain'd, that upon the Payment of Two Hundred Thouſand Crowns (or as others, Scutes) or Fifty Thouſand Marks, he ſhould be releaſed. The Regent and Protector were very fearful of the ill Conſequence of his Liberty, being a zealous Promoter of King Charles's Intereſts, and an experienced and valiant Commander, and therefore required, that he ſhould firſt acknowledge Henry the Sixth, the rightful and lawful Heir and King of France, but he abſolutely refuſed it, which might have been ſufficient Cauſe to have continu'd him Priſoner in England, but becauſe it was thought neceſſary to gratifie the Duke of Burgundy, who pretended himſelf a firm Friend to the Engliſh, and had been long at Enmity with the Duke of Alenzon about his Father's Death, and by this extraordinary piece of Kindneſs might gain ſo much upon his Affe-

The Duke of Alenzon releaſed from his Impriſonment.

(s) John, Lord Mowbrey was not made Duke of Norfolk till after the Reconciliation of the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Biſhop of Winchester.

ctions

A. D. 1426. Reg. 5.

ctions, as to incline him which Way he pleaſed, therefore he was diſmiſſed, and upon the Payment of ſo ſmall a Sum, (t) ſent Home, but to the great Damage of the Engliſh, to whom he proved a fatal Enemy, as afterward will more fully appear.

A. D. 1427.

Duke of Bretagne and his Brother relinquiſh the Engli Intereſts.

The Regent having kept his Chriſtmas with the King, prepared for his Return into France, where ſome Changes, to the no ſmall Diſadvantage of the Engliſh had hapned in his Abſence; for tho' nothing was wanting in the Earl of Warwick, either of Vigilancy, Care, or Courage, yet the Alliance with the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, began now to be broken by the Departure of the Duke of Bretagne, and his Brother Arthur of Richmond, over to the French King's Intereſts, of whom they were joyfully received; and the latter was made Conſtable of France. This Change was a great Loſs to the Engliſh, and required a ſpeedy Care to prevent the ill Conſequences of it. The Regent therefore about Candlemas departed England, and landed at Callis, Feb. 5. The Biſhop of Wincheſter accompanied him, and at Callis in our Lady's Church, received a Cardinal's Hat from the Pope. The late King Henry V. who foreſaw what a Prejudice the Pride and Covetouſneſs of this Prelate would prove to the Nation, if he were put into that Dignity, withſtood his Promotion, and prevented it all his Life; but now the King himſelf being young, and the Duke of Bedford his Friend, he was at Liberty to obtain his ambitious Purpoſe, which by the Pope's Legate, he was enſtated in at Callis on the Feaſt of the Purification; and ſoon after purchaſed himſelf a Bull-Legantine, by which he was made the Pope's Legate in this Nation, and by his Authority as ſuch, raiſed ſuch a Maſs of Money out of the Spiritualities of the Kingdom, that he became almoſt the only wealthy Man in the Nation, and was commonly upon that Account called, The rich Cardinal of Wincheſter. The Regent ſtayed a while at Callis to ſee this Ceremony over, and honour the Biſhop with his Preſence at his Inauguration, which being ended, the Regent taking him by his Right-hand, conveyed him with mighty Reſpect to his Lodging, and there gave him and the Lords with him a magnificent Banquet, and then within a few Days left Callis, and paſſing thro' Picardy, went to Paris. His Arrival put an End to the Authority of the Earl of Warwick in France, but brought him the News of a more honourable and greater Charge, which the Nobles and Council of England had thought fit to impoſe upon him, viz. to be Governour of the Perſon of King Henry in the Place of the Duke of Exeter, lately deceaſed. This Service the noble Earl could not refuſe; but the Revolt of the Duke of Brittain having occaſioned ſome Troubles to the Engliſh, which he was about to remove before the Regent arrived, he reſolved firſt to ſee them ſettled before his Departure. The greateſt Moleſtation this way, was by the Fortifying of Pontorſon, a Town on the Confines of Brittain, into which the Lord of Ruſtignan, Marſhal of Brittain, with a Body of a 1000 Men was put to defend it, and ravage the adjoining Country of Conſtantine, which they did without Mercy; but at length being encountred by the Garriſon of Auranches, a City in the Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, they were after a long Fight put to flight, and forced into the Town with Loſs, the Captain himſelf being taken Priſoner. The Duke of Bedford hearing of this, and knowing, that tho' the Engliſh had the better in this Skirmiſh, yet how prejudicial the Garriſon would be to their Territories, if not reſtrained, he ſent the Earl of Warwick and Lord Scales, with an Army of 7000 Men to beſiege it, who ſo ſtreightly beſet the Town, that none could go into it, or out. The Beſieged held out very valiantly a long time in hopes of Relief from the French King as was promiſed them, ſo that Proviſion began to be very ſcarce in the Engliſh Camp, and they were forced to ſeek Forage in the adjoyning Parts with much Loſs and Hazard from the Garriſon of St. Michael's Mount. The French King at laſt ſent the Lord Raix, his Lieutenant-General, with an Army of 3000 Men to relieve it, who in his March took two ſmall Caſtles, Malicorn and Lude; but when they came, hearing that the Earl of Warwick and the Engliſh were reſolved to fight him, if he attempted to raiſe the Siege, he drew off his Men, and returned to King Charles, whereupon the Beſieged came to a Capitulation to reſign the Town upon Condition, that they might have Liberty to depart with Horſe and Arms only; which being granted, the Engliſh had Poſſeſſion of the Town given them, and the Earl made the Lord Roſſe and Lord Talbot Governours of it, with a convenient Garriſon, and then returned to the Regent to Paris. This Succeſs of the Engliſh brought the Duke of Bretagne again to a Treaty with the Regent, in which he agreed not only not to moleſt the Engliſh for the future, but to demoliſh the Town of Pontorſon, and St. James de Beauron; and ſo the Duke of Bretagne was made, if not a Friend, yet afraid to be longer an Enemy; and the Engliſh for the preſent were eaſed of his Oppreſſion, which would have proved very troubleſome.

Duke of Bedford's Return into France, and Biſhop of Wincheſter made Cardinal.

The Earl of Warwick made Governour of the King.

Pontorſon beſieged and taken.

Duke of Bretagne brought to a Treaty with the Engliſh.

A. D. 1427. Reg. 6.

The Regent having thus removed this new and unexpected Enemy, turned his Arms again into the old Current to ſubdue all the Towns, that ſtill adhered to Charles, the pretended King of France; and ſent his Captains out to ſubdue ſuch Places, as refuſed Subjection to the Engliſh; and reduced ſeveral of them. For, Chriſtopher Hanſon, Philip Gough, and Martin Godfrey took the Caſtle of St. Laurence de Montuis by Surprize. Sir H. Falſtaffe, the Governour of the Countries of Anjou and Maine, having aſſembled a ſtrong Body of Men, got by ten Days Siege the Caſtle of St. Owen Diſtais near the Town of Laval. Then he laid Siege to the ſtrong Caſtle of Gravile, and aſſaulted it twelve Days, at the end of which, the Garriſon came to a Compoſition, and gave Pledges to reſign it upon a certain Day, if it were not relieved by the French King. Sir John immediately ſignified this Agreement to the Regent, who raiſing a great Force of 20000 Men, came attended with the Earls of Mortaign and Warwick, the Lords Roſſe and Talbot, to encounter the French, if they ſhould attempt the Reſcue of it; but they dare not appear, tho' they were ſent for that Purpoſe, becauſe they were afraid of the Engliſh Army, whereupon the Regent immediately ordered Sir John Falſtaffe to require the Delivery of the Caſtle; but the Beſieged having furniſhed themſelves with Proviſion and Ammunition, and well mann'd it in the Time of Truce, refuſed to ſurrender it, and ſo the Hoſtages were brought out, and hanged in their Sight. After this the Lord Talbot was made Governour of Maine and Anjou, and Sir

Several Places taken by the Engliſh.

(t) 200000 Crowns was no ſmall Sum in thoſe Days.

A. D. 1427. Reg. 6.

John Falstaffe removed to another Charge. This Lord being of as great Courage as Birth, carried on the English Conqueſt ſo faſt in theſe Parts, that his very Name became a Terror to the French, and his Fame ſpread almoſt over the World. The Duke of Bedford alſo hearing that the Town of Montargis in the County of Orleance, was but weakly furniſhed, and carelеſly kept, ſent the Earl of Suffolk, his Brother Sir John Pool and Sir Henry Biſſet, with an Army of 6000 Men to beſet it by Land, and the Earl of Warwick with a good Number of Men of War to ſtop up the Port by Sea, (u) that no Aſſiſtance of Men or Victuals ſhould come into it; but they found the Places ſtrongly fortified, and provided that they held out 2 Months and more, ſo that the French had time to provide for its Relief; and accordingly, Arthur, Earl of Richmond, Conſtable of France, coming ſuddenly upon a Party of the Beſiegers in the Night, defeated them without Reſiſtance, killing above 1500, Sir John Pool and Sir Henry Biſſet hardly eſcaped themſelves, and ſo cauſed the Siege to be raiſed. This Victory was received with great Joy by the French King's Party, and had been triumphantly magnified, had not their Loſſes upon the Coaſts of Brittain, by a Party of Engliſh, under the Command of Sir Nicholas Burdet, ſent by the Duke of Somerſet thither, equalized at leaſt, if not ſurmounted the Advantage they had at Montargis, ſo that the French had little Reaſon to rejoyce at the Succeſſes mixed with ſo much ill Fortune.

Duke of Alenzon takes Mans by Treachery of the Engliſh.

The Duke of Alenzon lately come out of his Impriſonment in England, after ſome Months Converſe in France to learn the Eſtate of the French King's Affairs, and ſettle his own, now enters upon the Stage of Action. The good Opinion that the French had of his Abilities and Experience put new Life into their Cauſe, and drooping Minds, and ſo much the more, becauſe he began with an Action, which had very much of a promiſing Advantage, as well as Succeſs in it, which was the Recovery of the City of Mans. Several of the Chief of the Inhabitants of that City, as well as of the chief Magiſtrates as Clergy, being well affected to the French King, entered into a Conſpiracy to betray the City to him, which they ſignified to him by Letters conveyed by certain Friers. The French King immediately ſent 500 Men under the Command of the Lords De la Bieth and Faiet to take poſſeſſion of the Town, which was accordingly delivered up to them by the Conſpirators, and the Engliſh Guards at the Gates, were all ſlain. The French being thus Maſters of the Town, fell upon the Engliſh, and ſlew many of them, ſcarce any of them underſtanding the Matter, but only ſuppoſing that the Citizens had in general roſe up againſt them. The Earl of Suffolk, the Governour of the Town, had gotten knowledge of the Matter by ſome that had eſcaped; and with what Engliſh he could get into the Caſtle then under the Command of Thomas Gower, Eſq; but they were ſo crowded, that they could make little or no Defence for themſelves, wherefore they ſent a Meſſage to the Lord Talbot then at Alenzon, to deſire his ſpeedy Aſſiſtance, declaring their Caſe to him. The Lord Talbot being as diligent a Commander as valiant, immediately attempts their Relief in the Night, and with 700 Men marches to Mans, where finding the French ſecure, he falls upon them, recovers the Town, releaſes the Engliſh, takes above 400 French Gentlemen Captive, and returns again to Alenzon. The Earl of Suffolk being thus reſettled, made a ſtrict Search and Enquiry into the Authors of this Treaſon, who being found to be 30 of the chief Citizens, 20 Prieſts, and 15 Friers, were all upon Conviction hanged, and ſo received the juſt Reward of their Merits. Mans being thus happily recovered, and the Engliſh every ways on the winning Side, Fortune's Frown ſoon clearing up into Smiles on them, the Earl of Warwick, whoſe Valour would not ſuffer him to leave his Country-Men in any Danger, began to think of Returning into England to take care of the King, whom the Nobles had committed to him. He had done ſo much in France the laſt Year, that the Council did not think that Nation could be kept without a Man of equal Value in his Place, and therefore Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, commonly called in England, The good Earl, was ſent into France with 6000 choice Men well accoutred, to ſupply his Room, and ſecure thoſe Places with equal Valour, with which he had gotten them.

A. D. 1427. Reg. 6.

Earl of Warwick returns into England.

Soon after the Earl of Salisbury's Arrival at Paris with his freſh Men, the Regent called a great Council of all the Nobles and Commanders of the Engliſh Army, and entred into a long Conſultation, how they ſhould proceed for the moſt ſpeedy and effectual Way of ſubduing France; and the Earl of Salisbury, who was a Perſon of both approved Judgment, as well as Valour, propounded to them the Siege of Orleance, as a certain Step to it, it being the principal City which adhered to the French King, and by the Conqueſt of it, would probably let them into all the reſt, and particularly to Bourges, the French King's Reſidence. Some Debates were in the Council about the Difficulty of the Enterprize, but at length they all yielded, and the Siege of Orleance was reſolved on. The Earl of Salisbury himſelf was thought by all of them, to be the fitteſt Perſon to command at the Siege, and accordingly was ſent, accompanied with the Earl of Suffolk, and Lord Talbot, and an Army of 10000 Men well furniſhed with Artillery, Proviſion, and Ammunition for ſo great an Attempt. While Preparations were thus making, the French had got Intelligence of the Deſign of the Engliſh, and put in a ſtrong Garriſon of French and Scots under the Command of the Baſtard of Orleance, and the Biſhop of the City, who not only made ſtrong Fortifications about the Town for their own Defence, but deſtroyed all the Suburbs, in which were 12 Pariſh-Churches, and 4 Monaſteries for as many Orders of Friers; and cut down all the Vines, Trees and Buſhes within 5 Leagues of the City, that the Enemy might find no manner of Support or Refuge in the Country. But all this did not diſcourage the Engliſh, tho' it made the Siege more difficult, yet nothing ſeemed impoſſible to ſuch brave Minds as thoſe of Salisbury and Talbot, who, notwithſtanding marched towards it, and ſate down before it in the Beginning of September, and planted the Siege on the one Side of the River Loire. Both Parties were full of Courage and Reſolution, becauſe the Fate of France depended upon this Siege, as was thought, whoever got Orleance, got all France. The Engliſh made ſeveral fierce Aſſaults, and the French as ſtrictly repulſed them. Three Weeks paſſed without any conſiderable Advantage on Orleance determined to be beſieged.

Orleance beſieged, and a Fort taken by the Engliſh.

(u) Montargis an inland Town ſeated on the little River d'Oſtaine, between Chartres and Orleans, and above an 100 Miles from the Sea.

either

A. D. 1427. Reg. 6.

either Side; but at length the Baſtard of Orleance making a vigorous Sally out of the Gate of the Bridge, was after a ſharp Diſpute beaten back with great Loſs, and purſued ſo cloſe, that the Engliſh entred the Gate with him, and took the great Bulwark upon the Bridge, with a Tower ſtanding at the End of the ſame, which by its advantageous Situation, was a great Help to take the Town, becauſe from it was a free Proſpect into all Parts of the City, ſo that the Engliſh Commanders might eaſily obſerve the beſt Places for their Aſſaults, which they were not wanting to improve; for the Earl of Salisbury cauſed ſeveral Bulwarks to be raiſed round about the Town, planting Ordinance, where he could perceive any likelihood to batter down the Walls. The French within were as buſie to defend themſelves, and make good the Walls againſt the Engliſh Guns, raiſing Guns againſt Guns, and Forts againſt Bulwarks, and making new Rampiers as ſtrong as might be. The French King, who knew how much his Welfare depended upon the Succeſs of this Siege, was extreamly troubled at this firſt Advantage gotten by the Engliſh, fearing now the Loſs of all, and deſpairing almoſt of any future Succeſs, and tho' the Town held out well, yet he looked upon his Deſtruction not leſs certain, tho' longer in coming, and could almoſt have wiſhed the Fates to haſten his Ruin, the Fears of which were as great a Torment to his Mind, as the ſuffering it ſelf could be. But while he remained in this deſpairing State of Mind, Providence was pleaſed not only to give the Beſieged at Orleance ſome Advantage, but to raiſe them up (as the French Hiſtorians ſay) a ſpecial inſtrument of Deliverance, by inſpiring Joan D' Arc, afterwards commonly called Joan of Orleance, both with a certain Perſwaſion of Reſtoring him to his Kingdom and Throne, and with a manlike Courage to effect it, and ſo revived the fainting Hopes of that King, whoſe Courage and Patience was almoſt invincible. And indeed, as if Divine Juſtice had taken ſufficient Vengeance upon the French Nation for their former Sins, he began to give them ſome glympſe of his Favour again, by the Misfortunes of the Engliſh, and Succeſs of the French, which began to ſhew it ſelf in the Death of the Earl of Salisbury, a Perſon of that Wiſdom, Courage and Conduct, that the Fortune of the Engliſh Armies ſeemed to live and dye in him. He was both the Adviſer and chief Actor in this Siege, and knowing perfectly, that the Fate of France depended upon the Succeſs of this Attempt, he was very diligent to improve, and carry on all Advantages for the effecting of it, and cared not to entruſt almoſt any Man without his own Preſence, leſt they ſhould Miſcarry. The Tower, which the Engliſh had taken on the Bridge, was much made uſe of by him, for obſerving where the Town might moſt ſucceſsfully be aſſaulted, and in an upper Room, where the Proſpect of the City lay from a Window, he often entered into Conſultations with his Commanders about Taking the Town. The Citizens were ſenſible of it, and had taken notice, that there was much looking out of the Window, and had thereupon planted a great Gun full upon it, to ſhoot at an Advantage, and a Gunner always attended upon it to diſcharge it as Occaſion ſerved. On the Nine and Fiftieth Day after the Siege began, the Earl of Salisbury, Sir Thomas Gargrave and William Glaſdale, with divers others, were in a deep Conſultation in the ſaid Room, and being obſerved by the Gunner frequently to look out at the Grate, he fired his Gun at them, which Shot ſo ſhattered the Bars of the Window, that one of them ſtruck the Earl of Salisbury on the Face, and put out one of his Eyes, and ſtruck off a part of his Cheek; Sir Thomas Gargrave alſo was ſo grievouſly bruiſed and wounded, that he died within Two Days. The Earl of Salisbury was convey to Meun, on the Loire, and all poſſible Care taken for his Recovery; but his Wound was paſt Cure, ſo that he died at the End of 8 Days; and his Body was ſoon after carried with much Solemnity into England, and buried by his Anceſtors at Biſſam in Barkſhire. He left only one Daughter, who was married to Richard Nevil, Son to Ralph, Earl of Weſtmorland, who was after Earl of Warwick. The Loſs of this great Man, was received with much Grief by all the Engliſh, but by none ſo much as by the Duke of Bedford, who was more ſenſible of his Worth, while living, and ſo of the Damage to the Engliſh by his Death; yet he would not ſeem to want him, and therefore appointed the Earl of Suffolk to be his Lieutenant, and Captain of the Siege; and with the Lord Scales, Lord Talbot, Sir John Falſtaffe, and ſome others, to carry it on with all Vigour and Courage poſſible; who accordingly left nothing unattempted that Policy could deviſe, or daring Boldneſs archieve. But the Town being ſtrong of it ſelf, and filled with a good Garriſon, held out till Lent was almoſt paſt without any Signs of Yielding, putting the Engliſh Camp to very great Streights for Proviſion, which they were forced to fetch as far as Paris, becauſe the Country round about them was depopulated and deſtroyed. At length the Beſieged beat for a Parley, and came to a Treaty to ſave themſelves. The Engliſh accepted it, but the Beſieged would not agree to reſign it to the Duke of Bedford, but only to the Duke of Burgundy to be kept for the Duke of Orleance, or his Brother the Duke of Angoleſm, hoping either to obtain more Favour from their Country-Man if it were granted, or if not, to beget a private Grudge between them, which indeed came to paſs; for when he had ſent to the Duke to ſignifie the Conditions, upon which the Town offered to yield, tho' he was adviſed to agree to the Conditions, and ſuffer it to be reſign to the Duke of Burgundy, yet the Regent would by no means, but returned Anſwer, 'That it 'was neither convenient nor honourable, that 'a City ſo long beſieged by the King of Eng- 'land, and defended with ſo much Obſtinacy 'and Reſolution, ſhould be ſurrendred upon 'their own Terms, or to any other than King 'Henry himſelf, or his Deputy, and therefore 'would not aſſent to any other Terms. This Anſwer the Duke of Burgundy took very ill from the Regent, conceiving that the Engliſh envied his Honour and Intereſt, and kept it deeply laid up in his Mind.

A. D. 1427. Reg. 6.

The Earl of Salisbury mortally wounded, and dies in Eight Days

The Siege of Orleance continued.

Orleance ſeeks a Treaty, and is accepted.

The Regent refuſing to accept the Propoſals of the Beſieged the Surrender of the Town was delay'd, and by that Means gave time for the wonderful Deliverance, which after follow'd after this manner. A young Maid nam'd Joan D' Arc, the Daughter of James D' Arc and Iſabel his Wife, a poor Country-Man, who inhabited in a ſmall Village in Berry call'd Domremy, aged about Eighteen Years, aſſerted with great Zeal and Confidence, 'That ſhe had a Revela- 'tion, that ſhe ſhould deliver King Charles from 'his preſent Troubles, and drive the Engliſh 'from Orleans, and having cauſed him to be 'crown'd at Rhemes reſtore the whole King- 'dom

The Story of Joan D' Arc, who pretended to be ſent 'by God to 'deliver 'France.

A. D. 1427. Reg. 6.

'dom to its Ancient Peace and Happineſs. This Revelation ſhe firſt diſcover'd to her Father and Mother, and Neighbours, and after was perſwaded to relate it to the Sieur Baudricourt, Provoſt of Vaucouleurs, which ſhe did with a great deal of Serioufneſs and Reſolution. The Provoſt being a ſage and diſcreet Perſon, and knowing, that Pretences of Revelation were not eaſily to be credited at firſt, look'd upon her to be poſſeſſed with a deep Melancholy, and told her, 'That it was very unlikely, that ſhe being a Woman ſhould be an Inſtrument of their 'Deliverance, when all the Attempts of their 'moſt illuſtrious and brave Perſonages had pro'ved in vain: But when he ſaw her unmovable Reſolution, and conſider'd the Gravity and Prudence of her Diſcourſe, he thought fit to carry her to the King for his own Diſcharge, who lay then with his Court at Chinon. She was brought into that Town March the 6th, and the News of her Arrival was receiv'd by the King and his Council with much Pleaſure, and becauſe ſhe had always been educated in the Country, and had never ſeen the King, it was contriv'd, that the King ſhould put on a Country-Man's Habit, leſt ſhe ſhould know him by his Regal Ornaments and Diadem, and by this Experiment try, whether ſhe were inſpir'd or no. When the young Woman was brought into the Chamber ſhe went directly to the King, though in Diſguiſe, as if ſhe had been brought up in the Court all her Life. The Courtiers that ſtood about her, told her, that ſhe was miſtaken, but ſhe conſtantly averred, that it was he, though ſhe had never ſeen him before, and then immediately began to diſcourſe with him and aſſure him, That ſhe had a ſpecial Command from the God of Heaven to revive the ſinking Fortune of the King and Kingdom. This Action turn'd their Scorn into Admiration, and what they derided at firſt, they began to believe, ſo that now her Words were thought worthy of more ſerious Conſideration, and that there might be no Miſtake about ſo great a Matter, it was referred to the Judgment both of the King's Council, and of the moſt eminent Divines of his Party, who after many Debates reſolv'd, 'That in Caſes deſperate the Provi'dence of God did often make uſe of extraor'dinary Remedies, and in like Revolutions of 'State, when the Courage of Men was loſt, he 'raiſed up Women for its Deliverance, as De'borah and Judith, who by their Valour reſcu'd 'the People of Iſrael from the Tyranny of two 'Heathen Kings, Jabin and Nebuchadnezzar: 'That Neceſſity made it lawful to uſe all ſorts 'of Remedies for their own Defence and Re'covery, and ſo to try whether what this Maid 'has ſo confidently aſſerted, be true, yet with ſo 'much Caution as to run no Hazzard. Theſe Reſolutions being aſſented to by the King, all Things were ſubmitted to her Conduct, as far as was Safe and Convenient, which ſhe eaſily yielded to, being as modeſt and reaſonable in her Actions, as in her Propoſals. The News was no ſooner brought to her, but ſhe began the Work, which ſhe ſaid ſhe had a Command from God to execute, and as inſpir'd by God manfully entred upon thoſe Actions, which a mere Womaniſh Valour would not dare to think on. She arm'd her ſelf with all Warlike Habiliments, and mounted her Horſe as a Man. The Spear which was laid up in Touraine in a Place call'd St. Catherine de Fierbois was given her upon her Requeſt, and the Admiral of France and Marſhal, who were with a ſufficient Strength to carry a Supply of Victuals into the Town, had a ſpecial Charge given them to take care of her Safety, and conduct her without Hazzard into it. She being thus arm'd and equipp'd took her Leave of the King with a Deportment befitting a great Captain, and in April the 12th left Chinon, and arriv'd ſafely at Orleans, where ſhe was receiv'd as a Meſſenger ſent by Heaven for their Deliverance, with ſuch a Joy as People reviving from Deſpair do ſhew, having Faith to believe, as much as ſhe could promiſe them, becauſe in God's Name. Joan being gotten ſafe into the Town behav'd her ſelf without any Inſolence or extravagant Boaſting, making Propoſals of Peace, before ſhe would begin any Warlike Enterprize, and to that End ſent this following Letter to the Chief Commanders of the Engliſh Army by a Trumpet.

The Judgment of the French Divines about her.

A. D. 1427. Reg. 6.

King of England,

'GIve an Account to the King of Heaven 'for his Royal Blood. Surrender up to 'the Virgin the Keys of all the good Towns 'which you have taken by Force. She is come 'from Heaven to vindicate the Royal Blood of 'France, and is very ready to make Peace, if 'thou wilt ſubmit to reaſonable Terms, and '(as Equity and Juſtice requires) reſtore what 'thou haſt taken from him. King of England, 'if thou wilt not do thus, I am the Captain of 'the Wars, and in whatſoever part of France I 'ſhall find any of the Engliſh Nation, I will 'drive them out whether they will or no; but 'if they will ſubmit, I will take them to Mer'cy? I am come from the King of Heaven to 'expel you out of France, and if you will not 'obey, I will make ſuch a ſlaughter and ſtir 'among you as hath not been this Thouſand 'Years in France. Believe me, The King of 'Heaven will give me and my Forces ſuch irre'ſiſtible Courage and Strength, as you ſhall not 'be able to oppoſe. Go in God's Name into 'your own Country, and be not obſtinate to 'your own Opinions, for ye ſhall not hold 'France of the King of Heaven, the Son of the 'Virgin Mary, but Charles the true Heir of it 'ſhall again poſſeſs it and be King of it, for 'God hath given it him, and he ſhall enter Pa'ris with a goodly Train. You William Pawlet, 'Earl of Suffolk, John, Lord Talbot, Thomas, Lord 'Scales, Lieutenants of the Duke of Bedford, 'and you Duke of Bedford, who calleſt thy'ſelf Regent of the Kingdom of France, be ſpa'ring of innocent Blood, and give Orleans its 'Liberty. If you will not do Juſtice to thoſe 'whom you have wronged, the French will do 'the nobleſt Exploit that ever was done in 'Chriſtendom. Mind this wholeſome Advice gi'ven you by God and His Virgin.

Joan's Letter to the Engliſh to tender them Peace.

This Letter being carry'd to the Earl of Suffolk was receiv'd with great Laughter, and King Charles and his Council were derided, as Perſons tranſported with an Extravagant Folly, who would make uſe of ſuch irrational Means for their own Defence, and the Engliſh from this Time began to promiſe themſelves a certain Victory, ſince the French had no better ways to ſecure themſelves, than ſuch groundleſs Projects. The Trumpeter, who brought this Letter was impriſon'd, which though the French complain'd of, as contrary to the Laws of Arms, yet the Engliſh juſtified it by the madneſs of the Meſſage, and thought ſuch an Enthuſiaſtick Defiance ought not to be treated in the common Methods. Joan the Virgin ſeeing her Letter diſregarded, and no way left to carry on her Work but by open force of Arms, Joan's Letter derided by the Engliſh.

adviſes

A. D. 1428. Reg. 6.

adviſes the Chief Governours of the Siege, the Earls of Dunois, Pothon and Xantrails to prepare for an Aſſault, and to ſally out upon the Engliſh with all their Force, ſaying: 'God is for 'us, and the Engliſh cannot eſcape our Hands. 'Let us but put on an anſwerable Courage to 'the Aſſiſtance God intends us, and we ſhall 'defeat all the Raſcals of that Army. The Commons, who putting Confidence in her had flock'd about her in great Numbers, promiſed themſelves mighty Succeſs in the Attempt, and readily attended her Motions; but the Commanders had little Hopes of a Victory againſt thoſe Enemies, which ever conquer'd them, yet reſolv'd to follow her Advice for once, as an Oracle. All Things therefore being well prepared, the Beſieged with Joan in the Head of them made a vigorous Sally at the Gate of Burgundy, and firſt ſet upon the Fort of St. Lupe adjoining to it, which was defended by 400 Engliſh. The French, as inſpired with an unuſual Courage, aſſaulted it with ſuch Fury, that no Oppoſition the Engliſh could make, could keep them from Scaling it, which ſo affrighted them, that they left the Caſtle to the French, and fled, but were ſlain many of them, and others taken Priſoners. This ſucceſsful Beginning raiſed the Opinion of the Virgin in the Minds of all, and the People at her Return to her Lodging ran in Flocks to meet her, crying, Bleſſed be the Holy Virgin ſent by God to deliver us. Victory ſeem'd to be now come over to the French; and though the Engliſh Generals did all they could to keep up the dying Courage of their Soldiers, yet the French every Day got ſome Advantage of them, and at length on May the 8th, obliged them to raiſe the Siege, which they did in good Order, and retreated part under the Earl of Suffolk to Jurgeaux the next Engliſh Garriſon, and part under the Lord Talbot to Mehun. The French fluſh'd with this Victory had no ſooner put Orleans into a Poſture of Defence, but they purſu'd the Engliſh to Jurgeaux, and after a ſhort Siege made themſelves Maſters of it July the 12th, taking the Earl of Suffolk and his Brother Priſoners, with many others.

Siege of Orleans raiſed by Joan's Conduct.

Fifth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

While the Siege of Orleans was thus carry'd on, little was done in England, ſave that about the 14th of October in the beginning of this Year a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and provided for the good of the Nation by enacting ſeveral Laws, and for the Defence of it, by giving a large Tax for carrying on the War with France. The Acts were of good Benefit to the Publick: As,

1. That whereas by reaſon of the quick Return of Capias's in the King's Bench, Exigents were granted and awarded, whereby divers Perſons being by baſe and fraudulent Practices outlaw'd, their Goods and Chattels were immediately ſeiz'd, as forfeited to our Lord the King, and ſo divers of the King's faithful Subjects were utterly undone, as by the Complaints of the Commons in Parliament doth appear. Before any Exigents ſhall be granted for the future, every Capias ſhall be directed to the Sheriffs at leaſt ſix Weeks, and if upon the Return the Judges ſhall think fit to grant an Exigent, they may proceed as formerly, but if any be granted before the Return of the Writ, it ſhall be void.

2. That Sheriffs ſhall be oblig'd under the Penalty of Forty Pounds to deliver to all Plaintiffs, Tenants or Defendants a true Copy of their Pannels ſix Days before the Aſſizes, when they ſhall be ſo requir'd by the ſaid Plantiffs or Defendants.

3. Whereas Sheriffs by corrupt Juries were wrongfully endicted to the Juſtices of Aſſize for making falſe Returns of the Knight choſen in their ſeveral Sheirs to ſerve in Parliament, by which Means the Sheriffs were liable to pay an Hundred Pounds Forfeiture, and the Knight loſt their accuſtom'd Wages in Parliament without Remedy; therefore it was enacted, That Sheriffs and Knights againſt whom any Inqueſts or Offices of undue Elections are found ſhall for the future have their Anſwer, and traverſe to ſuch Inqueſts and Offices, and ſhall not be endamag'd till duly convicted.

4. By this Parliament alſo it was appointed that ſeveral Commiſſions of Sewers ſhould be iſſu'd out by the Chancellor of England into all Parts of the Realm to cleanſe and repair all Walls, Ditches, Gutters, Bridges, Wears, &c. to prevent the great Inundations of the Sea and Rivers which had happen'd in divers Parts of the Nation. And a Form of Commiſſion was compoſed on purpoſe, that it might be the more effectual, which is annex'd to it, and an Order, that for Ten Years next enſuing they ſhould be ſo ſtrictly executed, that all Water-courſes ſhould be cleanſed, and the Nation freed from the Prejudices it had ſuffer'd a long time by frequent Inundations.

This Parliament in Conſideration of the King's Expence in carrying on the War in France, which grew very dubious, and more chargeable, granted very large Taxes, viz. a Subſidy of Three Shillings by the Tun for all Wine imported, and Twelve Pence by the Pound for all Merchandize, except Wool, Wool-fells and Cloth, which had a Tax before laid upon them. But beſides theſe a kind of Poll-Tax, tho' not general was laid upon ſeveral Pariſhes, viz. In every Pariſh where the Living was worth Ten Marks per Annum, it was enacted, That Ten of the chiefeſt Pariſhioners ſhould pay Six Shillings and Eight Pence per Head; and in ſuch Pariſhes as the Living was worth Ten Pounds per Annum, a like Number of the chief Inhabitants ſhould pay a Mark; and in all Corporations it was order'd, that every Perſon worth above Twenty Shillings beſides his Houſhold-Goods and Apparel, ſhould pay Four Pence by the Head to the King, and ſo proportionably for every Twenty Shillings all Perſons were worth, by which means the Tax was much increaſed in Cities and Boroughs.

Wickliff condemned by the Council of Conſtance, and his Bones burnt.

In this Sixth Year of the King, Wickliff and his Memory was ſolemnly condemn'd at the Council of Conſtance (or rather Sienna) held under Pope John after this manner. Proclamation being firſt made, and Commandment given, that if any Perſon or Perſons could or would defend Wickliff or his Memory, they ſhould immediately appear and be heard; none daring to be his Advocate, the Council proceeded to examine ſeveral Witneſſes, whom they had brought to prove, That John Wickliff in his Life-time held and taught many Heretical and Heterodox Doctrines, contrary to the receiv'd Tenets and Practices of the Chriſtian Church in all Ages, and that he dy'd in an obſtinate and wilful Impenitency of thoſe Opinions, for which he ought to be condemn'd and curſed by the Church: Whereupon the Synod at the Requeſt of the Steward of the Pope's Treaſury proceeded to give Sentence againſt the ſaid Wickliff and his Memory. 'That the ſaid John Wickliff being 'a notorious obſtinate Heretick, and dying in 'his Hereſie, his Body and Bones, if they might 'be diſcern'd from the Bodies of other faithful 'People, ſhould be taken up out of the Ground,

'and

A. D. 1428. Reg. 6.

' and thrown away far from the Burial of any ' Church, according to the Canon-Laws and De- ' crees. The Execution of this Sentence which was approv'd by the whole Aſſembly, was committed to the Biſhop of Lincoln (x) Richard Flemming, in whoſe Dioceſſe the Pariſh of Lutterworth, of which Wickliff was Parſon, and where he lay buried, was. The Biſhop as zealous as the Council againſt what they call'd Hereſie, as ſoon as he had received his Orders, ſends his Officers, viz. his Arch-Deacon, Officials, Commiſſaries, and other Servants to Lutterworth to take up Wickliff's Bones, and remove them out of Chriſtian Burial, who were ſo far from coming ſhort of their Commiſſion, that they exceeded; and having taken his Bones out of his Grave one and forty Years after his Burial, burnt them, and caſt them into a Brook adjoyning, call'd Swift, which carrying them into the Sea was a Preſage of the ſpreading of Doctrine into all Parts of the World.

Reg. 7.

Biſhop of Winchester's Return into England, oppoſed by the King.

About the Beginning of September the Biſhop of Winchester lately made Cardinal of St. Euſebius in France return'd into England, and in his Journey to London was met by the Mayor, Aldermen, and many of the Chief Citizens of it on Horſe-back, and by them honourably conducted unto his Palace in Southwark; but his Return with ſo great Dignity, and a Legantine Power, was not at all pleaſing to the Duke of Glouceſter, who by this Time underſtood of how ill a Conſequence his Promotions might prove to the Nation, being a Man of a very inſolent and high Temper, and very rich, which would make him troubleſome, and intolerable. And to prevent the ill Effects of them, as ſoon as he heard he was landed, he cauſed an Inſtrument to be publiſhed in the King's Name, declaring, ' That whereas the moſt Chriſtian ' King Henry VI. and his Progenitors, Kings ' before him of this Realm of England, have ' been heretofore poſſeſſed time out of Mind ' with a ſpecial Priviledge and Cuſtom uſed and ' obſerv'd in this Realm from Time to Time, ' that no Legate from the Apoſtolick See ſhall ' enter this Land, or any of the King's Domi- ' nions without the Calling, Petition, Requeſt, ' Invitation or Deſire of the King; and foraſ- ' much as Henry, Biſhop of Winchester, and Car- ' dinal of St. Euſebius hath preſum'd to enter as ' Legate from the Pope, being neither call'd nor ' deſir'd by the King; therefore the King by ' his Procurator Richard Caudray doth proteſt by ' this Inſtrument, that it ſtandeth not with the ' King's Mind or Intent by the Advice of his ' Council to admit, approve or ratifie the Com- ' ing of the ſaid Legate in any wiſe in Deroga- ' tion of the Rights and Cuſtoms of this Realm, ' or to allow and aſſent to any Exerciſe of his ' Legantine Power, or to any Acts attempted ' by him contrary to the ſaid Laws. This Proclamation being only intended againſt his Power as Legate, the Biſhop ſeem'd for the preſent to wave his Authority in that Kingdom, and kept on his way homeward without any Oppoſition farther from the Duke of Glouceſter, who was willing to wink at any Submiſſion thro' the fear of diſpleaſing the Pope, who certainly would have thunder'd aloud if he had ſeen his Authority openly reſiſted, tho' in the Cardinal's Hands.

Fox, Act. and Mon. Pag 649.

A. D. 1429.

The French King having Fortune now on his ſide ſummon'd a Council of his great Lords to his Court to conſult, how, and by what Methods they ſhould purſue their Victories (for this Occaſion was not to be ſlipped) and at laſt it was reſolv'd, that it would be moſt for his Advantage to recover ſuch Places from the Hands of the Engliſh, as were ſituate upon the River Loire, and to that end it was thought fit, that a large Army ſhould be raiſed, and marching to Orleans ſhould from thence purſue the good Fortune which had firſt began there. John de Valois, Duke of Alenzon, was made the King's Lieutenant in this Expedition, and had the Conduct of an Army of 14000 Men under the Command of the Duke De Vandoſme, a Prince of the Blood, Joan the Virgin, Guy de Laval, Marſhal Loeac his Brother, Chivagnes de Tonr, and Vidame de Chartres. The firſt Thing that they attempted was the Siege of Mehun or Mean, which tho' a ſmall Town, was an Annoyance to them in their March from Orleans; whereupon they beſieg'd it, till they had taken the Bridge and Caſtle, by which means being freed from any Trouble from it: After they had put in a French Garriſon, they march'd forward to Beaugences a more important Place, where they were met by Arthur of Brittain, Conſtable of France, accompany'd with the Lord D' Albret, Beaumenoir, Marſhal of Brittain, and many others, who brought them a Reinforcement of 1200 Horſe, and 1500 Foot, who joyning with them they moſt ſtraitly beſieg'd the Place. The Lord Talbot in the mean time was as buſie for the Advantage of the Engliſh, as the French were for their own, and took Laval, a Town formerly in Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, but upon the good Succeſs of the French at Orleans it had Revolted, and ſet up King Charles's Standard. Talbot's Courage would not endure their Inconſtancy, and therefore falling upon it with Scaling-Ladders made his way directly into the Town and took it with a rich Spoil. The Caſtle ſtill held out againſt him, and though it could not hope to ſtand out long, yet was Andrew Laval, Lord of Loeac ſent to maintain it, if poſſible, till they could gain an honourable Compoſition, which at length he obtain'd, viz. ' That all that were ' in the Caſtle, himſelf not excepted, ſhould ' pay for the Ranſom of their Lives 25000 ' Crowns, and he remain a Priſoner among the ' Engliſh, till it was either actually paid, or ſuf- ' ficient Security given for the Payment of it. The Lord Talbot immediately placed a ſtrong Garriſon in it to keep the Inhabitants in Subjection, and went forward to the Regent to Paris, but could make no ſtay there, becauſe the News of the Siege of Beaugences being brought thither ſoon after his Arrival, the Regent diſpatch'd him, and the Lord Scales with an Army of 4000 Men to the Relief of it. Theſe Lords fear'd no Attempts, though never ſo Deſperate or Hazardous; but coming to Beaugences, they found it ſo ſtraitly Beſieged, and the Army of the French ſo ſtrong, that Prudence engag'd them not to hazzard themſelves and Men to no purpoſe, and ſo they retir'd towards Mehun, intending to force the Bridge and Caſtle there, and ſecure themſelves in that Town. Beaugences by the Departure of the Engliſh ſeeing their Hopes of Succour gone yielded upon theſe Conditions, ' That the Garriſon ' ſhould march out with their Arms, Horſes ' and Baggage (but the French Hiſtorians ſay, ' That they were to pay a Mark a Man for the ' laſt) and that the Engliſh Soldiers ſhould not ' bear Arms for Ten Days againſt the King of ' France. The French being thus Maſters of the Town, and ſeeing their Army ſo much greater than the Engliſh, purſu'd them with all ſpeed,

A. D. 1429. Reg. 7.

Duke of Alenzon beſieges Mehun.

The Lord Talbot takes Laval.

The French takes Beaugences.

(x) This Biſhop Flemming had been formerly a zealous Wickliviſt.

and

A. D. 1429. Reg. 7.

and before the Engliſh could affect their Deſign at Mehun, overtook them, and forced them to leave it. They endeavour'd to recover Janvile, but were ſo cloſely follow'd by the French Horſe, that they were oblig'd to make a ſtand at Patay in Beauſſe to guard themſelves with Stakes againſt their Aſſaults, but before they could do it the whole Army came upon them, and they were forced to engage in fight, tho' very unequally againſt them, the French being at leaſt four times their Number. Talbot ſeeing the Neceſſity of a Battel encourag'd his Men with all the Arguments he could to conquer or die bravely, and gave them command to keep themſelves cloſe together, leſt being ſurrounded by the Enemy, they ſhould open a Gap to their own Ruin. The French aſſur'd of Victory fell on them very furiouſly, and the Engliſh as reſolutely for Three Hours maintain'd their Ground againſt them, but at length their brave Captain Talbot having receiv'd a dangerous Wound upon his Back, and thereby being ſo diſabled, that he could make no Reſiſtance, fell into the Hands of his Enemies, and was made their Captive. This unfortunate Accident ſo diſheartned the reſt of the Army, that they betook themſelves to Flight, but were ſo cloſely purſu'd, that they were almoſt all ſlain, the Engliſh Garriſons not daring to receive them, becauſe they were mingled with ſo many of their Enemies, that they had been in Danger of falling into the Hands of the French to ſave them. The Lords Scales and Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Rampſtone, with ſome others of leſs Note, were taken. Sir J. Falſtoff, tho' a Perſon of great Valour, yet ſeeing the inevitable Fate of this Battel, withdrew without giving or receiving a Blow (as judging it mere Raſhneſs to fight at ſuch a Diſadvantage) but the Regent was ſo incenſed with him for it, that he took from him his George and Garter, which he had given him but the Year before for his former brave Actions; but thro' much Mediation of Friends, and his own alledging of ſome Excuſes (which were at that Time judg'd reaſonable) they were again reſtored to him, tho' much againſt the Lord Talbot's Will and Conſent. This Victory cauſed great Triumph among the French, chiefly becauſe they had gotten their braveſt Captain and Commander, without whoſe Conduct they believ'd the Engliſh would not be able to do any thing of Conſequence in France for the future; yea, and the Engliſh themſelves diſpair'd of any of Fortune's Favours hereafter, ſince the Two great Pillars of their Cauſe were loſt. And indeed they had no ſmall reaſon for their Fears, becauſe ſeveral of their Towns yielded themſelves up to King Charles, viz. Gergeau, Baugence, Janville, Meun, and all Beauſſe, ſo that by a ſudden turn of Fortune, they loſt in a few Days, what they had been getting many Months at a great Expence of Blood.

The Engliſh routed at Patay, and the Lord Talbot taken.

Sir John Falſtoff left the Lord Talbot in this Battel.

Orleans being thus deliver'd according to Joan's Promiſe and Prediction, ſhe preſs'd for the Coronation of King Charles at Rheimes, which according to her Train of Prophecies, was next to follow in order to the compleat routing the Engliſh out of France. Many of his Nobles, who were tender of his Safety, were extremely againſt it, alledging, 'That a Coronation is but 'a mere Ceremony, and did neither add to, nor 'take from a King's Title to his Crown. All 'the Uſe of it was only to make the King known 'to his People, which the War had ſo fully 'done, that none of his Natural Subjects were 'ignorant of his Perſon or Title. But if it were 'neceſſary in it ſelf, yet the preſent Time, and 'the deſign'd Place where ſo inconſiſtent with 'the King's Safety, that it was in no wiſe to 'be attempted: For beſides, that Rheimes was 'in the Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, there were ſo 'many Engliſh Garriſons on both ſides the way 'thither, viz. on the one ſide Auxerre, Troyes 'and Chaalons, and on the other ſide Layon and 'Soiſſons, that it was almoſt impoſſible to get 'thither: So that at leaſt the Ceremony ought 'to be forborn for a time; and ſo much the 'rather, becauſe the Engliſh had not yet thought 'it neceſſary to crown King Henry. Theſe Reaſons, tho very rational and certain, yet ſatisfied not Joan, as being contrary to One of the Three Things which were pretended, that ſhe had a Commiſſion from God himſelf to execute, and therefore inſiſted upon the Performance of it without delay, aſſuring them, That theſe imaginary Difficulties would vaniſh in the Attempt. King Charles having ſeen the Succeſs of the Former, was eaſily ſway'd to comply with the Latter; and therefore reſolv'd to proceed to his Coronation at Rheimes. All his Nobles, tho' with unwilling Minds, attended him in his Voyage, except Arthur of Brittain the Conſtable, and Count Fedriac his Friend, whom Tremville was unwilling to be troubled with; but leſt thro' ſome Diſcontent they ſhould diſturb the Proſperity of their Affairs, he cauſed the King to ſend them, one with a ſufficient Force to defend the Frontiers of Normandy, and the other to be his Lieutenant in Guienne, which Stations they accepted without any ſeeming Diſlike, though not inſenſible of Tremville's Artifices. Things being thus ſettled, Charles took his Way with an Army of 12000 Men towards Rheimes, and with little or no Difficulty arriv'd there; for the Engliſh Garriſons fearing a Siege, demanded only Time for Succour, which not coming they ſurrendred. Troyes indeed ſtood out Twelve Days, or as others ſay, but Two Days, the French partly making fierce Aſſaults, and the Engliſh under Sir Philip Hall thro' Famine making little or no Reſiſtance. Chaalons and Rheimes were forced by the Inhabitants to ſurrender to King Charles, who thereupon made his ſolemn Entry into the City, and was crown'd there in the Preſence of the Dukes of Lorrain and Barr, and all his Nobles. This ſucceſsful Voyage raiſed Joan's Reputation very much; and tho' a Woman of no good Credit, yet confirm'd their Belief of her, as a Perſon ſent by God for their Deliverance, which ſupported their Courage. And indeed the Ceremony, tho' of no Value in it ſelf; yet produced ſuch real Effects, as if it had been a material Circumſtance by the Divine Decree in the Relief of France; for it was no ſooner over, but the People who judge by Appearance only, flock'd to him to do him Homage, and many Cities, as if that Action had conferred a juſt Right upon him, which before he had not, own'd him for their lawful and only Sovereign. Laon ſent Deputies to him to do him Homage, and Soiſſons, Chaſteau Thierre and Province yielded to him with many adjoining Towns.

A. D. 1429. Reg. 7.

Charles the French King crown'd at Rheimes

The Effects of Charles's Coronation.

The Duke of Bedford, a wiſe and experienc'd Governor was not an unconcerned Spectator of all theſe Actions, and with no ſmall Grief of Heart revolv'd with himſelf the ill Succeſs of his Party. Every Revolt was a Wound to him, but he knew not how to ward off the Strokes of an inevitable Fate. Something he knew was to be done, but he was long in doubt what would be beſt. At laſt he reſolv'd to try another Field-Battel, and ſtop the Current by force, and to that end leaving Paris with an Army of 10000 Engliſh, and ſome Norman Troops march'd into the Country of Brie, from whence he ſent a Challenge in Writing to King Charles by an Herald to this Purpoſe, 'That whereas, 'he had contrary to the final Concluſion made 'between his noble Brother King Henry V. and 'his own Father King Charles VI. and the King-'dom of France, by the Allurement of a De-'viliſh Witch, taken upon him contrary to all 'Laws and Right, the Name, Title and Dig-'nity of King of France, and had by Murder, 'Stealing, Craft, and other deceitful Means 'violently gotten, and wrongfully kept divers 'Cities and Towns belonging to the King of 'England his Nephew, pretending a rightful 'Claim to them, which he utterly deny'd, He 'was come down from Paris with his Army 'into the Country of Brie to prove by dint of 'Sword and ſtroke of Battel his Challenge, and 'Cauſe true, requiring him to appoint the 'Place of their Meeting, and would not fail 'to come to decide this Controverſie with him. The French King was now come from Rheimes to Dampmartin, where the Herald found him, and deliver'd his Writing to him. Charles was not a little aſtoniſh'd at it, but putting on a brave Reſolution, told him, That his Maſter ſhould not need to come to him, nor invite him to a Battel, for he was determin'd with all ſpeed to ſeek out his Maſter, and by Battel put an end to all Diſputes between them. The Duke of Bedford hearing this, kept on his March towards him, and at length (tho' the French King declin'd meeting as much as in Honour he dare) met his Army at a Town near Senlis, which, notwithſtanding it was much bigger than his own, he was reſolv'd to fight almoſt at any Diſadvantage, yet to ſecure his Rear from the French Horſe, he encamp'd himſelf as ſtrongly as he poſſibly could, and put his Archers in the Forefront of the Battel. The French King alſo drew up his Army by the Advice of his Captains into very good Order, and faced the Engliſh two Days without any Action, except a few Skirmiſhes between Parties. On the third Day it was debated in the French Camp, whether they ſhould aſſault the Engliſh or no, Joan was irreſolv'd, and would by no means encourage them as at other times, which made the greateſt part of the Soldiers, who look'd upon her Determinations as Divine, againſt a Battel. The other Commanders thought it very irrational to hazard their former Victories by one Battel, which if unfortunate, might utterly ruin them, and 'twould be folly to tempt their kind Fortune by venturing needleſly. Theſe Arguments ſo prevail'd with King Charles, that in the dead of the Night he broke up his Camp, and withdrew to Bray. The Duke of Bedford had much ado to keep his Army in the Morning from purſuing the French; but becauſe he fear'd the Fidelity of the Citizens of Paris, he was afraid to give them Liberty to do it, and ſo he return'd thither again to wait another Opportunity.

A. D. 1429. Reg. 7.

Duke of Bedford Challenges the French King to fight.

Biſhop of Winchester provides to go againſt the Huſſites in Bohemia.

While theſe Things were tranſacting in France, Pope Martin V. who having excommunicated the Followers of Wickliff in Bohemia, commonly call'd Huſſites, from their Chief Preacher John Hus, at the Council of Florence, ſent his Bull into England to the Rich Cardinal Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Winchester, imploring him by the Wounds of Chriſt, his Zeal to the Church, and as he tender'd his own Salvation, to contribute his utmoſt Aſſiſtance to extirpate theſe Hereticks, which had ſo long withſtood the Arms of the Emperor, and other Princes of Europe, and to encourage him to be induſtrious in the Undertaking, he made him his Legate in the Army, which he ſhould raiſe for that End, and gave him the Tenth Part of every Dignity, Benefice and Promotion in the Kingdom. The Cardinal's Ambition, or, if you will, Zeal, made him very active in his Work, and that he might proceed with the greater Succeſs he propounded the Letters of the Pope to the Parliament, and obtained their Approbation, either out of the ſame Principle of Hatred to the Hereticks, or perhaps rather, becauſe they would rid the Kingdom of this turbulent Prelate, who was to be the Captain of the Army in ſo Religious a War. But whatever was the Reaſon, the Cardinal glad of this publick Ratification of his Commiſſion, proceeded with all Expedition to gather the Money of the Clergy, (who notwithſtanding the Goodneſs of the Cauſe, were not a little diſcontented at it, having been much impoveriſh'd of late with Tenths and other Taxes for the Wars of France) and with it he raiſed an Army of above 4000 Men, whom having well furniſh'd with all Things for the War, he about the Beginning of June intended to have tranſported into France, and ſo march'd into Bohemia; but when he had drawn them up to Dover for that end, Letters came with all ſpeed from the Duke of Bedford to his Brother the Protector, to ſend him over ſome Recruits forthwith, becauſe the French King's Affairs were come to that Ripeneſs, that unleſs a ſpeedy ſtop were put to his Victories (which he had not Men enough to do) he would ſoon become Maſter of all France. The Duke of Glouceſter, ſtartled at this Meſſage, was very ſollicitous to anſwer his Brother's Deſires, but not being able to do it ſo ſoon as was requir'd, and really neceſſary, he earneſtly intreated the Cardinal to aſſiſt his Brother in France with his Army for the preſent, and ſo ſoon as he could provide other Supplies he ſhould be diſmiſſed to proceed on his Journey. The Cardinal very unwillingly hearken'd to the Protector's Requeſt, tho' next to a Command; but being no impolitick Perſon, and conſidering, that if the King's Affairs in France ſhould miſcarry thro' any neglect of his, it was not the Zeal he had for Religion, nor the Pope's Command could excuſe him, either to his own Conſcience, or to the King and Parliament for thus forſaking the Kingdom's Intereſts; whereupon he immediately tranſported his Forces into France, and join'd them with the Regent. With this Reinforcement the Regent march'd out again with a Reſolution to fight his Enemy the French King, who (as he had receiv'd late Intelligence) was marched into Champaigne and Beauvais, where having many Friends, he hop'd to have had many of the Towns of thoſe Countries yielded to him; but e're he could arrive there, the Regent, who purſu'd him with great ſpeed, overtook him, and found him encamped upon Mount Piliol between Senlis and Champaigne, himſelf pitching between Senlis and Monmaur at a convenient Diſtance from them. The French being thus in proſpect of a daring Enemy, tho' much the greater Number, yet would not venture to aſſault the Camp of the Engliſh, and the Regent not thinking it ſafe, upon better Thoughts, to fight them at ſuch Diſadvantages, as the Place and their Numbers gave them, they waited ſeveral Days to come to a fair Battel, but at length, being both tired with Expectation, they retreated, the one to Creſpie, and the other to Paris, and ſo nothing was done, ſave that in ſome ſmall Skirmiſhes the Engliſh and Normans

A. D. 1431. Reg. 7.

Biſhop of Winchester in his way to Bohemia aſſiſts the Regent of France.

had

1429. Reg. 7. His Success in Bohemia.

had much the better. The Bishop of Winchester having waited with some Impatience for a Battel in vain, and finding his Delay unnecessary, went forward with the Regent's Leave into Bohemia with his Army, but having had ill Fortune there against the Hereticks, he returned Home soon after with as little Honour as Gain; and the Pope being not well pleased with his ill Success or bad Management, recalled his Legantine-Power, and put Cardinal Julian into his Place, to the no small Vexation of the Cardinal, who, tho' unfortunate in his Atchievements, yet expected a better Requital for his Zeal and Charge.

Reg. 8. King Henry's Coronation.

King Henry being now entred upon the Ninth Year of his Age, and shewing a great Pregnancy of Wit and Parts, it was thought fit to admit him, as it were, into his Regal Dignity by a Coronation, which was accordingly performed upon St. Leonard's Day, Nov. 6. in St. Peter's Church at Westminster with great Solemnity, and a Joy suitable to the Occasion. Robert Fabian in his Chronicle, gives a very particular Account of the magnificent Feast made in Westminster-Hall, when it was ended, to which I refer the Curious. At this Coronation the King made 36 Knights of the Bath, and in the Conclusion of it, Resolutions were taken by his Council, for his Coronation in France in the Spring, and in the mean Time all necessary Preparations were ordered for his Journey thither.

Fab. Chro. P. 365, 366.

The French take several Places, and court Burgundy his Friendship.

King Charles being freed from the Molestation of the English, kept on his March slowly in those Countries about Crespy, and was received into the Towns of Compeign, Senlis and Beauvais, by a submissive Surrender to him, as their lawful Sovereign. The Castle of Aumerle stood out, but was surprized by the Lord Longuevile, who slew all the English which he found in it. The French also took Castle-Galliard from the English, and found the Lord Barbason kept close Prisoner in a Dungeon in it, enclosed within a Grate of Iron like a little Chamber. He was thought to have been long dead, and there was found with a Joy as great almost, as if he had been raised from the Grave, by his Countrymen, who immediately broke open the Grates for his Deliverance: But he was made a faster Prisoner by his Oath to the Captain, one Kingstone, by which he engaged himself to be his true Prisoner, than all Iron grates and Shackles could make him; insomuch, that he would not come out of the Dungeon, until the French-Men had sent to the same Kingstone (who was departed out of the Castle upon the Covenants agreed on for the Surrender) and obtained from him a Discharge from his Oath. But all this Success was not enough to satisfie the French King, so long as the Friendship of the Duke of Burgundy with the English continued; for as he had found by Experience, that it was that, which had settled the English Power in France, so he did not doubt, but if he could break it, and bring over the Duke to his Natural Duty and Allegiance, it would be a Means to rout the English totally out of the Kingdom; and if he could not effect it, his Success hitherto would come to nothing. He resolved therefore to send Ambassadors to that Duke, who excusing the Death of his Father, might represent to him, how misbecoming it was for a Prince of his Quality, and of the Blood-Royal, to joyn with the Enemies of the Regal Dignity and Kingdom, to which himself, or his Posterity might, thro' a Failure of Succession in the nearer Branches, ascend; and offering him what Conditions he pleased, if he would submit to him. But Philip being a very politick Prince, and sensible that neither Party could well subsist without him, as he was courted by both, answered them only in general Terms, which gave them little Hopes, yet did not quite deprive them of them, and made some Demands of Things impossible to be granted, yet with such an Indifferency, as shewed he stood not so much upon his Will as his Advantage, which he sought from both Sides, and would accept the biggest of either; and so dismissed them to their Master. The Regent being certified of these Things by the Duke of Burgundy himself, who at the same time let him know, he resented his Denial that Orleans should be resigned to him, 'gave him many Thanks for 'his kind Notice, promising him, that his 'Fidelity for the Future should be more fully 'rewarded by him, because he had so firmly 'withstood the insinuating Proffers of his Natu-'ral Soveraign, and had not suffered any former 'Disobligations to draw him from his League 'with the English. However, he could not but observe, how fast the French King pushed forward the Ruin of the English, and with Policy seconded his Fortune, which put him upon the Use of such Means as might prevent, if possible, the worst, and if he could not keep all France, might at least secure Normandy, which was a Province that of Right belonged to the Crown of England, and lay the most convenient for it of all the rest; wherefore leaving the Bishop of Terrowen and Ely, Lewis of Luxenburgh then Chancellor of France, for King Henry, with a competent Number of English-Men to defend and guard Paris, he went into Normandy, and being arrived at Roan, called a Parliament of the three Estates of the Dutchy, and declared unto them, 'That tho' he was 'confident, that the Inconstancy of their 'Neighbours in Revolting to the French King, 'contray to their Oaths and Allegiance due to 'King Henry, was detestible to them in it self, 'yet left bad Example should infect them, he 'thought fit to let them know, how much it 'was their Interest, as well as their Duty to 'continue firm to the English: That as to the 'former, so long as a firm Friendship continued with England, their Freedom would be 'enlarged, and their Riches increased every 'Day; for as England would be always ready 'to receive their Wines and Linnens, so on the 'other hand it would be continually importing 'to them their Wool, Lead, and other staple 'Commodities; whereas on the contrary, if 'they revolted, they could hope for nothing 'but Slavery from the Arbitrary Power of 'Charles, the French King, and continual War 'from the English, who would very unwillingly lose the Dutchy, being the Inheritance 'of the English Crown, for tho' other Parts of 'France might of Right be thought to belong 'to King Charles, yet Normandy was undisputably his Nephew King Henry's, being descended to him in a direct Line from the first 'Duke of Normandy, Rollo the Hardy; wherefore since both Right and Interest concurred 'together to joyn their Loyalties to King Henry VI. he hoped that no Temptation would 'be able to allure them from their Faith and 'Allegiance so often sworn and promised to 'King Henry V. his Brother, in which so long 'as they persevered, they might be assured 'of Protection and Defence from the English 'against all their Opposers. The Normans

A. D. 1429. Reg. 8. Burgundy's Subtilty for his own Advantage.

Regent's Journey into Normandy, to confirm that Province in their Loyalty.

A. D. 1429. Reg. 8.

hearing theſe Exhortations, declared their Loyalty to King Henry, to which their Intereſt and Duty did not more oblige them, than their Inclinations voluntarily ſwayed them; and with theſe Aſſurances he departed joyfully to Paris, whether he haſtned with the greater Speed, becauſe he had received ſome Information of King Charles's Attempt upon it in his Abſence, which he did after this Manner: The Pariſians being repreſented to him by his Friends, as very much inclined to their lawful Sovereign, if they could have a fair Opportunity to declare for him with Safety to themſelves, King Charles thought the Regent's Abſence much favoured that Purpoſe, and therefore ſoon after his Departure, leaving Senlis, he marched with his whole Army to St. Dennis, which being yielded without Reſiſtance, he preſented himſelf before the Walls of Paris; but not meeting with the Reception he expected, which was to be admitted into the City by his Friends without Delay, he ordered an Aſſault to be made, and did not doubt of a ſpeedy Succeſs, becauſe Joan pretended a Revelation for the Taking of it. John, Duke of Alenzon immediately began the Aſſault, and the chiefeſt Part of the Army, which were lodged at La Chappel, levelled their Artillery againſt the Gate of St. Honorius, and took the Outworks of it. Joan alſo threw her ſelf reſolutely into the Ditch, contrary to the Advice of the Duke of Alenzon, and all the Reſt, and expected the Army ſhould follow her to take Poſſeſſion of the City, but the Engliſh Captains and Soldiers kept their Stations ſo firmly, and being aſſiſted by the Pariſians, defended the City ſo manfully, that they beat the French, and threw Joan, more forward than wiſe, into the Town-Ditch, full of the Filth and Excrements of the City, and had certainly taken her, had not a Servant of the Duke of Alenzon pulled her out. King Charles, ſeeing this unexpected Reſiſtance, ſounded a Retreat, and ſo with ſome Loſs, but more Diſhonour, left the City, not taking ſo much as his wounded Captains along with him, and marched by Touraine into Berry. The Duke of Bedford arrived at Paris ſoon after the French were gone, and underſtanding by his Soldiers, how faithfully and bravely the Pariſians had behaved themſelves in the Defence of the City, by which they had freed themſelves from all Suſpicion of Diſloyalty, he gave them publick Thanks for their good Service, and promiſed them all the Felicity which might be expected from the Favour of a Prince, who loved nothing more than the Good of his Subjects, and would ſtudy to reward the well Deſervings of a faithful People: Which grateful Return of their Services, the Pariſians took ſo very kindly, that they declared a perpetual Friendſhip and Subjection to the King of England, making publick Acclamations in theſe Words. Friends to King Henry, Friends to the Pariſians, Enemies to England, Enemies to Paris. But their after-Actions made the Sincerity of this Profeſſion queſtionable.

King of France attempts to take Paris, but is repulſed.

Joan very hardly eſcapes being taken.

A. D. 1430.

Not long after the Regent was come to Paris, Philip, Duke of Burgundy, with a great Number of armed Men arrived; and the Regent, who was under ſome Diſturbance of Mind for the late Loſſes of the Engliſh, entred into a long and grave Conſultation with him, how to proceed moſt effectually to recover them; and it was at length agreed between them, that the Duke of Burgundy with his Men ſhould remain in Paris for the Defence of it, while the Duke of Bedford and his Army ſhould recover St. Dennis, and the adjacent Places which had lately revolted to the French. The Duke of Bedford therefore without Delay marched from Paris on this Expedition, and having regained St. Dennis, and the other adjoyning Fortreſſes, with as little Labour as they were loſt, he returned again to Paris, and ſent out ſeveral Parts of his Army to recover other Places which he feared would prove more obſtinate, viz. The Baſtard of Clarence to beſiege the Caſtle of Torci, a very ſtrong Fortification, as well for its Site, as for the Artificial Strength of it; but by the Valour of the Engliſh, it was taken after Six Months Siege. The Earl of Suffolk to take the Town of Aumarle, which had reſigned to King Charles a little before; Monſieur de Romburris was made Governor, who ſo reſolutely held it out, that the Earl of Suffolk made Twenty-five Aſſaults upon it, before it would yield, and then at laſt ſurrendred, not for want of Will, but Strength to oppoſe, all their Men being loſt. The Earl of Suffolk, who took it without Conditions, hanged 30 of the Chiefeſt of the Inhabitants upon the Walls of the City, for their Perjury and Treachery to King Henry; fined the Reſt of them, and ſent Monſieur de Romburris a Priſoner into England, who did not recover his Liberty till Six Years after, and then by Exchange. Sir Thomas Kiriel alſo about the ſame Time, iſſuing out of Gourney in Normandy with 400 Men, ravaged and waſted the Country as far as the very Suburbs of Clermont, which the Earl of that Country ſeeing with Sorrow, drew out the Garriſons of that Town, and the neighbouring Places to chaſtiſe his Boldneſs, and repreſs his Inſolency. The Engliſh retreated into an advantageous Ground near Beauvais, where the French Horſe could prove of no Uſe to them, and there pitching, reſolved to give them Battel. The French-Men being egg'd on with the ſeeming Flight of the Engliſh, and their ſmaller Numbers were eager to engage them, and becauſe their Horſes could do them little or no Service, the Earl commanded them to diſmount, and engage them on Foot. Upon this a very fierce Skirmiſh followed, and the Advantage was a long while dubious on which Side it would fall; but at length, by the Valour and Force of the Engliſh Archers, the French were forced to give Ground, and in the End fly, having loſt 300 of their Company. The Purſuit was cloſe, ſo that the French could not recover their Horſes again, but they falling into the Hands of the Engliſh, were made uſe of to overtake them, and ſo 200 of them were taken Priſoners, the Earl of Clermont himſelf, being ſaved only by the Swiftneſs of his Horſe. The French in the mean while were not unactive, and tho' they loſt in ſome Places, got in others; for they having laid an Ambuſh in the Night near the Town of Laval, and corrupted a Miller, whoſe Mill lying by the Town, he had often Admittance into it, got into the Town by his Advice and Notice, when the Gates were opened for him: All the Engliſh that they found in it, they put to the Sword, but ſeveral of them eſcaped over the Walls. A little after this, Sir Stephen de Vignoills, ſurnamed La Hire, took the Town of Louviers, in Normandy, by Surprize, and having ſworn the Inhabitants to be Loyal to King Charles, carried away with him a great Booty, and many Priſoners.

A. D. 1430. Reg. 8.

French gained ſomething.

The Regent recovers ſeveral Places taken by the French.

King Henry, according to the Determination of his Council for his Coronation in France, began his Journey thither early in the Spring,

K. Henry's Voyage into France, and Coronation at Paris.

being

A. D. 1430. Reg. 8. being accompanied with the Two Dukes, of York and Norfolk, the Biſhops of Bath, Ely and Rocheſter, the Earls of Huntington, Stafford, Warwick, Oxford, Devonſhire, Morton, Ew and Ormond, and the Lords Bouchier, Beaumont, Tiptoft, Fitzwater, Roſſe, Arundel, Awdley, Falconbridge, Gray of Codnor, Scroop and Wells, with a large Retinue of armed Men, as well for his preſent Guard, as for a Recruit of his Army in France. On St. George's Eve, April 23, he came to Dover; the next Day being Sunday, he landed at Callis, and after a (y) ſhort Stay, marched ſlowly to Roan, where he paſſed all the Summer.

Duke of Burgundy's Marriage.

While King Henry remained at Roan, the Marriage of Philip, Duke of Burgundy with Iſabel, Daughter of John, King of Caſtile, and Philippa, Daughter of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter (in Honour of which Marriage, the King (z) inſtituted the Order of the Knights of the Golden Fleece) was ſolemniz'd. And ſoon after, that the Engliſh might try their Fortune under his auſpicious Preſence, as well as ſignalize their Courage and Conduct to him, they undertook ſeveral advantageous, but hazardous Enterprizes. One Captain Franquet, or as the French Hiſtory, Franchetto d'Arras, made an Aſſault upon the Town of Laignie, wherein Joan, and divers other good Captains were, who ſeeing Franquet's Men, but few, ſummoned the Garriſons adjoining together, and fell furiouſly upon them, reſolving to beat them down at the very firſt Onſet with their Multitude. Franquet was a Man of exceeding Courage, and his Company, tho' but 300, were reſolved never to deſert him in the greateſt Dangers, whereupon a long Conflict happened between them, and the Engliſh repulſed the French with great Loſs in the two or three firſt Onſets; but at laſt they were overpowered with Multitudes, and forced to give ground, but being unwilling to ſuffer the Shame of a Flight, they choſe to die by the Sword, and ſo were almoſt all ſlain. Franquet himſelf was taken, and preſented to Joan, as to a Commander in Chief in the Town; he was required to humble himſelf to her on the knee, which becauſe he refuſed to do, ſhe fell into a great Fury, and contrary to the Law of Arms and Reaſon, commanded his Head to be cut off, and all the Engliſh that were taken Priſoners with him to be ſlain. While this Enterprize was unſucceſsfully carried on, a greater was begun, which was the Siege of Compeigne. This was a great Town, and well manned, victualled and fortified, and therefore the Regent ſent his beſt Captains, the Duke of Burgundy, Earls of Suffolk and Arundel, and Lord John of Luxenburgh, to beſiege it with a Body of many Thouſand Men. In their Way thither, they took Soiſſons, which the French Hiſtorians ſay, was betrayed to them by a Captain of Picardy, who had the Command of it, and ſo having cleared their Way, ſat down before the Town. There was very little Hopes of gaining it by Force, and therefore theſe wiſe Captains raiſed Batteries, made Trenches, and built Forts round it, partly for their own Safety, and partly to neceſſitate the Beſieged, hoping by length of Time, and inward Streights, to force them to ſurrender. William de Havie was Governor of the Town, a very valiant and prudent Man, who by Sallies and Skirmiſhes kept the Beſiegers almoſt in continual Exerciſe, eſpecially after Joan, with a Reinforcement of 500 Men came into the Town from Laignie. On the Night of the Aſcenſion of our Lord, the Beſieged having Intelligence, that the Lord Bawdo de Noielles, who kept one of the Caſtles againſt them, was ſent out by the Duke of Burgundy to Marigny upon ſome ſpecial Service, Poiton de Saintreilles, and Joan the Virgin, with a Party of Six Hundred Men, made a vigorous Sally out of the Town by the Bridge toward Montdidier, intending to maſter it, but being perceived as they were in the Action by the Lord John de Luxenburgh, he came upon them with a ſtrong Force of Engliſh and Burgundians, as they were cutting down Tents, overthrowing Pavillions, and killing Men in their Beds, and beat them back again into the Town. In the Retreat, Joan, to ſave her Men, kept the Enemy in continual Skirmiſhes, being her ſelf one of the laſt that entred (a), but the Bars thro' which they got into the Town, being kept very ſtreight, leſt the Enemy ſhould enter with the Beſieged; Joan was left at laſt with a few, or as ſome relate, ſhut out on purpoſe by the Malice of the Governour, who envied her the Glory of Defending the Town, and ſo fell into the Hands of the Lord John of Luxenburgh, who ſold her to the Engliſh for (b) Four Thouſand Crowns in preſent Money, and an Hundred and Fifty Crowns annual Rent, who ſent her a Priſoner to Roan. After this Succeſs the Siege of the Town ſtill continued, and the Duke of Bedford, that he might haſten the ſpeedy Taking of it, ſent a Recruit of a Thouſand Archers, under the Command of the Earl of Huntington, and Sir John Robſert, Two Gentlemen as expert in all warlike Affairs, as valiant in all bold Attempts. Theſe Men were ſo active in carrying on the Siege, that there could be no doubt of gaining the Town in a ſhort time, had not the Death of Philip, Duke of Brabant, happen'd in the very Interval, by which the Duke of Burgundy, who was next Heir to his Dutchy, was obliged to leave the Siege, that he might go and take Poſſeſſion of it, before any Competition were ſtarted. The Lord John, of Luxenburgh, was by the Duke conſtituted General of the Siege, a Perſon of ſmall Valour, and as little Conduct, who being diſcouraged at ſome briſk Sallies of the Garriſon, and the Loſs of ſome of his Men, entertain'd Thoughts of raiſing the Siege, and propounded it to the Engliſh Captains; but they would by no means conſent to it, telling him, that the Town being ſo cloſely begirt outwardly, that no Relief could get in, and ſo afflicted within with Peſtilence and Famine, could not hold out many Days longer, or if it did, yet it would be a mighty Diſgrace to them, to leave the Place after ſo long a Siege. But no Reaſons would preval with him, he would hearken to no Intreaties, he would be gone, and accordingly he Sieges of Laignie and Compeigne.

A. D. 1430. Reg. 8.

Joan taken Priſoner.

Siege of Compeigne raiſed.

(y) He ſtaid ſome time at Calais. Hol. p. 605.

(z) The Duke of Burgundy inſtituted the Order of the Golden-Fleece, and the Kings of Spain have no other Pretence to the Sovereignty of that Order, but as they are Lineally deſcended from Charles the Bold, Son of Philip the Second, Duke of Burgundy, of whom the Author is now ſpeaking.

(a) It ſeems ſhe did not inter.

(b) Le Roſier, a French Author, who wrote the Life of the French King Charles VII. ſays, the Price was 10000 Pounds Tournois, and 300 Pounds Rent. VVhich being reduced into Engliſh Money, (for theſe Pounds are only Livres) make about 838 Pounds Sterling down, and 25 Pounds a Year Penſion. Enough for the Head of a VVitch, or what is more probable a VVhore; as ſhe confeſt her ſelf when ſhe was condemn'd to be burnt, pretending ſhe was with Child to ſave her Life, but that was a Trick, and did not do her Buſineſs.

A. D. 1429. Reg. 8. he march'd off when the Town was reduced to Deſpair, to the great Diſgrace of the Engliſh, who went into Normandy, and left Luxembergh to provide for his Fears, who burnt his Hutts, and left his Artillery behind him, as if he had been forced to fly by the Enemy, when there was nothing leſs

Joan examined before the Biſhop of Beauvois.

Soon after the Siege of Compeigne was raiſed, the Regent being now a little at Leiſure, cauſed Joan the Virgin to be examin'd and try'd before Peter Cauchon, Biſhop of Beauvois, in whoſe Dioceſe ſhe was taken, being requeſted thereto by the Univerſity of Paris, who put up a Petition to King Henry, that ſhe might be deliver'd up to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, becauſe ſhe had been a Cauſe of much Scandal among the People, to the Prejudice of Religion and the Catholick Faith. She was accuſed upon Seventy Eight Articles, the chief of which were theſe, viz. 'That tho' ſhe was indeed found a Virgin, yet 'ſhe had ſhamefully rejected her own Sex, imi-'tating a Man both in her Actions and Appa-'rel; That ſhe had like a faithleſs Wretch 'been a damnable Inſtrument of Slaughter and 'Blood-ſhed, partly committed by her, and part-'ly carry'd on by her Directions: That ſhe 'had greatly ſeduced the People, by pretend-'ing, that ſhe was ſent from God, and vending 'many falſe Revelations in his Name; That 'ſhe was a Sorcereſs and a Witch, foretelling 'Things to come by her Diabolical Arts and 'Skill; That ſhe had diſſwaded Charles the 'French King from Peace with England, and ſo 'had been the Cauſe of the Wars for ſeveral 'Years; That ſhe had boaſted, that ſhe knew 'Things to come, and particularly had publiſh-'ed the certain downfal of the Engliſh Power 'in France; That ſhe had aſſerted, that the 'Saints converſed with her, and had been ſeen 'with her by the King of France himſelf, Duke 'of Bourbon, and two or three other Lords; 'That ſhe had ſo ſeduced the People, as that 'many abuſed by her Hypocriſy and fained De-'votion, worſhipped her as a Saint. To theſe Articles of Accuſation ſhe made her Anſwer, ſometimes very gravely and ſoberly, and ſometimes fooliſhly. Her chief Advocate, one Giles, a grave and prudent Man, ſaid, That though in Viſions and Revelations ſhe had ſhewed her ſelf too Superſtitious, and in the Levity of her Anſwers had diſcovered the Weakneſs of her Sex, yet he could not think that the Siege of Orleans was raiſed, or King Charles brought to his Crown by any means of the Devil. But neither this Man's Opinion, nor her own Defence, was ſufficient to clear her from the greateſt part of the Charge; which when ſhe ſaw was likely to fall heavy upon her, ſhe, with much ſeeming Sorrow, confeſſed her Wickedneſs, and begg'd Mercy, which the Judge willing to grant, mollified the Sentence, and only inflicted this Puniſhment on her for the preſent, viz. That from thenceforth ſhe ſhould caſt off her unnatural wearing of Men's Garments and other Habiliments, and keep her ſelf to ſuch a Garb as is ſuitable and proper to her Sex: That ſhe ſhould abjure her pernicious Practice of Sorcery and Witchcraft, and all the other Evils, which ſhe had committed contrary to the true Religion; That ſhe ſhould be kept in perpetual Impriſonment, being fed with Bread and Water, that ſhe might, with a ſtrict Penance, bewail her former Miſdeeds. This Sentence being much milder than what ſhe had reaſon to fear from an Enemy, to whom ſhe had done ſo much Miſchief, ſhe gladly ſubmitted to it, and took a ſolemn Oath punctually to perform it. But the Devil had too great a Power upon her, to be ſo eaſily vanquiſh'd: What ſhe had promiſed was only for fear of Suffering, not thro' Conſcience of her Wickedneſs; and therefore as ſoon as her Fear was remov'd, ſhe fell again to her old Tricks of pretending Revelations, and foretelling future Events, by the familiar Converſe ſhe had with Evil Spirits, which ſhe call'd by the Names of our Lady St. Katherine and St. Ann, who (as ſhe ſaid) brought her them from God. Theſe things being heard of by the Regent, he cauſed her again to be brought to the Biſhop and tried as a Perſon relapſed into the former Wickedneſs; of which being found guilty, ſhe was reſign'd to the Secular Power, and condemn'd to be burnt as a Witch. This unavoidable Sentence of Death fully diſcover'd the Falſeneſs of her Pretenſions to any Divine Inſpiration: For whereas ſuch Perſons have joyfully ſuffer'd Death rather than ſave themſelves by the leaſt Sin, ſhe did not ſtick to bely her ſelf, by affirming, that ſhe was with Child, and conſequently, (not being married) to be guilty of Whoredom, that ſhe might put off the Execution of ſo ſevere a Sentence. The Regent, tho' he look'd upon it as a falſe Pretence, which might have been eaſily remov'd by the common Methods, yet choſe rather to reſpite her Puniſhment for Nine Months, that this Lye being diſcover'd, he might convince the World, that ſhe being actuated by a lying Spirit all along, for ſo indeed it happen'd, that ſhe was not with Child: Whereupon at Eight Days end, her Sentence of Condemnation being again pronounced upon her, ſhe was in the Old Market-Place of Roan burnt to Aſhes, which being caſt up into the Air were diſperſed by the Wind. Valeran Veran, a French Poet relates two Miracles in her Death, which as he imagines clear'd her Innocency, viz. That her Heart remained unburt in the Flames, and that a White Dove came out of her Aſhes and flew up towards Heaven; but as they are not related by any Hiſtorian of Credit, either French or Engliſh, ſo they ſeem a mere Poetical Fiction, invented long after to juſtifie the Pope's Abſolution of her from the Sentence of Condemnation the Engliſh had laid on her, which K. Charles obtain'd of Pope Calixtus Twenty-Six Years after her Death, when the Engliſh were quite expell'd France, becauſe though her Actions were too Scandalous to bear a Canonization, yet he thought it not fit to let her lie under ſo ignominious a Brand, who muſt not be deny'd the juſt Praiſe, That ſhe was a brave and valiant Amazon, the Reſtorer of the French Monarchy, who if ſhe did not drive out the Engliſh, as ſhe vaunted her ſelf, yet certainly was the chief Cauſe that the Engliſh loſt France.

A. D. 1430. Reg. 8.

Joan condemn'd and burnt.

About November King Henry went from Roan to Paris, in order to his Coronation there, for which great Preparations had been making great Part of the Summer. Many Princes and Lords, as well French as Engliſh accompany'd him, of which the Chief were the Cardinals of Wincheſter and York (e) the Dukes of Bedford, York and Norfolk, and of the French the Dukes of Burgundy, and Lewis de Luxenburgh, Cardinal and Chancellor of the Kingdom, the Biſhops of Beauvois

Reg. 9. K. Henry crown'd at Paris, and returns into England.

(e) The Biſhop of York was not a Cardinal at this Time. There was then but one Cardinal of the Engliſh Nation, Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter, John Stafford, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, was not made Cardinal till three Years after, Anno 1424. and John Kemp, Arch-Biſhop of York had not that Honour till after Stafford. See Thin's Hiſtory of Cardinals in Hol. pag. 1167.

A. D. 1430. Reg. 9.

pais, Paris and Noyon (f) firſt Peers of France, the Earls of Warwick, Salisbury, Oxford, Huntington, Ormond, Mortaigne and Suffolk, the Counts Longuerville, March and Vaudemont, with a numerous Train of Gentry, and others of both Nations, and was met by the Pariſians with very great Reſpect and Pomp. He was crown'd in the Church of Noſtre Dame on the 7th or 17th Day of December by the Cardinal of Wincheſter, which much diſguſted the Biſhop of Paris, who thought that honourable Office belong'd to him, as Biſhop of that Dioceſe. The King return'd to his Palace with the Crown on his Head, and Scepter in his Hand, another Crown and Scepter being born before him to ſignifie his Kingdom of England, and was there receiv'd with ſumptuous Feaſting. He ſtay'd no longer, than till the whole Solemnity was over, and the Noblemen of France and Normandy had paid their

A. D. 1431.

Homage, and then return'd to Roan, where he kept his Chriſtmas, and a little after by the Advice of his Council went to Callis, from whence after a ſhort Stay he took Ship for England and landed at Dover, February 11. In his Journey to London he was met by the Gentry and Commons of Kent on Barham-Down, which lies between Dover and Canterbury, who congratulated his happy Arrival, and conducted him thro' their County to Black-Heath, where he was met by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of London, who attended him thro' the City, which was adorn'd with many rich Pageants and ſhews to give him an hearty Welcome to his Palace at Weſtminſter.

Divers Skirmiſhes between the French and Engliſh.

While theſe Things were tranſacting at Paris, divers Things of Moment were perform'd by the Engliſh Soldiers in ſeveral Places in France. In Normandy Sir Francis Surianes, call'd the Argoignois, a Captain of the Engliſh Side, ſurpriz'd Montargis, by corrupting a Woman that belonged to Monſieur De Villiers the Governor of the Town, to whom he gave 2000 Crowns to reſign it to him, which ſhe accordingly did, and ſo he became Maſter of that Place by Policy, which he could not get by Force. The French troubl'd at the Loſs, ſent an Army under the Command of the Meſſiers de Gravile, and De Vitry to regain it, who took the Town, but not being able to obtain the Caſtle by a long Siege of ſix Weeks, they were forced to forſake the Town, and leave it to the Engliſh, who refortified it, and held it, till with it they were conſtrain'd to relinquiſh all thereabouts. About the ſame time the Earl of Arundel having received certain Intelligence that the Lord Bouſac, Admiral of France, was come to Beauvois with a Deſign to invade the Coaſts of Normandy, gather'd a Body of 2300 Men, and laid an Ambuſh near the Town, into which that he might train the French, he ſent a choice Troop of his Horſemen to brave them even at their Paliſadoes. The French not ſuſpecting the Snare laid for them, ſally'd out, and ſet upon the Engliſh with great Fierceneſs and Violence, but they retir'd and fled, as if they had been afraid and beaten, till they had brought them into the Ambuſh, which encompaſſed them ſo cloſe on every ſide, that they were almoſt all ſlain except ſome that fled back into the Town, and ſome few that were taken Priſoners, of whom the Valiant Captain Ponton de Santrail, Monſieur St. Raigle, and ſome others were the chiefeſt. The Lord Talbot, who was taken at the Battel of Patay, was exchang'd for the former of theſe, or as others ſay, for the latter. Before the Town of Gourney alſo Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick met a Party of French, and after a ſharp Skirmiſh vanquiſh'd them, and having ſlain many of them took Forty Horſemen Priſoners, all of them Perſons of Name and Worth. About the ſame time there having happen'd a Quarrel between Ranatus of Anjou, Duke of Barr, Count de Province, and by his Pretenſions to the Kingdom of Naples, call'd King of Sicily, and his Kinſman Anthony, Count Vaudemont, who being Brother to Charles, Duke of Lorrain claim'd the Dukedom of Anjou for his own by Succeſſion. It cauſed a War between them, and to ſtrengthen themſelves one againſt the other, Renatus engag'd the French, and Anthony the Engliſh to their Aſſiſtance. Renatus was the more powerful of himſelf, and before Anthony could get ſufficient Forces to encounter him in open Field, beſieg'd Vaudemont; which Anthony being chiefly oblig'd to ſecure, left his Men to defend for the preſent with the Help of the Citizens, and fled to the Engliſh at Paris to beg their ſpeedy Aſſiſtance to raiſe the Siege. The Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy readily granted his Petition, and ſent with him 600 Archers under the Command of Sir John Falſtoff, and 1500 others under Sir Anthony Toulongon, the Duke of Burgundy's Marſhal. Renatus hearing of this Deſign, and that Count Anthony was coming towards him to raiſe the Siege, he like a valiant Captain leaving a Part of his Army to carry it on, went to meet them, and encountred them at Valleamont not far from Nanci. The Battel was fierce and long, but at length the Engliſh Archers ſo gauled the French Horſe, that they were forced to give Ground, and at length fled. In the purſuit there were 3000 ſlain, and 200 taken Priſoners, among whom were Duke Renatus himſelf, the Biſhop of Metz, the Lord of Roquedemaque, Viſcount Darcy, and Sir Everard de Salſeburg, who were impriſon'd at Braconés upon Salin. This Defeat of Duke Renatus's Men ſtruck ſuch a Terror into the reſt of his Army which carry'd on the Siege before the Town, that they immediately raiſed it, left all they had and fled away, but the Beſieged purſuing them, took many of them, ſlew many, and took others Priſoners. The whole Camp then became their Prey, which they ranſack'd; and being loaden with the Riches and Spoils of it, return'd into their City. Thus the Engliſh attended by a good Fortune, not only were Victorious themſelves, but made their Allies Succeſsful.

A. D. 1431. Reg. 9.

Vaudemont beſieg'd.

Lord Talbot exchang'd.

Yet their good Fortune was not without ſome Mixture of Ill thro' their own Careleſſneſs and Security; for the Lord Willoughby and Sir Matthew Gough beſieging St. Severine, a ſtrong Caſtle in Anjou, in the Abſence of the Lord Ambroſe de Lore, who was the Governor of it, this Lord fearing the Skill and Courage of his Deputy made all the Haſte he could to the Relief of it, and King Charles ſent along with him certain Noblemen with a conſiderable Body of Men to raiſe the Siege, who not following him with the Speed deſired, the Lord de Lore tarry'd for them at Beaumont. The Engliſh about the Town having Intelligence of the Intentions and Motions of the French, Sir Matthew Gough was ſent with part of the Army to ſurprize De Lore and his Forces before the reſt came up to them, while the Lord Willoughby maintain'd the Siege with the other part of the Army. Gough marched with Expedition, and in the Night entred the

Reg. 10.

St. Severine beſieg'd by the Engliſh.

(f) The Biſhop of Paris was not a Peer of France till very lately. Meſſire Francois de Harley, the late Arch-Biſhop was the firſt that had that Honour. Robbe Geo. part 1. pag. 88.

A. D. 1431. Reg. 10.

the French Man's Camp, before they were perceived, the Watch being careleſs and ſecure. The French thro' the Confuſion they were in, made ſmall Reſiſtance, but diſpairing of Safety, fled towards the Noblemen, who were haſtning up with another Body of Men to De Lore. The Engliſh in the mean Time plundered the Camp, and having taken ſome Priſoners, among which was De Lore himſelf, were returning to the Town, but ſlowly, being loaded with Prey and Priſoners. The French, who were coming, hearing of the Defeat of their Fellows, haſtned up to their Relief, and tho' too late to preſerve them, yet they reſolutely purſued the Engliſh, and ſet upon them with great Fury, who being in Diſorder, and cumbred with their Baggage, were unable to reſiſt, and ſo fled to the Town, leaving their Captain, Sir Matthew Gough, and divers others in the Hands of the French, with all their Spoil that they had taken a little before, yet could not they recover De Lore again, but he ſtill remained in the Hands of the Engliſh. The Lord Willoughby, who lay ſtill before the Town, was much troubled at this Misfortune, and having loſt much of his Strength, thought it not ſafe to continue the Siege, and ſo he departed unwillingly from it, and in his Retreat was purſued ſo cloſe by the Beſieged, that he loſt many Men in his Rear.

The Pope endeavours to make a Peace between the French and Engliſh.

The Wars in France between the Engliſh and French thus holding on with almoſt equal Succeſs, and with ſmall hopes of a Concluſion, it much grieved the Pope, who was then Eugenius IV. to ſee and conſider of the great Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood made thereby, and therefore that he might put an End to ſo great Cruelties, and eſtabliſh a Peace, he ſent his Legate, Nicholas, the Cardinal of St. Crucis, or the Holy-Croſs, into France to make a Peace between them, but to little or no effect; for tho' the Cardinal was very earneſt and induſtrious to compoſe all Differences between the Two Parties, yet he found them ſo obſtinate in their Enmity one to another, that he could obtain no more of them by all his earneſt and long Importunities, than a Truce for Six Years, which being very unwillingly granted, laſted ſcarce ſo many Months, and ſo was never ratified; for the Baſtard of Orleans, lately made Earl of Dunois, having an Army of 3000 Men about him, ſurpriſed and took Chartres, a conſiderable Garriſon belonging to the Engliſh, after this manner. A Servant of one of King Charles's Financiers had ſeveral Relations and Friends among the Inhabitants of Chartres, and among the Reſt, a Brother, who having obtained Liberty by his Means to buy Proviſions out of the Town, and ſell them to the Garriſon within, had a free Paſſage thro' the Gates with his Cart to carry it in, and becauſe he often gave the Keepers of the Gates ſome of his Proviſions gratis, could eaſily gain Admiſſion at any Seaſon. This Servant being inſtigated by the Baſtard of Orleans, to tempt his Brother by large Rewards to betray the Town to the French, by many Requeſts and Promiſes prevailed with him, that upon Pretence of carrying a Load of Fiſh into the Town freſh and fair, he might be admitted thro' the Gate at Midnight, and it was contrived, that with him an Hundred Men, whom he had laid ready in a Cellar, which he had hired near the Gate for a Ware-Houſe, ſhould ruſh in, and having killed the Watch, let in the Reſt of the French Detachment which lay in Ambuſh, and at a Sign given, were ready to fall in with them. This was all ſucceſsfully carried on, and the Engliſh Garriſon, which was no more than an Hundred and Twenty Men, becauſe they truſted to the Fidelity of the Inhabitants, ſeeing the Enemy in the City eſcaped out of the Gates that opens towards Eureux, and ſo ſaved themſelves. The Inhabitants, who having always ſided with the Duke of Burgundy, knew that they could expect no Mercy from the French, ſtood to their Defence, but being too weak, eſpecially in that Diſorder, to encounter ſo great a Force, were moſt of them ſlain, and among them the Biſhop, who with Eighty more, was killed upon the Stairs of his Cathedral Church. After this the whole City was treated as conquered, the Clergy, and chief Magiſtrates that ſurvived, were made Priſoners of War, never to be releaſed, but for large Ranſoms; their Goods were plundered and carried away, their Women were raviſhed, and all Perſons put to Death, who had acted as Magiſtrates, or Officers under the Engliſh. This Breach of the Truce ſo lately made much offended the Engliſh, and ſo much the more, becauſe the Baſtard of Orleans defended it, as lawful by the Law of Arms to ſteal or buy a Town without Invaſion. And ſo the War was again renewed with freſh Hoſtilities on both Sides. The French having been ſo ſucceſsful in taking the Town of Chartres by Treachery, made a like Attempt upon the Caſtle of Roan, by corrupting the Captain of it, one Peter Andebeefe with Promiſes of giving him the whole Revenue of the Caſtle; which, tho' Andebeefe did as much as in him lay to perform, yet partly thro' the Cowardize and Backwardneſs of the French, and partly thro' the Courage of the Engliſh, who made a brave Defence, tho' ſurprized, by reaſon of the Earl of Arundel's Preſence, they miſſed of their Deſign, moſt of the French being either ſlain in the Attempt, or taken Priſoners. This ill Succeſs quelled the French a little, and the Truce took effect a while.

Chartres taken.

A. D. 1431. Reg. 10.

A. D. 1432.

In England there was great Rejoycing for the late Coronation of their King, yet; as if the poor Followers of Wickliffe were to be their Peace-Offering, the Biſhops perſecuted them with the greateſt Severity. Richard Hoveden, a Woolwinder, and Citizen of London, was burnt for Hereſie on Tower-Hill, and Thomas Bagley, Prieſt, Vicar of Monenden, or Munden, not far from Maldon in Eſſex, ſuffered the like Puniſhment in Smithfield for the ſame Crime. In the Dioceſe of Norwich, Nicholas Canon of Eye, and ſeveral others were forced to abjure their Opinions, and undergo Penance, and ſo in other Places of the Kingdom. Theſe Cruelties much incenſed the Commons againſt the Clergy, who were always the moſt zealous and forward in ſuch Proſecutions, and begat a Rebellion; for William Mandevile, Bailiff of Abbington in Oxfordſhire, a Man who favoured the Opinions of Wickliffe, and much diſliked the Cruelty of the Clergy to them, having a great Intereſt in the Commons, ſtirred them up to Revenge againſt them, and getting a Multitude of People about him, took upon himſelf to be their Captain, under the Name of Jack Sharp of Wigmoreland, in Wales, giving out, That he would make the Heads of Prieſts as cheap as Sheep's Heads, which were then Three, or as others ſay, Ten a Penny. Some Hiſtorians make his Deſigns to be levelling, and affirm, That he held, that Prieſts ought not to have any worldly Poſſeſſions, and that Chriſtians, whoſe

The Perſecution of Wickliffe's Followers in England begets a Rebellion.

Jack Sharp, Captain of the Rebels.

A. D. 1432. Reg. 10.

whoſe Profeſſion engages them upon a univerſal Charity, ought to enjoy no Properties, but to leave all things in Common. Theſe Opinions were at that Time thought to be diſperſed abroad by their Enemies, to make them more odious to the People, and 'tis not at all probable that he ſhould attempt ſuch an impoſſible Thing, as to take away all Title of Poſſeſſions. His Hatred was to the Clergy, and 'tis like, that as he would have deſtroyed many of that Order, if his Deſign had been ſucceſsful, ſo he would have made ſuch as ſurvived poor enough: But his ſeditious Attempt was no ſooner known, than it was ſuppreſſed; for the Duke of Glouceſter, a watchful and good Governour, having Notice of this Inſurrection, immediately ſent down a ſufficient Force to diſperſe the Rebels, which was ſoon effected, ſeveral of them were taken Priſoners, and among them the Captain himſelf, who being puniſhed with Quartering, the Reſt upon their Submiſſion, were pardoned and diſmiſſed.

Fifth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

About the Time of this Rebellion, the (e) Cardinal of Wincheſter, a warlike and politick Prelate, who had ſtaid behind in France to aſſiſt the Regent, in managing Civil Affairs, there came over into England for ſome freſh Recruits, both of Men, and Money to carry on the War, which by the late Breach of Truce was likely to be renewed. The Duke of Glouceſter, being ſenſible of the Neceſſity of a preſent Supply, immediately called a Parliament, which ordered, That in the firſt Place a ſufficient Number of Men and Money ſhould be raiſed, and tranſported with all convenient Speed into France, and after ſpent ſome Time upon other Affairs of State. The Principal Matters Enacted were,

1. That whereas under the Colour of Outlawries, ſued out againſt certain Perſons, Occaſion was taken to moleſt others of the ſame Name, and to ſeize their Goods and Chattels, eſpecially when they were dead, becauſe there was no Remedy at Common-Law for Executors to recover ſuch Seizures, wherefore it was enacted by this Parliament, in Favour of Executors, that in Defence of the Teſtator's Goods, a Writ called Identitate Nominis, ſhould be granted to them, and ſhould be as maintainable by them, as by any other Perſon living.

2. That whereas the Welſh-Men aſſembled in great Numbers, armed, and did in a riotous and rebellious Manner, intercept, and ſtop, the Boats, Trowes, Floats, called Drags, carrying Wares and Merchandizes to Briſtol, Glouceſter, Worceſter, and other Places, upon the River Severn, and broke the ſaid Veſſels, to the end, that the Traders might have their Boats and Veſſels of them only; therefore it was enacted, that all the King's Liege People ſhould have free Paſſage upon the ſaid River, to carry their Goods and Chattels as they pleaſe, without any Moleſtation from the Welſh, and if for the future they any Ways moleſted them in their Traffick, the Party or Parties aggrieved ſhould have their Actions according to the Courſe of the Common-Law. But that which made the greateſt Noiſe in this Parliament, was a Caſe of Baſtardy, alledged againſt Elianor, the Wife of James, Lord Audley, who claimed the Inheritance of Edmund, Earl of Kent, as being his Eldeſt Daughter, and a Legitimate Iſſue, or Mulier, by Conſtance his Wife; for which ſhe had gotten a Certificate from the Ordinary. Againſt this Claim, the other Daughters of the ſaid Edmund, Earl of Kent, put in their Petition to the Parliament, alledging, that the ſaid Elianor was a Baſtard, that her Mother Conſtance, the late Wife of Thomas, Lord Diſpencer, was never married to the ſaid Earl, and that the Certificate brought from the Ordinary was obtained by Fraud. This produced an Act of Parliament, and by which it was ordained,

A. D. 1432. Reg. 10.

3. That in all Pleas, wherein Baſtardy is alledged againſt any Perſon, Party to the ſaid Plea, the Judge, or Judges of, or in the Courts where the ſaid Plea is depending, ſhall certifie it to the Chancellor of England, for the Time being, to the intent, that Proclamation be made in the ſaid Chancery, by Three Months, once in every Month, that all Perſons that have any Thing to object againſt the ſaid Mulier, or Perſon pretending himſelf a Legitimate-Iſſue, may put in their Allegations and Objections before any Certificate be given by the Biſhop.

A Peace made with the Scots.

In this Parliament alſo a Peace was concluded with James, King of Scots, who ſent his Ambaſſador to the Duke of Glouceſter to deſire it. The Duke not willing to determine ſo important a Matter without the Conſent of the Nation, referr'd it to the Three Eſtates, who after ſome Debates, ſettled a Peace with them, and then the Parliament roſe.

A Mutiny at Callis.

The Biſhop of Wincheſter, who had all the Seſſion been very active to raiſe both the Men and Money appointed by the Parliament for the Service of France, was ready to paſs thither about the ſame Time, and accordingly departed. The Duke of Bedford, having accompanied the King to Callis, remained ſtill in Picardy, ready to receive the Cardinal; in the mean Time he having Information of a Mutiny among the Soldiers at Callis, partly becauſe the Staple of Wool was removed from thence, and partly becauſe in the Time of Truce they had been reſtrained from pillaging and ravaging the Neighbouring Countries, whereby their Prey grew too narrow to uphold their Extravagant Expences. The Regent knowing the dangerous Effects of ſuch Diſcontents among the Soldiers, haſtned thither, and having diligently examined the Matter, put Four or Five of the chief Mutineers to Death, and Caſhiered an Hundred and Ten more, baniſhing them from the Town and Marches of it, and ſo ſettled the Garriſon in Peace.

The Death of the Dutcheſs of Bedford, and the Duke his ſecond Marriage.

While the Duke of Bedford was in theſe Parts, his Dutcheſs, the Lady Anne, Siſter to Philip, Duke of Burgundy, departed this Life at Paris. She had in her Life-time been the Cement of that firm Friendſhip and Love, which had ſo long continued between her Husband and Brother, by which the Engliſh Intereſts in France had been chiefly maintained and upheld, and by her Death it was much abated, and in a ſhort Time was utterly diſſolved by a ſecond Marriage, which this wiſe Duke not very prudently made, with Jaquet, the Daughter of Peter de Luxenburgh, Earl of St. Poll and Niece, to Lewis de Luxenburgh, Biſhop of Turain and Ely, and Chancellor of France, for King Henry, by whoſe Perſwaſion this Match was effected. Philip, Duke of Burgundy had never embraced any Friendſhip with this Family, and had he been conſulted about the Marriage, would certainly have been againſt it, as being not only inferiour to the Duke of Bedford's Greatneſs, but his own; beſides, he was not at all acquainted with it, contrary to the uſual Cuſtom among Princes, eſpecially of ſo great Intimacy, which he interpreted as a Contempt caſt upon him, and grew every Day more and more cold towards him, till upon other little Occaſions of Diſguſt offer'd, they became open and profeſſed Enemies, which was a chief Cauſe of loſing France. But however this was not diſcern'd till ſome time after, and the Duke of Bedford very well pleaſed with his New Spouſe paſſed into England, and tarry'd there among his Friends, from whom he receiv'd many Congratulations of Happineſs, and other Expreſſions of Love and Kindneſs, till the latter end of Aug. 1433. when he return'd again to his Charge in France.

(e) This Rebellion, the Calling of the Parliament, and the Cardinal's Return to France, happen'd all before the young King's Return to England.

A. D. 1432. Reg. 10.

The Dauphin's Soldiers break the Truce.

While the Duke of Bedford was Abſent and in England, the Dauphin's Soldiers, who by reaſon of the Truce were almoſt ſtarv'd, having no Wags, and not being allow'd to live upon the Spoil of others, as they had done in the Time of the War, began again to plunder and rob both the Engliſh and Burgundians as they pleaſed, and taking many Priſoners would not releaſe them but upon great Ranſoms. Theſe open Breaches of the Peace being obſerv'd by the Duke of Bedford at his Arrival ſo awaken'd his Thoughts, and ſtirr'd up his Vigilancy, that he prepared an Army to repreſs the Inſolencies of the French, or to renew the War, as occaſion ſhould offer; for it ſeem'd to him unreaſonable, that the French ſhould under the ſhew of a Truce do King Henry's Subjects as much Miſchief as they pleaſed, and make the War ceaſe in the French Dominions only. The News of the Duke of Bedford's Preparations, tho' really no more than what was neceſſary, was receiv'd by the French as a Preſage of the Continuance of the War; and therefore having gotten a Pretence for their deſir'd Arms, they invade the Engliſh Territories immediately, before the Duke of Bedford could get an Army together, and by a ſudden Surprize took St. Valery, a Town in the Confines of Normandy, lying upon the Mouth of the River Some, and another Party of French under the Command of Sir Ambroſe de Lore waſted and deſtroy'd all the Country about Caen. The Invitation to this Attempt was the great Fair, which was kept on St. Michael's Day in the Fields adjoyning to the Town, about St. Steven's Church, which if they could ſeize upon without any Impediment from the Garriſon, would be a great Booty for them. De Lore therefore thus contriv'd the Buſineſs. He himſelf with 100 Croſs-bow-men, and 50 Horſe went between the Fair and the Town to beat back the Garriſon if they ſhould ſally out upon them, ſending a Party of 500 Men to ſeize the Booty in the Fair in the mean Time. The Garriſon of Caen had not the leaſt Suſpicion of this Attempt, and ſo came not forth to hinder them; whereupon the Merchants and Traders of the Fair became a Prey to the French, who took them all Captives with their Goods, and paſſed over the River Orne with them, where their Captain made a Scrutiny of the Priſoners, retaining ſuch only in their Hands as could pay a Ranſom, which were about 800, and ſuffer'd the Reſt to depart Home, being in Number about 2000. Theſe Hoſtilities of the French rouſed the Engliſh, who that they might draw them from their ravaging at a Diſtance, reſolved to beſiege the Town of Laignie upon the River Marne, which being a Place of Importance to the French, and a great Annoyance to the Engliſh in hindring their Commerce to Paris, would engage the French wholly upon its Defence, and accordingly ſent the Earl of Arundell, the Earl of Warwick's Son, and the Lord Liſle Adam with 1200 Men, and all ſuitable Arms and Ammunition to beſiege it. Laignie was well ſtored and fortified with Men and Victuals, having 800 Men of Arms, beſides other Soldiers and Townſmen in it, ſo that they were of equal, if not greater Strength than the Beſiegers. This did not at all diſcourage the Engliſh, but counting it a greater Honour to conquer thoſe that were ſuperior in Strength, they made many fierce Aſſaults, and by their Cannon-ſhot broke down one Arch of the great Bridge laid over the Marne, and burnt the Ravelin; but Winter coming on, and the Beſieged making a Vigorous Oppoſition, they broke up the Siege for the preſent, and left the Town.

A. D. 1432. Reg. 10.

The French rob the Fair at Caen.

The Engliſh beſiege Laignie.

A. D. 1433.

The Duke of Bedford diſappointed of his Deſign in beſieging Laignie reſolv'd in the Spring to attack it more vigorouſly in Perſon; and having gather'd an Army of choice Men for Courage put it under the Command of ſuch Captains as he counted moſt Valiant and Experienced, viz. Robert, Lord Willoughby, Sir Andrew Ogard his Chamberlain, Sir John Salvain, Bailiff of Roan, Sir John Mongomery, Bailiff of Caux, Sir Ralph Nevill, Sir Ralph Standiſh, and many others, by whoſe Conduct he did not doubt of Succeſs. The French were much terrified at the Approaches of this ſtrong Force, which to them as well as to all others ſeem'd almoſt irreſiſtable. The Duke led it in Perſon, and drawing near to the Town fortified himſelf in a Park adjoyning; and having made a Bridge of Boats over the Marne brought his Ordnance ſo near the Walls, that he might batter them down for an Aſſault ſpeedily, by which he intended with a full Reſolution to make himſelf Maſter of it. The Earl of Dunois, commonly call'd the Baſtard of Orleans, was not at all terrified at their Attempts; but having animated his Men to ſtand valiantly to their own Defence, repulſed the Engliſh with ſome Loſs ſeveral times, inſomuch that the Duke of Bedford not thinking it ſafe to conquer it by Force, which would coſt him the Lives of ſo many Men, choſe rather by Delays and Watchfulneſs to ſtarve it. The French King ſeeing the great Danger the Town was in, and knowing of what Importance it was to him to preſerve it, being as the Key to the three Territories, Burgundy, the French and Engliſh part of France, ſent the Count Dunois a Recruit of 6000 Men with Store of Victuals under the Command of Monſieur de Rieux, Marſhal of France, Monſieur de Coulant, Admiral of France, the Lords Poiton, Le Hire, and Gawcourt intended by this Force to raiſe the Siege, or elſe to Victual the Town ſo, that it ſhould not be reduced by Famine. This Army at their firſt coming breathed Revenge, and being equal to the Beſiegers aſſur'd themſelves of a Victory with the Help of the Beſieged. The Duke of Bedford was ſenſible of the Advantage the French had of him, being freſh Men, and kept himſelf cloſe in his Camp, which the French gave out they would aſſault, but the Regent's Courage would not ſuffer him to wait for that which would have been a Diſgrace to him, tho' he had repulſed them, and therefore within a Day or two of their Arrival ſent an Herald to them to bid them Battel, but they deny'd, maintaining only ſome ſmall Skirmiſhes with the Engliſh, till their Men convey'd thirty Oxen and ſome other Proviſions into the Town, and that with no ſmall Damage to themſelves; for in the Skirmiſhes the French loſt above fifty noble and valiant Men, among whom were the Lord Saintreiles, and the Lord Gawcourt's Brother. The Town however having receiv'd ſome Relief, the Army remov'd in the Beginning of Auguſt to a Place call'd Fort-under-yer, and by a Bridge of Laignie valiantly defended and held againſt the Duke of Bedford.

The Duke of Bedford raiſes the Siege.

A. D. 1433. Reg. 10.

of Boats paſſed into the Iſle of France, where meeting with no Reſiſtance they took many Caſtles and Towns. The Duke tho' very deſirous to get Laignie, which after the Departure of the Army could not hold out very long, yet conſider'd the various Diſpoſition of the Pariſians, and fearing leaſt that City ſhould revolt to King Charles when the Army drew near to them, raiſed the Siege in haſte, leaving all his Engines, Pavilions and Proviſions behind him: The Beſieged purſu'd him in his Retreat, ſlew ſome of his Men, and took others Priſoners; but the Neceſſities of War obliging him to ſave Paris, he was forced to undergo that Loſs rather than a greater. At Paris he ſent the French another Challenge to fight, but they anſwer'd, They had done what they came for, and would fight him when they ſaw their own Time; and ſo retir'd without Battel.

Reg. 11.

St. Valery regain'd from the French.

The French being retreated, the Regent ſent Peter de Luxenburgh, Earl of St. Poll, and Robert, Lord Willoughby with a ſufficient Force to beſiege and retake the Town of St. Valery which the French had gotten in the Beginning of the laſt Year; for the Regent was of that Diſpoſition, that he could hardly ſleep till all Loſſes ſuſtain'd by the Engliſh were regain'd. Meſſieurs de Vaucourt, De la Torre, and De Verſeil defended the Place, and did for three Weeks ſpace manfully and bravely maintain their Poſts againſt the Beſiegers, but at length yielded upon Condition, That the Garriſon might depart with their Horſe and Baggage. The Earl of St. Poll after their Departure put in a Garriſon of Engliſh, of the valianteſt and ſtouteſt Men, made Sir John Aubmond Captain of it, and then with the Lord Willoughby return'd to the Regent at Paris, where they were joyfully received by the Army.

A raging Peſtilence at St. Valery.

Not long after their Departure there happen'd a very terrible Peſtilence among the Inhabitants, whether by the Infection of the Air, or by any corrupt Victuals, which the Towns People during the Siege had eaten, is uncertain, but it raged ſo violently, that within a little Time it conſum'd two Parts in three of them. The Succeſs of the Earl of St. Poll in taking St. Valery was an Encouragement both to the Regent and himſelf to attempt other Places; and accordingly the Duke ſent him to beſiege the Caſtle of Monchas, which he readily undertook; but being in his March toward it he encamp'd near the Town of Blangie, where he was ſeiz'd with a very violent Diſtemper, of which de died ſuddenly, leaving his Title and Poſſeſſions to Lewis de Luxenburgh his Son and Heir.

The Death of Peter de Luxenburgh.

His Obſequies after his Death were ſolemniz'd with great Devotion both at London and Paris, becauſe he was Father-in-law to the Duke of Bedford; with him died the Deſign of the beſieging the Caſtle of Manchas, and the Town of Rombarres.

Sixth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

On the 8th of July the Parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and ſat till Aug. 1. when it was adjourn'd to St. Edward's Day, Octob. 13. and then compleated the Acts, which they had began before, in the former part of the Seſſion, and being moſt of them about Matters of great Uſe to the Publick, they may not be unworthy our Obſervation.

1. It was provided by an Act, That ſuch Perſons as were Keepers of the Stews or Whore-Houſes in Southwark, ſhould not be impanell'd upon any Jury, nor keep an Inn or Tavern in any other Places, leaſt Men of ſuch vile Conſciences and Practices ſhould corrupt Juſtice, and propagate their Villanies over the Nation.

2. It was enacted, That even Diſſeiſors ſhould not be put out of Poſſeſſion by any Colluſive Tricks of Law, as was then uſual, by making the Sheriff the Diſſeiſor, and then entering upon the Lands for the Default of the Tenant's not anſwering: Wherefore it was ordain'd, That all ſuch Writs ſhall be abated and quaſhed: And,

A. D. 1433. Reg. 11.

3. In the Behalf of the Perſon diſſeiſed wrongfully of his Lands, whereas before the Law was, that the Diſſeiſee might ſue the Diſſeiſor in his Life-time, if he took the Profits at the Time of the Suit commenced, which to avoid the Diſſeiſors, made over the Land by Feoffments to others, and ſo avoided the Suit: Whereupon it was enacted, That the Diſſeiſees ſhould have their Action as well againſt the Feoffee, as Diſſeiſor himſelf, if either of them take the Profits of the Land.

4. And becauſe divers Tenants of Lands for term of Life and Years, made over the ſaid Lands to other Under-Tenants to the End that they might not be liable to Writs of Waſte, for the Damages done upon the ſaid Lands by their Order and Connivance before the Grant of the ſaid Leaſes; It was hereupon enacted, That the Tenant in Reverſion might have his Action againſt the Tenant for Life or Years, for the Damages done, as well before as after the Leaſe made to any Under-Tenants, and recover treble Damages for the ſaid Waſte, provided that it were prov'd, that the ſaid Firſt-Tenants took the Profits of the Land to their own proper Uſe at the Time of the Waſte done.

5. Whereas divers Suits and Inducements as well for the King as his Subjects were diſcontinu'd by making of new Commiſſions for the Peace, to the great delay of Juſtice, and wrong of the Subject, it was enacted, That no Pleas, or Proceſſes ſhould be diſcontinu'd by any new Commiſſions, but the Juſtices ſo made ſhould have Power and Authority to continue all Pleas depending and determine the ſame.

6. An Abuſe alſo being crept into the Nation about Meaſures contrary to the Statutes, and Purveyors, Bakers, Merchants, and Buyers of Corn, taking Nine Buſhels for the Quarter; it was enacted, That the Statutes for Weights and Meaſures ſhould be proclaim'd in every Market-Town, and that there ſhould be a Buſhel, common Balance and Weights in every Market-Town, City and Borough kept by the Mayor and Juſtices according to the Standard in the Exchequer; and if any Perſon ſhall preſume to Sell or Buy by any other Weights or Meaſures, they ſhall forfeit Five Pound to the Perſon that ſhall ſue for it, and Five Pound to the King.

7. Recogniſors having found out a way to defeat the Executions of ſuch Perſons as they were indebted to by Recognizance, by bringing their Writs De Corpus cum cauſa out of Chancery, and giving Sureties to the King only, are deliver'd out of Priſon, and their Creditors are defeated of their Debts; it was therefore ordain'd, That Sureties ſhould be given as well to the Party as to the King, that their Debts may be ſurely paid.

Other Acts alſo of leſs Importance were alſo made this Seſſion, as about the Meaſure of certain Cloths, call'd Streights, for the puniſhing of ſuch as ſhall dare to aſſault any Perſon coming to the Parliament or Council by the King's Command: And laſtly, For ſetting a Price upon Wax-Candles, Images and Figures: But theſe Acts being only Temporary, and long ſince out of Uſe deſerve little Regard. We

A. D. 1433. Reg. 11. read not of any Taxes, that this Parliament gave the King, but perhaps it was becauſe the Duty of Tunnage and Poundage, which was given the King in his Third Year, was ſtill continu'd: And whereas before they were granted for certain Years only, they were now indefinitely given him for the Charge of the War, and from thence as Stow ſays, They received the Name of Cuſtoms, i. e. uſual and conſtant Payments.

Cuſtoms, why ſo called.

The Council of Baſil, which, tho' call'd by Pope Martin V. and after his Death confirm'd by his Succeſſor Eugenius IV. in the Year 1431. was ſcarcely ſettled by reaſon of the Turbulency of Eugenius, who took upon him to diſſolve it, and bring it to Ferrara, began now to aſſume a Power of acting without the Pope, and in their Eleventh Seſſion, February the 27th, made theſe Decrees or Canons.

The Council of Baſil, and its Decrees.

1. That the Biſhop of Rome ought under the Pain of Suſpenſion and Depoſition to be preſent, either by himſelf, or his Legates choſen by the Conſent of the Cardinals, at General Councils, with all other Eccleſiaſtical Perſons.

2. That the Pope cannot lawfully hinder any Man, not ſo much as a Cardinal from coming to ſuch a Council, but ought to give a Licenſe to all that deſire it; and that the Pope cannot call a Council, diſſolve it, or remove it from one Place to another, without the expreſs Conſent of the Council.

3. That the Council of Baſil cannot be diſſolv'd without the Conſent of all the Biſhops aſſembled at it.

And then they proceeded to conſult about Eccleſiaſtical Matters, and made divers Conſtitutions for the better ordering of the Church, viz.

1. That no Perſon ſhould be made a Biſhop, but ſuch as have been in Holy Orders a conſiderable time, are of fit Age, and are eminent for their Piety, Holineſs and Learning.

2. That Biſhops ſhould hold a Dioceſan Synod once a Year in their Dioceſſes about the Octaves of Eaſter, and diligently inſpect into the Manners of the Clergy, and amend all the Corruptions of their Dioceſſe.

3. That all Monks and other Religious Perſons ſhould carefully obſerve the Three Subſtantial Vows of their Profeſſion.

4. That in ſuch Places as the Jews inhabited, all Biſhops ſhould take a particular Care to ſettle ſuch Paſtors, as may be able to convince them of their Errors, and by their Authority draw them to hear the Word of God; with many Canons of like Nature: But the Three chief Canons which they moſt ſtrongly aſſerted againſt the Pope and deſir'd, to be believ'd by all, as the moſt infallible Truths, calling them, Veritates Fidei, were theſe, viz.

The Canons called, Veritates Fidei.

I. That a General Council is above the Pope, and any other Perſon.

II. That the Pope cannot diſſolve or remove a General Council lawfully call'd without their Conſent, by his own Authority, or at his own Pleaſure.

III. That whoſoever oppoſes theſe Aſſertions is an Heretick.

This Council ſat many Years after this, and ſtoutly maintain'd its own Power againſt Eugenius, who fought to diſſolve them, and by its Authority the Chriſtian World hath armed it ſelf againſt the Pope's Supremacy, as uſurped, and againſt the Word of God.

The Death of Peter de Luxenburgh, who after certain Funeral Ceremonies perform'd at Paris was ſent over into England, and interred with much Solemnity in St. Paul's Church in London, cauſing ſome ſhort Ceſſation of Arms on the Engliſh Part, gave an Opportunity to the French, who watch'd all Advantages, to commit ſome Outrages upon them and their Allies. Into Burgundy they entered with a ſtrong Body of Men, and burnt, took and deſtroy'd many Towns. The Burgundians much enrag'd at their Loſſes gather'd a great Army to revenge their Quarrel, and recover their Towns, and the Duke of Bedford being much troubl'd for the Loſs of his Friends, ſent the Lord Willoughby and Sir Thomas Kiriell with a good Force to their Aſſiſtance. Theſe joyning the Burgundians fell upon the Enemy in Lymois, and after a long Battel vanquiſh'd them, and recover'd all the Places to the Duke of Burgundy, which they had gain'd from him. Le Hire alſo accompany'd with many Gentlemen and 1500 Soldiers at the ſame time acted his Part with great Violence, taking the Town of Somme, and in it a great Number of Priſoners, by whoſe Ranſoms he maintain'd his Soldiers, better than by their Pay. He afterwards divided his Men into two Parts, ſending one of them into the County of Cambray, and conducting the other himſelf in thoſe Parts. The former being inform'd of a great Concourſe of People, met at Haſpre at a Feaſt, ſet upon them unawares in the midſt of their Mirth, took many of them Priſoners, (the reſt of them which were of better Condition ſaving themſelves by getting into a ſtrong Tower adjoyning) and having plunder'd the Town, and burnt the Church and Abbey, with many Houſes they retreated to Mount St. Martin, where Le Hire and his Men expected them, who in the mean time had not lain ſtill, but done as much or more Miſchief; for they burnt and plunder'd the Town of Beaurevoir, and La Motta, an Houſe of Pleaſure belonging to the Counteſs of Laigni near by it, ſecur'd all the Champion Country about it, and having gotten much Booty went to Laon to divide it; which done he diſmiſſed them to their Garriſons loaden with Spoil without the Loſs of ſo much as one Man, becauſe they met in all their March with no Oppoſition. John de Luxenburgh, Count de Laigni, to whom the Defence of thoſe Parts belong'd, being otherwiſe buſied at that Time by reaſon of the Death of the Old Count Peter his Brother. The Succeſs of Le Hire encourag'd Pawnſach, the Captain of Laon, who envy'd his good Fortune, to make the like Attempts, that he might enrich himſelf and his Garriſon; and to that end he march'd with 400 Soldiers towards Marle intending to ſurprize Vervins, a Town belonging to Giovanna de Barr, Daughter-in-law to John of Luxenburgh above-nam'd. Paſſing by Marle he burnt the Suburbs, and plunder'd them, but ſtay'd not to attack the Town, being mindful of his richer Booty at Vervins. John de Luxenburgh, who was before alarm'd at the Inſults of Le Hire; having now gotten to his Charge again, and rallied his Men, ſet upon them, and gave them Battel. The French ſcarce ſuſpecting any Oppoſition ſoon fled, leaving 160 of their Brethren ſlain upon the Place, and 80 Priſoners. It is ſaid, That John de Luxenburgh himſelf fought with that daring Courage and Reſolution, as if he would have conquer'd them alone, and ſlew many of them with his own Hands. He had with him in this Skirmiſh a young Nephew whom he was training up for War, for whoſe ſake he was the more venturous

A. D. 1433. Reg. 12.

The Lord Willoughby and Sir Thomas Kiriell's Acts in Burgundy.

Le Hire infeſts the Engliſh much.

Pawnſach's Deſign upon Vervins.

John de Luxenburgh routs him.

A. D. 1433. Reg. 12.

turous himſelf to give him a good Example of Valour, and the more glad of the Victory, as an Encouragement to his future Proceedings; and that he might embolden him the more in Warlike Atchievements, he cauſed him to ſlay ſeveral of the Priſoners then taken with his own Hands, which 'tis ſaid, he did with ſo much Unconcern and Readineſs, that he ſhew'd a natural Diſpoſition in him to be a Soldier; eſpecially, if that Maxim be true, That a Man cannot be a good Warrior unleſs he be very Cruel.

A. D. 1434.

The Lord Talbot lately come out of England, takes ſeveral Places in France.

Whilſt theſe Things paſſed in France, the Valiant Lord Talbot, who had been ſome time in England among his Friends, was very buſie in gathering a Recruit of freſh Men to carry with him into France, and having gotten a Body of Eight Hundred, march'd thro' London, March the 9th, in order to his Journey with them thither. He landed in Normandy, and took his Way by Roan to Paris, but the Active Spirits of both Captain and Soldiers could not be idle in an Enemy's Country; and therefore paſſing by a ſtrong Caſtle, call'd Joing belonging to the French King, and lying between Beauvais and Giſors, he beſieged it, and having taken it hanged up all the French he found in it, razed the Caſtle, and then proceeded directly in his Journey to Paris, in which he had an hearty Welcome from the Duke of Bedford and the Engliſh. The Lord Talbot having reſted himſelf and his Men at Paris a while, and conſulted with the Regent and other Nobles, which way it was beſt for him to proceed againſt the Enemy without prolonging Time, was at length ſent with the Lord Liſle-Adam, and 1600 Men in their Army to beſiege the Caſtle of Beaumont upon the River Oiſe, of which Sir Amadour de Veignolls, Brother to Le Hire, was the Captain: But whether the French were terrified at the News of the Approach of the Engliſh Forces, or whether they found themſelves too weak to oppoſe them is uncertain; for they had left the Caſtle, and were all withdrawn to the next French Garriſon at Creil. The Lord Talbot follow'd them thither and laid cloſe Siege to it; but Sir Amadour the Captain of it being ſlain by the Engliſh in a Skirmiſh, the Town and Caſtle ſoon yielded it ſelf upon a Compoſition, and the Terror of it ſo awed the adjoyning Towns, as Pont St. Maxence, Neufville and Rouge-Maiſon, that they all ſubmitted without any Reſiſtance at all. Creſpi in Valois made a ſmall Oppoſition, but was ſoon forced to ſurrender, and Clermont follow'd their Example; which Towns having been formerly ſubject to the Engliſh, but revolted, were uſed the more ſeverely by the Soldiers, who plunder'd many of the Inhabitants, with whoſe Spoils they return'd Rich to Paris.

The Earl of Arundel takes ſeveral Places.

The ſame Succeſs had the Earl of Arundel at the ſame time in propagating and enlarging the Engliſh Power, by taking ſeveral Towns then in the Poſſeſſion of the French; for he beſieged the Caſtle of Bommolins, and took it by Surrender, and leaſt it ſhould harbour the like Enemies for the future, he demoliſh'd it. From thence he march'd to Orle in the County of Marne, and after a ſharp Attack with his Cannon brought it to a Compoſition, which being put in Order he ſet forward toward St. Selerine, of which Town the Lord Ambroſe de Lore was Captain. This Man being a Perſon of ſignal Valour, and not willing to bring the Place to the Hazzard of a Siege, ſally'd out with a conſiderable Body of Men, and fell ſo eagerly upon the Engliſh, that he made them give back a Bow-ſhot; and as the French Hiſtory relates, ſlew about 100 Men, and got their Artillery, Victuals and Tents into his Poſſeſſion: But the Earl of Arundel encouraging the Engliſh Soldiers to return and retrieve their Honour by Fight, which would be irrecoverably loſt if their Artillery remain'd in the Enemies Hands, ſo raiſed their Courage, that they made Head again, ſlew a great Number of them, and drove them back into the City, recovering all they loſt in about an hour's Time. Though he reſolved to beſiege the Town, yet thinking it alſo convenient to take ſome Places adjacent, becauſe he thought it would coſt him ſome Time, he paſſed it by and beſieged Louviers. Le Hire and his Brother Amadore de Vignolls were Captains of it, and there were many other Perſons of Valour and worth in it, who defended it very bravely; but the French Hiſtorians ſay, the Engliſh Army was 12000, much too great for the Garriſon to grapple with, and therefore they yielded the Place; and the Engliſh being in the Poſſeſſion of it, broke down the Walls and Fortifications. Having reduced Louviers, the Earl of Arundel returned to St. Selerine and cloſely beſieged it; but the Beſieged defended themſelves ſo valiantly for Three Months together, though the Earl every Day almoſt attempted ſomewhat, that he was at laſt forced to take the moſt deſperate Courſes he could, and by Aſſault make himſelf Maſter of it. In entring the Town John D' Almain, and William De St. Albin, two of the chief Captains, and 800 Men of the Garriſon were ſlain. The Children of the Lord De Lore were taken Priſoners. The Earl put in a new Garriſon of the Engliſh, and made Sir John Cornwall Captain of it. This Succeſs ſtirred him up to try his Fortune further; and thereupon went to the Town of Silly, and pitched his Camp by it. The Terror of the Fate of St. Selerine had ſeized the Inhabitants ſo much, that they immediately offered him Hoſtages to ſubmit to him within thirty Days, if they were not relieved, their Lives only ſaved. This Agreement the Beſieged advertiſed the King of France of, that they might have Succour within the Time appointed, and were not only promiſed it, but as if that King had been as Zealous to ſave it, as the Engliſh were to take it; he appointed the Duke of Alenzon, Arthur, Earl of Richmond, Charles D' Anjou, and a Marſhal of France, who at the importunity of the Lord De Lore had gotten together a conſiderable Body of Men to ſuccour St. Selerine, but too late to undertake the Reſcue of Silly, and with all convenient haſte to march thither for that End. Theſe Orders were readily obey'd, and the French Army within the Time appointed preſented it ſelf before the Town, and incamped ſo near the Engliſh, that only a ſmall River parted the Camps. The Engliſh ſeeing this Bravery returned their Hoſtages and prepared for a Battel; but the French, though to reſcue the Town they ought to have refuſed no ſmall Dangers, finding the Engliſh poſted to Advantage, only entertain'd them a few Days with ſmart Skirmiſhes, and then in the Night broke up their Camp and departed. The Beſieged in Silly being mightily diſappointed of their Hopes immediately after their Retreat ſurrendred the Town to the Earl of Arundel according to their Agreement, and were well received by him, who reſtored them to their Houſes and Poſſeſſions, and leaving a Garriſon with them departed towards Mans, and in his Paſſage having taken the Caſtles of Millay, and St. Laurence, and clear'd the Country of Main of ſome ſtraggling Enemies which much infeſted it, as ſoon as he was arrived, diſmiſſed his Men

A. D. 1434. Reg. 12.

St. Selerine taken by the Earl of Arundel.

Silly ſurrendred.

to

A. D. 1434. Reg. 12.

to their Eaſe for a while in their wonted Garriſons. About the ſame Time the Lord Willoughby, and Sir Thomas Kiriell returned out of Normandy with Honour and Victories, and with their Men ſupplied Louviers, a Town lately brought into Subjection to the Engliſh with a ſufficient Garriſon and Ammunition.

A Rebellion in Normandy, ſuppreſſed by the Earl of Arundell.

While theſe open Hoſtilities were maintained by both Sides, one againſt the other, the French King was buſie Under-hand to diſturb the Engliſh Settlement in Normandy, and by his Inſtigation a raiſed formidable Rebellion there; for a great Number of the common People about the Sea-Coaſts, diſcontented at the Engliſh Yoke (and the French never could heartily love the Engliſh, or patiently live in Subjection to them) took Arms, and under the Conduct of the Marſhal de Rochfort, Walter de Bruſack, and Charles de Mares (who were laid with ſome Troops to joyn with them, and form them into ſome Military Order for their Enterprize) march'd to the Engliſh Garriſons, publiſhing and proclaiming it in all Places were they came, That it was their Reſolution and Intereſt to expel the whole Engliſh Nation out of their Country and Coaſts; and purſu'd this their Deſign ſo furiouſly at firſt, that in a few Days they took the Engliſh Garriſons of Deip, Feſcamp, Harfleur, Monſtrevilliers and Tancbervile, with all the Country of Caux, except Arques and Caudebec. This Succeſs increaſed their Boldneſs, and they went on to Caen, a chief City on the Sea-Coaſts, purpoſing to make themſelves Maſters of that Place, to the End, that they might not only increaſe their Numbers, but have a fit Rendezvous from whence to purſue their Enterprize. The Dukes of Somerſet and York, who commanded in that Province, and lay there with an Army, having Intelligence of their Proceedings, ſent the Earl of Arundell and the Lord Willoughby with 6000 Bow-men, and 1300 Horſe to lie in Ambuſh for them in their Paſſage. The Lord Willoughby accordingly with 2000 Archers, and certain Horſe-men went before, and lay with his Men in covert by the Way which they were to paſs, the Earl of Arundell purſuing them at ſome Diſtance behind with the reſt of the Forces, a Sign being agreed to between them, when they ſhould both ſet on them. The Rebels were ignorant of the Deſign, and ſecurely march'd toward Caen; but when they came at the Lord Willoughby's Ambuſh, the Engliſh under his Command having ſhot off a Gun, which was the Signal for the Earl of Arundell's Men, fell on the Rabble both behind and before with that Fury, that the poor Wretches unable to withſtand their Forces threw down their Arms and begged Mercy and Pardon. The Earl knowing them to be inſtigated to this Enterprize by other Heads, and much pittying their Ignorance gave command immediately to his Soldiers to ſtop their Hands from Slaughter, and apprehending ſuch as were thought the Incentives of this Rebellion, he permitted the reſt to depart to their Houſes; but ſuch was the Fury of the Soldiers, that before they could be recalled to their Standards they had ſlain above 1000 of the Rebels. The Authors of this Inſurrection being upon a ſtrict inquiry found out, were put to moſt cruel Torments, as their Crimes deſerv'd, and the Places which had been taken by them being badly treated by the Commanders, who were left in them, revolted, and recall'd the Engliſh, and ſo this Storm, which made an huge Bluſtering for the preſent, was ſoon blown over and quiet. The Earl of Arundell having thus ſucceſsfully ſettled the Diſturbances of Normandy return'd to the Earl of Bedford to give him an Account of it, who much fear'd the ill Conſequences of it, and by the good News of the Victory was ſo much refreſhed and pleaſed with the Earl, that as if the Engliſh Affairs could thrive in no other Hands, he immediately diſpatch'd him upon another Enterprize of almoſt equal Importance, viz. the Recovery of the Fort of Rue, lately taken by John de Breſſay, Lieutenant to the Marſhal de Rieux. This was a Loſs of very great Conſequence to the Engliſh, becauſe the Garriſon put into it by the French very much annoy'd the Countries of Ponthieu, Artois and Bolonnois, and therefore the Recovery of it was abſolutely neceſſary. The Earl of Arundell willingly undertook it, and with 800 Men began his March to beſiege it; but being come as far as Gourney he alter'd his Reſolution for a little time, upon this Reaſon. There was an Old Fort near Beauvais, call'd the Caſtle of Gerberoy, which had been lately diſmantled and demoliſhed, but being obſerv'd by the French King to ſtand very commodiouſly for a Garriſon againſt the Engliſh on thoſe Frontiers, he commanded Sir Stephen de Vignolis, commonly call'd Le Hire, to repair and newly fortifie it. The Earl of Arundell in this Expedition taking Notice of the Building, and knowing that it would be very prejudicial to the Engliſh, reſolv'd to diſpoſſeſs the Enemies of it immediately; thinking, that in ſo ſhort a Time as it had been built, it could be in no Condition of Defence, or if it were, it would be eaſier and better gained now than hereafter. Upon this Preſumption, which was badly grounded, he march'd up to it only with 500 Horſe, leaving his Foot behind him to follow him at Leiſure, and queſtion'd not to take it with ſmall Reſiſtance, but it prov'd a very fatal Miſtake; for Le Hire, who was there himſelf in Perſon, and had a Body of 3000 Men, which the Earl was ignorant of, obſerving, that the Earl's Force was ſmall, and his Horſes tired, reſolve to ſet on them before they could refreſh themſelves, or the Foot could get up to them to their Aſſiſtance, and to animate them in the Attempt, he ſent out to them Fifty Horſe, as if there had been no more in the Caſtle. Sir Ralph Standiſh with an Hundred Men was ſent by the Earl to encounter them; but before the Battel between them was begun, the reſt iſſued out of the Caſtle, and having ſlain Sir Ralph and his Men, they ſet upon the Earl and the Horſe-men about him, who fought very manfully in their Defence; but Le Hire ordering three Culverins to be diſcharg'd in the midſt of the Engliſh as they were fighting, many were ſwept away by that means, and at the ſecond ſhot was the Earl's Leg broke a little above the Ankle, which ſo pain'd him, that he fell from his Horſe in a Swoon, and the French purſuing the Advantage, put the Engliſh to Flight, taking the Earl himſelf, Sir Richard Woodvile, and 120 other Priſoners with their Horſes, 200 were ſlain, and the reſt eſcaped. The Earl himſelf was carry'd to Beauvois, where he dy'd within a few Days of his Wound, and was buried in the Church of the Friers-Minors. His Death was much lamented by the Engliſh, being their Glory in preſent, and Hope for the future. He was the Fifth Earl of the Noble Family of Fitz-Allen.

A. D. 1434. Reg. 12.

The Earl of Arundell ſent to recover the Fort of Rue.

The Earl of Arundell in taking the Caſtle of Gerberoy, and is ſlain.

The Rebels ſuppreſſed by the Earl of Arundell and Lord Willoughby.

About the Beginning of June, John, Duke of Bourbon and Auvergne, who had been taken Priſoner at the Battel of Agincourt Eighteen Years before, was admitted to pay a Ranſom of 18000 l. Sterling, and be freed from his long Im-

Duke of Bourbon's Captive in England 18 Years, dies there.

A. D. 1434. Reg. 12.

Impriſonment and Captivity; which being done, he made all Haſte to return into his Native Country, France, again; but Providence had order'd he ſhould never ſee it; for, upon the Day appointed for his Departure, he was ſeiz'd with a violent Diſeaſe, of which he died in London, and was buried in the Church of the Gray-Friers in that City.

The Breach between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy.

With this Year concluded the long Friendſhip and Confederacy between thoſe Two Great Princes, John, Duke of Bedford, and Philip, Duke of Burgundy, which had been ſlacken'd for ſome time before by the Death of the Duke of Bedford's Lady, and new Marriage, but at this Time was quite diſſolved by many freſh Diſtaſtes and Grudges taken one at another, which had been raiſed and fomented to ſo high a Pitch by the Tales of Court-Paraſites, that they both thought it diſhonourable for them to hold any League or Amity longer one with another: But ſome there were, who being ſenſible how fatal this Breach would prove to England, as well as mindful of King Henry the Fifth's Charge given to his Lords upon his Death-Bed, viz. That by all means they ſhould be very careful to retain the Duke's Friendſhip and Amity; uſed their utmoſt Endeavour to make up the Breach, by bringing them to an Interview, that by producing the Cauſes of their Diſpleaſure, they might, if poſſible, be removed, and they made Friends. St. Omers was the Place appointed; a Town, which being in the Dominions of the Duke of Burgundy, might ſeem a Condeſcention, and an Earneſt of the Duke of Bedford's Deſire to be reconciled, for him to meet at it. The Duke of Burgundy ought in Compliance, when the Duke of Bedford had ſtoop'd thus low, to have viſited him firſt, and gave him a Welcome into his Dominions, ſince it hath been always accounted Rudeneſs to affect Priority in our own Houſes and Territories; but Burgundy's Mind was ſo inflamed, that he would be firſt viſited, as the Lord of the Town, and Sovereign in that Place, a Punctilio, which when the Duke of Bedford conſider'd, he began to think with himſelf, that he was not only the Son, Brother and Uncle of Kings, but being Regent of France, he ſuſtained the Perſon of one of the greateſt Monarchs of Europe, and 'twould be a Diſgrace for his Maſter, if not to himſelf, to ſtoop to the Humour of a petty Prince, eſpecially ſince he had obtain'd Henault, Holland, Zealand and Friſland, by the Aid of the Engliſh only; and for theſe Reaſons he would not give him the firſt Viſit. Burgundy was not inſenſible of theſe Reaſons, yet would not bend: However, to end the Diſpute, propounded, that the Matters in Difference might be diſcuſs'd by Three Perſons, which the Duke of Bedford not hearkening to, they departed without the Sight one of another in great Anger and Diſcontent, and lived ever after it, as if there never had been any Affinity or Friendſhip between them, in the moſt inveterate and implacable Enmity, which though indeed it had been Bedford's Prudence and Policy, by any Acts of Condeſcention, to have prevented, (and that he did not do it was thought highly blame-worthy) yet it may bear a Diſpute, whether any thing would have prevail'd, ſince that Duke had given many wide Proofs of his good Inclination to the French Side, by allowing his Brother-in-Law, the Earl of Richmond, to be Conſtable of France, and conſenting that his Siſter Agnes ſhould marry the Duke of Bourbon, a great Friend of King Charles; ſo that it is to be thought, the Breach was unavoidable.

Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy quarrel.

While this Treaty was on Foot between the Dukes, the Earl of Dunois, commonly called the Baſtard of Orleans, the Lord Rochfort, Marſhal of France, and ſome others, having had Information from one Reginold de S. John, a Gentleman born in the Iſle of France, but a Soldier in S. Dennis, with whom they had a Correſpondence, how they might ſurprize the Town, ſent Captain Deinville with a ſufficient Number of Troops thither, who ſcaled the Walls by Night, and made himſelf Maſter of it, turning out the Engliſh Garriſon, commanded by Sir Matthew Gough and Sir Thomas Kiriel. This Action is interpreted by ſome, as if the Duke of Burgundy, tho' he pretended a Willingneſs to be reconciled to the Duke of Bedford, never really intended it, becauſe the King of France at that Time ſo highly courted the Duke of Burgundy's Favour, that he would never have permitted ſuch an hoſtile Action in the Time of Treaty without his Leave, tho' this may be allowed only conjectural, yet 'twas ſuſpicious in the Duke of Bedford's Abſence. However that be, 'tis certain the Loſs was very great to the Engliſh, being upon the very Gates of Paris, and if kept by the French King, it would be a perpetual Moleſtation to that City, eſpecially, ſince the French would be obliged to keep a very ſtrong Garriſon in it. Theſe Thoughts induced the Engliſh to reſolve upon the ſpeedy Recovery of it, which Sir Matthew Gough and Sir Thomas Kiriel, whoſe Honour was much impaired by the Loſs of it, were ready to undertake, and accordingly did by the Aſſiſtance of the Pariſians. The Baſtard, who yet continued at St. Dennis, had Notice of the Deſign of the Engliſh, and being ſenſible it was as much the Intereſt of his Maſter to keep it, as of the Engliſh to regain it, left the Marſhal De Rieux to defend it, if the Engliſh beſieged it, while he went himſelf to raiſe greater Forces for the Relief of it. The Engliſh ſoon after his Departure began the Siege under the Command of the Lord Talbot, Sir Matthew Gough, Sir Thomas Kiriel, the Lord Liſle Adam, and others, with a full Reſolution to take it; and tho' the Baſtard joining with the Forces of the Counties of Champeigne and Valois, took the Towers of Houdan, and Montmulan (f) to draw them from it, yet the Engliſh held on the Siege, and would not be drawn from it. The Conſtable of France, the Baſtard of Bourbon, Monſieur de Loheac, and others were ſent with a great Army to raiſe the Siege, but ſeeing the Reſolution of the Engliſh, they dar'd not to ſet upon them, which when Marſhal de Rieux ſaw, he yielded up the Town to them upon as honourable Conditions as he could: Reginald de S. John, who had betrayed the Place, and Dionegius de Vaucourt, a Perſon of great Valour and Conduct, upon whom the Governours chiefly relied in the Siege, were both ſlain. The Walls of the Town were all beaten down, unleſs on the Side next the Abbey, and the Tower de Veneno, which remained all the while in the Cuſtody of Simon de Morier, Son to the Provoſt of Paris, with the Engliſh Soldiers with him, and ſo the Engliſh recovered but a very ſhattered Place of it.

A. D. 1434. Reg. 12. Reg. 13. S. Dennis taken by the French

But retaken by the Engliſh.

October the Tenth in this Year, (as Fabian relates, but our Statute-Books place this Parliament

Seventh Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

(f) Pont Meulan it ſhould be. This Town was taken by Surprize: Two Fiſhermen entred it at a Common Privy ſtanding on the Wall, and open'd the Gates to the French.

ment

A. D. 1434. Reg. 13.

ment in the Fourteenth Year of King Henry the Sixth, by Miſtake) the Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and continued till the latter End of December. The Buſineſs of this Seſſion ſeems to be only to regulate ſome Abuſes of other Acts of Parliament, or interpret them, for it was therein enacted,

1. That the Judges in their Circuits, ſhall have Power to give Judgments in all Caſes of Felony and Treaſon, as well upon Perſons acquitted as attainted, and award Executions according to that Judgment.

2. That all Wools and Woolfells, that ſhall be ſhipped to be tranſported, ſhall be carried to Callis only, and no Licenſe ſhall be granted to the contrary, but by the King, with the Advice of the Council.

3. That the Juſtices of Peace in Cumberland ſhould hold their Seſſions Quarterly at Carliſle only, and in Middleſex only twice a Year, becauſe of the Terms.

4. That all Wool and Woolfells, and other Merchandizes of the Staple, which ſhall be ſhipped in any Creeks or Ports, clandeſtinely to cheat the King of his Cuſtoms, and Subſidies, ſhall be forfeited to the King.

5. That all Perſons, who ſhall dare to diſturb any Foreigners, in ſelling Fiſh, or other Victuals, either by Whole-ſale or Retail, ſhall forfeit Ten Pounds, one Moiety to the King, and the other to the Perſon, that ſhall ſue for the ſame.

Theſe Acts being finiſhed, the King had a Fifteenth given him to carry on his Wars with France, and they were diſſolv'd. During the Sitting of this Parliament, on the Eve of St. Katherine, November the 24th, began a Froſt, which laſted to the Feaſt of St. Scholaſtica, February the 10th, and held with ſo great Violence, that the Thames was frozen over, ſo that the Merchandizes and Proviſions brought to the Thames's Mouth, were conveyed to London by Land thro' Kent.

A great Froſt, by which the Thames was frozen over.

A. D. 1435.

In the Council of Baſil, which ſtill continued Sitting, there was a Motion made by Sigiſmund, the Emperor, and aſſented to by the Reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, who were all preſent to compoſe the Difference between the Sciſmatical Popes, Felix and Eugenius, That a Mediation ſhould be made for a Peace between France and England, ſince ſo much Bloodſhed among Chriſtians was a great Scandal to their Holy Profeſſion, and this they had a great Encouragement to do, becauſe the Duke of Burgundy, who had been the Support of the Quarrel from the Beginning, was now willing to be reconciled to the French King upon honourable Terms, provided that it could be ſo managed, as that it might ſeem not ſo much his own, as that King's Deſire. The Settling a Peace at this Juncture between Two ſuch great Nations, was indeed a Work worthy the Endeavours of the Council, and the great Danger that all Chriſtendom was in, from the Arms of the Turk, whoſe Emperor, Mahomet the Firſt, having not many Years before made Adrianople in Thracia his Royal Seat, left Amurath, his Son, an ambitious and aſpiring Prince, to propagate his Victories further into Europe, made it neceſſary, if poſſible, for all the Chriſtian Princes to unite among themſelves, and join againſt this common Enemy: And to this End, Nicholas D' Albergat, a Carthuſian Frier, Cardinal de Sancta Cruce, or the Holy Croſs, and Hugh de Laſignan, a Cypriot, Biſhop of Præneſte in Italy, were ſent to the Princes at Difference, to come to a Conference in order to a Peace, and obtained by their earneſt Sollicitations, that they would ſend their Ambaſſadors to an Aſſembly at Arras, a Town in Artois to conclude all Matters in Controverſie between them. The Commiſſioners ſent by Henry, King of England, were Henry Beaufort, Cardinal and Biſhop of Wincheſter, John Kemp, Archbiſhop of York, William de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, John Holland, Earl of Huntington, the Biſhops of Norwich, St. Davids, and Lyſieux, with divers other Knights and Gentlemen. For the French, came Charles, Duke of Bourbon, Arthur of Brittain, Conſtable of France, Lewis, Earl of Vendoſme, the Archbiſhop of Rheims, Chancellor of France, for the French King, with many other Perſons of Note. The Emperor, the Kings of Cyprus, Portugal, Caſtile, Sicily, Navarr and Poland, ſent alſo their Ambaſſadours to aſſiſt at it, and further the Agreement, as Occaſion ſhould offer. Nicholas alſo Cardinal of the Holy-Croſs was ordered by the Biſhop of Rome, to perſwade an Union in the Name of his Maſter the Vice-gerent of the Prince of Peace. The Duke of Brittain had alſo his Deputies, the Earls of Alençon and Barr. But the Duke of Burgundy was there in Perſon, attended by the Duke of Guelders, his Chancellor, the Biſhop of Chambrays, with divers other Earls, and Barons, and a gallant Train of Courtiers. The Cardinal of Holy-Croſs opened the Aſſembly with a pathetick Speech to the Parties in Difference, repreſenting to them the great Miſchiefs that had redounded to all Chriſtendom, by the continual Wars between Two ſuch potent Kingdoms, and exhorting them by the Honour of God, and for the Love they had to Religion, that they would lay aſide all Enmity one to another, and embrace ſuch a Peace and Union, as might be for the Glory of God, and the eternal Advantage of their Souls; which Speech being ended, Conſultations were entred into by the ſeveral Ambaſſadors to bring in their Demands and Propoſals. The Engliſh Ambaſſadors brought in their Demands firſt, and urged, 'That King Charles ſhould lay down 'his Pretences to the Kingdom of France, and 'ſhould enjoy no Part of it, but what the King 'of England ſhould out of his mere Favour allow him, and thoſe ſhould hold of him, as 'his Homager and Feudary. The French Ambaſſadors on the contrary, as poſitively 'Demanded the whole Kingdom of France, as their 'Maſter's Right, and required, that the King 'of England ſhould lay aſide the Name, Arms, 'and Title of the King of France, and relinquiſh Paris, and all the Towns which he 'held in France, being content with the Dukedoms of Aquitain and Normandy, with ſuch 'Part of Guienne as they were now in Poſſeſſion 'of, yet to pay homage for them to the King 'of France, as the Supream Soveraign of them. Theſe Propoſitions ſeeming more to incline to a War than Peace, the Cardinal of S. Croſs endeavoured to mitigate them on both Sides, and bring them to more near Terms, but all proved in vain; and becauſe he ſaw, it would be next to impoſſible to make a Peace between them, he offered them reaſonable Conditions for a Truce, but this was alſo rejected on both Parts, and the Engliſh diſpleaſed with the great Demands of the French, whoſe Spirits they ſuppoſed to have been more humble, departed to Callis, and ſo returned into England. The Cardinal de Sancta Cruce, ſeeing all Hopes of Concluding a Peace between England and France to be to no Purpoſe, turns all his Endeavours to work an Accommodation between the French King and the Duke of Burgundy, which he did with

The Council of Baſil endeavours to make a Peace between England and France.

A. D. 1435. Reg. 13.

The King of France and Duke of Burgundy made Friends, and upon what Terms.

A. D. 1435. Reg. 13.

with no great Pains, the former being ready to ſtoop almoſt to any Terms to win him, and the latter ready to embrace any Thing honourable and advantageous, ſo that a Peace was immediately agreed on upon theſe Conditions, viz.

I. That King Charles, tho' he excuſed himſelf from the Murther of the Duke of Burgundy, his Father, yet ſhould make Satisfaction for his Death, by puniſhing all that were found guilty of it, if they could be diſcovered and apprehended, by Death, if not, by perpetual Baniſhment, and ſhould build a Church in Monterra, with a Monaſtery of Twelve Monks, and a Superior, which he ſhould endow with a ſufficient Maintenance, to pray for his Soul for ever.

II. That King Charles, ſhould pay to the Duke of Burgundy 50000 Crowns for the Jewels, that were taken from his Father at his Death, and ſhould have Liberty to recover thoſe that were not named, particularly the Fleece, which was of a very great Value, from any, in whoſe Poſſeſſion they were found.

III. That the following Countries, Cities, and Towns, with all their Præeminencies and Juriſdictions, ſhould be immediately delivered up to Philip, Duke of Burgundy, and ſettled upon him and his Heirs, whether Male or Female, viz. Maſcon in Xantoigne, the City of Auxerres, with the Juriſdiction of Barr upon the Seine, the City of Caſtel, with the Lay-Patronage of the Church and Abbey of Leuxeule, pretended to, but never poſſeſſed by the Dukes of Burgundy before, the Cities of Montdidier, Peron, St. Quintin, Corby, Amiens, and Abbeville, the County of Pontian and Poictou, with the Outbounds of Champaign.

IV. That in Caſe the King of England ſhould make War upon the Duke of Burgundy and his Subjects, King Charles ſhould aſſiſt him both by Sea and Land, as in his own Cauſe, and ſhould not make Peace with him, unleſs he included him in it; and that if King Charles ſhould not fully keep to this Agreement, his own Subjects ſhould not be bound to obey him, but being freed from all Oaths of Allegiance to him, might aſſiſt the Duke of Burgundy againſt him.

V. Laſtly, That Charles, Count Caroloix, Son to Duke Philip, ſhould marry the Lady Katherine, King Charles the Third's Daughter, and have with her in Portion 120000 Crowns; but this Marriage was not conſummated till Four Years after, by reaſon of their tender Age, not being above 7 Years old.

By theſe Articles the French King may ſeem to have bought the Duke of Burgundy's Friendſhip dear, but he being the Hinge upon which the Kingdom of France turned, nothing could be too much to gain his Friendſhip, which being obtained, all muſt ſoon follow, as indeed it did.

Duke of Burgundy's Excuſe for his Alliance with the King of France.

The Duke of Burgundy being thus united again with the French, to whom he had a long time born a good Affection, knew very well that the News of it would be very ſurprizing to the Engliſh, his old Confederates, and would certainly produce ſome ill Effects, if they were not pacified with ſome palliating Excuſes, whereupon he ſent Toiſon d'Or, his chief Herauld, into England, to give an Account of this new Confederacy, and his Motives to embrace it, which were, 'Not any real Diſaffection to 'the Engliſh, but merely to ſatisfie his People, 'and in Compliance with the earneſt Entreaties of the general Council at Baſil, the Pope 'and other Princes of Chriſtendom. For by the 'Continuance of the Wars, his own People 'with bitter Lamentations complained to him, 'That they were utterly ruined and impoveriſhed, and the whole Kingdom of France in 'a manner deſtroyed, which becauſe all Men 'laid upon him as the Cauſe of it, he thought 'it his Duty to yield to the Exhortations of ſo 'many grave Perſons, to unite with King 'Charles, and ſo avoid the Guilt of ſo much 'Bloodſhed, as would elſe be laid to his Charge. 'And theſe Reaſons he thought ſo ſtrong, in 'reference to King Henry, that he could not 'but heartily wiſh, he would accept of a Peace 'upon honourable and reaſonable Terms, that 'ſo theſe cruel Wars, which were ſo diſpleaſing to God, and prejudicial to both Nations, 'might have an End, and Peace be eſtabliſhed 'amongſt them. This Meſſage, which was delivered by Letter to King Henry's Council, was very amazing, and ſo much the more, becauſe the Superſcription was very unuſual. For, whereas before he uſed in his Writings to ſtile King Henry, King of France and England, his Lord and Maſter (g), now he entitled him only, The High and Mighty Prince, Henry, by the Grace of God, King of England, his Well-beloved Coſin; as if he had been no longer King of France, and the Duke by joining with Charles, had utterly diſowned his old Maſter. This Letter being read, and conſidered on well by the Council, raiſed ſuch Indignation in them againſt the Duke, that they would not let the Meſſenger ſee the King, but ſent him back to his Maſter without any Letters, telling him, that the Duke was a perjured Traitor, whom they could not think worthy of Anſwer. But the News of this Peace was received with much greater Diſguſt by the Citizens of London, who were more heady and furious, and becauſe they could not revenge themſelves upon the Duke himſelf, fell heavy upon his Subjects, who for Traffick ſake reſided in, or about their City, and ſlew many of them. King Henry, whoſe mild Temper better qualified him for Mercy, than Revenge, was much troubled for the Outragious Facts of his Subjects, and put out his Proclamation, ſtrictly charging all his Subjects, under ſevere Puniſhments, to forbear the like Diſorders for the future; which ſtopp'd their Hands from Bloodſhed, but did not reſtrain their Tongues from charging Philip with the groſſeſt Perjury, Treachery and Hypocriſie, who, contrary to all his repeated Oaths and Promiſes to obey King Henry, as his lawful Soveraign, had deſerted him, and reconciled himſelf to his Enemy, in which, tho' the Pope's Legate had given him Abſolution to pacifie his guilty Conſcience, yet that was but a deluſive Salve for ſo foul a Breach of Fidelity in the Sight of all the World; but Burgundy had ſerved his Turn by Siding with the Engliſh to revenge his Father's Death, and now had another Game to play, which was to raiſe his own Greatneſs, which he did effectually by making up with France, whereby he gained many large Countries and Territories, which his Anceſtors had no Title to, nor could he himſelf by any other Means have gained, and for this Reaſon he held firmly ever after to the French Intereſts.

A. D. 1435. Reg. 13.

King Henry's Council angry with the Duke of Burgundy, and the Londoners ſlay the Burgundians.

Reg. 14.

Seven Days after the Concluſion of this Peace, between Charles King of France, and the Duke of Burgundy, John Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, died at Roan, September the Fourteenth, a wiſe and warlike Prince, who by his Courage, Duke of Bedford's Death and Burial at Roan.

(g) He uſed to ſtile him his Soveraign Lord only, Lord and Maſter not being uſual from Feudatary Princes to their Superiors.

A. D. 1435. Reg. 14.

and prudent Conduct had kept up the Engliſh Power in France almoſt alone, it is thought, that the Proſpect of the Change which would inevitably follow upon the League between the French King and Duke of Burgundy, was a Means of haſtening his Death; for he eaſily foreſaw, that their Union would root the Engliſh out of France. He was buried in the Cathedral Church of our Lady in that City, with all Funeral Solemnities, on the North-Side of the High-Altar, under a ſumptuous and coſtly Monument, which remaining whole and entire many Years after, in the Reign of Lewis XI. Son of King Charles, ſome of his Courtiers adviſed him, being then at Roan to demoliſh it, becauſe his Memorial was a Shame to France. But King Lewis generouſly reply'd, God have his Soul, and let his Body lie now at Reſt; who, when he was alive, would have made the proudeſt of us to tremble. As for his Tomb, it is not ſo decent and convenient, as his noble Atchievements deſerved; and I am ſorry it is no more ſtately, that its Richneſs might anſwer his Worth. The News of his Death cauſed great Grief in England, not only for the Loſs of ſo excellent and great a Perſon, but for the Danger France was in by his Death, there being ſcarce any Man left behind him equal to him in Courage and Wiſdom, and none of Experience to manage ſo difficult a Station; but Neceſſity required, that one ſhould immediately be put in his Place; and therefore K. Henry's Council proceeded to an Election (b). The Dukes of Somerſet and York became Competitors for it, both of them nearly related to the Crown, and therefore might be thought to have an equal Zeal for the Support of it. Somerſet was moſt deſirous of it, but York had the Votes of the Council, becauſe he had the faireſt Pretences to the Crown, and ſo he was elected; yet with ſo great Offence to Somerſet, that he ſought all Ways to obſtruct his Commiſſion, and hinder his ſpeedy Paſſage thither, which though it might prove the common Loſs, yet he thought would turn to York's Diſgrace with the Commons, who, not knowing the ſecret Cauſes, hate or love for what appears. And, indeed, Somerſet was not out in his Politick Deſign; for before the Duke of York could get his Diſpatch into France, Paris, and many other chief Towns, for want of a Governour, were revolted to the French King; and though he was not really in Fault for it, he was forced to bear much of the Blame, upon the Account of his Delays. The Duke of York was not inſenſible as well of the Cauſe, as of the Effect, and tho' he would not at preſent ſeem to reſent it, yet he laid it up in his Memory, that when Occaſion ſhould offer, he might revenge it upon the Duke of Somerſet, who bearing an equal Hatred to him, they wrought each other's Deſtruction in a few Years, and entailed the Quarrel upon their Poſterities, to the Ruin almoſt of both Families.

Duke of York choſen Regent of France.

In the ſame Month with the Duke of Bedford, died Iſabel, late Queen of France, Mother of Charles, the preſent King, and Catherine, Queen of England, at Paris; and was buried by her Husband at St. Dennis, without any Funeral Pomp or Solemnity, the Times not permitting ſuch Ceremonies. She died hated by the French, and not much regarded by the Engliſh; for tho' indeed ſhe had been the main Inſtrument of the Succeſs of the Engliſh in France, and their Eſtabliſhment there, yet they being ſenſible, that what ſhe did for them was not out of any real Love to them, but out of an inſatiable Deſire of Revenge upon her Son Charles the Dauphin, could not affectionately requite the Kindneſſes they received, becauſe they were intended chiefly to gratifie her own Malice, and the Engliſh were uſed but as Inſtruments for her unnatural Cruelties.

Iſabel, Queen of France, died.

A. D. 1435. Reg. 14.

The Death of the Duke of Bedford was no ſooner known in France, but, as though he had been the only Reſtraint upon the French to yield Obedience to the Engliſh, they began almoſt in all Places of the Engliſh Dominions to think of a Revolt to their natural Prince. Normandy began firſt to ſhew its Inclinations to King Charles; and having given Intelligence of their Deſign, invited his Army to come among them, under the Command of Marſhal de Rieux, Charles de Mareſt, Meſſieurs de Bauſack and Longueville, to whom they immediately ſurrender'd Deipe, Roan (i), Bois de S. Vincennes (k), and ſeveral other conſiderable Places; in which though there were Engliſh Garriſons, yet either being overpower'd, or betray'd by the treacherous Inhabitants, they were forced to relinquiſh them, and ſhift for themſelves as well as they could; but ſome were taken Priſoners; and the Citizens, who had been for the Engliſh, were either plunder'd of their Goods immediately, or made to take an Oath of Fidelity to the French King. This Succeſs drew Multitudes to them. The Lords Sentraglie, Eſtouteville, and many other Lords, brought an Army of between 3 and 4000 to join with them; and one Kernier, a Captain of the Rabble, follow'd them with 6000 Commons, who all readily took the ſame Oath; ſo that Charles's Party became very ſtrong, and able to take the remaining Towns by Force, if they ſhould ſtand out againſt them, which it could not be thought that many would do, ſince the ſtrongeſt Towns had ſubmitted. Feſcamp yielded it ſelf on Chriſtmas-Eve, without Aſſault, and the Captain of it, Monſieur Villiers, a Gaſcoigne, was ſo zealous for his new Maſter, that he aſſaulted Harflure on St. Stephen's Day to reduce it. The Garriſon repulſed him at firſt valiantly, and beat him off at the Onſet with the Loſs of Forty of his Men; but while he was putting himſelf in Order for a Second, the Inhabitants capitulated to ſurrender the Town to the French, upon Condition, that the Engliſh Garriſon, which conſiſted of 400 Men, ſhould be ſuffer'd to depart peaceably with all their Goods; which being granted and accepted, many other Towns follow'd their Example, as, Beureſpin, Tancherville, Gomeſſeule, Loges, Vallemont, Gravile, Longevile, Nenevile, Lambervile, and many others, into which the French having put Garriſons, became almoſt abſolute Maſters of Normandy.

The French in many Places revolt from the Engliſh.

A. D. 1436.

Feſcamp ſurrender'd.

Things being thus ſettled here, Charles caſt an Eye upon Paris it ſelf, which being kept only by 2000 Men, a weak Garriſon, under the Command of the Lord Willoughby and the Biſhop of Turwin, was eaſie to be recover'd, the Citizens, as he was inform'd, being well affected to him, and willing to ſubmit; whereupon he commanded the Conſtable, Arthur of Brittain, the Earl of Dunois, the Lords de la

(b) He was appointed by Parliament to be Regent of France. Hol. p. 613.

(i) Roan was not yielded to the French King till Twelve Years after, Anno 1447. as will be ſeen in the Courſe of this Hiſtory.

(k) Bois de St. Vincennes is no Part of Normandy.

Roche

A. D. 1436. Reg. 14.

Roche and Liſle Adam, with a good (l) Body of Burgundians and French Men, to preſent themſelves before it, hoping to get the Poſſeſſion of it without much Labour; but when they arrived, they found their Friends ſo carefully watch'd by the Garriſon, that they could not betray the City to them, as was deſigned; and therefore they retreated to St. Dennis, which they beſieged. The Engliſh Garriſon there was 400 ſtrong, but the Place weak, being wholly diſmantled, unleſs it were on the Abbey-Side; yet they withſtood a very powerful Aſſault, wherein they loſt 200 Men, and were forced to flie into the Abbey and Tower Venin, in which they only kept themſelves, till they could gain a Compoſition to render up the Place with the Safety of their Lives.

St. Dennis taken.

The Lord Beaumont, who was lately come out of Normandy with 600 Men, hearing what Danger St. Dennis was in to be loſt, but not knowing that it was yielded, ſallied out of Paris, with ſome Addition to his Forces, to obſerve the Poſture of the Enemy, and if they could relieve the Place; but being diſcover'd by the French Army, they ſo encompaſs'd him on every Side, that though both himſelf and his Men defended themſelves valiantly, yet 300 were ſlain, and himſelf, with Eighty of his Men taken Priſoners; the reſt fled, but were cloſely purſued to the very Gates of Paris.

This Loſs on the Engliſh part not only weaken'd the Garriſon, but made the Citizens, who ſtood in Fear chiefly of the Lord Beaumont, to reſolve upon a Revolt, which having acquainted the Lord Liſle Adam with privately, and obtain'd an Aſſurance of him and the Conſtable, That their former Offences ſhould be pardon'd, and their ancient Liberties and Privileges confirm'd to them, on their part they promiſed to receive them into the Town. The Conſtable delay'd no Time, but drawing up his whole Army, preſented himſelf before the City, diſplaying the Charter of their Pardon to the View of the Citizens, and requiring them, as it were, to open their Gates. The Engliſh Garriſon, ſuſpecting the Treaſon, endeavour'd all they could to keep them ſhut; but the Citizens had drawn up the Chains in every Street, and oppoſed them not only themſelves in Armour, but even their Wives and Children from their Houſe-Tops ſo annoy'd them with Stones and Scalding-Water, which they pour'd upon them, that they could not prevent their Deſign; ſo the French Army partly got Admiſſion at the Gates of St. Dennis and St. James, and partly ſcaled the Walls. The Pariſians in a great Tumult meeting them, cry'd out with Joy, Long live King Charles, and the Duke of Burgundy. The Engliſh, ſeeing all Oppoſition in vain, retired into the Street of St. Anthony, where they remain'd ſafe for the preſent under the Cannon of the Baſtile, which they victualled as much as they could in ſo ſhort a Time, and then betook themſelves to it for their Defence. The Conſtable and his Forces purſued them to their Fortreſs, and cloſely beſieged them; but they defended themſelves very bravely for Ten Days, in Hopes of Relief; their Victuals failing at the End of that Term, and no Aſſiſtance appearing, they agreed to yield up the Place, their Goods and Lives being ſaved, and ſo they were ſafely conducted to Roan.

Paris betray'd to the French King, and the Engliſh driven out.

Thus the Capital City of France ſubmitted to King Charles, Sixteen Years after the Duke of Clarence had placed a Garriſon in it for the Engliſh; but not by the Valour of the French, but by the Perjury of the Citizens, who contrary to their frequent Oaths and Promiſes of Fidelity to Two Kings, moſt treacherouſly revolted from them, ſhewing themſelves a falſe and inconſtant People.

A. D. 1436. Reg. 14.

The Engliſh being gone, the French ſeized on and ſhared ſuch Goods of theirs, as they found in the City, and confiſcated the Eſtates of ſuch of the Citizens as had ſided with them, diſplacing all the Officers and Governours that had not further'd their Attempt, and putting new ones in their Places.

While Fortune thus proſper'd the French in ſome Places, the Engliſh were not unactive in others to recover their Loſſes, or, if that could not be, to endamage them ſo, that they might not be ſo great Winners. The Garriſon of Calais iſſued out, and made a ſudden Aſſault upon Bullen, and had almoſt taken the Lower Town, but failing of it, they burnt many of the Ships that were in the Haven, and paſs'd from thence into the Confines of Gravelin, and deſtroy'd all the Country round about it. The furious People, impatient of their Loſſes, got together, and took Arms to oppoſe them, but being unskilful and undiſciplin'd, were ſoon routed by the Engliſh, 400 of them being ſlain, and 120 taken Priſoners, the reſt flying into the Country for Safety, while the Engliſh, with their Spoil and Priſoners, return'd to their Garriſons.

The Engliſh annoy the French.

Other Advantages the Engliſh had in other Places againſt the French, which ſomething abated the Glory of their Victories; for at the Siege of the Town of Crail upon Oiſe, Sir William Chamberlin, Governour of the Town, iſſued out of it with 500 Men upon the French, who aſſaulted it, and, after a long Fight, routed them, ſlew 200, and took a great Number Priſoners, the reſt flying into Champaign, and the adjoining Countries. Nor was La Hire more fortunate at Giſors, which Twelve of the Burgeſſes had betray'd to him for a Sum of Money; for tho' he got a quiet Poſſeſſion of the Town by their Treachery, yet the Engliſh Garriſon, who had fortified themſelves in the Caſtle, and ſent to the Lords Talbot and Scales, who lay at Roan, with a good Force, to aſſiſt them, ſtood out firmly againſt all the French Forces, in Hopes of Succour, which coming timely to them, while the Enemy were in the Heat of their Oppoſition, freed the Caſtle, drove away the French with Loſs, recover'd the City, and puniſhed the Traitors.

Giſors recover'd with Loſs to the French.

While theſe Things were doing, the Duke of York, though later than he would, landed in Normandy with an Army of 8000 freſh Soldiers, being accompanied with the Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the Lord Falconbridge, and ſeveral other famous Captains. It was no ſmall Trouble to the new Regent to hear of the Loſſes of the Engliſh in this Vacancy of the Government, and therefore upon his Arrival he doubled his Diligence to regain as much of them as he was able. The Earl of Salisbury he diſpatched to beſiege the Caſtle of Chambois, which he ſoon regain'd by Surrender. The Lord Scales and Hoo, with Sir Thomas Kiriell, he ſent to ſuppreſs the Rebels of the Country of Caux, which they did ſo effectually, that they left no Fears of like Diſturbances from thoſe Parts; for they ſlew 5000 of the Rebels, burnt all the unwall'd Towns and Villages in the Country, and brought away all their Cattle to Caudebec, where they ſold a Sheep for an Engliſh Penny, and a Cow for Twelve Pence.

Duke of York arrives in France, and recovers ſeveral Places.

(l) This Officer had lately diſperſed the Engliſh.

A. D. 1436. Reg. 14.

The Regent himſelf took his Way to Roan, where, after he had put Things in good Order, and ſettled ſome Differences among the Inhabitants with admirable Lenity and Juſtice (for which the French Chronicles highly extol him to this Day) he went to beſiege Fiſcamp, which he in a ſhort time recover'd, and brought in Subjection to the Engliſh.

Duke of Burgundy ſeeks the Engliſh Friendſhip again

The Duke of Burgundy, who had ſo lately joyn'd himſelf with the French Intereſts, tho' his Subjects had been much wrong'd and abuſed by the Engliſh, as well in France as England, yet ſhew'd no open Acts of Hoſtility, but as if he had repented of the Fact, and were willing to be reconciled to his Old Friends, permitted the Inhabitants of the Low-Countries, who ſuffer'd very great Loſſes by his League with the French King for want of the Commerce, which they formerly had with the Engliſh, to endeavour a Reſtoration and Continuance of the Peace with them, who thereupon employ'd John de Luxenburgh, Count de Ligni to write to his Brother the Arch-Biſhop of Roan, who was one of King Henry's chief Counſellors in France, to propound it to, and obtain it of King Henry's Council in England, which he did ſo earneſtly and effectually, that he found no unwilling Compliance with the Propoſal. But becauſe in the mean time the Engliſh in France had not deſiſted from making Invaſions upon his Territories, and deſtroying his Subjects, and King Henry had at the ſame time written to the Hollanders to offer them the Continuance of his Friendſhip, Philip being highly offended at theſe Things, and eſpecially at the latter, which he interpreted to be done to ſeduce his Subjects from their Obedience to him, receded from his Word, and told Ligni plainly, That he would never more entertain any Thoughts of Peace with the Engliſh, becauſe they had very much injur'd him in his Honour, ravaged and plundered his Subjects upon the Confines of Flanders, endeavour'd to ſurprize Ardres, ſent Ambaſſadors to the Emperour to provoke his Imperial Majeſty againſt him, ſought to ſeduce and withdraw his Subjects from their Allegiance, and done many other Things not to be paſſed over without the higheſt Reſentments by any Prince. Theſe Things he writ in a Letter to King Henry and his Council in England, and in it he declared War againſt him for the ſaid Wrongs and Injuries; which tho' many of them were falſely charg'd upon him, as was prov'd by the Anſwer given him by King Henry and his Council, yet they ſerv'd for a Pretence for the irreconcilable Enmity that enſued upon it: For the Duke of Burgundy immediately call'd a great Council of his chief Men, and repreſented to them the Miſchief done to himſelf and Subjects by the Engliſh, deſiring their Advice and Aſſiſtance to revenge him and themſelves upon them, and remove ſo troubleſom an Enemy, if not out of France, yet from their Confines. Callis, he ſaid, belong'd to his Juriſdiction, as a part of the Province of Artois; and as it was now the greateſt Annoyance to his Dominions, being in the Hands of the Engliſh; ſo if they could recover it, it would be as great an Advantage to them, for it would perfectly ſecure Flanders, Artois, Picardy, and the Country about Bullen. Indeed it was a very ſtrong Fort, and very well mann'd and provided, and therefore the Siege was not to be undertaken without ſufficient Forces, but he did not doubt they would aſſiſt him with all Things neceſſary to effect it, if they concurred with him in the Deſign. Theſe Propoſals the whole Aſſembly approv'd of, and aſſur'd him of their Readineſs to lend him all the Aſſiſtance they could in it; and becauſe they judg'd ſufficient Forces might be raiſed out of Holland and Flanders to effect their Purpoſe, it was adviſed, That the Duke ſhould in Perſon go into thoſe Provinces and ſollicit their Help in ſo advantageous an Attempt, which he immediately upon the Diſſolution of this Council did. He began with Gaunt the head City in Flanders; and having aſſembled the Magiſtracy there publiſh'd his Reſolution to them, and met with ſuch a general Approbation from them, that they eaſily granted his Deſires, and thought long till it was put in Execution; and the like Concurrence it had in all the Province of Flanders. The Hollanders indeed ſhew'd not that Forwardneſs and Readineſs in the Deſign as the Flemmings did; but at length they conſented to ſatisfie their Prince's Deſires, and ſo all Things were provided for ſo great an Attempt, which either Invention or Caution could deviſe. Theſe Preparations and the Intent of them were certified to King Henry and his Council by Sir John Ratcliff, Deputy-Governour of the Town of Callis, who was as careful to provide for the Defence of it, as the Enemy to aſſault it, and there were ſent over with all Expedition 1500 Men, with good ſtore of Proviſion, under the Command of the Earl of Mortaigne, Son to the Duke of Somerſet, and the Lord Camois. This ſtrong Garriſon, that they might make the Country about it unfit to harbour and receive the Enemy, pillag'd and deſtory'd all the Villages and Corn; and though they were encounter'd firſt by a ſtrong Body of Flemmings, and then by a Party of 1500 French under the Command of the Lords of Warren and Bado, yet they were Victorious over them, killing many, and taking almoſt an equal Number of Priſoners.

A. D. 1436. Reg. 14.

Callis fortified againſt the Siege.

Duke of Burgundy declares War with England.

Duke of Burgundy reſolves to beſiege Callis, and raiſes an Army for that End.

Duke of Burgundy's Army raiſed to beſiege Callis.

The Caſtle of Oye yielded to the French

The Duke of Burgundy having ſpent ſome conſiderable Time in fitting out his Troops, and ordering his Men, at length began his March towards Callis. His whole Army which conſiſted of Men out of ſeveral Provinces, as Picardy, Flanders, Holland, Hannault, to the Number of 40000, was furniſh'd with ſuch an Abundance of Victuals, Arms and Artillery, that they may ſeem to be fit to conquer a Nation, and not a Town, which they themſelves thought ſo inconſiderable an Attempt, that they ſuppoſed the very Approach of their Captains would fright the Inhabitants out of it, and it would be taken without Reſiſtance; but they found their Miſtake ſoon after, the Caliſians neither fearing their Numbers nor Strength. In their Paſſage towards Callis, when they drew near Gravelin, they beat down Two Mills, imputing the late Loſs of the Flemmings to their Situation; and though Philip himſelf diſſwaded them from ſuch an inglorious Attempt, yet they would not deſiſt. Being paſſed the Waters of Gravelin, and come into the Engliſh Territories, the Duke thinking it not convenient to leave any Thing behind him that was held by his Enemy, beſieged the ſmall Caſtle of Oye, which had but Fifty Soldiers in it. Theſe defended that Fort very courageouſly, till twelve of the Chief being ſlain, the reſt yielded themſelves up to the Duke's Mercy, but found little or none; for he giving the Caſtles and Captives to the People of Gaunt, who were the greateſt part

A. D 1436. Reg. 14.

part of the Army and had ſuffer'd much by their Reſiſtance, they to revenge the Blood of their Country-men hang'd up Twenty Nine of them immediately, and razed the Caſtle down to the Ground. The reſidue of the Captives were condemn'd to Death; but the Duke being offended at their Cruelty in ſlaying the former, ſav'd their Lives by much Interceſſion. Within the Proſpect of Callis ſtood another Caſtle, held by the Engliſh, call'd the Caſtle of St. Mark, of greater Strength than the former, containing a Garriſon of 200 Soldiers, under the Command of Sir John Gedding their Captain, who made a bolder Reſiſtance than the Governor of Oye was capable to do, and ſlew many of the Duke's Forces. But was at laſt over-power'd, and deſpairing of Relief from the People of Callis, to whom he had in vain given Signs of the bad Condition of his Garriſon, by ringing their Bells, and hanging out Colours, (for tho' they would, they could not do it) he reſign'd upon Condition, That his and his Men's Lives ſhould be ſav'd; and ſo being made Priſoners of War, they were ſent to Gaunt to be kept for an Exchange, if any of them ſhould happen to be taken. The Way to Callis being thus clear'd, the Duke of Burgundy accompany'd with the Duke of Cleves, the Earl of Eſtamps, the Lords of Dantoing, Croy, Criſquie, Humieres, and many others of Note, laid Siege to the Town on July the 19th, as was moſt to his Advantage, and at his firſt coming cauſed three Aſſaults to be made, but with ſo much Loſs, that he was forced to draw off his Forces further from it. The Engliſh entertained them with continual Sallies, and in moſt of them were Victorious. The Duke of Burgundy was not much diſhearten'd at theſe firſt Succeſſes of the Enemy, but he look'd upon them as flaſhes of Courage, which by length of Time, and the ſtraights of a Siege would much abate; and therefore in the mean time he was careful to block up the Haven, that no Supplies of Men or Victuals ſhould come to the Beſieged out of England, which to his great Grief he had hitherto ſeen done, becauſe the Fleet from Holland and Zealand was not come up, as he had appointed and expected, and to that end he cauſed Four great Hulks, fill'd with great ſquare Stones cemented together with Lead, to be ſunk in the Haven at High-Tide, but with no Damage to the Harbour as it happen'd. He alſo diligently ſurvey'd the Walls of the Town and the Caſtle, that when occaſion offer'd, they might repeat their Aſſaults with better Succeſs. But the Beſieged were on the other ſide as watchful of all Advantages; and ſeeing the Duke obſerving their Town ſhot at him, kill'd his Trumpeter, and three Horſes of ſuch Perſons as were next him.

Callis beſieged.

While the Army lay before Callis the Lord de Croy was ſent with a good Party to beſiege the Caſtle and Town of Guiſnes, of which he ſoon took the latter, but was kept ſo long in the Siege of the former, that he was forced to quit what he had gotten and leave them. In the mean time the Duke of Glouceſter, who knowing the Importance of the Town of Callis to the Engliſh in France, was reſolv'd to raiſe the Siege, ſent over his Herald, call'd Pembroke to tell the Duke of Burgundy, That the Protector of England, his Maſter (if God favoured him with Wind and Weather) intended with all convenient Speed to paſs over to him and give him Battle, either before Callis, or in any other Place in his own Country which he ſhould appoint, and if he refuſed would ſeek him where he could find him. The Duke of Burgundy anſwer'd the Herald, Tell your Maſter, that his Challenge is both Honourable and Reaſonable, and that I will ſave him the Pains to ſeek me, for (God willing) I will not leave the Town till I have my Will of it, and if he comes here he ſhall find me ready to encounter him with all the Forces he can bring. After the Duke of Burgundy had given the Herald his Anſwer, he took him to his Tent, and having feaſted him plentifully gave him a Silver Cup, and an Hundred Pieces of Gold, and ſo ſent him back again. The Herald departed to Callis, and ſo home to the Duke of Glouceſter, who was haſtening with all ſpeed to get an Army, and all other Things neceſſary for his intended Expedition.

Duke of Glouceſter challenges the Duke of Burgundy.

A. D. 1436. Reg. 14.

The Duke of Burgundy alſo as ſoon as the Herald was gone, call'd a Council in the chief Tent of the Gauntois, and ſummon'd all the Flemmiſh Commanders and Cavaliers to it, to whom having declared the Subſtance of the Duke of Glouceſter's Embaſſy and his Anſwer to it, he entreated them for his Honour's ſake and their own, not to deſert him, but ſtand by him, and defend themſelves manfully upon this Occaſion, which they all voluntarily and readily promiſed. This encourag'd the Duke ſo, that he forthwith ſent into Picardy, Artois, and Henault to levy new Forces, and augment his Army to ſuch a Proportion to the Engliſh Army (which he fear'd would be great) as they might be able to oppoſe them. But as the News of the Duke of Glouceſter's coming begat Caution in the Burgundians, ſo it raiſed the Courage of the Beſieged ſo much, that they made many brisk and fortunate Sallies; and among other Things won a Fort built by the Duke of Burgundy upon an Hill ſo near the Town, that they could ſee all the Tranſactions of the Beſieged, and by that means much annoy'd them, which Loſs damp'd the Beſiegers Spirits, and made them deſpair of carrying the Town, eſpecially ſince the Duke of Glouceſter's Arrival was daily expected. In the midſt of theſe Terrors and Fears the Duke of Glouceſter had fortunately paſſed the Seas with 500 ſail of Ships, and landed at Callis with a powerful Army on the Second Day of Auguſt, intending on the Day following to have iſſued out of the Town and gave the Duke of Burgundy Battle; but when that Day was come the Enemy was departed, the very News of his coming ſo affrighted the Flemmings, that no Perſwaſions of their Prince could prevail with them to abide the Battle, and ſo they all departed and left the Siege the Night before to the great Grief of the Duke of Burgundy. Glouceſter, when he brought forth his Army found ſome of their great Ordnance, which were too heavy for their Flight, with much Victuals and Ammunition; but thinking he might overtake them, he purſu'd them Eleven Days; but not being able to do it, he ravag'd part of the Duke of Burgundy's Country, and having burnt two Towns, Popering and Bell, he return'd again to Callis. The Lord de Croy alſo at the Duke of Burgundy's Command left Guiſnes, and the Engliſh repoſſeſſing themſelves of the Town took ſome of their Baggage and Artillery, and among the reſt a great Gun of Braſs, call'd Dijon from the chief Town of Burgundy. And thus the Duke of Glouceſter finiſh'd his Expedition, and return'd into England with Honour and Triumph.

Duke of Burgundy prepares to fight the Duke of Glouceſter.

Duke of Burgundy's Army flies.

In the Abſence of the Duke of Glouceſter, the former Diſcontents between the Scots and Engliſh broke out into open War. James, King of Scots, having married his Daughter to Lewis the Dauphin, gave great Suſpicion to the Scots and Engliſh at War.

A. D. 1436. Reg. 14.

the Engliſh of ſuch an Affinity and Confederacy between them, as might prove very prejudicial to them: Whereupon they firſt endeavour'd to intercept her, and take her Priſoner in her Paſſage into France; but miſſing of that, they began to treat the Scots as no faſt Friends, and did ſome Damages to them upon their Borders. Theſe Things incenſed King James ſo much, that he ſought Opportunity of Revenge, and in the Duke of Glouceſter's Abſence beſieged Roxborough Caſtle with an Army of 30000 Men. Sir Ralph Gray, a Perſon of great Courage and Fidelity, commanded the Caſtle at that Time, and defended it for Twenty Days againſt ſo powerful an Army, which though he could not have withſtood much longer, yet his holding it out ſo long prov'd the Cauſe of its Deliverance; for the King of Scots being advertiſed, that the Earl of Northumberland was coming with an Army to raiſe the Siege, but chiefly, his Queen being come into his Camp to give him Notice of a Conſpiracy form'd againſt his Life, by certain Perſons whoſe Names ſhe could not at preſent find out, choſe rather to releaſe the Town, than loſe his Kingdom and his own Life, by giving his Enemies Time and Opportunity in his Abſence to bring their wicked Contrivances to Perfection, and ſo he left the Siege. But this Deſign, though ſeemingly prudential enough, prov'd fatal to him: For Walter, Earl of Athol, the King's Uncle, who was the Chief in the Conſpiracy, being fearful of being diſcover'd by the Diligence of ſuch as the King had employ'd to find him out, with his Aſſociates, deſperately put them forward to a more ſpeedy Execution, which by the Help of one John a Frier Preacher of Pearth, into whoſe Monaſtery the King was fled for Safety, they effected; for by his Means the Porter being corrupted, and the King's Chamber being left unbarr'd, the Conſpirators boldly and violently ruſh'd into the King's Preſence, and giving him 28 Wounds, ſlew him. Three of the Chief of them, the Earl of Athol himſelf, Robert his Grandſon, and Robert Grimes, were very ſeverely puniſh'd for the Murther by the People, and his Son James the Second, a Child of about Seven Years old, was raiſed to his Throne in the Right of Succeſſion.

James, King of Scots, killed.

Reg. 15.

Duke of Burgundy ſeeks a Neutrality.

After the diſgraceful Departure of the Duke of Burgundy from Calis, the Engliſh, in all Parts of France, became very troubleſome to him and his Subjects. At Bruges they roſe in a tumultuous manner againſt him, and ſlew a Captain of his Guard, the Lord Liſle Adam himſelf very hardly eſcaping with his Life. Theſe Dangers made him employ his Neighbouring Princes to ſolicit a Peace between him and the King of England, That he ſhould remain a Neuter between England and France. The Perfidiouſneſs of the Duke was an invincible Objection againſt their Petition; but an Expedient being found out, that the Dutcheſs ſhould act for her Husband, and ſhould be admitted to a Treaty for him, Commiſſioners were appointed on both Sides to meet at Gravelin, viz. The Dutcheſs of Burgundy, the Biſhop of Arras, Lord Croy, and others for the Duke: And Henry, Cardinal of Wincheſter; John Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk; Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, and divers other Perſons of Honour, for King Henry. After ſome Debates, a Truce was concluded between King Henry and the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, her Husband not being ſo much as named in it; but it laſted a little time, the Duke taking Liberty to break that Covenant, in which his Enemy would not have him tied; and ſo it only ſerved a Turn, till he could better ſecure himſelf againſt the Engliſh Enmity.

A. D. 1436. Reg. 15.

A. D. 1437.

On the 2d Day of January this Year died (m) Queen Catherine, the Wife of that renown'd Prince King Henry the Fifth, and Mother of this King Henry the Sixth, at Bermondſea in Surrey, and was, with all due Solemnity, buried at Weſtminſter, in the midſt of our Lady's Chappel, under a Marble-Tomb, by her Huſband, where ſhe reſted, till King Henry the Seventh pull'd down the ſaid Chappel, and erected that moſt ſumptuous Pile of Buildings, which retains his Name to this Day. She had in her Life privately married a Noble Welch Gentleman, of the Lineage of Cadwallader, the laſt of the Britiſh Kings, named Owen Tudor, or Theodore, a Perſon of rare Beauty and Parts, but of ſmall Fortunes, and therefore accounted a very unequal Match for this Great Princeſs; yet it was wink'd at by the Dukes of Glouceſter and Bedford. By him ſhe had Three Sons, Edmund, Jaſper and Owen; the laſt was a Monk at Weſtminſter. Her Daughter by him died in her Infancy. After her Death, Owen was apprehended (n) and impriſon'd, becauſe that, contrary to an Act of Parliament made in the Sixth Year of this King's Reign, he had preſumptuouſly married the Queen, without the King's ſpecial Aſſent. He eſcaped twice out of Priſon, and let out others with him, but the Third time, it is ſaid, he loſt his Life. However, his Children which he had by the Queen ſunk not by the Misfortune of their Father; for King Henry either out of Reſpect to his Mother, or in Recompence for the too great Severity againſt his Father, ſoon after his Death, created Edmund Earl of Richmond, and Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, and married Edmund to Margaret, Daughter and ſole Heireſs to the Duke of Somerſet, of whom he begot Henry, Earl of Richmond, who afterwards was King of England, by the Name of Henry the Seventh, Queen Catherine died.

Biondi Hiſt. of the Civil Wars of England.

About the ſame Time, the Dutcheſs of Bedford, Siſter to Lewis, Earl of St. Poll, as if Queen Catherine's Example had taught her to marry for Affection rather than Honour, married a brisk young Knight, Sir Richard Woodvile, afterwards created Lord, and Earl of Rivers, to the great Diſpleaſure of her Brother, and Uncle, the Biſhop of Turwin, whom ſhe had not acquainted with it. By him ſhe had many Children, both Sons and Daughters, and among them the Lady Elizabeth, who being married to King Edward the Fourth, was afterward Queen of England.

Dutcheſs of Bedford married Sir Richard Woodvile.

Whilſt this Marriage was in the Celebration, Jane, the Wife of Henry the Fourth, and Daughter of Charles, King of Navarre, ſurnamed, The Wicked, died at Bermondſea in Surrey, and being carried to Canterbury, was there interr'd by her Husband King Henry. Some remarkable Accidents alſo happened about this time, viz. the furtheſt Gate upon London-bridge next Southwark, with the Tower upon it, and Two Arches upon which it chiefly depended fell down ſuddenly, but did no Harm, all the Lions alſo in the Tower died.

On the 21ſt Day of January, King Henry aſſembled his Parliament at Weſtminſter. This Par-

Parl. 8. its Acts and Taxes

(m) In the 38th Year of her Age.

(n) Owen Tudor was beheaded after the Battle of Mortimer's-Croſs, for fighting in the Quarrel of the Houſe of Lancaſter, Anno 1460. Holl. 660.

liament

A. D. 1437. Reg. 15.

liament was firſt appointed to meet at Cambridge, but for ſome Reaſons of State is was recall'd to Weſtminſter.

In this Parliament, 1. A Remedy was provided againſt vexatious and troubleſome Suits of ſuch Perſons as were not of the King's Houſhould, in the Court of Stewards and Marſhals in the King's Houſe, and it was allow'd as an Exemption from their Juriſdiction to plead and aver, that they are not of the King's Houſe.

2. An Allowance was given to all the Subjects of England to tranſport Corn of ſmall Price out of the Realm, viz. Wheat at Six Shillings and Eight Pence, and Barley at Three Shillings and Four Pence the Quarter.

3. An Injunction to all Sheriffs, Bailiffs of Franchiſes and Coroners, that in Actions, or Writs of Attaint of Plea for Lands of the Yearly Value of Forty Pounds, they do not return nor impanel any Perſons, but ſuch as be inhabiting in his Bailiwick, and have an Eſtate to their own Uſe in Lands and Tenements, to the Yearly Value of Twenty Pounds or more, upon the Penalty of forfeiting Ten Pounds to the King, and Ten Pounds to the Plaintiffs in the ſaid Action, or Writs of Attaint; and that no Perſon of leſs Sufficiency of Freehold than Twenty Pounds a Year ſhall be ſworn in the King's Court upon any Iſſue in the ſaid Actions, if he be for the ſame by the Plaintiffs in due Form challenged.

4. A Permiſſion was given to all Perſons, as well Religious as Secular, to appoint themſelves General Attornies to ſue or plead for them in every Hundred and Wapentake. And,

5. A Prohibition was laid upon all Merchants to ſhip, or cauſe to be ſhipped, any Wool, Woolfells, or other Merchandizes belonging to the Staple, in any Place within this Realm, except at the Keys and Wharfs aſſigned by the Statute, where the King's Weights and Wools be ſet, excepting the Merchants of Genoa, Venice, Tuſcany, Florence, Catalonia, and the Burgeſſes of Berwick. To this Parliament came the Biſhop of Terwin and the Earl of Arminack out of France, but their Buſineſs was not known, and if important, was ſoon diſpatch'd, and the Parliament ſoon after diſſolved.

Harfleure beſieged by the Engliſh.

In the late Inſurrection in Normandy, the Engliſh had loſt Harfleure, a Town of great Conſequence for the Preſervation of that Province, which being found to be extreamly inconvenient in the Enemies Hands, they reſolved upon the Recovery of it. The Duke of Somerſet, attended with the Lords Falconbridge and Talbot, were ſent with a ſtrong Force to beſiege it. The Captain of the Town was Sir John D' Eſtautevile, and the Garriſon was 600 ſtrong. The Engliſh at their firſt Approach were ſenſible, that they ſhould meet with a ſtrong Oppoſition, as well from the Beſieged as the French King's Party, whoſe Intereſt it was to preſerve the Town, as much as the Engliſh to gain it; and therefore they ſtrongly intrenched themſelves before the Town, and then began to batter the Walls, that they might gain an Entrance into it, but were ſo valiantly oppoſed and repulſed, that tho' the Town ſuffered much Damage, it held out, and kept them from an Aſſault. The French King in the mean Time was very deſirous to relieve it, and to that End ſent the Earls of Ew and Dunois, the Valiant Baſtard of Bourbon, and the Lord Gaucourt, with an Army of 4000 Men to raiſe the Siege; but when they came, they found their Enemies ſo ſtrongly entrenched, that they could moleſt them very little by all the Means they could deviſe, and ſo ſaw it next to impoſſible to do their Friends within the Town any good, whereupon they fearing leſt their Delays might prove dangerous to themſelves, left the Town to its own Defence and the Enemy's Mercy: The Governor ſeeing it paſt all Hopes of being ſaved, thought it better to ſurrender the Town upon ſome honourable Terms, than hazard all to no Purpoſe, and therefore capitulated for the Lives of himſelf and Soldiers, and left the Place in the Hands of the Engliſh, who joyfully received it, as their deſired Prey. The Duke of Somerſet committed it to the keeping of Thomas Pawlet, Chriſtopher Barber, William Limerick and George St. George, who manfully defended the Town and Haven many Years. The Lord Talbot, after the Taking of Harfleure, was left Captain of the Army to carry the Victory on, as his Courage ſhould lead him, who thereupon beſieged Tankerville, which he took in Four Months, being delivered up to his Diſcretion, and ſoon after Beauchaſtaan and Maleville, which following the Example of Tankerville, yielded without Blows. But the Engliſh by all theſe Victories were no Gainers, for Charles, the French King, paſſing over the River Loire, beſieged the ſtrong Town of Monſtreau Fault Yonne, of which Captain Thomas Gerard was Commander, who forgetting his Honour and Truſt, ſold it to the French King for a Sum of Money, as was afterwards diſcovered. The French that were in it, were all hanged for their Treaſon to him, and the Engliſh at the Dauphin's Requeſt ſet at Liberty. After the Taking this Town, ſome ſmaller Garriſons, as Chaſteau, Landone, Charmi and Nemours, yielded to him without Reſiſtance, and then paſſing on, he took his Way to Paris, where having not been ſince it returned to his Obedience, he made his Entry with Solemnity, and loud Acclamations. The Engliſh, tho' not unconcern'd at theſe Loſſes, were under no poſſibility of Regaining them thro' the Change of the Regency, which unfortunately happen'd in this Juncture, otherwiſe Monſtreau had not been ſo eaſily parted withal. The Duke of York, who had held the Place with great Applauſe, tho' he was never perſonally preſent at any Battle or Siege, unleſs at that of Feſchamp, was diſplaced, and the Earl of Warwick put into his Room, a Perſon every ways qualified for ſo great a Charge, but being detained Seven Weeks by croſs Winds from arriving in France, they wanted a Power in York to oppoſe the Current; and ſo the French King carried on his Victories without Controul. At the ſame time Arthur of Brittain, Conſtable of France, John, Duke of Alenzon, and La Hire, with a great Army, made divers Attempts in Normandy, firſt upon the Town of Auranches, and then upon the City of Roan, but fail'd in both by the Courage and Diligence of the Lord Talbot, Lord Scales and Sir Tho. Kiriel, who ſet upon the French ſuddenly, and routed them at a Town called Riz, not far from Roan, killing about 200, and taking a great Number Captives, among which were the Lord of Fountains, Sir Aleine Geronne, Sir Lewis Balle, and Sixty Knights and Eſquires, by which Normandy was preſerved to the Engliſh.

A. D. 1437. Reg 15.

And ſurrendred upon Articles.

The Lord Talbot takes ſeveral Places.

The French gain on the Loire.

Earl of Warwick made Regent of France.

Reg. 16.

The Earl of Warwick, Richard Beauchamp, who had been endeavouring a Paſſage into France for ſeveral Weeks before, and in order thereto had Seven times taken Ship, but was as often driven back again, at length arrived at Honflue, Nov. 6. with a Thouſand freſh Soldiers, and from thence went to Roan, where the Duke

Earl of Warwick arrives at Honflue.

of

A. D. 1437. Reg. 16. of York having received him with a kind Welcome, reſign'd his Dignity to him, and returned by the ſame Ships, with all his Train, into England. This New Deputy was no ſooner in his Place, but he was forced upon Action; for Florimand de Brimau, Bailiff of Ponthieu, having private Advertiſement, that Crotoi, an Engliſh Garriſon, was in great Want of Victuals, and could not hold out, if ſuddenly beſieged and begirt round, gave Notice of it to Philip, Duke of Burgundy, who immediately ſent an Army of above 10000 Men, with Guns and other Materials, under the Command of Meſſieurs D'Archi, Crovi, Kenti, Jaques de Brimeau, and others, to lay cloſe Siege round it. The Garriſon, who fear'd nothing but Hunger, ſeeing their Danger, began to provide againſt it, and finding the Sea open, ſent out a Ship immediately, which by its nimble Sail in a Day or two ſupplied them with Plenty of Proviſion. The Duke of Burgundy ſaw his Error too late, and endeavour'd to prevent it, by ſending Four Ships to lie at the Mouth of the Haven; but the Inhabitants of Crotoi would not endure this Blockade, and ſending Six Ships out, routed them, and kept the Sea open for their continual Relief. By this means they were in no Fear of Want of Victuals, but could hold out till Aid ſhould come. The Earl of Warwick had News ſoon of this Attempt, and immediately diſpatch'd the Lords Talbot and Falconbridge, Sir Tho. Kiriel, and divers other Knights and Eſquires, with an Army of 5000 Men, to raiſe the Siege, who were alſo ſo zealous to deliver the Town, that they all waded thro' the River, ſome up to the Chin, to get the neareſt Way to it, reſolving either to drive the Enemy from it, or die in the Quarrel. The Duke of Burgundy, who lay with his Forces beſide the City, had News of the Approaching of the Lord Talbot, with all his Power, and thereupon drew off his Forces, as if he would have confronted his Army and fought them; but when they came nigh one another, the Duke and his Forces retreated to Abville, and left the Town; but being unwilling to loſe the Baſtile, which he had lately built to annoy it, he left 400 Men to keep it. The Lord Talbot kept on his Way, and came to Crotoi, but not finding the Duke of Burgundy's Army there, he aſſaulted the Baſtile, and took it, all the Men being either ſlain, or made Priſoners. Then he ſent Meſſengers after the Duke of Burgundy to challenge him to a Battle, threatning, that if he refuſed, he would deſtroy all his Country of Picardy with Fire and Sword; but the Duke, ſtricken with a Panick Fear, fled the faſter from him, and paſſing by Amiens, lodged himſelf and his Army at Arras. The Lord Talbot, enraged at this Cowardize, ſtaid Twenty Days in Picardy, burning Towns, ſlaying the People, and taking what Spoil and Priſoners he could, and ſo return'd to the Earl of Warwick, who highly extoll'd his Courage and Conduct.

Crotoi beſieged.

Crotoi relieved.

Lord Talbot challenges the Duke of Burgundy to a Fight.

A. D. 1438. About Chriſtmas, in this Year, King Henry cauſed a ſolemn Obit to be celebrated in St Paul's Church in London, for that eminent and wiſe Prince Sigiſmund, the Emperor of Germany, who died a little before, and left the Empire to Albert, who had marry'd the only Daughter of the ſaid Sigiſmund.

An Obit for the Emperor Sigiſmund.

One John Gardiner burnt for Hereſie.

On Eaſter-Day, one John Gardiner, a Perſon that favoured the Doctrines of Wickliff, but yet conformed outwardly to the Romiſh Ceremonies, either out of Fear or Intereſt, was diſcovered to convey the Sacramental Bread from his Mouth, after he had received it from the Prieſt's Hands, in a foul Cloth, in St. Mary Ax's Church in London. This Fact was obſerved with Abhorrence by all his fellow Communicants, and he being examined, was found to be an obſtinate Heretick, and was burnt in Smithfield, May 14. for his Crime. A. D. 1438. Reg. 16.

In the Spring of this Year, Henry, Earl of Mortaigne, Son to Edmund, Duke of Somerſet, ſail'd out of England with 400 Archers, and 300 Spears, and landed at Cherburg in Normandy, and paſſing through the Country of Main, he beſieged and took the Caſtle of St. Anian, putting the Scotch Garriſon of 300 Men to the Sword, and hanging up all the French Men he found in it, becauſe they had formerly taken an Oath of Fedelity to King Henry, and had falſified it. The Lord Talbot alſo, about the ſame Time, gat ſeveral other Places more thro' the Terror of his Name, than by his Sword; for Longaville, Carles, Manville, and many other Towns, yielded themſelves to him without any Reſiſtance. The Earl of Mortaigne further advanced his Succeſs, and took the Caſtle of Algerche, and the Lord Camewis in an Ambuſh, who came to the Relief of it; but the Engliſh were not the only Gainers, what they got in one Place, they loſt in Another; for Montarges, and Cheroſie ſubmitted themſelves to King Charles, and the Burgeſſes of Meaux and St. Suſan, in the Country of Brie, ſold and delivered thoſe Towns up to the French for Money; ſo that what Courage and Diligence got on the Engliſh Side, Treachery loſt them, for tho' they could ſubdue the French, they could never make them faithful, ſeldom continuing in Obedience longer than they were kept in Fear by the Sword, or other Force.

Earl of Mortaigne ſent into France.

French revolt.

The Unſeaſonableneſs of the Harveſt this Year, which was full of raging Winds and exceſſive Rains, cauſed ſuch a great Scarcity of Corn in England and France, that Wheat began at this time to be ſold at 2 s. 6 d. per Buſhel, and Malt at 18 d. and before the Year paſſed, increaſed ſo much in the Price, that the Poor underwent great Hardſhips, and were forced to make their Bread of Vetches, and Peaſe, and Beans, courſe Grains, with which before they uſually fed their Beaſts and Poultry; and in ſome Parts of the Nation they were ſo preſſed with Want of theſe courſer Grains, that they made Bread of Fern-Roots and Ivy-Berries. In the City of London, the Dearth was not ſo great as in the Country, thro' the Care and Vigilance of Stephen Brown, then Mayor, who [illegible]ing the great Danger the City was in, of ſuffering Famine, ſent ſeveral Ships into Pruſſia for Ry, which brought ſuch Quantities of that Grain into the City, that there was a Sufficiency of Bread with the pooreſt. Divers other lamentable Accidents attended this publick Calamity. On Nov. 25. there was ſuch a terrible Wind, that it did much Harm in many Places of the Nation, and particularly at London; it blew off the Leads of the Grey-Friers Church, and almoſt beat down a whole Side of a Street, called the Old Exchange; ſo that the Inhabitants were forced to underprop it with great Studs to keep it from falling. On New-Years-Day a great Stack of Wood fell down at Bainard's Caſtle, and killed Three Men, many more being bruiſed and wounded dangerouſly. At Bedford alſo, upon the Day of the Aſſizes, there were Eighteen Perſons killed, and ſeveral more hurt, by the Fall of a Pair of Stairs. With theſe unlucky Events happen'd the Death of that uſeful and charitable Citizen Sir Robert Chicheley, Grocer,

Reg. 17.

A Dearth in England.

Several unuſual Accidents

A. D. 1439.

A. D. 1439. Reg. 17.

cer, Brother to the Arch-Biſhop and twice Mayor of London, who by his laſt Will and Teſtament ordain'd, that on his Mind-Day a good and competent Dinner ſhould be provided for 2400 poor People of the Houſholders of the City of London, if ſo many could be found, and after Dinner every one ſhould have Two Pence given them, which in theſe Times was a bountiful Charity.

Sir Roger Chicheley's Charity.

The Duke of Burgundy's Project to drown Callis.

The Duke of Burgundy, who, after his ſhameful Retreat from Crotoi, ſtudied how to revenge himſelf upon the Engliſh, and recover his loſt Reputation, now ſent many Wood-Cleavers, Smiths and Pioneers, under the Conduct of 1600 Soldiers, to cut down the Sea-Banks about Callis, believing that by that means he ſhould drown the Town, and all the bordering Country; but the Event anſwered not Expectation, whereupon they turn'd to Pont de Millay, and pretended to lay Siege to it, but ſoon drew off their Forces, and return'd Home, ſeeking rather to find themſelves ſome fair Excuſe, than effect any thing. But tho' this Stratagem prov'd very fooliſh, the French had other Engines, which did them greater Service, and got them many Towns about this Time, which were, their Preferments and Money, large Promiſes and great Sums. Theſe Things prov'd ſo prevalent, as well with the Engliſh as French, in the Engliſh Garriſons, that no Place could withſtand them. Indeed, the French wanted Money, 'tis plain, in the Camp, inſomuch, that they ſpent their Time in plundering one another; but yet ſince Money made way ſo eaſily to King Charles's Deſign in regaining his Country, he choſe rather to want himſelf, than his Enemies ſhould. This Piece of Policy the Engliſh hardly knew how to prevent; but it being related to the Council of England, they ſent over the Earl of Huntington in June, with 2000 Archers, and 400 Spear-men, as a Supply to the Garriſons, and a freſh Recruit to the Army. At his coming he found the Earl of Dunois near Thoulouſe, where, partly by Rewards, and partly by fair Promiſes, he had won ſeveral Cities in Guien, beſides thoſe which Rodrigo de Vellandras had recover'd by like Policy, to attone for his late Diſobedience to his Maſter's Command to attend him. The Earl ſeeing this, put in freſh Garriſons in many of the Towns, yet in the Engliſh Hands, out of his own Forces, which he had brought out of England, and removed the old Garriſons to other Towns, where they were not acquainted. He diſplaced alſo the old Magiſtrates, and put in new ones, and ſo ſecured ſeveral of the remaining Towns, moſt of which had an itching Deſire to be fingering the French Money, and would have probably revolted to them, had not this Earl's coming and prudent Management prevented it. Nor had the ſame Methods a worſe Succeſs in Normandy, whither Sir Richard Woodvile, Sir William Chamberlain and Sir William Peito were ſent, with a Thouſand Men, upon the like Errand, who kept the wavering Towns by ſo doing, tho' they recover'd not what had revolted till the Diviſions among the French gave them this Opportunity.

The Engliſh remove their Garriſons to prevent Bribery.

Lewis the Dauphin rebels againſt his Father.

Lewis the Dauphin, a Prince of a very ambitious Spirit, young and hardy, being now arrived at the Sixteenth Year of his Age; and married, grew impatient to be under the Government of a Father, and reach'd at ſome Authority that might make him look like the Son of a King, which his Father, who was very ſuſpicious and jealous, being even from his Childhood exerciſed with the Perſecutions of his Mother, and the Enmity of the Engliſh and Burgundians, obſerving, treated him with a little more Severity than uſual, and kept him to a ſhorter Allowance, which much diſcontented him. The Nobles, who were not well pleaſed with King Charles's Carriage to them, becauſe he had always put moſt Confidence in the People, as being leſs able to hurt and damnifie him, laid hold of this Opportunity of incenſing the Dauphin againſt his Father, thereby to raiſe themſelves into greater Places and Truſt under him, if they ſhould prevail, and under his Father, if they came to an Agreement. The Chief of the Nobles, who were moſt active to ſtir up this Diſſention, were the Dukes of Bourbon and Alenzon, the Counts of Vendoſme, Chabanes, Chaumont, Boveant and Prie. Theſe told him, That tho' his Duty to his Father was a great Obligation to Obedience and Submiſſion, yet ſince the Welfare of the Publick was the main Thing he ought to reſpect, as a Prince, the former ought not to tie him up from the Uſe of any proper Means to ſecure the latter: That 'tis evident his Father had been guilty of many Faults in his Government, as the Murther of the Duke of Burgundy, Contempt of his Nobles, and the like, which ought to be redreſs'd, and by none ſo fitly as himſelf, who was the next Perſon to the Crown: That thoſe who were at preſent in greateſt Authority about the King, perſwaded him daily to a Peace, which could not be effected, but with a great Loſs of his own Patrimony: That he had excluded them from his Favour and Truſt merely that he might Tyrannize the more ſecurely over the Kingdom, and keep the Dauphin under: That the King his Father had placed him at Loches, a remote and private Part of his Kingdom, that being far from the Court, and ignorant of Affairs, he might be led by them, who ruled as they liſt, contrary to his and the Kingdom's Intereſts: That a Reſolution to redreſs theſe Things could not be interpreted in him Diſobedience, but a noble Attempt to preſerve the whole State, as well his Father and himſelf, as his Subjects. The Dauphin being of a contumacious Diſpoſition, preſently yielded to theſe Reaſons, and told them, That he was ready to do whatever his Quality obliged him to, and if they would join their Power with his, would not be wanting to himſelf nor them. The Lords having thus obtain'd their deſired Ends, take the Dauphin with them, and began to raiſe what Forces they could to oppoſe the King, reſolving never to lay down their Arms, till Diſorders were reform'd, the Authority of the Princes eſtabliſhed, and Men of Merit and Worth brought into Favour. The Lords endeavour'd all they could to bring the Duke of Burgundy over to their Party, but he not only denied them, but adviſed them to deſiſt from their Enterprize, which was unjuſt, dangerous and groundleſs. Then they ſent Men into the ſeveral Provinces of the Kingdom to gather up a Strength out of the Commons, but theſe alſo gave them no Encouragements, telling the Meſſenger, That tho' they loved the Dauphin well, and were willing to ſerve him, yet they would not do it againſt his Father, nor in the Face of a common Enemy, who would make uſe of this Diviſion for the Deſtruction of all of them. Theſe Diſappointments were unexpected, but yet the Nobles having gone too far in their Deſign to retreat honourably, proceeded as well as they could, and the Duke of Alenzon ſeiz'd on the Town of Noyard, and John de la Roche on St. Maxence. The Counts of Chaumont, Bouciqualt and Prie headed a great Number of Volunteers, Freebooters, and ſuch Rabble;

A. D. 1439. Reg. 17.

Several Lords encourage and aſſiſt him.

A. D. 1439. Reg 17.

and the Duke of Burbon with a good Force had the Command and Guard of the Dauphin's Perſon. The News of this Inſurrection of his Son, which was as Unreaſonable as Undutiful, was very ungrateful to King Charles; but knowing it the greateſt Wiſdom to cruſh ſuch Attempts in the Birth, he immediately ſent a Meſſenger to the Duke of Bourbon to deliver up his Son, and to the Duke of Alenzon to ſurrender his Towns of Noyard and Maxence, and both of them to come to him to give a Reaſon of their taking Arms; but they made ſome Excuſes, which tho' they did not amount to Denials, yet apparently diſcover'd their Deſigns to delay both. The King ſeeing their Obſtinacy reſolv'd to cruſh them by Force, and ſo march'd againſt them toward Maxence and Noyard, which immediately ſubmitted to the King all but the Caſtle, which was beſieged and taken by the King's Forces, and the Commanders hang'd. The other Towns that follow'd the Dauphin's Party, came into the King, and left the Lords deſtitute of all Aſſiſtance, inſomuch that they wore forced to humble themſelves to him, who ſent the Earl of Eu to offer them Terms of Reconciliation, and ſo they met the King at Clermont, and after begging Forgiveneſs they were reconcil'd and all pardon'd, except Trimouille, Chaumont and Pry: The Dauphin ſtood much upon their Pardon at firſt, and told his Father, That he would not accept of his own, unleſs they had theirs, becauſe he had engaged his Word and Honour for their Safety; but when King Charles ſaid briskly to his Son, That he had free leave to depart, he valued not his Enmity, he ſhould find enow to defend his Right, Lewis ſubmitted to his Pleaſure, and the three Lords were left out: And ſo all Things were accorded between King Charles and his Son: But while this Diſturbance laſted, which was almoſt all this Summer, the Engliſh had a good Opportunity of recovering their Loſſes, which they ſo well made uſe of, that they regain'd the greateſt part of them, and were preparing to attempt Paris it ſelf, but the unexpected Agreement of the French King and his Son put an End to thoſe Deſigns, and confin'd their Thoughts to preſerve what they had gotten, rather than win more.

K. Charles ſends for the Dauphin.

The Rebels Pardon'd upon their Submiſſion.

The Dauphin ſubmits.

Grecians ſubſcribe to the Remiſh Doctrines at Florence.

While France was thus buſied in compoſing Things, another Difference tho' not of like Nature ſeem'd to be adjuſted; for Pope Eugenius at the Council of Florence perſwaded the Emperour and Patriarch of Conſtantinople, with the reſt of the Grecians there preſent, to receive and ſubſcribe to the Doctrines of the Church of Rome concerning the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt from the Son, receiving the Sacrament of the Body of Chriſt in unleaven'd Bread, Purgatory and the Supremacy of the Biſhop of Rome. But this Act of theirs was ſo highly Offenſive to the Grecian-Churches when they heard of it, that they publickly declared their Diſſent to this Subſcription, and with a publick Execration condemn'd all the Legates that had aſſented to them, and would not permit them to be buried with Chriſtian Burial.

Reg. 18.

A great Froſt by which the Engliſh recover'd Pontoiſe.

In November this Year began a Froſt, which held with ſuch Violence, that it froze all Ditches ſo hard, that they were paſſable, and being follow'd with a deep Snow made them almoſt indiſcernible from the Ground. This Weather put the Engliſh upon a Stratagem to recover Pontoiſe by Surprize, which the French King had lately got from them by Money, becauſe the chief Strength of the Place lying in the deep Ditches about it, the Froſt had made them Unſerviceable; they therefore covering their Armour with their White Shirts, and their Head-pieces with White Caps, paſſed over the Ice undiſover'd by Night, and Scaling the Walls ſlew the Watch ſleeping, and took the Town with many Priſoners of Worth and great Spoil, to the great Diſſatisfaction of the People of Paris, who were much damag'd by the Loſs of it. The Two Captains of the Town and Caſtle, John de Villers, and one Narabon a Burgundian Knight eſcaped, tho' hardly, but the treacherous Burgeſſes fell into their Hands, and ſuffer'd their deſerv'd Puniſhment. John Lord Clifford was the Leader of the Engliſh in this brave Attempt, and being Maſter of the Town was made the Governour of it, to defend it with the ſame Valour he had taken it.

A. D. 1439. Reg 18.

On the Morrow after St. Martin, November the 12th the King ſummon'd his Parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, where ſeveral Things of great Benefit to the Nation were enacted.

Ninth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes

1. That Cheeſe and Butter may be carry'd out of the Kingdom without Licenſe.

2. That Merchants Strangers ſhall not ſell their Merchandizes one to another in England, but that every ſuch Merchant ſhall have an Hoſt or Surveyor appointed him at his Landing by the chief Officer of the Town or Place where he ſhall Land, who ſhall keep a Regiſter of all he buys and ſells, and take Two Pence in the Pound of him for all Merchandize by him bought or ſold, and the ſaid Merchants ſhall ſell and buy all within eight Months.

3. That all Perſons made Juſtices of the Peace ſhall have Lands or Tenements to the Value of twenty Pound a Year, except in Cities and Corporations.

4. That no Captain ſhall detain the Wages of the common Soldiers, except it be for their Clothing.

5. That every Perſon muſtering and receiving the King's Wages, who ſhall depart from their Captains and the King's Service, without apparent Licenſe granted them by the ſaid Captains, ſhall be puniſh'd as Felons: With ſome others of leſs Importance.

It ſeems, that the King had by this Parliament a Fifteenth or a Diſme granted him for the Neceſſity of the State, becauſe there is an Act made for the regular Collections of Fifteens and Diſmes within the Cities and Boroughs of this Realm; and beſides it was enacted, That every Houſholder that is an Alien ſhall pay the King thirteen Pence a Year, and every Servant Alien ſix Pence.

A. D. 1440.

Earl of Warwick dies.

Soon after the taking of Pontoiſe by the Engliſh the Earl of Warwick Regent of France fell ſick, and in April following dy'd in the Caſtle of Roan in Normandy. His Corps was kept there till October following, when it was carry'd over into England, and honourably interred in his College of our Lady Church at Warwick, built by his Noble Anceſtors, in a fair and ſumptuous Tomb. He left only two Children, Henry, who after him was Duke of Warwick, and Ann, who was marry'd to Richard Nevill, Earl of Salisbury. Henry lived ſome Years, but dying without Iſſue, his Honour deſcended to his Siſter, in whoſe Right the Earl of Salisbury became Earl of Warwick. The Duke of York, Richard Plantagenet ſucceeded him in his Government in France, being made Deputy there a ſecond Time. He was more ſpeedy in going over into France this Time than before; for being accompany'd with the Earl of Oxford, Lord Bourchier, call'd Earl of Eu, Sir James Ormond, the Lord Clinton, and divers other Noblemen, paſſed into Normandy in a few Weeks after Duke of York ſucceeds him in the Regency of France.

A. D. 1440. Reg. 18.

after the Earl Warwick's Death. His Arrival was as ſeaſonable as it was ſpeedy. The French had made uſe of this Interval in the Government to fall upon the Engliſh Conqueſts in France; for the Pariſians, to whom the Loſs of Pontoiſe was very inconvenient, raiſed a great Sum of Money to enable King Charles to beſiege it, and endeavour the Recovery of it, which he accordingly did, carrying along with him 1200 Old Soldiers, and the greateſt part of the Nobles and Princes of France with a great Army. The French began the Siege with great Fury, encompaſſing the Town with Baſtiles, Trenches and Ditches, battering its Walls with their great Ordinance, and giving it many fierce Aſſaults. The Lord Clifford who was Captain of it defended it with ſo much Valour, that the French Men rather loſt than won, tho' it was impoſſible he could hold out long againſt ſo great an Army without Succour. The Duke of York immediately upon his Landing receiv'd the News of the Condition of Pontoiſe, and ſent to the Lord Talbot to come to him, and bring all the Forces he could get together for the Relief of it. Talbot was as zealous to obey, as the Duke was to command; and having aſſembled a ſtrong Body of Men to join the Duke, they marched to Pontoiſe and challenged the French King to come out of his Trenches to give them Battle. Charles by the Advice of his Council refuſed it, and thought himſelf ſecure from any Attempts of the Engliſh, becauſe the River Oiſe was between them; but the Duke of York, who came provided with Boats, Cordage, Timber, and Planks, by the Uſe of them gained a Paſſage over the River, and reſolv'd to attack King Charles in his Trenches. The News of this being carry'd to the French King ſurpriz'd him with Wonder and Fear at once, and that he might eſcape the Danger, he raiſed his Camp that Night and withdrew to Poiſy, leaving the Lord Cotignie with 3000 Men to defend the Baſtile. The Duke of York and the Engliſh Army were not ſenſible of the French King's Retreat, ſo marching up in Order towards the Camp found no Enemy, but only their Tents and heavy Baggage, which they ſeiz'd on as Prey. The Duke then entred the Town, and having repaired the Walls and ſtored it with Victuals, put in Sir Gervis Clifton and Sir Nicholas Burdet with a Garriſon of 1000 Soldiers, and went to offer the French King Battle at Poiſy; but not being able to draw him into the Field, he after ſome ſmall Skirmiſhes diſlodged his Army and return'd to Roan.

Pontoiſe beſieged by the French King.

Duke of York raiſes the Seige.

About the Time that Richard, Duke of York, went to his Government in France, viz. on June the 17th, a certain Prieſt named Richard Wiche, Miniſter of Hermetſworth in Eſſex, who had been before convicted of Hereſie and abjured, was found guilty of a Relapſe, and being degraded from his Prieſtly Dignity was burnt as an incorrigible Heretick on Tower-hill. Before his Death he had foretold, That the Poſtern-gate of the Tower ſhould ſink into the Ground, which accordingly coming to paſs upon the 18th Day of July following, when the ſaid Gate ſunk in the Night more than ſeven Foot into the Earth, it added ſo much to the Opinion, that many had of him, after his Death, that he was a good Man, and burnt out of Malice, that many Men and Women went by Night to the Place where he was murther'd, and offer'd many Images of Wax and other Things according to the Superſtition of thoſe Times, making their Prayers to him, kiſſing the Ground where he ſuffer'd, and carrying away the Aſhes of his Body as a ſacred Relique. This blind Devotion being obſerved by the Vicar of Barking, in whoſe Pariſh this Burning happen'd, he to increaſe their ſuperſtitious Adoration mingled Spices with the Duſt of the Body and Aſhes, that they might believe the Fragrancy to proceed from the Holineſs of the Sufferer, which ſo deceived the People, that they raiſed a great heap of Stones in the Place, and erected a Croſs, and many went on Pilgrimage to it, to the great enriching of the Vicar of Barking, who received the Offerings of the People. The Churchmen, who were much blam'd for putting to Death ſo holy a Man, were much offended at this Action of the People, and made their Complaints to the King, that it was a great Slander to the Church to have Worſhip paid to him; whereupon the King put out a * Proclamation to the Sheriffs of London and Middleſex, commanding them to hinder and forbid all Perſons reſorting to the Place of the Execution of the ſaid Richard Wiche under Colour of Pilgrimage, or any other pretence of Devotion or worſhipping him publickly or privately as a Saint, under the Pain of being taken and reputed for Hereticks and puniſh'd as ſuch. Upon this Order from the King and his Council, the Mayor and Aldermen of London ſet armed Men about the Place where he was burnt, to reſtrain the People from coming, who apprehending ſome (among whom was the Vicar of Barking) and committing them to Priſon, ſo deterred all others, that in a ſhort Time they left off their Pilgrimages and Devotion to him, which appear'd the more ridiculous to all, becauſe the Vicar of Barking confeſſed the Deluſion, that for his own Gain he had put upon them.

Richard Wiche burnt on Tower-hill for Hereſie.

A. D. 1440. Reg. 18.

The Vicar of Barking cheats the People.

* Cop. in Fox Act. and Mon. p. 644.

Reg. 19.

When the Regent and the Lord Talbot were return'd into Normandy, Charles the French King ſeeing that he had extreamly ſuffer'd in his Reputation, eſpecially among the Pariſians for leaving Pontoiſe in the Hands of the Enemy, again aſſembled his Army, and return'd to it, reſolv'd either to take it or die in the Enterprize. He divided his Forces into Three Parts, of which Two were under the Command of himſelf and the Dauphin his Son, and aſſaulted the Town in eight Places: By the firſt Aſſault he got the Church, and ſoon after the whole Town, but with ſo great Loſs of his Men, that it could be reckon'd little or no Gain; for the Engliſh reſolving to die with their Swords in their Hands were moſt of them ſlain, but ſold their Lives very dearly, for they ſlew above 3000 French. The Commander of the Town Sir Gervis Clifton was taken Priſoner, and ſome few of the Soldiers, who were ſent to the Caſtle of Corbeil, but Sir Nicholas Burdet was ſlain. Corbeil, Melune and Eureux were ſoon after taken by the French; it being uſual for the ſmaller Towns to follow the Fate of a Chief Garriſon.

K. Charles returns again to beſiege Pontoiſe.

The Engliſh Priſoners in Corbeil-Caſtle being impatient under their Reſtraint, racked their Invention to find out Ways for their Deliverance; and becauſe they thought Intereſt would be the moſt tempting Argument, they petition'd the Captain that one of them might be ſet at Liberty to go among their rich Friends and ſollicit them to pay a Ranſom for them. The Captain eaſily conſented to the Propoſal, and releaſed one of them inſtantly; but he according to their Agreement went to the Governour of the next Engliſh Garriſon, who was an Arragonian, placed there by the Duke of York, and told him, That the Caſtle of Corbeil was ſlenderly Mann'd, and might with no great Engliſh Priſoner at Corbeil Caſtle eſcape.

A. D. 1440. Reg. 19.

Force be won. The Governour gladly embraced the Diſcovery; and having placed an Ambuſh in the Night, ſent four Men the next Morning with Sacks full of Fruit to the Caſtle to ſell them to the French. Theſe Men ſpeaking French were not ſuſpected of any Deſign, but let in to ſell their Fruits, the Gates being careleſsly left open in the mean time. Theſe Soldiers gave Notice to the Ambuſh by a Sign already agreed on, and they immediately forcing themſelves an Entrance eaſily got the Caſtle into their Power, the Captain and many of the Soldiers not being out of their Beds. The Engliſh Priſoners they ſet free, and the French they carried Priſoners to Roan, taking all the Spoil of the Caſtle to themſelves, and leaving enow to ſecure it till an Engliſh Garriſon could be put in.

A. D. 1441.

A Peace endeavour'd at Calais but not concluded

Notwithſtanding the former Warlike Enterprizes on both ſides, there were ſome Overtures of Peace made, and at length accepted, for all Parties were almoſt weary of the War. Some Propoſitions as to Time and Place had been made the laſt Year, which being agreed upon to be at Calais (for the Engliſh would not conſent to any other Place.) In the Beginning of this Spring Deputies met there on both Sides. For King Henry appeared, the Cardinals of York and Wincheſter, the Duke of Exeter (o), and ſeveral other Noble Perſonages, bringing with them Charles, Duke of Orleans, who had been twenty five Years a Priſoner in England, that he might be a means to ſettle a Peace, and procure his own Deliverance. The French King ſent the Archbiſhop of Rheims and Narbonne, and the Earl of Dunois, a Baſtard of Orleans, and the Duke of Burgundy, the Lord de Crevecœur, and ſome others. Many Days were ſpent in finding out means for an Accommodation, and divers Propoſals made. The Engliſh were to be ſatisfied chiefly, but their Demands were thought ſo unreaſonable as they could in no wiſe be granted. Three Things they chiefly inſiſted upon, viz.

I. That they ſhould hold the two Dutchies of Aquitain and Normandy diſcharg'd of all Superiority and Soveraignty from the Realm of France, and the Governours of the ſame.

II. That they ſhould be reſtored to all the Towns, Cities and Places, which they within thirty Years laſt paſt had conquer'd, or otherwiſe taken in any part of the Realm of France.

III. That in whatever part of France the ſaid Towns lay, they ſhould hold them without any Dependancy upon the King of France.

The Firſt of theſe was eaſily granted by the French Commiſſioners, but the other Two were ſo unreaſonable, that it was impoſſible they ſhould accord to them, becauſe King Charles was reſolv'd to reſtore nothing that he had recover'd from the Engliſh, nor would quit that Soveraign Power over any part of France, that his Predeceſſors had without any Interruption long enjoy'd, ſo that nothing was concluded: Yet this Meeting broke up very civilly with Promiſes, that they would certifie their Maſters on both Sides, and try what might be done at a Second Meeting, which they then appointed in the ſame place. After theſe Matters of publick Concern were ended, the Freedom of the Duke of Orleans was next treated on, and it was agreed, That he ſhould be releaſed from his Captivity for 400000 Crowns; but becauſe the Money was not ready, and the Engliſh would not depend upon Promiſes, he was ſtill kept Priſoner till the Money could be provided. The Reaſons why the Engliſh detain'd him ſo long a Priſoner was partly to oblige the Duke of Burgundy, and partly to weaken the French King's Intereſts, but now the Duke had revolted from England, it was thought a greater Advantage to releaſe him (eſpecially for a good Ranſom which might ſupply the Wants of the State in ſome Meaſure) than to keep him, becauſe the Enmity, which he had to the Duke of Burgundy, might do greater Service to the Engliſh Affairs. This Reaſon mov'd the Engliſh to offer his Redemption. The Duke of Burgundy was not inſenſible of the Conſequences of the Duke of Orleans's Freedom, which certainly would produce bad Effects to him if not timely prevented. He ſaw his Friends active to get his Releaſe, and could not think 'twould be long e're it would be effected. Wherefore that he might lay an Obligation upon him to forget all Grudges, he ſhew'd a great Zeal for him; and having obtain'd a Promiſe of him to marry the Lady Mary, Daughter of Adolph, Duke of Cleve, he himſelf paid down the whole Sum for his Ranſom, and ſo he was deliver'd, and a perfect Amity concluded by the Marriage between 'em, tho' it did not laſt long, as the Hiſtory of the following Times will ſhew.

A. D. 1441. Reg. 19.

Duke of Burgundy pays his Ranſom.

How much Greatneſs expoſes to Malice and Envy, now began to appear in the Caſe of Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, who tho' a wiſe and cautious Prince, yet could not eſcape the Malice of thoſe who ſought his Ruin. They began with his Lady firſt, and having apprehended her with four Perſons, whom they call'd her Accomplices and Confederates, viz. Tho. Southwell, Canon of St. Steven's Church in Wincheſter, John Hume, Chaplain to the Dutcheſs, Roger Only, alias Bullingbrooke a Prieſt, a Man very expert in the Art of Necromancy, and Margery Gourdmain, commonly call'd the Witch of Eye, near Wincheſter, charg'd her with High-Treaſon; For that ſhe the ſaid Eleanor, Lady Cobham, Dutcheſs of Glouceſter to bring her Huſband to the Crown, had procured and contrived with the ſaid Perſons to make an Image of Wax like unto the King; which Image they dealt ſo with by their deviliſh Incantations and Sorceries, that as the Image conſum'd by little and little, the King's Perſon ſhould ſo daily decay, till he was brought to his End. Roger Bullingbrooke being examin'd before the King's Council own'd, That he had by the Procurement of the ſaid Dutcheſs wrought by Necromancy to know what ſhould befal her, and to what Eſtate ſhe ſhould come; and Margery Gourdman confeſſed, That ſhe had preſcrib'd ſome Love-Potions for the ſaid Lady to make the Duke of Glouceſter love her, which alſo the Dutcheſs her ſelf did not deny, but ſhe deny'd the Treaſon which was laid to their Charge, and for which they were all condemned, though only Roger Bullingbrooke was hanged drawn and quarter'd, and Margery burnt: The ſaid Roger at his Death affirming his Innocency to the laſt. The Dutcheſs only did Penance by walking through Fleet-ſtreet Hoodleſs with a Taper in her Hand of two Pound Weight, which ſhe offer'd at the High-Altar in St. Paul's Church, and then was ſent to the Caſtle of Cheſter, where ſhe remain'd a Priſoner under Sir Thomas Stanley all her Life. Mr. Fox endeavours to ſhew, that the Dutcheſs was thus accu-

The Dutcheſs of Glouceſter accuſed of High-Treaſon.

Duke of Orleans releaſed.

(o) John Earl of Huntington, he was not created Duke of Exeter till Three Years after, Anno 1444. Holin. pag. 624.

ſed,

A. D. 1441. Reg. 19. Reg. 20.

fed, becauſe ſhe favoured the Lollards, Acts and Monuments, pag. 646.

In the Beginning of this Twentieth Year of the King, Richard, Duke of York Regent of France and Governour of Normandy, as if he thought to compleat the Conqueſt of France, determin'd to invade the Enemy's Country by ſundry Armies, and in ſundry Places, and thereupon without Delay ſent the Lord Willoughby to ravage and deſtroy the Country of Amiens, John, Lord Talbot to beſiege the Town of Deipe, and the Regent himſelf accompany'd with Edmund, Duke of Somerſet went into the Dutchy of Anjou. The Lord Willoughby according to his Commiſſion ſuddenly entred the Enemy's Country, and took many Priſoners before they could get into any Place of Defence. The French in the adjoyning Garriſons being amaz'd with the Cries of the People ſally'd out in good Order, and courageouſly fought with the Engliſh for their Relief, but being over-power'd by the Engliſh, who ſlew them without Mercy, they gave Ground and retreated into their Towns, leaving their Country to be pillag'd by the Enemy, and the Forces of the Earl of St. Paul, who came in to their Aid juſt upon the Flight of the French. In this Conflict the Engliſh ſlew about 600, and took a great Number of Priſoners, with which they retreated into Normandy. In the mean time the Dukes of York and Somerſet acted their Parts in Anjou and Main with the like or greater Succeſs, for they deſtroy'd the Towns, robb'd and plunder'd the People, and meeting with no Oppoſition return'd loaden with Prey and Priſoners as they pleaſed. The Duke of Somerſet alſo to give further Proof of his Valour entred into the Marches of Brittain and took the Town of La Perche by fierce Aſſault, ſpoiling and burning the adjoyning Country: From thence he march'd to Ponzay, where for two Months together he ſent out Parties to plunder and deſtroy the Countries Traonnois and Chatragonnois. The French King much diſturb'd with theſe Inſolencies of the Engliſh, ſent out the Marſhal Loiach with 4000 Men to put a ſtop to the Invaſions of the Duke's Men, and guard the Country, who ſuddenly entring in the Night thought to have ſet upon the Duke in his Lodgings and take him; but the Duke like a politick Captain had Intelligence of his firſt Appearance, and wiſely foreſeeing the Danger approaching march'd toward the French and met them half way, who not being able with Honour to retreat joyn'd Battle with him. The Fight was maintain'd a while well on both ſides, but at length the Engliſh got the better, and routed the French, ſlaying an Hundred of the Marſhal's Men, and taking Threeſcore and Two Priſoners, of which the chief were the Lord of Dauſignie, and Sir Lewis Buell, the reſt were moſt of them Eſquires and Gentlemen. After this Victory the Duke of Somerſet went forward and took the Town of Beaumont Le Viſcount, and having well mann'd and provided all the Caſtles and Forts, which were in thoſe Parts on the Frontiers of the Enemy, he return'd with his Spoil and Priſoners to the Duke of York.

Duke of York attempts to conquer France.

Duke of Somerſet takes ſeveral Places.

Talbot beſieges Deipe in Normandy.

The Lord Talbot, whoſe invincible Courage made the moſt dangerous and daring Attempts to be allotted him, was all this while diligently employ'd about the Siege of Deipe, to which he had made his Acceſs by ſubduing the adjacent Places of Strength. When he came to the Town to beſiege it, he caſt up Trenches about it, and raiſed a Fort or Baſtile upon the Hill Pawlett, which ſtood ſo conveniently, that he could with his Ordinance annoy both the Town and Haven at once. Having thus prepared Things for an Attack, he found that the Town was ſo ſtrongly defended, that it would take up more Men and Time than was at firſt expected, and thereupon thought it convenient to get a Recruit both of Men, Proviſion and Ammunition from Roan before he proceeded in it, and to that End leaving the Conduct of the Siege to his Baſtard Son, he went to Roan to provide all Things neceſſary for taking of it. The French King, who was as much concern'd to reſcue Deipe, as the Engliſh were deſirous to get it, being advertiſed of Talbot's Departure ſent an Army of 15000 Men under the Command of his Son Lewis the Dauphin, aſſiſted by the Baſtard of Orleans and Biſhop of Avignon to relieve it. The Count of St. Paul, who being ſorely vexed by the Duke of Burgundy's Forces, which took away from him his Towns and Caſtles, was oblig'd to go over to the French Intereſts, attended the Dauphin in this Expedition with divers other of the French Nobility. After they had entred the City and prepared ſix Bridges running on Wheels, and other Things neceſſary to attack the Fort; they began with it, but the Engliſh defended themſelves ſo valiantly, and with ſo great Loſs to the French, that had not the Dauphin himſelf in Perſon gave them an Example of undaunted Valour, the French would have left it, but being led by him, they overcame all Difficulties, and tho' with much Loſs gain'd it. The Baſtard of Talbot was taken Priſoner, with Sir William Paiton, and Sir John Repply, but were ſhortly after redeem'd. Three Hundred Engliſh were kill'd, and above double the Number of French dy'd with them. The reſt of the Engliſh were taken Priſoners, and the French in the Engliſh Service were all hanged. The Dauphin after this Victory rewarded the Conſtancy of the Inhabitants of Deipe with ſeveral large Immunities and Priviledges, which were confirm'd to them by the ſucceeding Kings, and left Monſieur de Marrets Governour of the Town, becauſe he had behav'd himſelf ſo valiantly in it, and ſo departed.

A. D. 1441. Reg. 20.

The Dauphin raiſes the Siege of Deipe.

The Activity of the Engliſh in Normandy, and the bordering Provinces againſt the French was a Spur to the Earl of Huntington, who was Lieutenant to King Henry in the Dutchies of Aquitain and Guyenne (p) to attempt ſomething of equal Importance to the Engliſh, as the Lord Talbot had at Deipe, and to that End ſent his Captains into Guyenne to beſiege the ſtrong Town of Tartas belonging to the Lord D' Albret, the old Enemy of the Engliſh. The Inhabitants and Garriſon ſeeing the Engliſh Army approach the Town were loth to hazzard themſelves in vain; and having taken a full View of the Strength of the Enemy fain'd that they were not able to defend themſelves long, and therefore before they came to make any Aſſaults agreed, that they would ſurrender it up to them, if it were not reliev'd before St. John's Day, and gave them Monſieur D' Albret's Eldeſt Son for an Hoſtage for the true Performance of their Agreement; but becauſe Monſieur D' Albret himſelf was not preſent, and being Lord of the Town, it was reaſonable his Concurrence ſhould be had, it was reſerv'd, that if Monſier D' Albret did not approve of their Agreement, he ſhould ſignifie it to the Earl of Huntington, and the Pledge ſhould be return'd, and the Engliſh do their beſt. This Condition

A. D. 1442.

The Earl of Huntington beſieges Tartas.

(p) Aquitain and Guyenne are the ſame, the former being the Ancient Name of the Province, and the latter the Modern.

left

A D. 1442. Reg. 20.

left the French at Liberty, and gave them Time to raiſe the Siege, which the Lords of Guienne thus improved. They ſent firſt to the French King, to beg of him to gather his Army together to raiſe the Siege of Tartas, which he eaſily granted, and having aſſembled an Army of 60000 Men, they cauſed the Lord De la Bret to ſignifie his diſſent to the Agreement, which the Garriſon and Town had made with the Engliſh, to the Earl of Huntington, and take the Lord's Son back from them. The Engliſh ſuſpected not the Deſign, but intended to go on in their Siege, but the French King lying ready with his Army to prevent the Effect, before they could bring Things into order for an Aſſault, the French Army appeared, and the Engliſh unable to encounter them, raiſed the Siege and departed. The French Forces being almoſt irreſiſtible at the preſent, made uſe of the Advantage, and proceeded to beſiege and take ſeveral Engliſh Garriſons, as St. Selerine, which they gained by Force, and ſlew 300 Engliſh, taking Sir Thomas Rampſtone Governour of it Priſoner; the City of Arques, which after the Bulwark was taken by Force, yielded the Town by Compoſition, and the Captain of it, the Lord Monferrat, departed with his Garriſon to Burdeaux, where he found the Earl of Longville, Captain De Beuſe, and Sir Thomas Rampſtone, who was lately releaſed; Riolle, a City ſeated upon the River Gyronne, Seven Leagues diſtant from Burdeaux and Mermandie, which both yielded to them without Oppoſition: But the Engliſh in the mean time, tho' they dare not oppoſe them, yet ſo beſtirred themſelves, and ſtopped all ways of their Foraging, and other Supplies of Proviſion, that they were forced to withdraw and march up into France for better Quarters. The Engliſh ſoon after their Departure, recovered St. Selerine, Arques, and ſeveral other Towns from the French, taking their Lieutenant Reginald Guilliam, a Burgundian, Priſoner, with many other Gentlemen, and ſlaying all the Common Soldiers; but Count de Fois regain'd St. Selerine from them. While theſe Things paſſed in Guienne, the Lord Talbot, whom Fortune's Frowns could never daunt, took the Town of Conchet, and hearing that Galliardon was beſieged by the Baſtard of Orleance, haſted with all ſpeed to the Relief of that Place, which the very Report of his Approach effected; for the Baſtard immediately withdrew upon the News of his coming, and Talbot poſſeſſed himſelf of it, but finding that it would be almoſt impoſſible to keep it, partly thro' the Inconſtancy of the Inhabitants, and partly becauſe it ſtood ſo much expoſed to the Incurſions of the French, he demoliſhed it to the Ground, and ſo left it.

French raiſe the Siege

The French take ſeveral Engliſh Garriſons,

The Lord Talbot takes Conchet, &c.

Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, dying in France, his Honours and Eſtate, by the Cuſtom of the Realm was to have deſcended to his only Son and Heir Henry; but he being abſent in France with his Father, his Eſtate was ſeiz'd on by the King, and kept Two Years from him, the Revenues of it being employ'd for the King's Uſe. What were the Cauſes of it, we find not; but whatever they were, the Conſideration of his Father's Merit, and the natural Juſtice of the King, were ſuch Motives for his Reſtoration to his Right, that, as if the King had deſign'd to repay all that he had taken from him at once, he not only gave him all his Eſtate again, but received him into his ſpecial Favour, nominating him the firſt Earl of England, and making him King of the Iſle of Wight, crown'd him with his own Hands.

The Earl of Warwick's Eſtate ſeized and reſtored.

A D. 1442. Reg. 20.

Duke of Glouceſter accuſes the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

The Duke of Glouceſter, provoked by the intolerable Height and Pride of Cardinal Beaufford, Biſhop of Wincheſter, who out of Hatred to him, had lately inſtigated, as was generally thought, certain Perſons to accuſe and proſecute his Dutcheſs for Treaſon, Witchcraft, and many other notorious Crimes, to his great Diſgrace and Shame, made a ſtrict Reflection upon the Cardinal's Carriage for many Years paſt, and finding him to have done many Things derogatory and prejudicial to the King's Prerogative Royal, he digeſted them into 24 Articles, and preſented them to the King, deſiring that Judgment might be given upon him according to his Crimes. The chief Things alledged againſt him in the ſaid Articles were;

I. That the Biſhop of Wincheſter had not only taken upon himſelf the Dignity and Title of a Cardinal, contrary to the expreſs Command of King Henry the Fifth, and in Derogation to the Church of Canterbury: But,

II. Having forfeited his Biſhoprick thereby by the Act of Proviſions, he had procured a Bull from the Pope to ſecure his Biſhoprick ſtill to him, contrary to the Laws of the Realm, which made it a Premunire ſo to do.

III. That the ſaid Cardinal, with John Kemp, Archbiſhop of York, had aſſumed the Government of the King's Perſon and the Realm, which no Subject could do without a Treaſonable Uſurpation.

IV. That the ſaid Biſhop had defrauded the King of his Jewels.

V. That being Chancellor of England, he had againſt Law ſet at Liberty the King of Scots, and forgiven him part of his Ranſome upon Condition the ſaid King ſhould marry his Niece.

VI. That the ſaid Biſhop had defrauded the King by Taking the Cuſtoms of Wools, and other Merchandizes at the Port of Hampton.

VII. That notwithſtanding the ſaid Cardinal neither hath nor can have any Title to the Crown, yet he preſumeth to take upon him Royal Dignity, in ſummoning and calling Perſons before him in Derogation of the King's Authority, being without his Permiſſion or Command.

VIII. That the ſaid Cardinal had obtained a pardon from Rome, to exempt his Dioceſs from paying of Tenths to the State, and ſo had given both an ill Example to the other Biſhops to do the like, and laid the whole Burden upon the Laity, to the great Diſcontent of the Kingdom.

IX. That the ſaid Cardinal had been a Means of Uniting the French and the Duke of Burgundy, and this latter with the Duke of Orleance, to the great Damage of the Realm, and Benefit of our Adverſaries the French.

X. That the ſaid Cardinal, after Communication had with our Enemies, ſent the Archbiſhop of York to the King, to perſwade him to leave his Right and Title to the Crown and Kingdom of France for certain Years, and be content to write himſelf, Rex Angliæ, &c. to the great Diſgrace of the King and his Progenitors.

XI. That the Releaſe of the Duke of Orleance was brought to paſs only by the Mediation and Procurement of the ſaid Cardinal and Duke of York, contrary to the Will of King Henry the Fifth.

XII. That being their Chancellor, he had inſtead of Promoting the Good of the King, bought his Lands and Mannors of him.

XIII. That

A. D. 1442. Reg. 20.

XIII. That the ſaid Cardinal by ſending ſuch Captains and Soldiers into France as he thought fit, hath been the Cauſe that ſo much of Normandy and other Parts are loſt.

XIV. That the Cardinal hath ſold Places of Captains and other Officers for Money in France, whereby unfit Perſons have been put into the Army, to the Loſs of the King's Dominions there.

Theſe Articles with ſome others of leſs Importance, the Duke tender'd to the King himſelf, deſiring in the Two laſt, that the King would put the ſaid Cardinal out of his Council to anſwer the ſaid Articles alledged againſt him, and that Perſons aggrieved may freely utter their Complaints. The King hearing theſe Accuſations againſt the Cardinal of Wincheſter, ordered, that they ſhould be looked into, and examined by the Lords of his Council, of whom the greateſt Part being Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, they not only were favourable to him, but fearing they ſhould diſoblige him, delayed the Examination and Judgment ſo long, that the Duke of Glouceſter, who was always rather paſſionate than revengeful, letting fall the Proſecution, as weary of it, the Biſhop eſcaped, and the Matter was huſhed up, as tho' the Crimes alledged had been inconſiderable, and not worth regarding; ſo that indeed the good Duke got nothing by this Attempt, but made the Cardinal a worſe Enemy than ever, which tho' he diſſembled, yet he ſo cunningly managed, that in the end he wrought his Deſtruction, as will after more plainly appear.

Biſhop of Wincheſter cleared.

A Fray in Fleet-ſtreet.

Alſo in Auguſt, this Year, happened a notable Quarrel in Fleetſtreet, between the Students of the Inns of Court, and the Inhabitants of the ſaid Street, occaſioned by one of Clifford's Inn, named Harbottle. It began in the Night, and laſted till the next Day with great Fury and Fierceneſs on both Sides, ſeveral Perſons were hurt and ſlain, but the Mayor and Sheriffs having received the News of it, went with a good Force, and appeaſed the Fray, which by Party-making, was likely to have drawn in the greateſt Part of the City which flock'd thither to aſſiſt or relieve their Friends on either Side.

Reg. 21.

Edward, Eldeſt Son of the Duke of York born.

In the Beginning of this Twenty firſt Year of the King, Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, had a Son born at Roan, in Normandy, chriſtned by the Name of Edward. He proved a very valiant and fortunate Prince, and in the Quarrel for the Crown, (which his Father began with King Henry, but loſt his Life before he could gain his Wiſhes, being ſlain at the Battle of Wakefield) was ſo ſucceſsful, that he was proclaimed King a few Days after, having won the Battle of Ferribridge, and gotten a perfect Victory over the Lancaſtrians.

Recruits ſent into France.

By the coming over of the Lord Talbot in the latter end of the Summer, when the Seaſon for Action was almoſt paſt, the Council of King Henry had Information of the State of the Engliſh Affairs in France, and particularly in Guien, where they had ſuſtained conſiderable Loſſes the laſt Summer. The Council upon this relation, believing the Succeſs would encourage the French in further Attempts, thought it neceſſary to ſend over ſome Recruits to ſtrengthen the Garriſons there, and defend their Borders, and forthwith diſpatched away 800 Men well armed under the Command of Sir William Woodvile. With theſe it was thought convenient to ſend a good quantity of Proviſions, becauſe that Country was ſurrounded by the Enemy on every Side, that it could get no Supply from the adjacent Parts; whereupon a Proclamation was put out, that whoſoever would ſend over any Proviſions and Victuals into Guienne, ſhould pay no manner of Cuſtom nor Toll, which encouraged ſo many to export Cheeſe, Corn and other Proviſions thither, that the whole Province was abundantly ſupplied with all Neceſſaries. In the mean time Care was taken to gather a bigger Body of freſh Men to ſend over with the Lord Talbot. And becauſe this valiant Captain had been for ſome time the main Support of the Engliſh Affairs in France, the King and Council judged it fit to give him the encouraging Marks of his Favour; and thereupon he was created Earl of Shrewsbury, a Title which none had born for near Three hundred and Forty Years before, the Family of Roger Montgomery, whom the Conqueror had dignified with that Title, being extinct in the Second Generation; but it hath proved a laſting Title to that noble Family, which ſtill inherits the Honour, Title, and Worth of that valiant and brave Lord to this Day. With this Badge of Royal Favour, he departed ſoon after into Normandy, and carried over with him 3000 Men for the better Defence of it.

A. D. 1442. Reg. 21.

Lord Talbot made Earl of Shrewſbury.

A Fray at the Election of the Mayor of London.

Upon the Day of the Tranſlation of St. Edward, viz. October the Twelfth, on which Day the Mayor of London for the next Year was nominated and choſen, out of Two Perſons, who have been Sheriffs of that City, preſented by the Commonalty to the preſent Mayor and Aldermen his Brethren, was a great Diſturbance made amongſt the Citizens about the Election, upon this Occaſion. The Commons of the City having fixed upon Robert Clopton, Draper, and Ralph Holland, Taylor, preſented them according to the Cuſtom before the Mayor for the time being, and the Aldermen, who having choſen Robert Clopton, declared him Mayor for the enſuing Year. This Election extreamly diſappointed the Society of Taylors, and their Friends, who were very zealous that Ralph Holland ſhould be choſen, and therefore grew very mutinous and diſcontented upon the Declaration of the other, and cried out, Not that Man, but Ralph Holland. The Mayor commanded them Silence, but they more enraged, demanded more paſſionately, that Ralph Holland ſhould be choſen. The Mayor ſeeing that fair Means would not prevail, and conſidering, that if ſuch tumultuous Proceedings were yielded to, the Order of Elections would be quite broken, commanded the Sheriffs, to apprehend ſome of the moſt clamorous and furious, that they might be puniſhed for their diſorderly Behaviour, which the Sheriffs immediately put in Execution, and carried Twelve or Sixteen of them to Newgate, where they were kept a while, and then diſmiſſed upon Payment of a moderate Fine, that it might be a Terrour to the Rabble to behave themſelves more civilly at ſuch Elections.

A. D. 1443.

French King and Count of Arminack quarrel for the Dutchy of Cominges, &c.

While the Lord Talbot remained in England, Jane, Counteſs of Cominges, Daughter to the Count of Bullen and Cominges, died, and left her Country to be diſputed for by Charles, King of France, to whom the ſaid Counteſs had given it, by Will, and the Earl of Arminack, who pretended to be the Heir of it, and accordingly entred upon the ſaid Territories, and took Poſſeſſion of them as his own. The King of France highly reſented this Uſurpation of his undoubted Right, as he termed it, and ſent the Dauphin to recover the Contries by him unjuſtly poſſeſſed. The Earl withſtood the French Forces a while, but being deſerted by his Confederates, the Counts Perdriacke and March, and Salatzar, a Cap-a Captain of Arragon, who were his great Supports againſt his Potent Enemy, he was forced to ſhut himſelf up in his Caſtle, and endeavour to couſin the Dauphin by diſſimulation and feigned Treaties. But the Dauphin, who was excellent in thoſe Arts, ſoon ſpy'd his Deſign; and having gain'd Acceſs to him upon that Account took him Priſoner, and ſent him, his Wife, Second Son and Two Daughters to Carcaſſone, yet he was ſoon after releaſed at the Interceſſion of Count de Fois, but Charles kept the Poſſeſſion of his Country.

A. D. 1443. Reg. 21.

Count Arminack ſeeks the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh.

Count Arminack being thus releaſed, uſed all means to regain his Right, and ſent ſolemn Ambaſſadours to the King of England, offering him his Daughter in Marriage (q), and with all promiſing him not only great Sums of Money with her, but to deliver into the King of England's Hands all the Caſtles and Towns which he and his Anceſtors, detain'd from him in the Dutchy of Aquitain or Gaſcoigne, either by the Conqueſt of his Anceſtors, or by the Gift of any French, and further would aid and aſſiſt him with Men and Money to recover all other Cities within the ſaid Dutchies as were kept from him by Charles the French King, Monſieur de Albret, or any other Perſons. This Offer appear'd ſo Honourable, as well as Profitable to King Henry and his Council, that they gave the Ambaſſadors a very kind Entertainment, and ſent them away with great Rewards into their own Country.

Count Arminack's Daughter affianc'd to King Henry.

Soon after their Departure certain Perſons were ſelected to go over to the Earl of Arminack to conclude this Match, viz. Sir Edward Hull, Sir Robert Rous, and John Galton, Dean of St. Severines, who accordingly were diſpatch'd away with a ſpecial Commiſſion to perform the ſame; and not only agreed all Things between them, but by Proxy affianced the young Lady. All this was tranſacted with all the Secrecy poſſible, but yet got to King Charles's Ear, who immediately cauſed him to be ſummon'd to appear at his Parliament at Tholouſe within fifteen Days to anſwer to what ſhall be alledg'd againſt him; but he not appearing, the Dauphin was again ſent againſt him to ravage his Countries; and though the King of England was oblig'd in Honour to aſſiſt him, yet through the Management of the Earl of Suffolk he was deſerted and left to himſelf, contrary to the Will of the Duke of Glouceſter, which raiſed ſuch an Hatred between thoſe two Noble Perſons, that it could not be extinguiſh'd but by the Deſtruction of both the Families, and many others who adhered to them.

Accidents in England.

On Candlemas Day the Steeple of St. Paul's Church was ſet on Fire with Lightning in the midſt of the Wood of the Shaft, but was quench'd by the great Pains and Diligence of the Citizens; and at the ſame time the Steeple of Waltham-Croſs in Eſſex was in the ſame Tempeſt conſum'd, but the Church was ſaved.

John Beaufort, Earl of Somerſet, was made Duke of Somerſet. (r)

An Order in London for the keeping of the Lord's Day.

The Common-Council of London obſerving the general Prophanation of the Lord's Day amongſt Victuallers and leſſer Artificers, as Taylors, Shooe-makers, and the like, made a ſevere Order to be obſerv'd within the Franchiſes and Liberties of the ſaid City, that no Perſon ſhould buy or ſell any Victuals, or any other Goods upon the Lord's Day, and that no Artificer or Handicraft ſhould carry out his Wares, Commodities or Work to any Perſon or Perſons to be worn or occupy'd on that Day: An excellent Law, and worthy to commend the Makers of it to all Ages; but it never was obſerv'd either thro' the Negligence of Under-Officers, or generality of Offenders. Our Author ſays, that it was too good a Law for ſuch corrupt Times.

A. D. 1443. Reg. 21.

A Diſturbance at Norwich.

The Citizens of Norwich incenſed with the Encroachments of the Monks of Chriſt-Church in that City roſe againſt the Prior, and would have fired the Priory. The Duke of Norfolk with all the Force he could gather together went down to ſuppreſs them; the Citizens kept their Gates and Walls againſt them a while; but at length they gain'd Entrance. The King ſent down Judge Forteſcue with the Earls of Stafford and Huntington to decide the Quarrel, who indicted many of the Citizens, and the Prior himſelf for his Sedition and Riot, and ſeiz'd the Liberties of the City into the King's Hands, who made Sir John Clifton Captain of it for the preſent, which ſo diſſatisfied many of the Citizens, who had not been concern'd in the Quarrel, that they left their Habitations and went ſome of them beyond Sea, and others got them Dwellings in other Cities or Towns.

Reg. 22.

A Peace again endeavoured between England and France

The Miſeries of France, and lamentable Diſtractions all over Chriſtendom cauſed by the War there, mov'd the Hearts of the Pope, and moſt of the Chriſtian Princes to endeavour the Concluſion of a Peace between England and France once more, hoping, that they might now more effectually prevail, becauſe both Parties could not but be tired with the length of War and the vaſt Expences of it; which tho' they might be well laid out, if either the Engliſh, were likely to make a Conqueſt of France, or the French expel the Engliſh; yet being ſo equal a Match, that neither of them was near effecting what they deſir'd, a Peace, they believ'd, would be welcome to both Sides; and therefore ſending Ambaſſadours to both Kings they ſo far prevail'd, that a Meeting was appointed by them to be at Tours in Touraine to adjuſt and conclude all Matters of Quarrel between them. To this Aſſembly the King of England ſent William de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, Dr. Adam Mollins, Lord Keeper, Sir Robert Ros, and ſeveral others: For the French King appear'd, Charles, Duke of Orleans, Lewis of Bourborn, Earl of Vandoſme, Great Maſter of the French King's Houſehold, Pierce de Breſſe, Steward of Poictou, and Bertram de Beauvan, Lord of Peſignie. The Emperour, Kings of Spain, Denmark, and Hungary alſo ſent their Ambaſſadors, perſons of the greateſt Quality and Authority to be Mediatours for a Peace between theſe Two Princes. This Aſſembly was one of the moſt Magnificent and Glorious that had been known in theſe Times, every Prince ſetting forth his Ambaſſadours with ſuch an Equipage, as might be for the Honour of their Countries.

Many Meetings were had for a final Concluſion of the Peace, and all the qualifying Propoſals made that might tend to an Agreement between them, but the Old Difficulties being again ſtarted, and maintain'd with the uſual Heat and Reſolution, the Engliſh being for keeping

(q) The Treaty of Marriage was concluded before the Dauphin took the Count D'Armagnac, his Son and Daughter Priſoners. Holl. p. 624.

(r) John Beaufort was created Duke of Somerſet by Henry the Fifth, above twenty Years ago. Cambd. Britain. Tit. Com. Holinſhed ſays.

A. D. 1443. Reg. 22.

ing all they had, and the French for getting what they call'd their King's Right, there was nothing effected, but a Truce for Eighteen Months was clapp'd up for the preſent both by Sea and Land, with Hopes, that in that Time all Matters might be adjuſted, and by the Mediation of the Princes a firm Peace made up.

A Truce made for Eighteen Months.

During this Treaty the Earl of Suffolk, perhaps knowing the King's Natural Mildneſs and Diſpoſition to Peace, ventur'd one ſtep further than his Commiſſion gave him leave, to propound a Marriage between his Maſter King Henry and the French King's Kinſwoman, Margaret, Daughter of Rayner, Duke of Anjou, and Titular King of Sicily, Naples and Jeruſalem, which gave him a great Name, but brought him no Profit or Authority. This Match Suffolk believ'd would prove an effectual Means of uniting the Minds of the two Princes; and tho' there were likely to be no Portion given the King with her, yet ſince ſhe would be the Foundation of a firm Peace, it would ſave England more Treaſure, than the greateſt Prince of the World could give with his Daughter. This Preſumption made Suffolk very eager to promote the Match, and ſollicited the King of France for that End, that it might be yielded to, and agreed on. His Paſſion cauſed a little Averſeneſs in the French King and the Lady's Father, who alledg'd, That tho' they were not unwilling to comply with the Match, yet it was not conſiſtent with their Honour to do it, ſo long as the King of England held a part of the Dutchy of Anjou, and the whole County of Main, which of Right belong'd to Duke Rayner the Lady's Father. But the Earl of Suffolk more Zealous than Cautious eaſily ſatisfied this Objecton, and told them, That he would undertake, that thoſe Countries ſhould be reſtored to Duke Rayner, if the Marriage was conſented to; which Promiſe being according to their Minds, the Lady was aſſured in Matrimony to the King, and Suffolk diſmiſſed to carry it on with his Maſter.

Earl of Suffolk makes a Match for K. Henry with the Duke of Anjou's Daughter

A. D. 1444.

Theſe Things being thus tranſacted and agreed on, the Earl of Suffolk with the reſt of the Engliſh Commiſſioners return'd Home to give an Account of their Negotiation; and tho' there was only a Truce concluded, yet Suffolk aſſured the King, That it would certainly produce an Immutable Peace thro' the Means and Methods he had taken, if they were comply'd with; for he had propounded and obtain'd a Match with the French King's Kinſwoman, the Daughter of Rayner, Duke of Anjou, one of the moſt accompliſhed Ladies in all Perfections of a Woman in the World, Beautiful without Blemiſh, and Virtuous to Admiration, fitted every way for the greateſt of Princeſſes; but that which would be of greateſt Advantage to England was, that this Match would be a certain means to end the Wars, ſettle a Peace every ways advantageous to the King, and ſo make the whole Kingdom happy.

King Henry partly out of Affection to Suffolk, who was his great Favourite, and partly out of a Deſire of Peace, greatly approv'd of all he had done, and was deſirous the Match might be effected with all ſpeed. The Council, to whom all this was related, conſented to it to pleaſe the King and Suffolk, only the Duke of Glouceſter, who was too great to flatter Suffolk's Actions, and too honeſt to call that Good, which he ſaw would certainly be of an ill Conſequence to the Nation, oppoſed the Match with ſome warmth and heat, alledging, That it would be contrary to the Law of God and the Honour of the King, to break the Contract of Marriage ſo ſolemnly made with the Daughter of the Earl of Arminack, upon Conditions very advantageous to the King and his Realm; That the Match with the Daughter of the Duke of Anjou was both diſhonourable to the King, and diſadvantageous to the Nation; becauſe by reſtoring the County of Main, and part of Anjou, the King would ſeem to purchaſe a Wife at the Expence of the Blood of his Subjects, and would much weaken his Affairs in France, which ought to be maintain'd in their full Force; that a Peace may be concluded upon better Terms, becauſe Anjou and Main are the Bulwarks of Normandy, and in ſurrendring them, that Country which was the Patrimony of the King would be expoſed to the Violence of the Enemy. Theſe were undeniable Reaſons, and the only true way to keep up the King's Credit and Intereſt: However, Suffolk ruled all, having the King's Affections, and ſo it was determin'd that the Marriage ſhould be conſummated, and the Train he had laid follow'd. Glouceſter's Advice, though the beſt, was ſlighted, and Suffolk and the New Queen made his Enemies, which as it prov'd fatal to him, ſo to the King himſelf and the Nation.

Duke of Glouceſter oppoſes Suffolk's Match.

A. D. 1444. Reg. 22.

Suffolk's Match for the King conſummated.

Theſe Reſolutions about the Marriage being unalterable, all Things were haſten'd to bring it to a Conſummation. The French King having Notice of it, ſent the Earl of Vandoſme, great Maſter of his Horſe, the Archbiſhop of Rheimes, firſt Peer of France, and divers other Noble Perſonages into England to have the Inſtruments of Marriage ſeal'd and ratified on both Parts. Theſe Ambaſſadours were kindly received by the Earl of Suffolk and his Party; and having their Buſineſs diſpatch'd were ſent away with Rewards.

Upon the Concluſion of this Marriage King Henry made a Creation of Noble-men at Windſor, viz. John Holland, Earl of Huntington, he made Duke of Exeter; Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham; Henry, Earl of Warwick, Duke of Warwick; and the Earl of Suffolk, who was the only Promoter of it, Marqueſs of Suffolk, and conferred on him this further Honour to be his Deputy in celebrating the Formality of the Marriage, and conducting his Bride over into England.

Reg. 23.

Theſe Things being thus order'd and appointed, the reſt of the Summer was ſpent in providing an Equipage ſufficient to fetch over the Royal Bride; for her Father, who was Rich in Titles, was ſo poor in Purſe, that he was not able to ſend her over to her Husband, which was much laugh'd at by the Duke of Glouceſter's Friends, who were all againſt the Marriage. Many coſtly Chariots and gorgeous Horſe-litters were provided, and the Marqueſs and his Wife with many Perſons of the greateſt Quality, as well Women as Men, were richly adorned with Apparel and Jewels, with whom the Marqueſs of Suffolk took his Voyage into France in the Month of November to bring the Queen into England. This gallant Company being landed in France, went to Tours in Touraine, where they were met and honourably received by the Kings of France and Sicily, the Father of the Royal Spouſe, and after a convenient Time allow'd for Preparation and Ceremony, the Marqueſs of Suffolk, as Procurator to King Henry, was marry'd to the Lady Margaret in the Church of St Martins in that City. There were preſent at the Marriage the Father and Mother of the Bride, the French King who was Uncle to King Henry, and the French Queen who was Aunt to the Lady Margaret, the Dukes of Orleans and Calabria, Alanzon and Bretagne, ſeven Earls, twelve Barons, twenty Biſhops, and a great Number of Knights and Gentlemen. After the Celebration of the Marriage, much Time was ſpent in Feaſt-

The Queen ſent for.

A. D. 1445.

The Marriage celebrated at Tours and in England, and the Queen crown'd.

A. D. 1445. Reg 23. ings, and Triumphs, Banquets and Juſts, by her Parents, and the King of France; and when theſe Things were over, the Bride was delivered to the Marqueſs and the Engliſh Nobles, who in great State and Honour conveyed her by eaſie Journeys thro' Normandy unto Deipe, and ſo tranſported her into England, where ſhe landed at Portſmouth in the Beginning of April, and from thence was carried by Water to Southampton, where having reſted a few Days, ſhe was conveyed to the Abbey of Tychfield, (ſ) and was there married to King Henry the Sixth, with all Nuptial Ceremonies, April the Twenty ſecond. From Southampton the King and Queen journeyed toward London in the Beginning of May, and arrived there on the Eighteenth of the ſaid Month, being received upon her Way by the Duke of Glouceſter and many of the Nobility, with all due Honour and Reſpect, and at Blackheath by the Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of London, in embroider'd Gowns, ſhewing their Arts and Trades, who convey'd her thro' the City, which was adorned with coſtly Shews and Pageants, to Weſtminſter, where ſhe was on the Thirtieth Day of the ſame Month crowned Queen of England with all the uſual Solemnity and Ceremonies.

The Benefit or Hurt of this Marriage.

After the Noiſe and Clutter of the Marriage was over, and the Queen a little ſettled in her Throne, Men began then to reflect upon the Match. The Lady was undeniably a Woman of great Excellencies; ſhe was very beautiful in Face, and graceful in Perſonage, of a ready and Politick Wit, and of a Courage equal to the braveſt Men, which extorted an Approbation of the Marqueſs of Suffolk's Choice of a Queen, as to her Perſon, even from his Enemies; but when they conſidered the ill Conſequences of the Marriage, viz. Relations that were likely to be rather a Burden than an Honour to the Nation, Normandy laid open and expoſed to the King's Enemies, by ſurrendring Main and Anjou, the Protection of it; and the Count of Arminack mightily offended, and that juſtly too, reſolving to revenge the Diſhonour; moſt men of Reaſon condemned the Choice, and thought Suffolk bribed into ſuch an unprofitable Match: But becauſe the ill Effects were not preſently felt, and Men's Minds were mightily intent upon the Peace, which they hoped for by her, and which they thought a ſufficient Advantage by the Marriage, if it were once ſettled; all Things at a Diſtance were not minded, but Suffolk applauded, and the Nation thought generally very happy in the Marriage.

Henry Archbiſhop of Canterbury dies, and his Character.

Henry Chicheley, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, died, and was ſucceeded by John Stafford, tranſlated from Bath and Wells (t). He was a worthy Man in his Generation, but too much addicted to the Pope. He founded Two Colleges in Oxford, and endowed them well, viz. All Souls and Barnard. He was of mean Parentage, being a Taylor's Son of Higham-Ferrers in Northamptonſhire, but was not ſo much exalted by his unexpected Grandure, but that he retained a very humble Mind and Diſpoſition in his greateſt Heigth and Proſperity, as may appear by this Paſſage of his Life. King Henry being inſtigated by ſome of his Courtiers, no Friends to the Clergy, and leſs to the Archbiſhop, ſent the Archbiſhop a Pie made of Taylors Shreds, of ſeveral Sorts and Colours, to reproach his mean Birth, which the Archbiſhop received very thankfully, and having look'd into it, courteouſly entertained the Meſſenger, as if he had received a very acceptable Gift, and when he diſmiſſed him, bad him tell the King, his Maſter, 'That if he did exceed his Father, Henry the Fifth, as much as he had done his poor Father, he would make the moſt accompliſh'd Monarch that ever was in Chriſtendom.

A. D. 1445. Reg 23.

Duke of York and other Captains in England.

During the Truce with the French King, Richard Duke of York, and divers of the great Officers and Captains came into England, and ſpent the greateſt Part of the Summer in viſiting their Wives, Children and Friends, but the Time drawing near for their Return to their Charge in France, many Conſultations were had with the King's Council, what Courſe ſhould be taken to ſecure the Conqueſts in that Kingdom at the end of the Truce, and what Proviſions ſhould be made to keep Normandy; ſince by the Marriage, Anjou and Main were now put out of the King's Hands. It was taken for granted, that the King of France would ſo recruit his Armies, that if a Peace were not concluded, he would renew the War with greater Vigour than ever, and if the Engliſh were not in as good a Poſture of Defence, the French King would either make no Peace at all, or a very diſadvantageous one for the Engliſh, wherefore it was agreed on all Hands, after ſeveral Debates, that Normandy muſt be well fortified, and the Engliſh Army in France be put into ſo good a Condition, as to bring King Charles to a beneficial Peace; or if he ſtood out, to make a powerful War upon him.

Reg 24. Tenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

And to this End a Parliament was ſummoned, Subſidies granted, and a great Army of Men ordered to be raiſed, and be in a readineſs to be tranſported into France againſt the Time of the Expiration of the Peace, which was to be in April following. The Duke of York, whoſe Commiſſion for the Regency of France for Five Years was now expired, was again appointed the King's Deputy in that Kingdom for Five Years longer, becauſe he had ſo well managed his late Truſt for the Advantage of the Nation, that no fitter Perſon could be found in ſo difficult a Time, and therefore his Commiſſion was granted for Five Years more, with Thanks for his Loyalty, and his former Allowances. But the Duke of Somerſet ſtill envying, as he had formerly done, the Duke of York's Advancement, ſought all Means to keep him from the Place, and get it for himſelf, which he eaſily effected, making the Marqueſs of Suffolk his Friend, who perſwaded the King to revoke his Grant to the Duke of York for the Regency of France, and give it the Duke of Somerſet. This diſgraceful Revocation, which look'd, as tho' ſome Crime had been alledg'd againſt him, much diſpleaſed the Duke of York, and lodged ſo deep a Reſentment in his Mind againſt the Duke of Somerſet, that tho' he carried it fair, he watched an Opportunity to revenge it, which he did to the Ruin of both Families, as after times will ſhew. In this Parliament the Marqueſs of Suffolk on the Second Day of January, made a long and elegant Speech in the Houſe of Lords, declaring the Pains and Labour he had been at in his Embaſſage into France, as well in concluding a Truce for a Seaſon, as in making up the Match for the King, advertiſing them, that the Truce was to expire in April; and like a faithful Subject he did adviſe, that all Preparations ſhould be made for the Preſervation of the King's Countries in France, and praying them to take notice of it, and give him a Diſcharge for his Legation. The next Day he went into

A. D. 1446. Duke of Somerſet made Regent of France.

(ſ) She was married at Southwick, the Seat of Richard Norton, Eſq; one of the Knights of the Shire for Hampſhire, in the laſt Parliament.

(t) He was created a Cardinal by Pope Eugenius the Fourth in the Year 1434. Hol. 1167.

the

A. D. 1446. Reg. 24.

Marquess of Suffolk rewarded for his Services, and thanked by the Parliament, when he should rather have been punished.

the Lower House, and with equal Eloquence not only shewed his Fidelity in his Legation, but set forth what great Charges he had been at in attending it, and fetching over the Queen, desiring, that this Action might be recorded in the Parliament Rolls, and himself be discharged by both Houses, with the Consideration of his Expence. Behold, what the Eloquence of Favourites can do! Few Men of Prudence in either House, but knew, that the Marquess deserved little Thanks for his Labour, either in making the Peace, or the Match; yet as if all had been well done for the Nation's Interest, the very next Day, the Speaker of the Commons, William Burghley, attended with a great Number of that House went up to the Lords, and desired their Concurrence in a Petition to the King to reward the Marquess for his Services; and to shew their Gratitude, they caused the whole Action to be enrolled, and gave him an whole Fifteenth in Consideration of his Expences. And so the Parliament broke up.

The Queen's Kindness to the Marquess of Suffolk and his Friends.

The Queen seeing the Marquess of Suffolk so well rewarded by the Representatives of the Nation for his Services, which were greater Kindness to her than the Kingdom, as she very well knew, looked upon their Action as a Precedent for her self, and therefore soon after the Rising of the Parliament, took him into her particular Favour, and instigated the King, who was forward enough of himself to heap Honours and Preferments upon him, whereupon he made him a Duke, and when it happen'd a little after, that Henry, Duke of Warwick, Premier Earl of England, and King of the Isles of Wight, Garnsey and Jarsey, died, and was buried at Tewksbury, he conferred upon him the Wardship of the Body and Lands of the Countess of Warwick, together with that of the Lady Margaret, sole Heir to John, Duke of Somerset, afterwards Mother to King Henry the Seventh; and because John de Foix, the Son of Gaston de Foix, a Gascoigne, had married the Duke of Suffolk's Niece, she caused the Father to be elected a Knight of the Garter, and the Son to be made Earl of Longaville, and gave him for the Maintenance of his Degree divers Lands and Castles, amounting to One thousand Pounds by the Year. With these her special Friends she contrived to be reveng'd of the Duke of Gloucester, who was look'd upon by this haughty Queen as her Enemy, because in respect to the Nation, he had declared himself against the Match; and as the first Step to it, she caus'd him to be remov'd, not only from any Command about the King's Person, but Council, and took it upon her self, with her Minions and Friends, to rule all, to the great Discontent of the People, who having had long Experience of the Good-will of the Duke of Gloucester to the Nation, (for which Reason he had the Name constantly given him of the Good Duke) could hardly think the Government safe in other Hands, and therefore cried out against the Queen and Duke of Suffolk for displacing him as Enemies to the publick Good; for all Men saw that the King's easie Disposition was sway'd by the Queen's Policy, and Suffolk's Flattery, and that therefore the Blame lay upon them, and not the King, who tho' out of his Minority, yet was govern'd chiefly by his Uncle's Council, and while Suffolk was his Favourite, Gloucester was his Oracle, to whose Advice he yielded in all Matters of publick Concern. This was such a Bar to the Queen's Ambition, who seeing so much of the Woman in her Husband, laboured to put on as much of the Man her self, and while he spent his Time at his Devotion, to play the King and govern all, that there was no enduring Gloucester near the Court, and so he was turn'd out of all upon some slight and frivolous Allegations against him.

Duke of Gloucester displaced.

A. D. 1446. Reg. 24.

While these Things pass'd in England, little was done in France, because of the Truce continuing, which being expir'd in April, was by the Consent of the Two Kings prolonged to the Year 1449, but it had likely to have soon been broken upon this Occasion. Anjou and Maine, the Two Counties which were to be delivered up to the Duke of Anjou the Queen's Father by the Treaty of Marriage, were readily resigned; but the English knowing of how great Importance the City of Mans was to them, were very loth to part with it, and thereupon kept it in their Hands longer than was thought convenient, insomuch that Charles, the French King, supposing that the English did intend not to resign that Town, raised an Army, and resolved to take it by Force. King Henry, who was more conscientious in performing than Politick in making an Agreement, hearing of the King of France's Attempt, immediately ordered, That the Town should be surrendred to him, not only because he would not give the French King a just Ground of Quarrel to break the Truce, but also because it was in Justice due to him, and so the Peace was pieced up again.

Anjou and Maine resigned to the Duke of Anjou.

The general Discontents, which the Removal of the Duke of Gloucester from about the King's Person and the Government had caus'd among the People, became now so evident, that the Queen and her Friends could not but take Notice of it, and therefore they were forced to set all their Wits at work to make the slight Allegations, which they had surmis'd against him at first, appear great Crimes, that so his Deprivation might seem as much deserved, as it was dishonourable. And to this End, the Duke of Suffolk, who ever hated him, because his sagacious Eye discovered his Unworthiness of the Favours heaped upon him, was employed to encourage the Duke's Enemies, to set on foot what Accusations they could either in Malice invent, or in Policy contrive against him; the Chief of whom were Humphrey Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, who being the Son of Ann Plantagenet, a Descendant from Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, Seventh Son of Edward the Third, wish'd him out of the Way, that he might be the first Duke of the Royal Blood in England; the Cardinal of Winchester, who was implacably incensed against the Duke of Gloucester, because he had made his Pride odious, and his Policy successless; and the Archbishop of York, who having joined with Winchester in his Crimes, was equally the Object of Gloucester's Displeasure. These Men, with the Queen and her Friends, having rais'd many forged Accusations against him, summon'd him to answer for himself before the King and his Council, to which he readily submitted and appear'd. Divers Articles were alledged against him, by Persons suborn'd to accuse him; but the main Thing which was insisted on, was this. 'That 'being the Chief Governour of the Nation in 'the King's Minority, he had to the great Dis'honour of the King, and Injury of his Sub'jects, caus'd divers Persons to be put to death, 'contrary to the Laws of the Land, and when 'any Persons were adjudged to death deserved'ly for their Crimes, he out of the Cruelty of 'his Disposition, order'd them to suffer other

The Designs of the Queen against the Duke of Gloucester.

The Duke of Gloucester accused and clear'd.

A. D. 1446. Reg. 24.

'Deaths than the Law aſſign'd, thereby ſhewing, that he was unjuſt even in the Execution of Juſtice; and that whereas he ought moſt ſtrictly to have obſerv'd the Laws, he was the greateſt Breaker of them. The Duke very patiently heard this Calumnies of his Adverſaries, and ſupported by the Conſcience of his own Innocency, as well as his great Knowledge of the Laws of England (for he was a very ſtudious Man, and ſo well read in all Laws and Cuſtoms of England as none better) he gave ſuch clear Anſwers to all Things objected againſt him, that he was acquitted by the Council, and the Diſgrace of his Crimes which his Enemies intended to lay on him, fell ſo heavily upon themſelves, that as the Duke of Glouceſter was more honour'd, ſo they were more hated and abhorr'd of all Men.

Accidents in England.

Simon Eyre, Lord Mayor of London, began this Summer to build Leaden-hall in London to be a Stow-houſe for Corn and Fewel for the Poor of the City, and a beautiful Chappel in the Eaſt-end of the ſame, and over the Gate of it cauſed to be written, Dextera Domini exaltavit me, i. e. The Right Hand of the Lord hath exalted me, giving an excellent Example to all Men, how Men ought to employ thoſe Riches which Providence heaps upon Men, viz. in being Benefactors to the Poor. In this Year were two very unuſual Combats within Liſts appointed, but one only was fought. The firſt was by the Prior of Kilmaine in Ireland, who impeach'd the Earl of Ormond of High-Treaſon, and the Place of their Tryal by Battel was appointed in Smithfield. But by the Mediation of Dr. Gilbert Worthington, Parſon of St. Andrews Holbourn, and ſome other of the Clergy, the Quarrel was taken up by the King and ſo decided without Combat. About the ſame time one John David an Armourer impeach'd his Maſter William Catur of Treaſon and they fought in Smithfield, but Catur being by the Company of his Friends and Neighbours almoſt intoxicated with Wine before he came to fight, he was unhappily ſlain without any juſt Suſpicion of Guilt; but the Servant liv'd not long after him, for the next Aſſize he was hang'd for Felony.

Reg. 25.

The Duke of Glouceſter's Death contrived.

The Diſappointments which the Duke of Glouceſter's Adverſaries met withal in their late Attempt againſt him, to bring him into Diſgrace by their forg'd Calumnies and Crimes, was ſo far from diſcouraging them in the further Proſecution of their malicious Deſigns, that they were the more enrag'd; and having the Queen on their Side, reſolv'd upon his Deſtruction; but knowing, that he was the People's Darling, and therefore no open Proceedings againſt him would be endur'd, they contriv'd to work his Ruin by the moſt unſuſpected and private Means. Many Ways were thought on to enſnare him, but upon ſcanning of all Circumſtances they were laid aſide. At length the moſt plauſible Invention was to call a Parliament, and there to apprehend him for ſome Charge of Treaſon, and ſo work their Will. This Propoſal, helliſh enough, was receiv'd with the general Approbation of the Conſpirators, and the Queen was left to manage it; who having firſt given out, that many important Affairs of State would ſhortly require the Meeting of a Parliament, Eleventh Parliament.

cauſed Writs to be iſſu'd out a little before Chriſtmas to ſummon a Parliament to meet at Bury upon the 23d of February following. And now the Confederates thinking all ſure, and that the Duke of Glouceſter would not ſuſpect their Deſign in the leaſt, ſpent their Chriſtmas with more than uſual Mirth, longing till the Day ſhould come when their miſchievous Contrivance ſhould be put in Execution.

A. D. 1447.

A. D. 1447.

Reg. 25.

With the new Year the Lords began to prepare for meeting in Parliament at Bury; and that the Duke of Glouceſter might fear no Evil, all Things at Court were carry'd ſmoothly to him, but yet Care was taken to have it whiſper'd in his Ear, that it was neceſſary he ſhould be at it, to prevent the Deſigns of the Queen and her Party. The Good Duke not at all Jealous of ill Practices, but retaining his old Zeal for the Commonwealth, hearken'd to the Caution, and with the reſt of the Lords came to the Place at the Time appointed, ready to attend the National Buſineſs.

Duke of Glouceſter arreſted, and is found dead.

On the firſt Day of the Seſſion all things were quiet, and the uſual Ceremonies at the opening a Parliament all perform'd. On the ſecond Day the Lord Beaumont, then High-Conſtable of England, being accompany'd with the Duke of Buckingham, Duke of Somerſet, and many others, arreſted the Duke of Glouceſter, and put him in Cuſtody under a ſtrong Guard. His Servants were all taken from him, and thirty two of them ſent to ſeveral Priſons at a diſtance one from another. The Nation was in a great amaze at this ſudden Action, and every Man was inquiſitive to know what new Matter was found out againſt the Duke, who had ſo lately clear'd himſelf of all that could be alledged againſt him. His Enemies thought it neceſſary to lay ſome Crime to his Charge, and therefore gave it out that Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, with his Train of Servants had traiterouſly conſpired to kill the King, that he might ſet the Lady Eleanor his Wife at Liberty. A ridiculous Charge, but yet ſufficient to quiet the People, whom they only fear'd in the Execution of their Deſign, for the more improbable his Crime was the eaſier it would be to free himſelf, and ſo the People reſted content with the Senſe of his Wiſdom and Innocency. But his Enemies had contriv'd otherwiſe that he ſhould never come to his Defence; for the Night after his Commitment, as ſome ſay, but others, a few Nights after, he was found dead in his Bed, and his Body ſhew'd to the Lords and Commons aſſembl'd in Parliament, and lay expoſed to open View of all Comers for ſome time; in which, becauſe no Signs of a violent Death appear'd, it was reported, That he dy'd of an Apoplexy or Impoſtume. But becauſe none of his Servants ſuffer'd after his Death, which they ought to have done had they been guilty of High-Treaſon, as was alledg'd againſt them, tho' Five of them were condemn'd and near their Execution were pardon'd by the Duke of Suffolk's Means, it was generally thought a ſufficient Ground to believe, that he was murther'd by the Queen's Means; and ſome were ſo particular as to report, that he was ſtrangled between two Pillows or Feather-beds, as Thomas Woodſtock, Duke of Glouceſter, before him had been; others that he had an hot Spit run up his Fundament, as K. Edward II. had; others affirmed, that he dy'd of mere Grief, becauſe he ſaw he muſt now fall a Sacrifice to his Enemies Malice without being allow'd to defend himſelf; all which Conjectures have little Foundation. The moſt diſcret Judge he was murther'd; but being tranſacted in private, it was not ſafe to determine by what Means.

The ill effects of the D. of Glouceſter's Murther.

Thus dy'd the Good Duke of Glouceſter, lamented deſervedly by all the Nation, being a Lover of the Commons, a Friend to the Learned, a continual Defender of the Innocent, and a Terror to the Guilty; and tho' the Queen and her Party

A. D. 1447. Reg. 25.

Party triumph'd in his Overthrow, yet a little Time ſhew'd them how impolitick Malice and Hatred is; for by his Death they wrought the Ruin of the King himſelf, having open'd a Gap for Richard Duke of York, to put in his Claim to the Crown, which he proſecured ſo violently, that in few Years he began thoſe Conteſts and Troubles in the Nation, which made King Henry's Throne very uneaſie, and at length ended in his Depoſition, which he would not in all probability have attempted, had not the Duke of Glouceſter been dead, whoſe Title was generally better known, and whoſe Intereſt in the Nation was ſuch, that York dar'd not have ſtirred againſt him; but he being thus made away with, the Queen was ſo hated, that it was eaſie for the Duke of York to get Aſſiſtance enough to further his ambitious Deſigns, as well to revenge Glouceſter's Death, as to eaſe themſelves of the Queen's Uſurpation, who had aſſum'd her Husband's Authority to govern all.

The Pope ſends a Golden Roſe to K. Henry.

Upon St. Andrew's Day this Year was King Henry preſented with a Golden Roſe by Pope Eugenius, who ſent Ludovicus Cordona, a Doctor in Divinity with it to him. Upon the Delivery of the Roſe, which was done with great Ceremony in St. Stephen's Chappel at Weſtminſter, in the Preſence of the Dukes of York and Exeter, Cardinal Kemp, Arch-biſhop of York, and John Stafford, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury (u) and Chancellor of England. He declared in an eloquent Oration his Embaſſage, which was to exhort the King to undertake an Expedition againſt the Turks, who barbarouſly waſted and ravaged the European Provinces, not forgetting to extol the Vertues of the conſecrated Roſe, and to explain the right Application of it, that he might make his Gift the more acceptable. His Meſſage and Gift were favourably accepted, and Promiſes of Aſſiſtance given to the Pope againſt the Turk, but Home-bred Diſturbances ſo took up the King from this Time, that nothing could be done Abroad.

The Death of Henry Biſhop of Winchſter.

Soon after the Deceaſe of the Duke of Glouceſter, God, who is the chief Guardian of Innocence, reveng'd his Murther upon one of his Principal Enemies the Rich Cardinal of Winchеſter, whoſe Heart being ſet ſo much upon the World and the Glories of it, there could not be a greater Puniſhment of his Sins, than to call him out of it. He liv'd not above a Month after the Duke of Glouceſter, and therefore enjoy'd the Satisfaction of his Death but a ſhort time. On his Death bed he is ſaid to have ſhew'd a World of Impatience, and when he was told, that no Medicines could ſave his Life, he cry'd out in a Paſſion, What! Will nothing ſave my Life? Will Money do nothing? Can't Death be brib'd a few Years? I'd give the whole Kingdom for my Life. But no Man can compound with Death, he was forced to leave his Pomp and lie down in the Duſt. To him ſucceeded William Patin, who was after ſurnam'd Wainfleet, from the Place of his Nativity, a Town in Lincolnſhire ſo call'd. He was by Birth a Gentleman, and from Provoſt of Eaton raiſed to this Biſhoprick, wherein he liv'd ſome Years as eminent for his Piety as the Cardinal for his Riches. On the 5th of Auguſt this Year dy'd alſo John Holland, Duke of Exeter, and was bury'd at St. Katherine's near London.

William Wainfleet made Biſhop of Winchеſter.

A. D. 1447. Reg. 25.

With this Six and Twentieth Year of the King began the Rule of the Queen, who having remov'd the Duke of Glouceſter out of the World manag'd all Things without controul, and with the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Suffolk, who was her chief Favourite, endeavour'd to make her Command Abſolute; wherein tho' ſhe made uſe of her Husband's Name, yet ſhe could ſcarcely hide her Uſurpation, becauſe in England the Queen Conſort hath no Power, but Title only. Her Ambition and Tyranny ſoon grew intolerable to the Subjects, and begat a general Diſcontent as well among the Nobility as Commons. This the Duke of York diligently obſerved, and made uſe of for his Deſigns to raiſe himſelf to the Throne: For having repreſented to his Friends the Miſery of the Nation, which, under the Name of a King weak and unable to govern, was ruled by an ambitious Queen and her Minions, he firſt whiſper'd it into their Heads, that it was neceſſary to pitch upon ſome other Perſon to be King, ſince the preſent King had depoſed himſelf in effect by ſuffering the Queen and Suffolk to over-rule all. King Henry was really a good Man, but fitter for a Cloyſter than a Palace, and therefore the Kingdom was to be put into better Hands than thoſe of Women and Favourites. This he ſaid to prepare their Minds for what he had further in due time to propoſe to them, but he firſt let their Diſcontents work, and when he found them as deſirous of Change as he wiſhed, then he further put forward his own Title, telling them,

Reg 26.

The Queen rules all, which diſcontented the Nation.

Duke of York's Title and Fitneſs for the Crown diſperſed about.

'That if they look'd into the Succeſſion of the 'Crown which alone gave a legal Title to it, 'the Houſe of Lancaſter enjoy'd it only by Uſurpation, contrary to the Laws of the Realm; 'That Lionel Duke of Clarence being Elder Brother to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, his Poſterity muſt have a better Title to the Crown, than the Lancaſtrian Line; That his Grandmother Philippa (x) Wife to Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, being the only Daughter of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, and he himſelf Son of the Eldeſt (y) Daughter of the ſaid Edmund (z), who left no Male-iſſue, it was eaſie for them to ſee who had the true Right to the Crown of England; That though he would not vainly vaunt himſelf fit for ſo great an Office, yet he might boldly claim the Crown as his Right, and hoped that the Diligence and Valour which he had ſhewn in France for the Preſervation of the Engliſh Dominions in that Kingdom, were Demonſtrations enough to ſhew, that he had the true Spirit of an Engliſh Man in him, and was zealous for the Good of the Nation in all Things.

Theſe Propoſals were Argument ſufficient to perſwade his Friends to a Concurrence, their Wiſhes having prevented his Deſigns; and therefore it was reſolv'd upon, and firmly agreed among them, that they ſhould promote his Intereſts with all the Secrecy neceſſary for (u) The Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury was a Cardinal as well as he of York, and therefore ought certainly as his Primate and Lord Chancellour to have the Precedence. See Holinſhead, p. 1167.

(x) Philippa was his great Grandmother, his Mother Anne Mortimer being Daughter of Roger, Son of the Princeſs Philippa, and Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March.

(y) She was not the Eldeſt Daughter, the Lady Elinor Mortimer was the Eldeſt Daughter of Roger Mortimer, the Son of Edmund, who marry'd the Princeſs Philippa.

(z) She was the Daughter of Roger Mortimer, and Grand-daughter of Edmund Mortimer Earl of March. Roger left Two Sons who both liv'd to be Men, Edmund and Roger, but they dy'd without Iſſue, as did their Eldeſt Siſter the Lady Elinor ſo Anne who marry'd Richard Earl of Cambridge, Father of this Richard, Duke of York, became Heir to the Princeſs Philippa's Right to the Crown, which Right on the Death of the ſaid Lady Anne, fell to the Duke of York.

a Buſi-

A. D. 1447. Reg. 26.

a Buſineſs of that Importance, which was ſo inviolably obſerv'd, that all requiſite Proviſions were made before his Adverſaries diſcover'd any thing of the Deſign, and his Friends were ready to ſet him on the Throne, before his Purpoſe was known, as by the Sequel of the Hiſtory will more evidently appear.

A. D. 1448. The Truce broken by the Engliſh.

While theſe Things were tranſacted in England, little of Moment paſſed in France, becauſe the Peace had bound up both Sides from Action. The Duke of Somerſet was Regent, but did not carefully manage Affairs there. Sir Francis Suriennes, call'd the Arragonois, who for his good Services done to the Crown of England was honour'd with the Dignity of Knight of the Garter, was Governour of the Lower Normandy. This Perſon being Active and Warlike, while he lay in his Garriſons of St. Jaques and Beverenne, had obſerv'd in their Commerce with the Frontier Towns, that they were weak and ill guarded, and eſpecially the Town of Fougieres in Brittain, a very rich Place, which was a Temptation to him to attempt the taking of it, and accordingly in the Night before the Feaſt of our Lady in Lent ſcal'd the Walls, and took both the Town and Caſtle; which tho' of it ſelf 'twas a Breach of the Peace ſcare Pardonable, yet that which render'd it a greater Crime was, that he treated the Inhabitants with the greateſt Inhumanity and Cruelty, not only ſlaying many of them, as in a time of War, but pillaging their Goods, raviſhing the Women, robbing the Churches, and carying away many of the chief of them Priſoners. Duke Francis, who was firſt comprehended in the Truce reign'd in Brittain at that Time, and was highly offended at this Action of the Engliſh, and thereupon ſent an Herald, to complain of the Wrong done him, to the Duke of Somerſet, requiring Satisfaction, and a Reſtitution of the Place, with all that was taken away from it. The Duke of Somerſet coolly reply'd, That the Action much diſpleaſed him, and that ſuch Satisfaction for the Wrong done ſhould be given, as he himſelf ſhould require; but the Duke not being ſatisfied with this Anſwer, ſent the Biſhop of Rheimes (a) to the French King to beg his Aid and Aſſiſtance in a Caſe where himſelf was equally concern'd, that he might recover the Town by Force of Arms. Charles, the French King was not ſo furious as the Duke, but firſt ſent John Havart and William Coſmet, one of the Maſters of his Requeſts to the King of England, and Peter de Foutein, the Maſter of his Horſe, to the Duke of Somerſet with the former Meſſage, who received the like Anſwer with this Addition, 'That he would ſend Com-
'miſſioners to Louviers upon a Day appointed,
'who ſhould adjuſt the Difference between 'them, and not only make Reſtitution, but
'Amends to the Duke of Brittain. On the Day prefixed the Commiſſioners on both Parts met, and the French-men demanded the Town, and a large Recompence for the Damages ſuſtain'd by the Inhabitants. The Engliſh-Men replied, 'That without Offence, nothing in Ju-
'ſtice ought to be given in Satisfaction, alledging, 'That it was the Fact of Sir Francis only, Reſtitution of the Injury denied. 'without the Conſent either of the King of 'England, or the Duke of Somerſet, his Lieu'tenant or Regent. To this the French anſwered, 'That if they did not make Amends
'for the Injury done, they would not be tied 'to ſecure any Place, but ſhould endeavour to 'revenge themſelves, it being againſt Reaſon
'for the offended Party not to be allowed to re-
'ſent the Injury received. To which Anſwer the Engliſh Commiſſioners not being able to reply, referr'd them to the Duke of Somerſet himſelf, who lay then at Sonniers; and King Charles ſent his Ambaſſador to him.

A. D. 1448. Reg. 26.

The Schiſm between the Popes ended.

About this Time, by the Means of Frederick, Duke of Auſtria, and other Chriſtian Princes, the Schiſm, which had continued between the Popes for Sixteen Years, was ended. For Felix the Fifth, (b) who was ſet up by the Council of Baſil, upon their Depoſition of Eugenius the Fourth, being very uneaſie under the Oppoſition, was ſoon perſwaded to reſign to Nicholas the Fifth, Eugenius's Succeſſor; and ſo an Union was again ſettled in the Church to the great Satisfaction of Chriſtendom. Felix by this voluntary Act got a great Reputation in the World for his Humility and Sanctity, and tho' he gave place to Nicholas in Dignity, yet he outſhined him in Piety, upon which this Verſe was made on him.

Lux fulſit Mundo, ceſſit Felix Nicolao.

as if Felix's Humility ſhined like a Sun in the World. Felix after his Ceſſion from the Papacy, was made Legate of France, and Cardinal of Savoy, and lived ſo holy a Life, that he was reverenced for a Saint after his Death.

Pont l'Arch taken by the French by Treachery.

While the French Ambaſſadors were treating with the Duke of Somerſet at Sonniers about the Reſtitution of Fougeres, and Satisfaction to be done the Inhabitants, the French King receiv'd Information from a Norman, who daily went into Pont de l'Arch, with his Cart to carry Victuals and other Things into the Engliſh Garriſon there, That that Town was but ill mann'd, and worſe kept, the Garriſon being very negligent and careleſs. Charles, who was glad of an Opportunity of requiting the Engliſh Perfidiouſneſs, readily hearkned to it, and ſent Monſieur de Breſſe, Sir James de Clermont, and Captain Floquet, with a ſelect Company of Men to lie in Ambuſh near the Gate of St. Andrew belonging to the Town, having agreed with the ſaid Waggoner, with whom he ſent Two luſty Soldiers in the Habit of Carpenters, with Axes on their Shoulders, to ſurprize the Guards and kill them, and to break down his Waggon in the Paſſage, which was very heavy laden on Purpoſe that the Gates could not be ſhut, or Draw-bridge pull'd up without a great deal of Difficulty; when this was done, he was to give Notice to the Ambuſhes, that they might enter the Town. Theſe Things were all acted as they were plotted, early in the Morning about the Beginning of October; and the Engliſh Garriſon, which ſuſpected nothing of this Nature, were all taken in their Beds, with the Commander himſelf, the Lord Faulconbridge, and were carried away Priſoners by the French. The Loſs of this Town was of great Importance to the Engliſh, being the Paſſage over the River Seine out of France into Normandy, and but Four Leagues diſtant from Roan, the chief City in that Province, which ſeem'd to be all in Danger by it. The Duke of Somerſet was extreamly troubled at it, and when the French Deputies came to demand the Reſtitution of (a) It ſhould be the Biſhop of Reims in Brittain, for 'tis not probable that the Archbiſhop of Rheims, as the Author Copying from Hollingſhead makes it who is Primate of all France, the firſt Biſhop and Peer of the Realm, would ſerve the Duke of Brittain in the Capacity of an Envoy.

(b) This Felix the Fifth, was Amadeus, Duke of Savoy, who from a Temporal Prince advanc'd himſelf to the Spiritual Empire of Chriſtendom.

Fougeres

A. D. 1448. Reg. 26. Fougeres, and Satisfaction of the Damages done to the Inhabitants, would hear nothing of it, he ſaid, till Pont de l' Arch was reſtor'd again to the Engliſh. But the French grown confident by this Advantage, told him plainly, 'They would now ſtand upon better Terms, 'and would not part with it, unleſs Fougeres 'with all the Loſſes, and Intereſts of it were re-'ſtor'd to the Duke of Brittain; which the Engliſh not being able to do, not only becauſe the Lives of ſuch as were ſlain were irreparable, but becauſe the vaſt Spoil which had been taken out of the Town amounting to 1600000 Crowns, had been extravagantly ſquandred away by the Soldiers, the Duke was forced to deny it, and ſo the War was renewed, before the Truce agreed upon was expir'd. For after this Meeting, Charles, the French King, immediately rais'd an Army to proſecute the War with unuſual Vigour.

The War renewed between the Engliſh and French.

The People of England being extreamly diſſatisfied at the Duke of Glouceſter's Death, and the Queen's Tyranny thro' the Abuſe of the good King's Eaſineſs, and the Nobility divided with and againſt the Duke of Suffolk, it was very improbable, if the War in France ſhould be renewed that the Engliſh could make any conſiderable Oppoſition; and it had been the greateſt Wiſdom of the Duke of Somerſet to have kept the Truce on foot upon any Terms. The French King was ſenſible of theſe Inconveniences, and therefore held the Engliſh to ſuch Conditions as he knew in himſelf almoſt impoſſible to be perform'd, that he might renew the War at the Engliſh's Coſt, and his own Advantage. Upon theſe Grounds he built great Hopes of Succeſs, (tho' the French Hiſtorians make their King very unwilling to have begun the War anew, and ſay, that it was nothing but God's Diſpoſition and Will on his Part, and the intolerable Wrongs on the Enemy's Part, that began this laſt War,) and having drawn his Army together, divided it into Three Parts, and ſent them out ſeverally, one under the Command of Monſieur de Mony, who after divers Aſſaults, and a Loſs of many of his Men, took the Towns of Louveirs and Gorbery; another part under Captain Flocquet who took Conquet, and the great Town of Verneuil in Perch with the Caſtle and Tower belonging to it; and a third Part under the Captain Verdenne, who took Coignac and St. Magrine near Bourdeaux in Gaſcoigne, and then return'd to K. Charles to unite with him.

A. D. 1449.

The Duke of Somerſet who had manag'd the Engliſh Affairs ſo ill in France, that he could make little or no Oppoſition to theſe Proceedings of the French, had nothing to help himſelf with but Complaints to the French King of his unjuſt Invaſions. He was anſwer'd, That the French wondered the Engliſh, who had taken Fougeres in the Time of Truce without any juſt Occaſion, and refuſed to give Satisfaction, ſhould look upon themſelves injured by Repriſals: Yet that K. Charles might keep up a ſhew of Peaceableneſs, he appointed a Conference at the Abby of Boniport to adjuſt all Matters in conteſt between them: This Meeting prov'd Fruitleſs, and then the French King raiſed a mighty Army, and declared open War againſt the Engliſh. But Fame had before ſo utterly vanquiſh'd the Engliſh Authority in France, that there needed little Force to reduce all to the Obedience of K. Charles. It was every where noiſed in the Engliſh Territories, that now the Duke of Glouceſter was dead the Engliſh were unable to protect them, and maintain their Conqueſts in France, being filled with ſo many Diſcontents and Diviſions at Home that they could not mind their Affairs Abroad, which ſo diſpoſed the People to a Revolt, who were never kept ſteady in their Loyalty to the Engliſh but by Force and Fear, that when the French King appear'd before the Towns, they without more adô open'd the Gates, and welcom'd their Sovereign to his Right; and tho' in many of the great Towns there were ſtrong Engliſh Garriſons, as Roan (c) in Normandy, Mauliſſon in Guien, and other Cities, yet all was no help. As ſoon as the French Army came before them, the Inhabitants arm'd themſelves and fell upon the Engliſh within, and the Army without fiercely aſſaulted them, ſo that it was altogether impoſſible to retain any Thing: All that the Engliſh could do was only to capitulate, and ſave their Lives. Thus the French King in a few Months became a perfect Maſter of Normandy, Gaſcoigne and Guien, tho' there wanted not Courage in moſt of the Engliſh Garriſons to defend themſelves; but being over-power'd or undermin'd with the Treachery of the French, they were forced to leave all in the French Hands.

A. D. 1449. Reg. 27. The French King recovers all France.

This Year began a Rebellion in Ireland, and the Duke of York, rather to have him out of the Way than to truſt or prefer him, was ſent thither with an Army; but he ſo well manag'd his Place, and dealing mildly and gently with that Savage People appeaſed their Commotions with ſo much Satisfaction to them, that he gain'd their Love and Favour ſo far, that they could never be ſeparated from him nor his Poſterity; but as well in the Misfortunes of his Family as their Proſperity firmly adhered to them. Thus did the Wicked Politicks of the Queen and her Party generally turn to her Damage. Glouceſter's Death was the Deſtruction of her Huſband's Title to the Crown, and this Employment of the Duke of York, which was intended for his Ruin, prov'd a mighty Advantage to him in his Deſigns againſt his Soveraign.

Duke of York ſent to appeaſe the Rebellion in Ireland.

In the Beginning of this Year Sir Lewis de Bueyle a French Knight, challeng'd an Engliſh Man nam'd Ralph Challons, Eſquire to encounter him in a Combat, and pitch'd the Time and Place, which was at Mans in Maine, the French King himſelf was preſent according to the Cuſtom of that Age, to behold the Courage and Skill of thoſe Combatants. Much Art and Bravery appear'd on both Sides, but the Fortune of the Combat fell to the Engliſh Man, who ran the French Knight thro' the Body with his Spear, of which Wound he ſoon after dy'd. The Law of Arms in ſuch Caſes requir'd, that the Conquerour ſhould attend the Corps of the Perſon killed, and celebrate his Obſequies, in Teſtimony of the Chriſtian Compaſſion which he has for the Deceaſed. This Challons perform'd not only with the uſual Decency, but with ſo much real and hearty Sorrow, that even the French King took Notice of it, and gave him ſome Tokens of his Favour.

Reg. 27. A Combat between an Engliſh Man and French Man.

King Charles and the Duke of Bretagne being follow'd with continual Succeſs carry'd on their Victories every Day further and further. The Duke of Bretagne recover'd Fougeres, St. James de Beveron, and ſeveral other Places, which had been

Duke of Bretagne and French King take ſeveral Places from the Engliſh.

(c) At Roan in Normandy the Engliſh Garriſon were ſo hard put to it by the Citizens within, and the French without, that they were forced to agree not only to deliver up that City, but ſeveral others, or they had been all murther'd. The Hoſtages for the Performance of this Agreement were the Brave Lord Talbot, afterwards Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Butler, Son to the Earl of Ormond.

been

A. D. 1449. Reg 27.

been taken from him by the Engliſh. The French King alſo joyning with the Counts of St. Poll and Eu, ſtill held on his Victories, eſpecially in Normandy, where he took Negent by Compoſition. Harfleur ſtood out the Siege, under the Command of a Captain of undaunted Valour Sir Tho. Curſon, who notwithſtanding their Batteries and Scaling repulſed them to their great Loſs; but at length ſeeing it impoſſible to ſave the Town he came to a Compoſition with the Enemy to depart with their Lives and Goods. The Submiſſion of this Place was a Terror to the other Engliſh Garriſons, ſo that ſome of them voluntarily yielded, as Lizeux, which was induced to it by the Biſhop's Means, the Tower of Griſe, which made a ſhort Reſiſtance, Gourney, Roche-guion, which was commanded by one John Howell, who to enjoy his Wife's Lands, a French Woman, ſurrender'd the Place on Condition the Garriſon might depart in Safety, and himſelf enjoy his Eſtate, and be employ'd in the ſame Station under the French King. Vologues, and many others. Other Towns were betray'd to the French, as Lagni, Gizors, and ſeveral others, ſo that little remain'd under the Juriſdiction of the Engliſh but Caen, whither the Duke of Somerſet and all the Engliſh then in France retir'd.

Twelfth Parliament, its Act.

A Parliament was ſummon'd and met November the 6th (d) at Weſtminſter, but nothing of Importance was enacted, only a few Acts paſſed to regulate Abuſes in bringing Merchandizes from Holland contrary to an Act made the 27th of this King, in preſſing Horſes and Carts for private Uſe in the King's Name, and in levying Deſtreſſes of Ships by Cuſtom-Houſe Officers. But the moſt remarkable Buſineſs done this Parliament was by the Biſhops, who endeavour'd all they could to have the Act of Premunire repealed. They had made conſiderable Intereſts in both Houſes to effect their Deſign, but in vain. The greater part of the Lords and Commons were ſo zealous for the Continuance of it, that they were conſtrain'd to endure that Eye-ſore, which remains in Force to this Day.

A. D. 1450.

The ill Condition of the Engliſh Affairs in France, which tho' very well known in England, could not be redreſſed by reaſon of the Diviſions and Diſcontents that were both in Court and Country, began now to be taken a little into Conſideration, and that all might not be loſt, the King ſent over a Supply of 1500 freſh Men under the Command of Sir Thomas Kiriell into Normandy, who landing at Cherburg joyn'd himſelf with ſeveral Engliſh Captains, who held ſome Towns in thoſe Parts, and made up an Army of 5000 Men, which being a pretty ſtrong Body, they betook themſelves to Action, and recover'd Liſieux and Vologues; and becauſe they heard that the French were upon their March to beſiege Caen, they thought it convenient to hinder their Deſign by giving them Battel by the Way, and accordingly poſted themſelves about Formignie, between Charenton and Baieux to receive them. On April 18. the Earl of Clermont, Admiral of France, and the Seneſchal of Poictou with 6000 Foot and 600 Horſe arriv'd at Formignie in their Way to Caen, but finding the Engliſh there, could neither ſafely retreat nor go on, and ſo were forced to abide the Battel, which the Engliſh were forward to begin, and the French ready to receive them. This Battel was begun with much Courage on both Sides,

Some Engliſh Forces ſent into France to keep Normandy.

The Engliſh conquer'd by the French. and the Engliſh put ſo hard upon the French, that they were forced to give Ground, and the Engliſh got from them two Culverings; but in the End Arthur of Brittain, Earl of Richmond and Conſtable of France coming in to the Aſſiſtance of the French with above 1000 freſh Men vanquiſh'd the Engliſh, ſlaying above 3000, and taking 800 Priſoners, among whom were ſeveral Perſons of Note, as Sir Thomas Kiriell himſelf, Sir Henry Norbery, Sir Thomas Drew, Sir Thomas Kirkly, and ſeveral others. Sir Robert Vere and Sir Mat. Gough, that valiant Welſh-Man eſcaped. The Victory was obtain'd as the French Hiſtorians relate, with the loſs only of Five or Six of their Side, ſo that they impute this to a wonderful Work of God to them. And fluſh'd and encouraged by it they marched on to the Siege of Caen, which having ſurrounded on all ſides they fiercely aſſaulted. The Duke of Somerſet the Regent in France was then in the Town with his Wife and Children, of whom being in fear he ſummon'd the chief Citizens together and told them, 'That it was impoſſi- 'to ſave the City out of the Hands of ſo great 'a Power as the King of France had about it, 'and to endeavour it was only to endanger 'themſelves without hopes of Profit, and there- 'fore adviſed them to agree upon as good 'Terms as they could, and reſign the Place. This was welcome Advice to the Citizens, who were ready through Fear or Treachery to outrun any Admonition in that Kind. But it ſeems the Duke, though he had a plenary Authority given him over all Places under King Henry's Juriſdiction, was not without Controul here. The City of Caen was given by K. Henry to the Duke of York, when he was Regent of France, and he had made one Sir David Hall, an hot and paſſionate Man, but very faithful to his Truſt, Governour of it. He hearing the Duke's Advice to the Citizens, told him boldly, That he had nothing to do in that Place, which belong'd to the Duke of York, and of which the Charge was committed unto him; That the Danger was not ſo great as he had repreſented it to the Citizens to terrifie them, for it wanted neither Men, Money nor Ammunition, and therefore they might defend themſelves at leaſt, till they could have the Duke of York's Succour, or Order to ſurrender it. That as to himſelf he would defend it againſt any Power how great ſoever, and if the Town would reſign, he would betake himſelf to the Caſtle with ſuch Soldiers as were Faithful and Valiant, and hold it out to the laſt; That it is true, the Beſiegers make a great noiſe and rattling with their Canon, but that ſcares Women and Children only, and not Men of War. In the midſt of theſe hot Diſputes between Fear and Courage, Treachery and Fidelity, a Stone Shot by the French into the Town fell down between the Dutcheſs of Somerſet and her Children. Yet with more noiſe than hurt, for it did no harm, yet it ſcared the Dutcheſs ſo violently, that ſhe immediately went to her Huſband and beſought him on her Knees to have Mercy and Compaſſion on his ſmall Infants, and to ſee them deliver'd out of the Town with Safety. The Duke being moved at the Tears of his Wife, and not knowing how to ſecure her and his Children but by the ſurrender of the Town, yielded it up to the French ſore againſt the Will of Sir David Hall upon theſe Conditions.

A. D. 1450. Reg. 27.

Caen beſieg'd.

Sir David Hall oppoſes the Duke of Somerſet.

Caen ſurrender'd by the Duke of Somerſet.

(d) The Queen thinking to aw the Members by the Number of her Attendance, when ſhe had them in a Country Town, ſummon'd this Parliament to meet at Leiceſter: But the Lords and Commons, who knew they were ſafe under the Protection of the City of London, refuſed to meet unleſs they were appointed to come to Weſtminſter: So the Seſſion was adjourn'd thither.

I. That

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28.

I. That the Town and Caſtle of Caen ſhould be ſurrendred to the French King on the Firſt Day of July, if they were not relieved by that Time.

II. That upon the Surrender of the Town the Duke, Dutcheſs, and their Children, and all others that would leave it, might do ſo, the Soldiers with their Horſes and Harneſs, and the Inhabitants, with their Wives, Children, and Moveables, but at their own Charges.

III. That all Perſons who left the Town, ſhould pay their Debts to the Citizens, and leave behind them all Sorts of Artillery.

IV. That the Duke of Somerſet ſhould pay for his Freedom 56000 Scutes, which is about 9600 Pound, and be bound to ſurrender to the French King all the Towns in Normandy, then in the Hands of the Engliſh, leaving the Lord Talbot an Hoſtage till both were perform'd.

Upon theſe Terms (for no Succour came by the Time agreed on) was the Town put into the Hands of the French; and Sir David Hall in his Heat took ſhipping for Ireland, to give an Account of this Action of the Duke of Somerſet's to the Duke of York, and ſo vex'd him, that the Hatred which he owed Somerſet, grew deadly. By the Surrender of this City, Normandy was all in the French King's Power except Four Towns, viz. Liſieux, of which Sir Matth. Gough was Commander; Falois, which belonged to the Earl of Shrewsbury; Damfront, and Cherburg, which all reſign'd upon Conditions within a Month after: The Liberty of the Earl of Shrewſbury, who was Priſoner at Dreux, being gain'd by the Surrender of Falois, with the Lives and Goods of the Garriſon, as were thoſe of the reſt. Cherburg was the laſt Town that yielded, the valiant Captain of it, Thomas Gonvall, defending it ſo long as they had Ammunition or Proviſion left to make their Defence; but at laſt he was forc'd to give it up, and with the reſt retreat to Callis, where they found the Duke of Somerſet. Thus was Normandy, Thirty Years after it was conquered by Henry V. loſt clearly out of the Hands of the Engliſh, and became again the Poſſeſſion of the French King. Three Cauſes are given for this Loſs, Normandy wholly loſt.

1. The Normans Treachery, who tho' naturally Subjects to the King of England, yet being French in Language and Cuſtoms, affected Subjection to the French King moſt.

2. The Duke of Somerſet's Avarice, who kept not full Garriſons as he ought to have done, that he might pocket the Money allow'd for Soldiers.

3. The Diviſions at Home, in which the Great Ones engaged with ſo much Zeal, that they had no Affection to Affairs Abroad.

Diſcontents among the People of England about the Duke of Suffolk's Actions.

Theſe Loſſes in France being heard in England, and breeding a general Diſcontent in the People, the Fault was generally laid upon the Governour; and loud Exclamations were rais'd againſt the Duke of Suffolk, as the chief Inſtrument of all their Miſeries, alledging, That he it was who had delivered up Maine and Anjou to the French, procur'd the Death of the Duke of Glouceſter, devour'd the King's Treaſure, remov'd all the King's vertuous Council from him and plac'd in their Rooms Perſons either openly Vicious, or elſe ſo addicted to his Intereſts, that they could not be Friends to the common Good. Laſtly, That he had been the only Occaſion of the Loſs of Normandy. The Parliament was ſtill Sitting, and the Queen, who was not unſenſible of theſe Grudges againſt her Favourite, ſought all Means to hinder any rigorous Proceedings againſt him; and to that End, removed the Parliament to Leiceſter, thinking to eſcape the Deſigns againſt him, which the Londoners chiefly favour'd; but few of the Nobility appearing there, ſhe was forc'd to bring it back to Weſtminſter, where there was a full Appearance. And the Commons preſented an Indictment to the King and Lords againſt the Duke of Suffolk, containing many Articles of Treaſon and other Miſdemeanours, the Sum of which is as followeth,

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28.

Duke of Suffolk impeached in Parliament in ſeveral Articles.

I. That the ſaid Duke of Suffolk had contriv'd and conſulted with John, Earl of Dunois, commonly call'd, the Baſtard of Orleans, and the other Ambaſſadors of the French King, then being in England, to excite and encourage their Maſter to invade this Realm, and deſtroy the King and his Friends, to the End, that he might raiſe his Son John, whom he had married (e) to Margaret, ſole Heir to John, Duke of Somerſet, the next Heir, as he pretended, to the Crown of England, to be King.

II. That being allur'd by great Rewards and Promiſes from the ſaid Ambaſſadors, he had ſet at Liberty the Duke of Orleans, the King's Enemy, contrary to the expreſs Will of Henry the Fifth.

III. That by his Advice given to the Duke of Orleans, the French King had invaded Normandy, and the other Countries of France belonging to the King, and ſo was now become abſolute Maſter of all France.

IV. That being ſent Ambaſſador into France, to conclude a Truce, he had agreed to ſurrender Anjou and Maine to the King's Enemies, under the plauſible Pretence of a Marriage, (f) without any Commiſſion from the King ſo to do, or Conſent of the Ambaſſadors ſent with him; and at his Return into England, drew the King to approve and comply with all he had done, and ſo forſake his Inheritance of thoſe Countries.

V. That he had betrayed the Weakneſs of the King's Forts and Towns to the Enemy's Captains, when he was in France, by which they were encouraged to aſſault them, and took ſeveral of them.

VI. That he had betrayed the King's Councils to the French Ambaſſadors, when they were in England.

VII. That when Ambaſſadors were ſent into France to conclude a Peace, he had hinder'd it, by advertiſing the French King of the Advantages he had againſt the Engliſh.

VIII. That he had as great Power and Intereſt with the French King, as at Home, as he boaſted in the Star-Chamber.

(e) The Lady Margaret was not married to the Duke of Suffolk's Son. Her firſt Husband was Edmund of Hadham, Earl of Richmond, Son of Queen Katherine, and Owen Tudor, by whom ſhe had Henry the Seventh. The Duke was only charg'd with intending to marry his Son to her.

(f) Had the Words Plauſible Pretence of a Marriage been mention'd it would have been a terrible Mortification to the Queen. But they are not in the original Articles, of which the Fourth is,

That he being Ambaſſador from the King of England to Charles, calling himſelf the French King, promiſed to Reyner King of Sicill, and to Charles D'Angiers, his Brother, Enemies to the King, the Releaſe of Anjou, with the Deliverance of the County of Maine, and the City of Maunt or Mans, without the Knowledge of the other Ambaſſadors with him accompanied; which Promiſe, after his Return, he cauſed to be perform'd to the King's Diſinheritance and Loſs irrecoverable, and to the Strength of his Enemies, and Feebliſhment of the Dutchy of Normandy. Hol. p. 631.

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28.

IX. That being corrupted by the French King, he had kept back our Armies from going into France, to oppoſe the Proceedings of the French.

X. That in making the League with the French King, he had not compriz'd either the Duke of Bretagne, or King of Arragon, but ſuffered them to be put in by the French King, whereby their Amity was loſt; and they became the French King's Allies, to the Damage not only of the Nation, but of the Duke of Bretagne's Brother, Giles, who adhering to the Engliſh Intereſts, loſt firſt his Liberty, and then his Life.

The Popular Charge abovemention'd, was alſo alledged curſorily, but not inſiſted upon, and ſo amounted not to an Article againſt him. The Duke upon theſe Accuſations was arreſted, and brought to his Anſwer, which he deliver'd diſtinctly in this Manner, viz.

Duke of Suffolk's Anſwer to them, and Impriſonment.

1. As to the Three firſt Articles he denied, that he had ever thought on, much leſs acted any ſuch Things as they laid to his Charge.

2. To the Fourth he alledged, that the Truce could not be concluded without ſurrendring thoſe Places, and it being permitted him to act as he judged convenient, he had agreed to it.

3. To all the reſt he pleaded not Guilty, and requir'd the Proofs of them, except the Tenth, which he could no ways excuſe.

Theſe Anſwers were judged very inſufficient, and therefore to pacifie the People, he was ſent Priſoner to the Tower, and a great Shew made, as tho' he ſhould be puniſhed ſeverely for theſe his Miſdemeanours; but the Queen loved him too well to do him any Harm, and therefore after he had been a Priſoner about a Month, in which Time ſhe thought the popular Heats againſt him were abated, ſhe releaſed him, and brought him to Court, and had him in as great Favour as ever. This Reſtoration of the Duke of Suffolk was no ſooner known, but it begat ſeveral Commotions in the Realm, and the People threatned an Inſurrection. About Canterbury a great Multitude aſſembled together, and choſe one Thomas Thany, a Fuller, their Captain, and Nick-named him Blew-beard; but before they had attempted any Thing, the King's Council being inform'd of it, ſent down a Body of Men to ſeize their Captain and ſeveral of their Ring-Leaders, who being executed, the Rebellion ceas'd, and Suffolk was thought to ſtand as faſt as ever. The Parliament which was adjourn'd upon this Occaſion, met again, and the King and Queen went thither (g) in great State, being attended with the Duke of Suffolk as their Chief Counſellor. The Commons look'd upon the Duke's Preſence as a Bravado to them, and being incens'd at it, put up their Petition to the King, that the Perſons, who had been inſtrumental in delivering up the Countries of Anjou and Maine to the King's Enemies, ſhould be duly puniſhed; and accus'd the Duke of Suffolk, Biſhop of Salisbury and Lord Say with others, as guilty of it. The King, who did not ſuſpect that Things would have thus been reviv'd, was very fearful of a bad Effect, if Suffolk ſhould be left at Liberty, and therefore to pacifie them, he put all the Duke's Adherents out of their Offices and Places about him, and baniſh'd the Duke out of the Realm for Five Years, ſuppoſing, that his Enemy's Hatred to him would cool in that Time, and then he might recompenſe his ſlight Sufferings with double Favours.

Duke of Suffolk reſtor'd to his Liberty, and Queen's Favour.

Duke of Suffolk baniſh'd.

The Duke ſeeing the Fury of his Enemies, was not backward to leave the Kingdom for a while, and to That End, having got all Things ready, took Ship to paſs over into France in April. In his Way, he was met by a Ship belonging to the Duke of Exeter, then Conſtable of the Tower, call'd the Nicholas, which engag'd him, and the Captain having taken the Veſſel he was in, after a ſhort Fight, ſeized upon the Duke, and bringing him into Dover-Road, cauſed him to be beheaded on the Side of a Cock-boat. A very bold and ſtrange Action, that a private Captain of a Ship ſhould dare to put a Peer of the Realm to death, without ſo much as any Pretence of Order or Quarrel, ſo far as can be known, yet juſt upon Suffolk himſelf, who having been inſtrumental in the Death of the Duke of Glouceſter, was himſelf as unjuſtly put to death. His Body was caſt upon the Sands at Dover, and being found by his Chaplain, who, after he was taken out of his own Ship, attended, and followed him to ſee his Fate, was by him taken up, and conveyed to Wingfield-College, in Suffolk, (b) and there interr'd. His Memory, had he not been engag'd in the Intrigues of a Court-Favourite, which muſt refuſe no Service to advance the Ambition of Princes, or the Deſign of a Court, had been very honourable to this Day; for he was a Man of good Wit and great Courage, as well able to ſerve a Prince as any Man, a faithful Counſellor, a Lover of Piety, and a great Benefactor to the Church. He built the Pariſh-Church of Eweline, in Oxfordſhire, where his Seat was, and at the Weſt-End of it, he founded an Hoſpital for Two Prieſts, and Thirteen poor Men.

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28.

Duke of Suffolk beheaded.

Duke of Suffolk's Character.

The Duke of Suffolk being dead, who, had he liv'd, would have been a Stop to the Duke of York's ambitious Aims, being an able Counſellor, and ſtout Warrior, tho' thro' Imprudence grown at laſt odious to the People. The Duke of York, who was in Ireland, began by his Agents and Emiſſaries, to drive more furiouſly and confidently toward the Crown; and to that End, his Friends in all Companies repreſented the preſent State of the Kingdom very miſerable, viz. 'That the Nation being govern'd by 'a ſloathful King, and an Ambitious Queen, who 'neither of them underſtood the true Meaſures 'of Government, did daily decay in its Reputation and Intereſts, of which the Loſs of 'France was an invincible Demonſtration. That 'the publick Good ought to be more nearly 'look'd into, and Men of ſuch Abilities rais'd 'to the Helm, as might both advance the 'Honour of the Engliſh, and be a Terror to 'their Enemies. That the Duke of York was a 'Perſon every Ways qualified for the greateſt 'Truſt, having given ſuch a Proof of it in compoſing the Rebellion of Ireland, with ſo great 'Satisfaction to the People, as well as Safety 'to the King. That in Reality, that Duke 'had the beſt Title to the Crown, the Family 'of Lancaſter being no better than Uſurpers; 'and tho' indeed King Henry would be tolerable, if he were either like his Father, or his 'Grandfather, whoſe Virtue and Courage 'made their bad Title overlook'd, yet ſince 'his eaſie and gentle Nature renders him uncapable of Governing well, it is better for the 'People to ſet up a Perſon, who, if he had no Right, were the fitteſt Man in the Nation to weild a Sceptre, much more being the true Heir,

Duke of York's Ambition to obtain the Crown.

(g) The Parliament was on this Occaſion adjourn'd to Leiceſter. Ibid. 1632.

(b) Thin in his Liſt of all the Dukes that ever were in England down to the Year 1585, ſays the Duke of Suffolk was buried in the Charter-Houſe at Hull.

than

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28.

'than ſuffer others to uſurp the Power of doing 'them and the King himſelf a Miſchief. This ſort of Diſcourſe which was broached by the Yorkiſts, was ſo pleaſing to the Nation in general, that in a little time it became the Subject of almoſt all Companies Talk, and every Man's Thoughts and Wiſhes that would pretend to be a Friend to the Commonwealth. But though the Duke himſelf was not inſenſible of his Growth in the People's Favours and Deſires, yet he was afraid to venture to claim the Crown by force of Arms, till he had made ſome open Tryal of the People's Affection to a Change; and to that End he ſtirr'd up one Jack Cade an Iriſh Man, a Youth of a Princely Stature and Mien, of a very pregnant Wit, and undaunted Boldneſs, to aſſume the Name of the Lord Mortimer (i), and take up Arms under the ſpecious Pretences of reforming the Abuſes of the Government, and Grievances of the Kingdom, which being grateful Themes uſually to the People eaſily draw Abettors enow after them. The Kentiſh Men ſhewed themſelves forwardeſt to joyn with him, and therefore he ſets himſelf at the Head of them, and in a little time by his Promiſes to free the Nation from Taxes and Impoſitions, drew a great Multitude after him, with whom in a Martial Order he marched to Black-Heath between Eltham and Greenwich, and there encamped June 1. Here he and his Army continued near a Month pillaging the Country round about, and ſummoning the Citizens of London, who favoured his Deſign to bring him in Arms, Horſes and Money, which he ordered them to levy upon the Foreign Inhabitants of that City, Genoeſe, Venetians and Florentines, threatning to kill as many as he could come at, if he were not obey'd. It is not known what the City did; but 'tis probable, his Deſires were ſatisfied, becauſe when he came into London a little after, he did no harm to any Foreigner.

Jack Cade ſtirr'd up by the York Party to rebel.

Citizens favour him.

In this Time the King and his Council had ſent a Meſſage to the Rebels, to know their Reaſons why they aſſembled after this tumultuous Manner. Jack Cade took upon him to give an Anſwer, and aſſured them, That their coming was not intended for any harm to the King or his Friends, but to amend and reform the Grievances, which the Kingdom groaned under, to chaſtiſe thoſe of his Counſellors, who oppreſſed the People, and tho' Flatterers of his Perſon, were Enemies to his Honour. In fine, Their Aim was to amend whatever was amiſs, and make the Poor Commons happy. With this ſhort Anſwer they ſent away the King's Meſſengers, promiſing them to exhibit their Complaints and Petitions more at large to the Parliament which was then ſitting at Weſtminſter, that they might have their Concurrence with them in ſo good a Work, and accordingly ſent Two Bills to the Houſes in a few Days, the Subſtance of which Papers Follow.

Cade's Anſwer to the King's Meſſengers.

The Firſt they call'd, The Complaint of the Commons of Kent, and the Cauſes of their aſſembling on Black-Heath. In it they repreſent to the Parliament; 'That it was reported, 'that Kent ſhould be depopulated and made a 'Forreſt to revenge the Duke of Suffolk's Death, 'tho' the People of that County were no ways 'guilty of it. That the King had given the 'Revenues of his Crown to his Favourites, and 'reſolved to live on Taxes raiſed on his Subjects, which impoveriſh'd his People. That 'the Lords of the Royal Blood were excluded 'from his Government, and mean Perſons preferred, who would not adminiſter Juſtice 'without Bribes and Gifts. That the Proviſions for the King's Houſe were taken of the 'Subjects, and not paid for, to the undoing of 'many; That the King's menial Servants falſely impeach'd many of High-Treaſon to get 'their Eſtates; That the King's Servants by 'unjuſt Claims of Feoffments have depriv'd divers of the Commons of their Eſtates and 'Rights; That certain Traitors, who have loſt 'the King's Territories in France, ſhould be puniſh'd without Mercy; That the Sheriffs and 'Under-Sheriffs of Counties, farming their Offices and Bailiwicks, are forced to extort unjuſt 'Fines from the People to pay the Sums; That 'the Officers of the Court of Dover in Kent vex 'and arreſt Men in all Parts of the Country upon untrue Actions, and require great Fees of 'them for their Deliverance; That the Freedom of Elections of Knights of Shires hath 'been taken from the People by the Great Men, 'who ſend Letters to their Tenants and Dependants to chooſe ſuch Men, as the People approve not of; That Collectors of the King's 'Taxes being made for Bribes by the Knights 'of the Shire uſe many Extortions to raiſe them; 'And laſtly, That the Seſſions being held in the 'furtheſt Parts of the County Eaſtward, the 'People were forced to go five Days Journey to 'them, to their great Trouble and Damage, 'which they deſir'd might be ſettled in two 'Places more conveniently.

The Rebel's Bill of Complaints.

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28.

The other Paper they ſtiled, The Requeſts of the great Aſſembly in Kent, and in that humbly petition'd, 'That the King would aſſume to 'himſelf the Demeſnes of the Crown, that he 'might live conformable to his Royal Dignity; 'That the Duke of Suffolk's Kindred ſhould be 'puniſh'd according to the Laws of the Realm, 'and the Lords of the Royal Blood, viz. the 'Dukes of York, Exeter, Bukingham, and Norfolk 'taken into Favour, and intruſted in the Government, and then he would be the happieſt 'and richeſt Prince of Chriſtendom; That all 'Perſons guilty of the Duke of Glouceſter's Death 'be puniſh'd, as falſe Traitors to the King and 'Realm, and the rather, becauſe by their Means 'the Duke of Exeter, the Cardinal of Wincheſter, and the Noble Prince the Duke of Warwick, with many other Lords and Gentlemen, 'and all the King's Countries in France have 'been loſt. Laſtly, That all Extortions uſed 'daily among the Common People, viz. the 'Green-Wax, King's-Bench, and King's-Pourvayors, and Statute of Labourers be ſo regulated by 'the King and his Council, that they may not 'be ſuch an intolerable Burthen to the Commons of England.

The Rebel's Bill of Requeſts.

Theſe Bills being ſeen and peruſed as well by the Lords and Commons in Parliament aſſembled (k), as by the King's Council, were not only condemn'd and diſapprov'd, but the Authors of them judg'd proud and preſumptuous Rebels, not to be gratified with fair Promiſes, but ſuppreſſed by force of Arms. The King who had been providing a Body of Men to chaſtiſe this ſeditious Crew, being thus encourag'd, order'd certain Lords with their Retinues to go before and skirmiſh with them, to ſee whether they would abide a Battel; but the Lord's Men boldly told them, That they would not fight againſt the Men of Kent, who had no other Aim in

The Parliament order the Rebels to be ſuppreſſed by Force.

(i) Of Sir John Mortimer, Brother to the Earl of March, who was beheaded in the former Reign. Ibid. 632.

(k) It does not appear that the Complaints of theſe People were rejected by the Parliament, only that the Council, condemn'd 'em as they wou'd have done, had they been more reaſonable, conſidering the Method of preſenting them. See Hol. pag. 634.

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28.

their riſing, but to reform the Diſorders of the Government: Whereupon they were forced to give over their Intention. A few Days after the King having gotten an Army of 15000 Men well accoutred march'd with divers Lords to Black-Heath to fight the Rebels; but they had Intelligence of his Approach, and Cade, as if he had been afraid, retir'd the Night before into a Wood near Sevenoake, hoping that the King's Forces emboldned by his Retreat would purſue him in Diſorder, and ſo they might rout them by lying in Ambuſh for them. But the King believing that thro' Fear of his Army the Multitude would diſſolve of it ſelf, return'd to London, and by the Queen's Advice, ſent only a Party under the Command of Sir Humphrey Stafford and his Brother William to purſue them, that if any Parties ſhould keep together they might diſperſe them. Sir Humphrey follow'd them to Sevenoake, and overtaking them fell upon them with much Fury and Zeal, but being over power'd by the Rabble, he was ſlain with his Brother, and many other Gentlemen, and his whole Party diſcomfited. This Victory tho' ſcarce worth taking Notice of, yet had Two very ill Effects. For, Rebels kill Sir H. Stafford, and rout his Party.

Firſt, It alter'd the Minds of ſuch Perſons of the King's Army as were diſcontented at the Government, inſomuch that they wiſh'd, That the Duke of York were here to compleat the Deliverance, which Mortimer, whom they now eſteem'd well of, had ſo happily begun, and which all Perſons long'd for. The King perceiving theſe Things to be whiſper'd among his own Soldiers, and fearing leaſt the Londoners ſhould riſe and joyn with them, cauſed the Lord Say his Treaſurer, whom the Rebels, cry'd much out againſt to be impriſon'd in the Tower, reſolving, if Occaſion requir'd, to ſacrifice him to the People's Fury. But the worſt Effect of this Victory was,

Secondly, That it not only encourag'd the Rebels in further Attempts, but invited Multitudes to arm themſelves to joyn with them for this pretended Reformation.

Jack Cade having armed himſelf with Sir Humphrey Stafford's Brigandine, and other Armour, full of gilt Nails marched in great Glory towards London with his Rabble, being in his Way joyned with many ſeditious and idle Perſons out of Surrey, Suſſex and other Places, and again pitched his Tents upon Black-Heath, where he ſtrongly encamped himſelf. The Arch-biſhop of Canterbury and Humphrey Duke of Buckingham were ſent thither to him by the King to commune with him about his Complaints and Petitions, and to perſwade him to lay down his Arms, and ſubmit to the King's Mercy. He anſwered 'em with much Gravity and Reaſon; but being exalted by his late Victory he reſolutely told them, That he would not lay down his Arms, unleſs the King came in Perſon, and granted whatever he demanded. Theſe Anſwers being brought to the King created many Doubts in his Mind what he ſhould do. He had neither Subjects nor Servants he could ſafely rely on, moſt approving of the Rebels Cauſe, if not of their Actions: Whereupon he with his Queen by the Advice of his Council departed to Killingworth-Caſtle, leaving no other Forces in London, but what was ſufficient to guard the Tower under the Command of the Lord Scales and Sir Matthew Gough, one of the moſt famous Captains in the French Wars.

The Rebels encamp at Black-Heath.

Cade and the Rebels march to London.

The King's Retreat from London being heard of by Cade and his Followers, they immediately broke up their Camp, and marched towards that City, himſelf lodging the firſt Night in Southwark at the White-Hart, where hearing what a great Party of the Commons of Eſſex were come to his Aſſiſtance, and were encamped at Mile-End he did not doubt to carry all before him. The Citizens of London ſeeing the Rebels ſo near their City, and expecting Admittance, were in doubt what to do: To deny him was very dangerous, and to give him Entrance would not prove leſs diſadvantageous to them: Whereupon the Mayor called a Council to determine and reſolve on what was to be done. Divers Opinions were among them, but moſt through Fear or Faction were for receiving him. Robert Horn, a Fiſh-monger and Alderman vehemently oppoſed them who were for entertaining him, which when the Rebels heard of, they were ſo enraged that the Mayor was forced to put him into Newgate, and open the Gates to give them Entrance, which happen'd July 2. At his firſt Entrance into the City (that he might gain the Favour and Love of the Citizens, and engage them more firmly to them) he cauſed a Proclamation to be made in the King's Name, ſtrictly charging and commanding all his Followers. That no Man ſhould dare to offer any Violence or Wrong to any Man, to rob, or take any thing away from any Perſons without paying them for it, or commit any Outrages, or make any Quarrels in the Streets, or abuſe or corrupt any Women, but all ſhould behave themſelves civily and orderly upon pain of Death: and then he paſſed through London-Streets, and going by London-Stone ſtruck it with his Sword, ſaying, Now is Mortimer Lord of this City. At Night he return'd again to his Lodgings at Southwark. On the 3d of July being Friday, this Captain of the Rebels returned again into the City, and having cauſed Sir James Fines, Lord Say and Treaſurer of England, to be brought into the Guild-Hall of London, had him arraigned before the Lord Mayor and ſeveral of the King's Judges, who by his Order ſat there to try him. The Lord Say, as in Law he might, demanded his Priviledge to be try'd by his Peers, but this Plea being dilatory, and he denying to anſwer to the Accuſations brought againſt him before ſuch incompetent Judges, Cade took him by force from the Officers and brought him to the Standard in Cheapſide, where he cauſed his Head immediately to be cut off, not giving him ſo much Time as to make an end of his Confeſſion. His Head he put on the top of a Spear, and had it carry'd before him, his Body he cauſed to be drawn naked at an Horſe's-Tail through the City as far as his Inn in Southwark, and there to be quartered. Nor was his Rage againſt this Nobleman hereby ſatisfied; but ſending to the Fleet-Priſon he fetched from thence Sir James Cromer, his Son-in-law, who married his Daughter, then Sheriff of Kent, and for ſome Extortions he had committed in his Office carried him to Mile-End to the Eſſex Rebels, and there beheaded him. His Head alſo he fix'd upon a Pole, and had it carried before him with his Father's into the City, the Bearers making them kiſs in every Street to move Laughter from the Beholders, and in his Return to Southwark had 'em ſet upon London-Bridge.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 28.

Cade admitted in to the City.

The Lord Say tried by the Rebels.

Cade and his Captains treated by the Citizens.

Theſe two Days the Citizens had nobly feaſted and courteouſly entertained Cade and his Captains; for Alderman Malpas at his own Charge gave them a great Dinner; and one Chorſtis of St. Margaret Patin's Pariſh did the like; but on the third Day they began ungratefully to requite their kind Hoſts, robbing their Houſes, with many other of the richeſt Citizens,

of

A. D. 1450. Reg 28. of whoſe Wealth they could get Information; and if they found no Treaſure, made them pay great Fines for the Safety of their Lives and Goods. Alderman Horn, who had a little before expoſed himſelf to their Rage by his Loyalty to the King, and Zeal for the Safety of the City, was now in Danger of loſing his Life; but his Wife and Friends perceiving that Cade loved Money, went to him, and for 500 Marks purchaſed his Liberty.

This Action of the Rebels frighted the Citizens, who ſeeing the ill Effects of admitting the Rebels, began to repent that they accepted not of Alderman Horn's Advice. Neither their Lives nor Goods, Wives nor Daughters were ſafe from the Rapine and Abuſes of a rude Rabble: Wherefore they reſolved to keep out of their City this wicked Captain, and his miſchievous Company, and to that End they ſent to the Tower to the Lord Scales and Sir Matthew Gough to aſſiſt them. The Lord Scales readily conſented to their Deſires, and promiſed them to play upon the Rebels with the Cannon of the Tower, and appointed Sir Matthew Gough to aid the Mayor and Aldermen all he could in this Attempt, by whoſe Advice they having gotten together the Train-bands of the City, planted themſelves to keep the Bridge againſt them, and denied the Rebels Entrance. Their Captain hearing that the City oppoſed their Converſe among them, ordered his Men to force their Paſſage, by which means roſe a ſharp Fight upon the Bridge, ſometimes the Citizens, and ſometimes the Rebels having the better of it, but neither were able to drive the other quite from it. The Fight continued many Hours, till at length both Parties being wearied and tired, a Ceſſation of Arms was agreed upon till the next Day; but upon this Condition, That neither the Londoners ſhould go into Southwark, nor the Rebels into London.

Citizens' keep the Rebels out of the City.

This Conteſt tho' not great, coſt the Citizens ſome Lives of great Value, as Alderman Sutton, Robert Haiſard, and Sir Matthew Gough, a Man whoſe Life was worth a Million of theirs that ſlew him; but it was really the Conqueſt of the Rebels by the wiſe Improvement and Management of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, John Stafford. For this great Stateſman being then Chancellor obſerving, that the Hearts of the Rebels began to faint, having the City of London for their Enemy, and that Jack Cade to ſtrengthen his Party was forced to open the Priſons of the King's-Bench and Marſhalſea, and give Liberty to that raſcally Crew to ſupport the Cauſe, in which they were the only fit Perſons to engage, ſent for the Biſhop of Wincheſter to him in the Tower (the latter at Haliwel for Safety) and having conſulted with him, formed a general Pardon for all Offences hitherto committed, and put the Broad-Seal to it, and paſſing into Southwark cauſed it to be publickly proclaim'd there. The poor deluded People, who long'd to be diſmiſſed, were ſo glad to hear it, that without any Reſpect to their Captain, they left him and departed Home, glad to ſecure themſelves, as faſt as they could. Jack Cade being thus deſerted by all but a very few, and not daring to ſtay for ſuch Succours as were promiſed him by the Favourers of the Duke of York, thought it the wiſeſt Courſe to provide for his own Safety by Flight; and having ſent the beſt of his Plunder by Water to Rocheſter, fled in Diſguiſe into Suſſex into the Wood-Country adjoyning to Lewis, thinking ſo to eſcape, and by gathering a Rebellion again to compaſs his Deſigns, which being known to the King's Council, a Proclamation bearing Date July 10. was put out to encourage all Perſons with the Reward of 1000 Mark to apprehend him, and bring him alive or dead to the King or his Council. Alexander Eden a Gentleman of Kent accidentally (l) ſeeing the ſaid Cade in a Garden at Hothfield in Suſſex, valiantly attempted to take him, and in fight with him ſlew him, and bringing him up to London in a Cart he receiv'd the Reward promiſed, and generouſly won. His Body was quartered, and the four Parts of it ſent into ſeveral Parts of Kent, his Head being ſet on London-Bridge.

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28.

Arch-Biſhop's device to appeaſe the Rebellion.

Cade flies and is taken, but dead.

After this the King himſelf went into Kent, and ſat in Judgment upon ſeveral Perſons, who either were excepted in the Pardon, or had been again ſtirring up Rebellion in thoſe Parts, and cauſed many of them to be executed in almoſt every great Town as well in Suſſex as Kent to be a Terror to all Perſons, who ſhall offend in the like Nature for the future. But yet ſo merciful was the King, that whereas above 500 Perſons were obnoxious to his Juſtice, he puniſhed only the Authors, or chief Leaders in the Treaſon.

In the time of theſe Tumults about London there were alſo ſeveral Seditious Aſſemblies in other Parts, as in Wiltſhire, Hampſhire and London which did much Miſchief; and among other Things William Aſcoth, Biſhop of Salisbury after he had ſaid Maſs at Edington, was by his own Tenants taken from the Altar in his Albe, and with his Stole about his Neck, and being carried to the top of an Hill adjoyning to the Town, was there ſhamefully murthered on June 29. and ſtripped to the Skin: His Shirt which was died in his Blood they divided among them, and diſplay'd the Parts of it as Enſigns of their Wickedneſs which they glory'd in. His Chariot had been robbed the Day before of 10000 Marks.

Several ſeditious Aſſemblies of People.

While the Affairs of England were in this Confuſion, Charles the French King made uſe of the Opportunity to get Aquitain into his Hands, juſt as he had done Normandy before, and to that End ſent the Earls of Penthievrres and Perigort to beſiege Bergerat in Guien, ſituate upon the River of Dourdon, of which Captain Gedding was Commander. The French Forces conſiſted of 2500 Horſe and Lances, which was too powerful an Army for a ſmall Garriſon to oppoſe: Wherefore, becauſe the Captain could expect no Relief he made his Compoſition, that the Engliſh ſhould march out on Horſe-back, and have Liberty to carry out all their Goods, the Inhabitants enjoying their own as formerly, and ſo left the Town to the French. But yet the Lord Camois, Sir George Seimour, and Sir John Arundel, with divers other valiant Captains, who had the Government of the Country beſtirr'd themſelves much to preſerve it to the Engliſh by manning the Towns as well as they could, comforting the Hearts of the Gaſcoignes with Promiſes of Rewards, and ſending Letters into England for ſpeedy Aid, certifying the King, That unleſs they could have Relief ſoon the whole Country would inevitably be loſt. But all they could get was fair Promiſes, no Relief appeared, nor Aid came; whereupon the French Men purſuing their Victories got the Towns of Fanſaike by Aſſault, in which 35 Engliſh were killed, and all the reſt made Priſoners of War; Monſerat, St. Foy and Chalois, which all yielded upon Conditions, becauſe they ſaw it in vain to French King gets Aquitain.

Reg. 29.

(l) Holinſhead writes, that he waited for him there. Ibid. 635.

ha-

A. D. 1450. Reg. 29. hazard their Lives and Eſtates. Burdeaux indeed made a ſmall Reſiſtance, having ſome Advantage upon Monſieur de Orval, Third Son of Monſieur de la Breſh, who was marching with 4 or 5000 Men to invade the Iſle of Madock. The Garriſon of Burdeaux having Intelligence of it, iſſued out with an equal Number of Engliſh and Townſmen to fight him, hoping, if they could vanquiſh them, to ſet a Period to the French Conqueſts. D'Orval was as ready to receive them, as they to attack him, and accordingly they came to a Battel, but the Men of Burdeaux were beaten with the Loſs of 600, and 1300 taken Priſoners. The French got not this Victory without ſome Hurt, for they loſt 800 Men; but the Glory of Conqueſt made Recompence for all, tho' the City yet held out.

Thirteenth Parliament, its Acts.

Upon St. Leonard's Day, which is November the Sixth, began the Parliament to ſit at Weſtminſter, wherein little was done, but only One Act made, whereby Jack Cade was attainted of High Treaſon, and all his Lands, Tenements and Goods given to the King, and his Blood made for ever corrupt. In the Beginning of this Seſſion came the Duke of Somerſet out of Normandy into England; and tho' he was welcom'd Home by the King and Queen, and her Party, yet thro' the Duke of York's Means, and becauſe of the great Loſſes which had happen'd in France under his Regency, he was but roughly entertain'd by the People, who cried out againſt him as the Cauſe of the Loſs of Normandy, and particularly of the City of Caen, the Metropolis of it (m). The Commons in Parliament aſſembled could not but take notice of the popular Clamours, and repreſenting to the King his ill Conduct in France, and treacherous ſurrendring ſeveral Places to the French, caus'd him to be arreſted and impriſon'd December the Firſt, which ſo animated the Rabble about London againſt him, that they got together in great Multitudes, and plunder'd his Houſe in the Black-Friers, carrying away ſuch rich Houſhold Goods, as were portable, and defacing and ſpoiling the reſt. The King hearing of theſe Tumults, put out a ſevere Proclamation, which he caus'd to be publiſh'd in ſeveral Streets of the City, making it Death for any Man to ſpoil or rob Houſes; yet this did not quiet the Rabble, till one of them was beheaded in Cheapſide for doing contrary to it.

Duke of Somerſet impriſon'd, and his Houſe robb'd.

A. D. 1451. Several Places more taken by the French in Guienne.

The Baſtard of Orleans, with his Brother John, Earl of Angoleſm, and many other French Captains, being encourag'd with almoſt the daily Succeſs of their Arms, carry on their Victories with great Zeal, that they might make their Maſter the compleat King of all his Country. And to this End, they beſieged Montguion, which held out 8 Days, and then deſpairing of Relief, yielded; and then went to Blay, a Town ſtanding on the Banks of the Garonne, which having been lately victuall'd and ſtor'd with Ammunition, ſtood out againſt them; but the French fearing no Force without, were reſolv'd that none within ſhould hold it out long; and to that End, beſieged it both by Water and Land, and after ſeveral Aſſaults, took it, having ſlain and taken Priſoners above 200 Engliſh. Some few got into the Caſtle with the Captains, but held it out no longer than they could make a good Capitulation, and then rendred it with themſelves into the Hands of the French. The other Towns, as Burgh, Liborne and Acques, delivered up their Keys at the firſt Summons. Other Captains of the French Party were as active in other Places; and Dunois took Fronſac, a Place impregnable. The Earl of Arminack, an inveterate Enemy to England, took the ſtrong Town of Rion, and the Earl of Pontheur Chatillon in Perigort. Fronſac held them out till the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, in hopes to have Relief; but none coming, they ſurrendred according to Covenant. The honourable Conditions upon which they ſurrendred, ſhew that the French were glad to gain it on any Terms. They were theſe,

A. D. 1451. Reg. 29.

The Surrender of Fronſac and Burdeaux.

I. That the Garriſon ſhould march out with their Horſes and Arms, and leave their Artillery behind them.

II. That thoſe that would ſwear Allegiance to King Charles, ſhould enjoy their Goods and Eſtates, in whatever Part of the Kingdom they were, and be pardon'd all former Faults.

III. That all that would ſerve the King of France in his Wars, whether Citizens or Soldiers of the Garriſon, ſhould have like Entertainment as his other Soldiers.

IV. That ſeveral Engliſh Priſoners named, ſhould be ſet at Liberty without Ranſome.

Which being granted, the Engliſh left the Town, and went to Burdeaux, which was alſo ſoon after beſieged; but made no Reſiſtance, only demanded Time for the coming of Succour, which not appearing by the Day appointed, the Garriſon by Capitulation ſailed into England. Theſe ſtrong Cities being reſign'd, all the other Towns in Guienne ſurrendred immediately except Baion, which the Earl of Dunois beſieged Auguſt the Sixth. This was a very ſtrong Town, and withſtood the French Force, till a great Breach in the Wall being made by their Artillery, they ſaw they muſt be taken, and ſo came to an Agreement, but hard enough, viz. That the Garriſon ſhould depart with their Arms, and the City pay 40000 Crowns. The French Hiſtorians relate a Miracle that happenn'd the next Day after the Surrender of it, which much ſettled the French in their Allegiance to K. Charles. In a clear Day, and ſerene Sky, there appeared a white Cloud in the Form of a Crucifix, with an Azure Crown on the Top of it, which afterward in the Sight of a Thouſand admiring Spectators, was changed to a Flower-de-Luce, and then within half an Hour after vaniſh'd. This being generally known, was thus interpreted, That God by this Prodigy of a White Croſs, did admoniſh them to relinquiſh their Subjection to the Engliſh, whoſe Badge was a Red Croſs, and become firm and faithful Subjects to their own King, whoſe Enſign was a White Croſs, and Arms, a Flower-de-Luce. Whether this were true or no, it is not material to examine; 'tis certain, that all theſe Revolts from the Engliſh, proceeded ſo much from a real Affection to the French King, and were accompanied with ſuch Hatred to the Engliſh, that they were never likely to recover any of their Loſſes again, if they could retain the Little they had left, which was only Callis, Hames and Guiſnes. Thus thro' the Factions of the Nobles and Commons in England, caus'd by the Queen's ill Management, was the Engliſh Intereſt in France quite neglected, and all their Territories loſt.

A Prodigy in the Air.

The Duke of York yet being in Ireland, was nevertheleſs believ'd to be the Fomenter and Stirrer up of Jack Cade's Rebellion, and the other Diſorders of the Nation by his Friends and Emiſſaries; and tho' he was at firſt thought

Duke of York ſuſpected to favour the Rebels.

(m) Roan is the Metropolis or Capital City of Normandy.

to

A. D. 1451. Reg. 29.

to have done the King Service by allaying the Sedition in Ireland with ſo much Mildneſs and Gentleneſs, yet now it was interpreted at Court, as nothing but Policy to ingratiate himſelf with the People, that he might gain their Aſſiſtance to compaſs his Deſigns in England; and therefore it was fear'd, that when ever he return'd, he would bring an Army with him, and diſturb the Peace of the Nation. For theſe Reaſons the King ſent out his particular Orders into Wales, Cheſhire, Shropſhire and other Places, to hinder the Duke from Landing, if he brought any Number of Men along with him; and ſeveral Perſons were employ'd to ſet their Friends in Ireland a-work, to take notice of his Motions and Actions which might tend to Rebellion; that if any Thing of that Nature appear'd, the King by timely Intelligence might provide for it. This after it was known to the Duke, he took very ill, and by Letter expoſtulated concerning it to the King, aſſuring him, That he always had been, and ever would be the King's true Subject. The King denies not the Fact, but owns that he did give ſuch Orders, becauſe of the ſeveral ſeditious Speeches which had been given out concerning him, as well by Seamen as others, which he took to be juſt Cauſe of Fears; but ſince he had declar'd, That he had never intended any ſuch Thing, the King in his Anſwer concludes his Letter thus. For the Eaſing of your Heart in all ſuch Matters, We declare, repute, and admit you, as our true and faithful Subject, and faithful Couſin.

King Henry's Progreſs and his Acts at Exeter.

Towards the Latter End of this Year of the King's Reign, King Henry took a general Progreſs over the Nation, and came to the City of Exeter July 16th. being St. Kenelm's Day, where he was honourably receiv'd by the Clergy, who met him Three Miles from the City, and convey'd him to the Cathedral firſt, and then to the Biſhop's Houſe, where he lodg'd. During his Abode, he caus'd a Seſſions to be held before the Duke of Somerſet, to try ſeveral notorious Criminals and Traitors, who had fled to that Sanctuary, and condemn'd ſeveral of them to Death. The Biſhop and Clergy hearing of it, came with heavy Complaints to the King, that by holding a Seſſions there, he had violated the Priviledge of the Sanctuary, and that theſe actions being againſt Law, were of no effect. The King and his Council told the Biſhop, 'That it was a Scandal to the Church 'and Religion, that ſuch holy Places ſhould be 'a Patronage and Defence to ſuch wicked 'Men, which the Law of God had commanded 'to be puniſh'd by the Magiſtrate's Sword: 'That the Perſons condemn'd, were the moſt 'notorious Malefactors found guilty upon a 'Legal Examination and Tryal, and ought to 'be puniſh'd for a Terror to others: That if 'all Sorts of Crimes might find a Safety in San'ctuaries, contrary to their firſt Intention, Ju'ſtice would be laid aſide, and none puniſh'd 'but ſuch as were not nimble enough to get in'to theſe Places. All theſe Arguments would not prevail. Holy Church, nor the Sanctuary muſt not be prophan'd (as they ſaid) with deciding of temporal Matters, and paſſing Sentences of Condemnation; tho' God orders expreſly, That all wilful Offenders ſhould be taken from the Altar and puniſh'd. Theſe Exclamations mov'd the mild King ſo, that he let fall his lawful Proceedings, and releas'd many notorious Traitors and Criminals, tho' as he judg'd to the Diſgrace of the Church; and ſoon after return'd to London.

The Duke of York, having receiv'd Intelligence in Ireland of the bad Succeſs of his Affairs in England, that Jack Cade was defeated, and his Company wholly routed, reſolv'd to go himſelf into England to conſult with his Friends, and lay a better Foundation for his Proceedings. About Michaelmas he left Ireland, and came to Shore in England at Beau-maris, an Haven of Angleſey, in Northwales, intending to have landed there; but by the King's Order and Command, he was kept from it by certain Officers ſent by the King thither, viz. Henry Norrice, Deputy-Chamberlain, Tho. Norrice, his Brother, William Buckley, William Gruſt and Bartholomew Bold, ſaying, That he was a Traitor, and an Enemy to the King, and ſhould have neither Landing, Refreſhing, nor Lodging for Men or Horſes there. Theſe Words highly offended the Duke, but he had no Remedy but Patience; wherefore Coaſting a while, he got a ſafe landing Place, and poſted with all Speed to his Friends and Well-wiſhers, who waited for his Arrival at London. His chief Aſſiſtants and Counſellors were John Mowbrey, Duke of Norfolk; Richard Nevill, Earl of Salisbury, in Right of his Wife, who was Daughter and Heir to the valiant Hero, Thomas Montague, who was ſlain in the fatal Siege of Orleans; the Lord Richard Nevill, his Son, who was afterwards Earl of Warwick, by the Marriage of the Lady Ann Beauchamp; Thomas Courtney, Earl of Devonſhire, who married the Duke of Somerſet's Daughter, yet ſided againſt her Father; and Edward Brook, Lord Cobham. All of them Perſons of great Authority, numerous Attendants, and daring Valour. Theſe with others of his Friends of leſs Note, had divers Meetings and Conſultations how to raiſe him to the Throne; and at laſt came to a Reſolution, That the Duke of York ſhould raiſe an Army under a Pretence of the Publick Good, viz. to remove the bad Counſellors about the King, and revenge the manifeſt Injuries and Wrongs done to the Kingdom by the Perſons now in Authority, and particularly the Duke of Somerſet, who had loſt Normandy; and being chief in Favour with the Queen, was ſuppos'd to manage all. But that he might have the fairer Pretences to do this, it was adviſed, That he ſhould firſt advertiſe the King himſelf of it by Letter, that it might be redreſs'd; and if he obtain'd it not, (as he knew 'twas not any ways likely he ſhould) then his taking Arms would be the more juſtifiable, and the People would the more certainly and readily take part with him. The Duke was not ſlack to follow theſe Methods, and accordingly in a few Days diſpatch'd a Letter to the King, in which he ſubmiſſively tells him, That great Murmur and Grudging was univerſally in the Realm, becauſe Juſtice was not duly adminiſtred againſt ſuch as treſpaſſed and offended againſt the Laws; and eſpecially againſt ſuch as were indicted of High-Treaſon, or ſaid openly to be guilty of it, whereby great Inconveniences have riſen to the Realm. Wherefore he counſels and adviſes the King, offering himſelf to be an Aſſiſtant in it, forthwith to ordain and provide, that impartial Juſtice be done to puniſh the ſaid Offenders, and and redreſs all Diſorders in Government; and to that End, to ſend his Writs out to arreſt ſuch Perſons as are guilty of it, of what Eſtate or Degree ſoever they be, and to commit them to the Tower of London, and other Priſons, there to remain without Bail or Mainprize, till they ſhall be deliver'd thence by Courſe of Law, and particularly the Duke of Somerſet. The King not ſuſpecting the Deſign, nor obſerving how he ſought an Occaſion to quarrel with him, returns him this Anſwer. That he had determin'd ſometime ſince with himſelf to erect a Council, (of which he had appointed the

A. D. 1451. Reg. 30.

Duke of York goes into England from Ireland.

Duke of York and his Friends contrive a Rebellion.

The Duke of York's Letter to the King.

The King's Anſwer.

A. D. 1451. Reg. 30.

the Duke of York to be one) and give them a more ample Authority and Power, than ever any had before, to reform all Diſorders, and puniſh all ſuch notorious Crimes as he complain'd of; but being a Matter of great Importance he would adviſe firſt with his Chancellor, and other Lords of his Council about it, and with them take ſuch Orders as ſhould be for the Publick Benefit of the Nation, and in the mean time would keep the Duke of Somerſet under ſuch Safe-guard, that he ſhould be ready to anſwer to the Crimes objected againſt him.

A. D. 1452.

Duke of York raiſes an Army in Wales, and marches to London.

This Anſwer, tho' as full as could be expected from a King to a Subject, did not at all ſatisfie, but the Duke immediately goes into Wales to levy an Army under Colour of removing bad Counſellours, and preſerving the Nation from Ruin, and in a little time gather'd a great Number of People to aſſiſt him in his Enterprize. The King had ſoon Information of the Duke's Actions and Doings in thoſe Parts from his Friends there, and having raiſed a ſtrong Army, marched into Wales with the Duke of Somerſet (now ſet at Liberty) along with him, intending to ſuppreſs the growing Rebellion in its Riſe; but the Duke of York had Notice of the King's March towards him, and declined him, hoping to increaſe his Numbers in his Paſſage and to get Poſſeſſion of London, to which he was reſolv'd to go directly. The King was not preſently ſenſible of the Duke's March by him, and ſo he recovered London before the King could overtake him; tho' after he heard that he was march'd that way, he followed him with all convenient Speed. The Duke ſent ſome of his Friends before him to the Citizens to repreſent his Undertaking to them, and ſhew them, that he had put his Life in his Hands, and adventured the Loſs of all that was dear to him, that he might retrieve the Nation from impending Ruin; and ſince London was the Capital City, they were chiefly concerned to join with him in ſo noble an Attempt, which if they would do, he doubted not of ſuch Succeſs as ſhould enable him to requite their Favours with infinite Advantage to them: But the Londoners dared not to venture a ſecond Time, ſince they had been ſo Unſucceſsful in Jack Cade's Rebellion, and ſo deny'd to receive him into their City. The Duke tho' greatly diſappointed diſſembled his Anger, and croſſing over the Bridge at Kingſtone, pitched his Camp on Burnt-Heath near Dartford, within Ten or Twelve Miles of London, with Trenches and Artillery. The King who followed the Duke the faſter becauſe he ſeem'd to flie, came up to London ſoon after and encamped his Army on Black-Heath, a few Miles diſtant from him; but before he would come to a Battle being very ſparing of his Subjects Blood on both Sides, he ſent the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas Bourchier, Biſhop of Ely, Richard Woodvile, Lord Rivers, and Richard Andrews, Keeper of his Privy-Seal to know of the Duke for what Cauſes he had taken up Arms to diſturb the Peace of the King and his Good Subjects, and to exhort him to ſubmit to the King's Mercy and lay down his Arms. The Meſſage was deliver'd to him by theſe Perſons, and he anſwer'd, That he had taken up Arms not to do any Damage to the King, either in his Honour or Perſon, nor any of the King's good Subjects, but to remove from him ſeveral ill-diſpoſed Perſons of his Council, Enemies of their Country and King, who abuſed the Nobility, oppreſſed the Clergy, and impoveriſhed the Commons, of whom the Duke of Somerſet was the Chief, and if the King would put him into ſafe Cuſtody, till he ſhould in Parliament make a Defence to ſuch Things, as ſhould be objected againſt him, he would diſmiſs his Troops, and preſent himſelf before the King, and ſerve him as all good Subjects ought to do. The Biſhops and Lords, who were ſent from the King, had a Commiſſion to grant any reaſonable Terms of Agreement which the Duke ſhould require, and therefore aſſured him, that the Duke of Somerſet ſhould immediately be clap'd up in Priſon, and ſo the Duke on the firſt of March diſmiſſed his Army, and broke up his Camp according to his Promiſe.

A. D. 1452. Reg. 30.

Duke of York diſmiſſes his Army.

This Peace which might ſeem to ſavour of Cowardiſe, was made by the Duke out of Policy and good Conſideration; for the King's Army was much greater than his, and conſiſted of much better Soldiers, ſo that he was in danger to have loſt all, if he had come to a Battle; Beſides, he had a further Reaſon to diſmiſs his Army, which he more relied on, and that was, That by diſmiſſing his Men upon Promiſes of a Reformation, he would give the Nation a Proof, that he purely ſought their Good, and not his own Advancement, that he aimed not at the Crown, but publick Welfare.

Some Days after Things were thus compoſed the Duke of York went to the King's Tent at Black-Heath, but contrary to his Expectation finding the Duke of Somerſet at Liberty, he burſt out into a Paſſion, and complain'd of the King's Breach of Promiſe in not impriſoning him, whom he accuſed of Treaſon, Bribery, Oppreſſion, and many other Crimes, but Somerſet as hotly recriminated, telling him, that he was the greateſt Traitor, affirming, that had contrived with his Friends and Accomplices to depoſe the King and aſſume the Crown to himſelf and Poſterity. The King was amaz'd at the Words of both Sides, and put off the Hearing of them to a full Council, which he reſolved immediately to call; and to that End return'd to London with all ſpeed, and ſummon'd all his Nobles together at Weſtminſter. By the Way it was much wonder'd at, that the Duke of York was carried as a Priſoner, but Somerſet went at large. Before the King and his Council thus met the two Dukes charged each other with great Crimes. York urged all the popular Accuſations, as the Loſs of Normandy, Bribery, and Oppreſſion of the People with much Zeal, and many Aggravations. Somerſet anſwer'd them all, and added further, That the Duke of York had long ago reſolv'd upon the Ruin of the King, and the Houſe of Lancaſter, that he might make himſelf King, and transfer the Crown upon himſelf and his Family, and to that End had conſpired with many others how he might do it with moſt Certainty and leaſt Danger: That if the Duke of York and his whole Family were not now puniſh'd with Death for theſe Crimes, ſuch a Civil War would enſue as would prove the utter Deſtruction of the King and Kingdom. The Duke of York utterly denied this heavy Charge, and the Council was inclined to accept his Denial, as an Argument of his Innocency, partly becauſe they thought, that if he had really been guilty of any ſuch Crime, he would not have diſmiſſed his Army ſo eaſily, and partly becauſe there was a Rumour ſpread abroad, that the Earl of March the Duke of York's Eldeſt Son was coming up to London with a great Army of March-men to deliver his Father, which concurring with ſome Neceſſities of State to uſe the King's Army in Gaſcoigne, which Province having ſent the Earl of Kendall and Lord D'Eſpar to offer their Obedience again, if they could be ſure of Defence from the French, the Duke of York was diſcharged after he had taken an Oath in St. Paul's Church before the King and all his Nobility, Duke of York encamp'd at Burnt-Heath, and the King on Black-Heath.

Dukes of York and Somerſet accuſe each other.

A. D. 1452. Reg. 30.

Duke of York ſwears Allegiance to K. Henry. See the Oath at length in Holinſhead and Stow.

to this Effect. 'That he is, and ever would 'be the King's humble and faithful Subject, and 'bear him Faith and Truth all the Days of his 'Life; That he would at no Time aſſent to 'any thing attempted or done againſt his no-'ble Perſon, and if he had Knowledge of any 'ſuch Purpoſes would diſcover them to the 'King's Highneſs, and do all he could to hin-'der them; That he would never take any 'thing upon him againſt the King's Royal State 'or Obeiſance, nor ſuffer others ſo to do, but 'come always at the King's Commandment, un-'leſs hindered by Sickneſs; That he would not 'for the future aſſemble or gather together any 'People unleſs at the King's Command, or in 'his own Defence, but if he were wronged or 'aggrieved would proceed after a Courſe of 'Law for Remedy of them: All this he promi-'ſed to obſerve and keep by the Holy Evange-'liſts, which he laid his Hand on, the Croſs, 'which he touched, and the Holy Sacrament, 'which he was about to receive; and deſired 'that if he ever attempted any Thing by Arms 'againſt the King's Majeſty, he might be for 'ever accounted a forſworn Man, and depri-'ved of his Eſtate and Dignity; declaring, 'that he did all this without any Conſtraint, and ſo ſubſcribed and ſealed it. The Duke of York being ſet at Liberty by theſe Means, went to his Caſtle of Wigmore in the Marches of Wales and there kept himſelf as it were in Private, yet not without his Spies upon the Court, and the Duke of Somerſet's Actions, who after his Departure was freed from his Rival, and roſe higher in the Favour of the King and Queen than ever, ruling and governing all, as he pleaſed.

The King and Council having wiſely compoſed this Domeſtick Broil, though indeed it was but like a Sore skinned over for the preſent, which breaks out more violently, fell cloſe to a Conſultation, how to anſwer the Expectation of the People of Gaſcoigne, who being oppreſſed with the King of France's Army, and with Taxes, longed for the old Liberty they enjoyed under the Engliſh, and grew weary of the French Yoke. Delays in this Caſe are dangerous. The Commons are fickle and unconſtant. The Gaſcoignes if not eaſed might and would change their Minds, and turn to the French again: Whereupon an Army was diſpatched into France under the Command of the valiant Lord Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, who though a Perſon always diligent, yet in this Caſe out-did himſelf, and with 3000 men arrived in the Iſle of Madocke before he was ſuſpected. His Deſign was to march directly to Bourdeaux, but was ſtopped in his Way a few Days by the ſtrong Town of Fronſacke, which held out againſt him, yet after a fierce Aſſault yielded; and he uſed the Inhabitants the more ſeverely, becauſe he would terrifie the neighbouring Towns, which without more ado returned to their Obedience. The City of Bourdeaux hearing of Talbot's Arrival ſent Meſſengers by Night to him to take Poſſeſſion of the City, which he neglected not one Moment to do, and got before the Town, the French having no Suſpition of them. At his Arrival the Citizens opened a Gate to give the Engliſh Entrance, which when the French Garriſon obſerved, they endeavoured to have ſaved themſelves at a Poſtern, but being purſued moſt of them were taken and impriſoned, but very few or none ſlain, either of them or the Townſmen. The Lord D'Eſpar and his Friends were very ſerviceable to the Engliſh in taking the Town. The Lord Talbot fix'd here a while to fortifie the City, and confirm them in their Duty to K. Henry, that he might more ſafely leave them to regain the adjoyning Country.

An Army of Engliſh ſent into Gaſcoigne. Reg. 31.

Bourdeaux gain'd by the Lord Talbot.

A. D. 1452. Reg. 31. A. D. 1453.

While he was doing this, K. Henry ſent over a Recruit of 2200 Men to join with him with Victuals and Ammunition under the Command of the Baſtard of Somerſet, Sir John Talbot, Son to the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lords Moline, Harington and Camois, and ſome others, with which he marched into the Country about Bourdeaux, and obtained many Towns and Villages without ſtriking a ſtroke, the Inhabitants gladly embracing the Opportunity of ſubmitting to the Engliſh under the Pretence of Fear and Force, to which they had ſuch Inclinations through the Severity of their new Lord. The King of France hearing of this Invaſion by the Engliſh, and with what Succeſs they went on in taking Towns, raiſed an Army to oppoſe them, and ſending his Son-in-law Count Clermont, and Meſſiers de Lorhac and Orvall with 600 Horſe, and 1200 Croſs-bow-men to put ſome ſtop to their Progreſs till he could gather a bigger Force, came in a few Days to them with 22000 Men, of which he kept 15000 in a Body, and ſent the reſt under the Marſhal De Lorhac to beſiege Chaſtillon, a Town which had lately revolted to the Engliſh. The Lord Talbot was as zealous to keep what he had gotten as to gain more, and therefore made haſte to raiſe the Siege, having with him 5000 Foot, and 800 Horſe. In his Way he took a Tower fortified by the French, and meeting with a Party of 500 which were come out a Foraging, he encountred them, ſlew and took many of them, the reſt flying to the Camp at Chaſtillon, gave Notice to them of Talbot's Approach. The French hearing it were afraid to hold on their Siege, and withdrew in good Order into their Camp which they had trenched, ditched, and fortified with Ordnance. Talbot had information, that the Siege was remov'd, and that the French had ſo placed themſelves, that he could not attack them but at a great Diſadvantage, yet knowing that the main Army of the Enemy was near, and that it would be almoſt impoſſible to free himſelf of it without fighting, he went on and aſſaulted the Camp with ſo much Fierceneſs, that he at laſt gain'd the Entry into it after a long and dubious Conteſt; but riding himſelf in the midſt of his Soldiers to encourage them in this brave Action, was ſurrounded by his Enemies, and with an Hand-gun-ſhot through his Thigh, which killed his Horſe, and he fell to the Ground, and ſo being in their Power was ſlain. His Son Sir John Talbot, Lord Liſle was cloſe by his Father when this Accident happen'd, who adviſed him to ſave himſelf by Flight, becauſe the Victory was loſt, and it would be Fool-hardineſs, not Courage to oppoſe a deſperate Fate. He was young and might do his Country Service, if he would reſerve himſelf to a more lucky Juncture, but it would ſtain all his former Actions ſo to do. The young Man, though never in a Battle before, yet had ſo much of his Father's Courage in him, that he would not ſhrink back, and choſe rather to die with his Father than accept that Advice which might make him look not like his Son. With him died alſo Sir Henry Talbot his Baſtard Brother, and Sir Edward Hall with 300 others, Men of Note and Valour. The Lord Molins and 60 more were taken Priſoners, the reſt that ſaved themſelves eſcaped to Bourdeaux, the Slain on the Engliſh Side were 1000, the French ſay 2000. The Lord Talbot being thus kill'd in the 80th Year of his Age, and the Engliſh Army routed, Chaſtillon ſurrender'd it ſelf into the Hands of the French upon Conditions, That the Engliſh

King of France raiſes an Army to oppoſe the Lord Talbot.

The Earl of Shrewſbury killed and his Son.

July 13.

A. D. 1453. Reg. 31. Garriſon might march out with their Goods, and paſs ſafely to Bourdeaux. The Body of this brave Man lay ſometime among the Dead undiſcover'd, but being after found out by his Friends, was carried to Whitchurch in Shropſhire, and there interr'd. After this Defeat, the French Towns revolted as faſt from the Engliſh as they before came over to them, ſo that the French King in a few Weeks recover'd all Gaſcoigne except Bourdeaux, which being the laſt that held for the Engliſh, the French King beſieg'd it in Perſon with his whole Army, reſolving not to leave it till he had taken it. The Citizens valiantly defended themſelves as long as they had any Proviſions left, but being oppreſſed by Famine, were forc'd to capitulate. The French King willingly accepted their Propoſals, and granted them almoſt as eaſie Conditions as they could deſire; for his Army was as ſeverely afflicted by the Plague without, as the Beſieged were by Famine within; ſo the City of Bourdeaux was yielded to the French on theſe Conditions.

Burdeaux retaken.

I. That the Engliſh might have Liberty with all their Subſtance to depart ſafely into England or Calis, and the Gaſcoignes enjoy their Goods and Poſſeſſions.

II. That the Lords D'Eſpar, Duras, and 30 others, ſhould never upon pain of Death be found in any of the French King's Dominions.

And thus was the Dutchy of Aquitain wholly loſt, after it had been in the Engliſh Hands near 300 Years.

Reg. 32. In the Beginning of this Year of his Reign, had King Henry a long Sickneſs at Claringdon, in which he was in great Danger of his Death, and happy had he been if God had taken him away from the Troubles, which were ſhortly to come upon him; but it pleaſed the Almighty to lengthen out his Life, and by the Uſe of Means to reſtore him to his former Health, which concurring with another great Bleſſing to the Royal Family, the Birth of a Prince, caus'd great Joy at Court, and thro' the whole Nation, with thoſe who bore a good Will to the Lancaſtrian Line. For Queen Margaret was deliver'd of a Son at Weſtminſter, October 13. who was ſhortly after Chriſtned by the Name of Edward. But the Yorkiſts, who ſought to eſtabliſh the Duke of York and his Family in the Throne, and were hot in contriving the Ways to it, ſpake diſgracefully and ſcornfully of this Birth; and gave it out, That the King was inſufficient and unable to get a Child, and therefore it was an adulterous Brat; but others thinking this Slander too notorious, becauſe the King was not above Two or Three and Thirty Years Old, and might well enough be ſuppos'd able to father a Child, unleſs a natural Impotency could have been prov'd againſt him, which neither was, nor could be, denied not that the Queen had a Child; but dying ſoon after its Birth, the Prince was another's Child put in his ſtead. The King and Queen were much diſturb'd at theſe vile Reports of their Enemies; but the King was not at all diſpleas'd with the Queen, which ſhew'd he had no Suſpicion of her; and it can't be reaſonably ſuppos'd, that a Perſon of ſuch eminent Piety, as K. Henry was allow'd to be by his Enemies, would be privy to ſo ill a Deſign, as to accept another's Child for his own, ſo that the Satisfaction which the King took in the Birth of the Prince, and teſtified in Feaſting the Court, and creating divers Noblemen, as his Two Brethren by Mother's ſide, he made Edmund, Earl of Richmond, and Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, muſt be allow'd Arguments ſufficient to clear the Queen's Innocency with all impartial Perſons, tho' they would not ſatisfie their Enemies, who were reſolv'd to deprive both Father and Son of the Crown.

K. Henry dangerouſly ſick.

Prince Edward born, and the Queen aſperſed about the Birth.

A. D. 1453. Reg. 32.

John Norman, who this Year was made Mayor of London, was ſworn at Weſtminſter according to the common Cuſtom, upon the Morrow after the Feaſt of St. Simon and St. Jude's Day; but whereas formerly the Mayor uſed to ride with great Pomp, attended with the Aldermen, and a numerous Train thro' the City to Weſtminſter, to be ſworn This Mayor was rowed in Barges to the great Advantage of the Watermen, who foreſeeing the Profit, made a Song upon his Commendation, beginning, Row the Boat Norman, Row to the Lemman, &c. From him and his Time hath the Cuſtom been deduc'd which ſtill continues, for the Mayor to go by Water to Weſtminſter to be ſworn, and pity it is, it ſhould be ever alter'd, which is ſo beneficial a Cuſtom to the poor Watermen.

Mayor of London firſt went to Weſtminſter by Water to be ſworn.

The. Bourchier made Archbiſhop of Canterbury. A. D. 1454.

A little befor Chriſtmas in this Year died John Kemp, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was tranſlated from the See of York to that See in the Room of John Stafford. Thomas Bourchier, Biſhop of Ely, Son to the Counteſs of Stafford, and Brother to Henry Bourchier, Earl of Eſſex, was remov'd to the See of Canterbury, being made Biſhop of that See, by Nicholas V. then Pope of Rome. He behav'd himſelf ſo well in this great Station, that King Henry made him his Chancellor, and Pope Paul II. rais'd him to the Dignity of Cardinal, ſo that he was as great a Man, as ever ſat in that Archiepiſcopal Seat.

The Beginning of the Wars between the Families of York and Lancaſter.

The Wars of France being now at an End, the Civil Diſſentions between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter began in contending for the Crown. Richard, Duke of York, was the Author of this War, and tho' he had ſworn to King Henry never to diſturb his Peace, nor move any Rebellion againſt him; yet his ambitious Deſire of Rule would not let him reſt, till he had the Crown on his Head. His Title indeed was very fair according to the Laws of this Realm, being the great Grandſon of Lionell, Duke of Clarence, Elder Brother to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, by whom the Three Henries derived their Right to the Crown. But King Henry VI. tho' his Title was not ſo fair and clear, yet not being the Uſurper himſelf, but ſucceeding upon the Uſurpation of his Father and Grandfather, Two moſt excellent Princes, and being himſelf of known Goodneſs and Piety, had ſo deep an Hold in the People's Affections, both for his Father's Sake as well as his own, that any barefac'd Pretenſions to the Crown, eſpecially conſidering that none of the Line of the Duke of Clarence were ever in Poſſeſſion of the Throne, would have appear'd both ſtrange and ridiculous. And therefore the Duke of York ſpent moſt of this Summer in inſinuating Jealouſies into the Heads of the People, and by common Bruits and Reports to foment their Diſcontents. The Two Things which he chiefly buzz'd into their Ears, were, York's Inſinuations into the Commons and Nobles.

1. That King Henry, tho' a very pious, good Man, was too meek and mean-Spirited to rule a Kingdom, which not his Enemies only thought of him, but his Friends, who abus'd his Weakneſs, and uſurp'd his Power; the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet ruling all at their Pleaſure, and leaving him nothing but the Name of King, which certainly was an intolerable Encroachment upon the People, and a Shame to England all over the World, to be govern'd by a Woman and her Minions. That the Condition of the

A. D. 1454. Reg. 32. Reg 33.

the preſent Times were ſuch, that they requir'd a King of Valour, Activity and Judgment, who by his Virtues and Wiſdom, might ſettle Affairs both Abroad and at Home.

2. That notwithſtanding he had once taken up Arms to reſcue the Kingdom out of the Hands of the Duke of Somerſet, and bring him to an Account for the unfaithful Management of his Truſt in his Regency in France, in loſing the whole Dukedom of Normandy, and had by Agreement laid down his Arms upon the King's Promiſe, that Somerſet ſhould be kept in ſafe Cuſtody, and give an Anſwer to all Accuſations brought againſt him the next Parliament, which was ſoon to meet for that Purpoſe, yet nothing was done in it. The Duke enjoy'd not only Liberty, but was in greater Favour and Power than ever, and no Parliament likely to meet, ſo that the Kingdom was in as bad or worſe Condition than before; and the Men who were the Ruin of the Nation, were honour'd and encourag'd. A lamentable Poſture of Affairs! And ſhall the Lovers of their Country ſtand ſtill and ſee its Deſtruction, without putting an helping Hand to deliver it?

York's Friends.

By theſe and ſuch like Speeches he had diſpos'd the Nation to a Rebellion, not againſt the King, (for no Harm was meant him good Man, who did no Ill to any Man, and deſir'd the Nation's Welfare in all Things) but againſt the Queen, Duke of Somerſet, and the reſt of the Cabal, who uſurp'd the King's Authority. The Duke in the mean Time wrought himſelf into the good Opinion of the Nobility, who moſt of them hated the Queen's Doings, and envied Somerſet's Greatneſs, and eſpecially made the Two Nevills, Father and Son, the one Earl of Salisbury, and the other Earl of Warwick, his Friends; Salisbury the moſt eminent for Policy and Council, the Earl of Warwick very popular, and admir'd for his innate Valour and Magnificence, Men able to raiſe and depoſe as they pleas'd. Things being thus concerted among theſe Noblemen, and contriv'd to be put in Execution. The firſt Attempt they made was upon the Duke of Somerſet, whom they caus'd to be arreſted in the Queen's Bed-Chamber, and ſent him to the Tower of London, where he kept but a ſad Chriſtmas, under the Fears of his Enemies Malice, who were preparing a Bill of black Accuſations againſt him to be ready for the Parliament, which was to meet ſoon. The King was very ſick and hardly ſenſible when theſe Things were done by the Duke of York, to whom, as ſome write, the Regency of the Kingdom was committed by the Council, during the King's Weakneſs, and by Virtue of this Authority it was, that he call'd the Parliament to meet within a few Weeks after Chriſtmas, and there openly before all the Lords and Commons aſſembled, accus'd the Duke of Somerſet of High-Treaſon, and many other heinous Crimes, as the Loſs of Normandy, and the late Miſchance which happen'd in Guien. But the Queen, who was as intent for the Delivetance of the Duke of Somerſet, as his Enemies were on his Deſtruction, had ſo contriv'd Matters, that nothing ſhould be done againſt him; for the King being ſomething amended, and come well to his Senſes, ſhe caus'd him, tho' very weak, to be carried to the Houſes, and there to diſſolve the Parliament for the preſent; and ſo nothing was determin'd in the Matter. This being done, Somerſet was immediately ſet at Liberty, and that he might be out of the Reach of his Enemies Malice, he was made Captain of Callis and Guiſnes, the only Parts of France that remain'd in the King's Hands, which caus'd a freſh Diſcontent both among the Nobility and Commons, who did not ſpare to ſay openly, That he was a very unfit Perſon to be entruſted with thoſe important Places, who was better at ſurrendring Towns than keeping of them; and if he was not afraid to yield up all Normandy to the Enemy, he would not ſcruple to deliver Two Forts only.

A. D. 1455. Reg. 33.

A. D. 1455. Duke of Somerſet impriſoned, and accuſed in Parliament.

Fourteenth Parliament, its Acts.

The Duke of York being thus enrag'd at his Second Diſappointment, grew reſolute to revenge himſelf by Arms, and having obtain'd an Abſolution from the Obligation of his former Oath from the Pope, went into Wales, accompanied with his ſpecial Friends, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, the Lord Cobham and others, to gather another Army, and come up to London, which being known to the King and his Party, they prepared what Aids they could for their own Defence, and having gotten together a Body of about 2000 Men, the King himſelf in Perſon, with the Dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham, the Earls of Northumberland, Dorſet, Devonſhire, Wiltſhire and Pembroke, left London, (becauſe it was thought the Duke of York had too many Friends there) and march'd May 21. to meet and engage him by the way. They came the firſt Night to Wadford, and the next Day to St. Albans, where hearing of the Approach of the Duke of York, he encamped and pitched his Standard in a Place call'd Goſlow, or Sandiford, in St. Peter's Street. The Duke of York by his Spies knew all the King's Motions, but ſtill kept on his March to St. Albans, and encamped in Keyfield near the ſame Town, his Army conſiſting of about 3000. The Duke and King being thus in Sight of one another with their Forces, the King after his peacable Manner, ſends Meſſengers to the Duke (tho' others ſay, that the Duke firſt ſent Letters to the King) viz. the Duke of Buckingham and ſome other Nobles, to know of him what he meant by appearing in ſuch an hoſtile Manner, to the Diſturbance of the Peace and Quiet of the Nation, contrary to his former Oath and Promiſes. The Duke of York return'd them Anſwer, 'That 'both he himſelf and all with him were the 'King's faithful and loyal Subjects, and intended 'no Harm to his Perſon, but came to require 'that wicked and haughty Man the Duke of 'Somerſet, who had loſt Normandy, neglected 'Gaſcoigne, and brought the Realm into this 'miſerable State; That whereas it was once 'and lately the Terror, now it is the Scorn 'and Deriſion of the World; That they would 'not be put off with fair Promiſes as they had 'formerly been, but would have him that hath 'deſerv'd Death, or die in the Quarrel; yet 'if it would pleaſe the King to reſign that bad 'Man into their Hands, they were ready with-'out Trouble, or farther Breach of the Peace 'to lay down their Arms, and return into their 'own Countries. The King hearing this Anſwer, grew angry, and told the Meſſengers from the Lords, 'That he would not deliver 'up the Duke of Somerſet, nor any Man in his 'Army to his Enemies, who had faithfully ad-'hered to him againſt them, commanding them 'all to lay aſide their Arms, and threatning 'them to hang them as a Terror to others, if 'they ſhould dare to appear or fight againſt 'him. As ſoon as the Duke of York receiv'd his Anſwer, he returned himſelf to his Men and ſaid, 'Since our Soveraign Lord will not be re-'form'd by our Intreaties, nor underſtand the 'Intention of our Meeting together, but is fully 'purpoſed to deſtroy us, and hath confirm'd his 'Reſolution with a great Oath, let us conſider

Duke of York abſolv'd from his Oath of Allegiance gathers an Army.

The King meets the Duke of York at St. Albans with an Army.

A. D. 1455. Reg. 33.

'the Danger we are in, and to avoid this Miſ-
'chief quit our ſelves like Men, and rather die
'with our Swords in our Hands, than to be put
'to an ignominious Death to ſhame our ſelves and 'our Poſterity. And God Almighty, who reigns
'in Heaven keep us in our Right, and make us
'ſtrong to oppoſe the Malice of them that ſeek
'our Ruin. And ſo gave Order to ſound for the Battel. But while theſe Things were doing at one End of the Town, the Earl of Warwick arriv'd (n) with his March-Men at the other, and with great Fury fell upon the King's Vanguard, which having routed before the Duke of Somerſet could come to relieve it, he brake into the Town about the middle of St. Peter's Street. The Duke of York ſeeing that fell on alſo with his Men, and ſo a furious Battel was commenc'd, which laſted ſome Hours with ſo much Slaughter, that it was thought there would not have been a Man left on either Side alive; but the Duke of York being much the ſtronger Side, and having kept back a certain Number of Men to renew the Battel, when the reſt were wearied and tired, he ſo ordered the Matter at laſt, that by their Means the Victory became compleatly his; the King's Army was routed with the Loſs of 800 of his Men, among whom were Edmund, Duke of Somerſet, Henry, Earl of Northumberland, Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, Son to the Duke of Buckingham, John, Lord Clifford, and many other Perſons of Note. Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham was wounded, and left the Battel when he ſaw that it would go againſt the King, as did alſo James Butler, Earl of Wiltſhire, and Tho. Thorp, Lord Chief Baron, with many other of the King's Retinue, who gave a bad example to the timorous Soldiers, and loſt the Day. The King, tho' none of the beſt Warriors, remain'd till the laſt; but ſeeing himſelf forſaken, retir'd into a poor Man's Houſe, where he might lurk as he thought unſuſpected, till the Enemy withdrew, and he might have Opportunity to provide better for his own Safety; but he could not lie hid long. The Duke of York had Notice where he was, and immediately went to him, with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and being come into his Preſence, beſought him on their Knees, to 'forgive them what they had done that Day, and 'accept them for his Loyal Subjects; for now 'the Duke of Somerſet, the common Enemy of 'the Nation, and the Cauſe of this Commotion, 'was dead, he and all adherents would remain during their Lives his faithful and obedient Subjects, and be ready in all Points to 'ſerve him as their Duty obliged them; and 'the Kingdom being in Peace, he ſhould now 'reign in the greateſt Happineſs that ever King 'did; ſo that the Deſtruction of Somerſet was 'his Preſervation. The King being little comforted at theſe good Words, deſir'd them to 'take care there were no more Hurt done, and 'keep their Soldiers from plundering and killing his People. (For the Northern Men after the Victory, behaved themſelves very outrageouſly to the Townſmen and others, who had fought on the King's Side, killing and robbing as they pleaſed.) Whereupon the Lords put out a Proclamation in the King's Name, That all manner of Perſons ſhould lay aſide their Malice one to another, and not commit any Acts of Hoſtility againſt any Man: And ſo all was quieted. The Duke of York and the Lords with him, having the King in their Power, conducted him with great Honour and Reverence to St. Alban's Shrine, and after to his Lodgings, where he reſted that Night. The next Day they remov'd with the King to London, and took up their Abode in the Biſhop's Palace, where they kept their Whitſuntide with great Mirth and Solemnity, concluding there to call a Parliament to ſettle and compoſe all Things for the Good of the King and his People. This Battel of St. Albans was fought May 23. The Bodies of the Noblemen ſlain in it were buried in the Chappel of our Lady in the Abby there, and the reſt in the Field adjoyning. The Duke of Somerſet left three Sons, Henry, Edmund and John, who to revenge their Father's Death took always King Henry's Part.

The Armies of the King and Duke of York encounter at St. Albans, and the King is vanquiſh'd.

The King taken by the Duke of York.

A. D. 1455. Reg. 33.

K. Henry carried by the Duke of York to London.

Fifteenth Parliament, its Acts.

The Parliament met as by Appointment of the King and Lords upon July 9. and ſettled all Things according to the Lords Minds, but under the Pretence of doing them for the common Good. Some few Acts of Parliament were made for a Colour of the Juſtice, and Care of the Lords to the common Safety, viz. That Servants of Perſons lately deceaſed, who have embezill'd their Maſter's Goods before the Executors could enter upon them, ſhall be attainted of Felony if they are found Guilty: That whereas the Officers of the Exchequer were guilty of great Extortion in exacting Fees on the People, it was hinted what Fees ſhould be taken by them in the ſeveral Cauſes there adjudged and decided: That there ſhould be but Six Common Attorneys in Norfolk, Six in Suffolk, and Two in Norwich, becauſe it was found by Experience, that the Multitude of Attorneys in thoſe Countries ſtirred up and procured many Suits of Law for ſmall Treſpaſſes, little Offences, and ſmall Debts. Theſe Acts were only to be a Specimen to the People, what a Reformation there would be if the popular Lords had the Rule, which was a curious Prologue to what followed, and was chiefly intended, and which began with theſe Votes.

Popular Votes, and a Settlement upon it.

1. That the Government as it was managed by the Queen, Duke of Somerſet, and their Friends, had been of late a great Injuſtice and Oppreſſion to the People.

2. That the King, who was of himſelf a pious and good Prince, had been abuſed by thoſe that counſelled and adviſed him, to his great Diſhonour.

3. That the Duke of Glouceſter, whoſe Memory had been ſtained with a Charge of Treaſon and Rebellion ſince his Death, was a true and faithful Subject both to King and the Realm.

4. That all Alienations and Gifts of the Revenues and Lands of the Crown, whether made by the King himſelf or his Parliament, from the firſt Year of his Reign ſhould be revoked, and the ſaid Lands and Revenues reſumed and taken into the King's Hands.

5. That no Perſon or Perſons ſhould judge or report, that the Duke of York, Earls of Salisbury and Warwick were guilty of Rebellion or Treaſon in coming in a Warlike Manner againſt the King at St. Albans, ſince the Action was neceſſary and taken in Hand to free the King from Captivity, and bring Peace and Safety to the Nation, but all the Blame was to be laid upon the Duke of Somerſet, Lord Chief Baron Thorp, and William Joſeph, Eſq; who out of a malicious and evil Deſign kept a Letter ſent by the Lords from the King's Knowledge, which if it had been deliver'd to the King's Majeſty would have taken away the Occaſion of theſe Diſorders.

(n) Hall ſays the Earl of Warwick fell upon the King's Men while there was a Treaty of Peace on Foot.

By

A. D. 1455. Reg. 33.

The Settlement of the Government upon the Duke of York and his Party.

By these Votes and Acts they made way for the Resolution, which was the main drift of all, and by which it was appointed, that the Duke of York should be the Protector of the Realm; That the Earl of Salisbury should be Lord Chancellor, and to that End the great Seal was delivered to him, and the Earl of Warwick was made Governour of Calis, and the Territories thereunto belonging, and so all Authority both Civil and Military was in a manner put into the Hands of the Lords, and Henry had only left him the Name of a King, nor should have that, 'tis probable, but that his Innocency and Holiness was had in so great Veneration among the common People, that had K. Henry suffered any Evil from the Lords, they would have immediately forsaken them, and turned their Fury upon them. This the Lords were very sensible of, and therefore would venture no further against him, than might fairly justifie their Pretences to reform the former ill-Government, and establish the Commonwealth in its ancient flourishing Condition, and to this End they displaced all such Persons from Offices of Trust in the Court, and from the Privy-Council, as the King loved, or Queen favoured, had any Principle of Loyalty, or had been Supporters of the Lancastrian Line; They were also careful to administer Justice impartially, and avoid Delays of Suits, and punish Bribery to ingratiate themselves with the People. And tho' they ventured upon one Thing, which never any King durst do, which was to take John Holland, Duke of Exeter out of the Sanctuary at Westminster to imprison him in Pomfraict-Castle, a Sacriledge much complained of by the Abbot and his Monks, and contrary to an Order made in the last Parliament, yet the plausible Pretence of doing it for the publick Good made the People to swallow it patiently, and dispense with the Injury done to the Church.

Reg. 34.

The Queen and her Friends unsettle the late Orders in Parliament, and contrive to restore the King.

Thee Queen, who while the King was in his Enemy's Hands, and ruled by their Councils, or rather over-ruled by their Threats and Policy, beheld all these Transactions with great Regret, as soon as he was deilvered, sought all means to revoke what they had settled, and place the King on his Throne again with his undoubted Authority and Power. She was sure of the Assistance of several eminent Lords in this her Design, and being a Person of Masculine Spirit was not afraid to undertake any Thing to keep up the Dignity of her Husband's Crown. Henry Beaufort now Duke of Somerset by the Death of his Father, was eager to revenge it, and Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham, who at the same time lost his Son and Heir, was no less zealous to pull them down, who had raised themselves upon his Loss. All the Lords of the Lancastrian Faction, evidently seeing the Tendency of the Duke of York's Actions to be towards the Crown, thought it for their own Safety to join with the Queen in pulling him down from his Usurpation, and to that End they all met in a Great Council at Greenwich by the Queen's Appointment, and after a full Debate upon what had passed came to this Resolution. That the King was no Child, and consequently needed no Tutor, but it being a Reproach to his Majesty to be governed at the Discretion of others, the Duke of York should be put out of the Protectorship, which he had so injuriously assumed, and the Earl of Salisbury deprived of his Chancellorship, which the King being very easily perswaded to do, an express Order under the King's Seal was dispatched to them to resign their Offices. The Duke of York was amaz'd at this sudden turn of Affairs; but since it was an undoubted Prerogative of the Crown to place or displace the Officers of it as he pleased, he dar'd not oppose it, least he should be plainly guilty of Rebellion, and so with a faigned Patience he yielded to it, tho' to the great Discontent of his own Party; but immediately left the Court, as if being discharged from publick Business, he would retire to attend his Private, having still in his Mind the same Designs of raising himself to the Throne, as well as of revenging this Affront, when Opportunity offered it self, which could not be long to such restless Spirits, as both he himself and many of his Party were of, who if they find not an Occasion to execute their ambitious Contrivances will make one. And this seems to be first attempted within a few Months after in the City of London, where the Duke of York had many Friends ready to stir up Tumlts for his Advantage, and who watched the least Stirs to inflame them into open Rebellion, which thus first happened.

A. D. 1455. Reg. 34. A. D. 1456.

The D. of York discharg'd of his Protectorship.

A Tumult in London raised by the Duke of York's Friends.

In May a certain English Merchant, who while he was in Italy had been prohibited by the Magistrates to wear a Sword, or any other Weapon, according to the Custom of England, met an Italian in Cheapside wearing a Dagger, and told him, That the English were not allowed to wear a Sword in Italy, he ought not to wear one in England. The Italian angry at this Rebuke gave him a rough and uncivil Answer, which so provoked the young fiery Merchant, that he not only took away the Italian's Dagger, but with it broke his Pate. The Italian immediately goes to the Mayor and complains of the Abuse, and the Merchant being summon'd to answer for it, was for want of a good Excuse imprison'd. The seditious Citizens, and especially the Prentices, made this an Occasion of rising, and gather'd together in great Numbers to deliver the Merchant out of Newgate, which when they had done, they in great fury went and pillaged the Houses of the Italians in several Parts of the City. The Mayor and Aldermen with the Assistance of many grave Citizens opposed the Rabble, and at length appeased them, putting several of the Chief of them into Newgate. The Queen and her Council, who now again ruled all, hearing of these Tumults in the City, and easily guessing at the Reason and Cause of them, sent the Dukes of Exeter and Buckingham with some other Noblemen to joyn with the Mayor and Aldermen in punishing such as were in hold for it severely, that they might be a Terror to others; but when the Commons of the City heard of it, and that the said Dukes and Mayor were set to try them according to their Commission, they rose again, and threatning the Judges, if they determin'd any thing severe against them, so frighted them, that they left Guild-Hall and departed, and so nothing was done that Day. But afterward the Mayor calling together a Common-Council took such effectual Course with the Wardens of the several Companies, that all were still, and the Commissioners had Liberty to sit in Guild-Hall, where they condemned several Persons for this Riot, Three of which were hanged at Tyburn, and the rest fined.

Some of the Seditious taken and punished with Death.

Reg. 35.

K. Henry removes his Court to Coventry.

The Queen, who was as suspicious and watchful as her Enemies were active, was very busie to countermine all their Contrivances and Plots; and because she had some Fears, that the City of London was false to the Regal Interests, she caused the King to remove his Court from Westminster to Coventry in Warwickshire, yet under the Pretence of taking the Air, and spending some

A. D. 1456. Reg. 35. some time in the pleasant Pastimes of Hawking and Hunting. Here in the Intervals of their Sports she and her Council had many private Meetings to contrive the Ruin of the Duke of York, and his two potent Confederates Warwick and Salisbury, as knowing, that as long as he lived, and had such potent Friends to abet his Claim to the Crown, it was impossible that K. Henry could quietly enjoy his Throne. Divers Ways were propounded, but at length they agreed upon this, which they judged most plausible and likely to take effect, viz. That it should be pretended, that some Matters of great Importance to the State had unexpectedly happen'd, which required the Council and Advice of the wisest and sagest Peers of the Realm, and that the King and Queen extreamly desired that the Duke of York, and Earls of Warwick and Salisbury should be present, with other Lords to consult about it, and to that End the King should send to each of them a very kind and obliging Letter under his Privy-Seal to desire their Attendance and Assistance at Coventry upon a certain Day and Hour therein named, with a Charge not to fail in their personal Appearance. The Duke, and Earls believing all these faigned Pretences to be real, and having not the least Suspicion of Danger, set forth at the time appointed to wait upon the King at his Commands, as their Duty obliged them, but in the Way they received a certain Information from some Friends, what Mischief was really intended them, which they would hardly be able to avoid if they ventured themselves into the City. Whereupon the Lords, who were surprized at such base Treachery, thought it best to provide for their own Safety, and sending their Retinue before them into Coventry, as tho' they themselves were coming, they fled every one to their Castles, viz. The Duke of York to Wigmore in the Marches of Wales, Salisbury to Middleham in Richmondshire, and Warwick to Callis, having contrived and agreed at their Parting upon a secret Way of holding Correspondence by Letters, till they could meet again with greater Terror to their Enemies. The Queen was not a little disappointed at this their Retreat, and loss of her Prey, but was forced to sit down contented with the Satsfaction, that tho' she had not obtained her Desire, yet she had so terrified them, that they were parted one from the other for Safety, and so were become less formidable to her.

The Queen and her Council contrive the Lords Destruction.

Two Prodigies appear in England.

In November in the Island of Portland not far from Weymouth in Dorsetshire was seen a Cock with a great Crest upon his Head, great red Gills, and Legs half a yard long, who stood upon the Sea and crowed Three times, turning himself every time a several way, and nodding his Head towards the North, South and West, he was particoloured like a Pheasant, and when he had so done he vanished. A little after there was taken at Erithe within 12 Miles of London Four wonderful Fishes, viz. Two Whales, One Sword-Fish, and a Fish called Mors Marina. These Prodigies were a little amazing to all Men, and such as would venture to prognosticate the Signification of them, gave it out, that they were Fore-runners of Wars and Troubles in England, which after proved true.

A. D. 1457. King of France plunders the English Coasts.

The Dissentions which had for some time been in England between the King and his Nobles continuing and daily increasing, put the French King in Mind of revenging the Worngs and Injuries, which France had suffered from the English; and tho' he could not pretend any Right or Title to the Crown, nor hope to form an Invasion with Success, yet he might endamage and plunder the Coasts without any Resistance or great hazzard to his Men. And for this End he caused all suitable Preparations to be made both of Ships and Men against the Spring, which when equipped and fitted out he divided into Two Navies, and sent them to Sea under the Command of William, Lord Pomiers, and Sir Peter Bressy. At the Mouth of the Saine these Two Fleets parted, and went the one Eastward and the other Westward. Sir Peter Bressy, who sailed East, coasted along the Shore of Sussex and Kent, but not daring to land, staid in the Downs till they could get Information about the State of those Counties, and being at length certified, that Sandwich was neither well Peopled nor fortified, because being lately infected with the Plague, the Magistrates and most of the chief People were remov'd out of it, and gone to the neighbouring Villages and Towns; he entred into the Haven, and pillag'd the Town, taking such poor Stuff as was found therein, and then hastned away, because he heard that the Country was rising upon them. The Lord Pomiers, who took his Course Westward, in the mean time committed the like Outrages in Devonshire, in plundering and robbing the Town of Fulney or Fowey, (o) which done, they both retir'd into Bretagne, but hardly with Prey enough to recompense the Charge the French King had been at in setting them out.

A. D. 1457. Reg. 35.

The Scots invade England.

While the French thus molested the Coasts, the Scots, who ever joyn'd with the French against England, invaded the Borders, and entring Northumberland in a good Body under the Command of their King, James II. burnt and plundered several small Villages and Houses. But the Duke of York hearing of their Attempts, got together a good Army, and hasted with all speed to drive them out of the Country, which when the Scots had Knowledge of, they immediately returned Home with little Profit to themselves, tho' they had done no small Damages to the English. Besides these Troubles which England suffered from her Enemies Abroad, the Disorders caused by the Nobility at Home, wrought no small Prejudices to it; for at the same time in the Northern Parts there happen'd a great Fray between Sir Thomas Piercy, Lord Egremont, and the Earl of Salisbury's Sons whom the said Lord hated for their Father's Sake, as being of the opposite Faction to himself and Family, fell upon them and their Retinue in open Field, and slew and wounded many of their Followers, and then fled. The King and Queen, tho' they did not much dislike the Action in themselves, yet least by overlooking the Wrong, they should provoke their Father and his Friends to any new Attempts, they gave out strict Orders for apprehending the said Lord, and having taken him, he was examin'd and tryed before the King's Council, by whom he was found guilty of an high Misdemeanour, and condemn'd to pay a large Fine to the Earl of Salisbury, and because he would not pay it, nor give him Security for the same, was committed to Newgate, with his Brother Sir Richard Piercy, who was guilty of the same Riot, but whether thro' the Negligence of the Keeper, or by the Weakness of the Prison, in a little time after he made his Escape, and let out several other Prisoners with him, to the great Trouble of the Sheriffs of London, who were oblig'd to find them out again,

A Fray between the Lord Egremont and Earl of Salisbury's Sons.

The Lord Egremont imprisoned, but escapes. Reg. 36.

(o) Fowey is in Cornwall.

The

A. D. 1457. Reg. 36. The Lord Egremont kept himſelf private for a while, but at length by his Friends obtain'd his Pardon, and Releaſe of his Fine of the King, and ſo was reſtor'd to his Liberty. Not long after the like Deſſention happen'd between the Young Duke of Somerſet and Sir John Nevil, the Earl of Salisbury's Son, who met at Salisbury with large Retinues, and threatned each other with Slaughter and Deſtruction, but by the Vigilance and Care of the Mayor, who kept ſtrong Watches and Guards upon both Parties, they were hindred ſo long from joyning, that by the Mediation of Friends their Anger was pacified and no harm followed at that time. Thus was England miſerably haraſſed at Home and Abroad thro' her own Diviſions, and ſhe that was ſo lately formidable to all her Neighbours, was made a Prey to the Meaneſt of them.

The Troubles of Reginald Peacock, Biſhop of Chicheſter.

Soon after the Feaſt of St. Michael in this Year began the Troubles of that learned and godly Divine Reginald Peacock, then Biſhop of Chicheſter. He had for many Years lived in very great Reputation for his Holineſs and Piety, and for the promoting of the Truth of the Goſpel had wrote ſeveral Books, which he entitl'd, 1. Of the Chriſtian Religion in general. 2. Of Marriage. 3. Of the juſt expreſſing of the Holy Scripture in Three Parts. 4. The Donet of Chriſtian Religion. 5. The Follower of the Donet. 6. A Book of Faith. 7. The Book filling the Four Tables. 8. The Book of Worſhipping. 9. The Provoker of Chriſtian Men. 10. The Book of Counſel. Beſides theſe Writings which were intended chiefly for the Benefit of the People, he had moved ſeveral Queſtions in the Univerſities about the Annates, Peter-pence, and the Juriſdiction of the Pope which he exerciſed here in England, and delivered his Opinion freely concerning them, but no ways in Favour of the Pope. He is alſo ſaid to have pitied the Ignorance of the People ſo much, that he ſpent many Years Labour in tranſlating the Bible into the Engliſh Tongue. By all theſe Things he very much angred the Hierarchy, but nothing was attempted againſt him ſo long as his great Patron, and Favourer of his Piety and Learning lived Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, by whoſe Means he was firſt made Biſhop of St. Aſaph, and then of Chicheſter. But ſoon after that good Duke was murthered, the Biſhop was then expoſed to his Enemies, who reading over his Books and picking up his Aſſertions delivered in his Diſputations brought an heavy Charge of Hereſie, and other Crimes againſt him to Thomas Bourchier, then Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, who being a Perſon zealous for the Papal Grandure and Power was forward and active in the Proſecution of him. This Arch-biſhop began his Proceſs againſt him October 22. ſending out a Citation to all Perſons who had any thing Heretical and Erroneous to charge the ſaid Biſhop of Chicheſter with, to appear before him within 20 Days after Summons, to ſpeak, propound, alledge and affirm fully and ſufficiently in Writing whatſoever they had to ſay againſt him, ſtrictly forbidding all Perſons as well of the Clergy as Laity in the mean time to inveigh againſt any Propoſitions laid down by the ſaid Biſhop in his Books ſo long as the Examination of them was depending in the Arch-biſhop's Court. Upon the Day appointed not only the Enemies of the Biſhop, but the Biſhop of Chicheſter himſelf, being as valiant for the Truth as his Enemies were furious againſt him, appeared before the Arch-biſhop, and the Divines and Lawyers belonging to his Court at Lambeth. The Articles laid to his Charge by his Adverſaries were theſe, viz. That he had in his Books, Works and Writings aſſerted many Hereſies and erroneous Doctrines contrary to the true Catholick and Apoſtolick Faith: As, A. D. 1457. Reg. 36.

His Opinions alledg'd againſt him.

1. That it is not neceſſarily to be believed, that Jeſus Chriſt after his Death deſcended into Hell. 2. That it is not neceſſary to Salvation to believe in the Holy Catholick Church. 3. Or in the Communion of Saints. 4. That it is not neceſſary to Salvation to believe the Body of Chriſt to be materially preſent in the Sacrament. 5. That the univerſal Church may err in Matters of Faith. 6. That it is not neceſſary to Salvation to believe, that what every general Council doth ordain, approve or determine ſhould be holden and approved by all Chriſtians. Other Opinions and erroneous Aſſertions he was charged with, as that he ſaid, That the Office of a Chriſtian Biſhop is chiefly to preach the Word of God; That Biſhops who bought their Admiſſion to their Sees of the Biſhop of Rome; did ſin; That no Man is bound to obey or believe the Determinations of the Church of Rome; That the wilful begging Friers were an idle and needleſs Order; That Spiritual Perſons ought not to have any Temporal Poſſeſſions; And that perſonal Tithes were not due by the Law of God. But theſe laſt, with many of the like Nature, were imputed to him to blacken his Name, and make his Condemnation ſeem deſerved. The former Six were in all probability the Articles proved upon him out of his Books, Sermons and Diſputations, when he was brought before the Arch-biſhop in his Conſiſtory, and theſe he defended very ſtrenuouſly and boldly in the Preſence of the Arch-biſhop and many great Lords, but at length partly by Menaces and Threats, and partly by Flattery, and Perſwaſions, he was prevailed withal by his Brethren the Biſhops to recant his Opinions, which he did Decemb. 4. at St. Paul's Croſs in the Engliſh Tongue, conſenting that his Books ſhould be burnt as a Terror to others, and exhorting all Men preſent to give no Belief to any of the Doctrines delivered in them. But tho' he recanted, yet he was not thought by the Biſhops themſelves to renounce his Errors heartily, and therefore he was not only deprived of his Biſhoprick, but kept in Priſon all the remaining part of his Life, where whether he died of Trouble and Grief, or was deſtroy'd by his Enemies is uncertain, but ſure it is he lived not long after. (p)

He recants his Opinions.

He is accuſed of Hereſie.

A. D. 1458.

King Henry and his Council obſerving, that notwithſtanding ſeveral Provocations had been given the Lords to rebel by the Queen and her Friends, yet they retain'd a great Deſire of Peace, as they had teſtified partly by their living quietly upon their Eſtates, and partly by ſending their Friends to him to mediate for an Agreement, removed to London about Chriſtmas, and ſoon after his Arrival ſummoned a great Council, and there freely and openly declared, That ſince he perceived that the Diviſions which of late had happened between himſelf and ſome of the chief of his Nobles had been the only Encouragement to the Scots and French to moleſt and invade his Kingdom the laſt Summer, and would ſtill more embolden them to do the like, if theſe Home-Animoſities continued, it was his Deſire, that a Reconciliation ſhould be made with all convenient Speed, promiſing upon his Salvation, that no Injuries done to his Perſon or Friends ſhould be any Impediment to a perfect Amity between them, but at their Deſires all Things ſhould be forgotten and forgi-

K. Henry returns to London, and offers a Reconciliation with the Lords.

(p) He was confin'd firſt to his own Houſe, and then he had leave to retire to an Abby, where he had a Penſion aſſign'd him for his Maintenance.

ven,

A. D. 1458. Reg. 36.

ven, and the Duke of York and his Friends taken into eſpecial Favour and Love, that ſo the Nation might unanimouſly oppoſe its Enemies. The King, who was at all times a Stranger to Diſſimulation, was immediately by all the Council judged to ſpeak theſe Things with his uſual Candor, and out of a pure Deſire of the Peace of the Nation, and therefore purſuant to his Order certain Perſons of Quality, who were judged fitteſt to mediate between the King and the Duke of York for their Gravity and Moderation, were diſpatched to the Lords of the York Faction, to command them to repair to the King's Court without Delay, there to treat and conſult with the King about a Pacification of all Parties for the good of the Publick. This Meſſage was accepted by the Lords with great Readineſs, and accordingly on the 15th Day of January the Earl of Salisbury with a Retinue of 500 Men arrived in London, and lodged by the King's Appointment at his own Houſe, called the Harbour, and on the 26th of the ſame Month came the Duke of York with a Train of 400 Men, and took up his Reſidence at Bainard's-Caſtle. Soon after him came the Dukes of Exeter, Buckingham and Somerſet with a mighty Throng of Attendants, viz. 800 Men, and had their Lodgings ordered them without Temple-Bar. Next arrived the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Egremont, and the Lord Clifford with a Train of 1500 Men, and had their Quarters allotted 'em in the Suburbs of the City. The Earl of Warwick, who was Captain of Calis, and reſided there, required a greater Time to prepare and come over, and therefore came up to London not till February 14. but appeared with the greateſt Splendour, having 600 Men to attend him, all in Red Jackets with White ragged Staves embroidered on them behind and before, and made his Abode in the Black-Friers. When all the Lords were arrived, the King and Queen followed on March 17. with a very ſtrong Guard and Attendance, and lodged in the Biſhop's Palace. And tho' the King and his Council had well provided, that the two Factions might be ſo ſeparated, viz. the one in the Suburbs, and the other in the City, that there might happen no Quarrels, between them; yet leaſt any unexpected Difference ſhould ariſe, the Mayor and Magiſtracy of the City were order'd to keep up a Body of 5000 armed Men to maintain the Peace indifferently between them, who accordingly Day and Night kept a ſtrict Guard, and rode up and down the Suburbs and City with them to prevent all Diſorders which might ariſe. The King and his Nobles on the one part held their Conſultations apart at firſt in the Chapter-houſe at Weſtminſter, and the Duke of York with his Party met at Black-Friers to debate upon ſuch Conditions of Peace as they ſhould agree to accept, and when Things were ſettled among themſelves, the Arch-biſhop and Biſhops, who perſwaded both parties to moderate Terms, brought 'em to a Communication together, and at length after many Debates and hot Conteſts on both Sides, they promiſed to forget all Wrongs and Injuries done on either Side, and to be Friends to each other, and obedient to the King, but upon theſe Conditions, which being ſet down in Writing were ſigned, ſealed and delivered by both Parties March 23. and were to this Effect, viz.

The Lords accept the King's Offer, and come to London.

Articles of Agreement between the King and Lords.

I That the Duke of York and Earls of Warwick and Salisbury ſhould ſettle 40 l. a Year upon the Abby of St. Albans for ever, for Suffrages and Obits to be kept, and Alms to be employ'd for the Souls of Edmund, Duke of Somerſet, Henry, Earl of Northumberland, and Thomas, Lord Clifford, with the reſt of the King's Friends, who were ſlain in the Battle of St. Albans, which Lords were declared faithful Subjects to the King at their Deaths, as well as the Duke of York, and Earls of Warwick and Salisbury.

A. D. 1458. Reg. 36.

II. That the Duke of York ſhould pay Eleanor, Dutcheſs of Somerſet, and Duke Henry her Son, the Sum of 5000 Marks to be divided as the King ſhould think convenient among the younger Children of the ſaid Dutcheſs, and the Earl of Warwick 2000 Marks to the Lord Clifford to be diſtributed among his younger Brethren and Siſter by the King.

III. That whereas Sir Thomas Piercy, the Lord Egremont, and Richard Piercy, Sons of the Counteſs of Northumberland were fined to pay to the Earl of Salisbury, his Wife and Sons, Thomas and John Nevill 14800 Marks for Treſpaſſes found by Richard Bingham and Ralph Pool the King's Judges to be done to the ſaid Earl of Salisbury and his Sons, it was agreed, that the ſaid Sums ſhould be releaſed by them to the ſaid Offenders, yet upon Condition, that the Lord Egremont and his Brethren ſhould enter into a Recogniſance in Chancery to keep the Peace with the ſaid Earl of Salisbury, his Wife, Children, Servants and Tenants, and the ſaid Earl ſhould diſcharge the Tenants of the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Egremont from their Obligations to ſtand to their Order and Government.

IV. That all Variances, Diſcords and Debates, all Controverſies, Appeals and Actions perſonal, that are or have been between any of the ſaid Lords and their Servants ſhall be for ever determined and ended, ſaving to every one their Title, Action and Right to all Arrerages of Rents, Services, Accounts, Detinues or Debts due by any Contract or Deed, and that Releaſes ſhould be given to each other accordingly.

V. That if any Action, Suit or Quarrel chanced between any of the Servants or Tenants of the ſaid Lords for any Matter or Thing, that none of the ſaid Lords ſhould ſupport, maintain or aid the Perſons ſo ſuing, but uſe their utmoſt Endeavours to bring them to Peace and Quietneſs.

VI. That if any Party complained of the Breach of this Agreement he ſhould not bring his Action, unleſs the King's Council ſee juſt Cauſe to allow it.

VII. That if any Variance aroſe about the Recogniſances, Releaſes or Acquittances between the Council of both Parties, it ſhall be determined by the two Chief Juſtices.

VIII. That whereas the Perſons bound in Chancery by this Award were obliged to obey it in great Sums, the King ſhould not pardon them without the Conſent of the Party aggrieved; and if they were recovered, the King ſhould have one Moiety and the Complainant the other.

This Award and Agreement was ſealed with the Great Seal at the King's Palace of Weſtminſter, March 24. in the Thirty Sixth Year of the King's Reign; and the next Day being openly proclaim'd and publiſh'd, was receiv'd with univerſal Joy, and a ſolemn Proceſſion celebrated by the King and Court, within the Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, in Teſtimony of their Thankfulneſs to God for this happy Union. In this Proceſſion all Things were contriv'd to declare a perfect Amity between the Factions; for before the King, went the Duke of Somerſet, and Earl of Salisbury Hand in A Proceſſion after the Sealing of it.

A. D. 1458. Reg 36. in Hand; the next the Duke of Exeter, and Earl of Warwick, and ſo on, the one of the one Faction, and the other of the other, being join'd together. The King came behind them in his Regal Robes, and the Crown on his Head; and after him the Duke of York leading the Queen, who was very familiar with him, as if ſhe had a real Favour for him; but as ſhe was always a great Artiſt at Diſſimulation, ſo ſhe never more uſed it than at this Juncture, when it ought to have been quite laid aſide, as the following Tranſactions will evidently ſhew.

All Things being thus concluded, the Lords parted from the King and Queen with all outward Signs of Friendſhip; and the Duke of York and Earl of Salisbury went to York, but the Earl of Warwick ſtaid at the Court a while about the Buſineſs of Callis, and about Whitſuntide paſſed over to his Charge. While he continued there, he went out with Fourteen of the King's Ships, (for he was alſo made Admiral of the Narrow Seas) to ſcour the Coaſts, and met with a Fleet of Spaniards laden with Merchandize, but well furniſh'd for their Defence. The Earl was not able to deal with them, yet being unwilling to part with ſo rich a Prey, he reſolv'd to encounter them, and ſo began the Fight, which they as reſolutely maintain'd againſt them. The Battel continued almoſt two Days, but at laſt determin'd in Favour of the Earl, who took Six of their Ships laden with Wine, Oil, Wax, Iron and other rich Merchandizes, worth 10000 Pounds Sterling; and ſunk and put to flight Twenty-ſix more, having ſlain a 1000 of their Men in the Fight, and taken many Priſoners, with the Loſs of not above an 100 Men. This Victory not only increaſed the Fame of this great Earl, but by his generous Temper in carrying (q) over into England the Goods he had taken; he cauſed thoſe Things to be ſold for a Shilling which before would have coſt Two.

Earl of Warwick takes Six Spaniſh Ships.

Among this Fleet of the Spaniards were Five Genoa's Carricks, of which Three were taken; and the other Two which fled Home, bringing the News of the Loſs, incenſed the Genoeſes to revenge it upon ſuch Engliſh Ships as they could light on, which not long after they did in this Manner. One Sturmyne, a Briſtol Merchant, had been traveling ſome Years in divers Countries of the Levant, and other Eaſtern Parts, from whence he was returning with rich Merchandizes, and as was ſaid, brought green Pepper and other Spices with him, to have ſet and ſown in England. The Genoeſes having Intelligence of his Return, laid wait for his Ship, and taking it, ſpoiled it of all its Goods, and ſeveral others with it. The News of this Action being heard of by the King and his Council, an Order was ſent out to ſeize all the Merchant Genoeſes in London, and commit them to the Fleet, till they could find ſufficient Security to anſwer the Damages done by their Country-Men to the Engliſh Merchants; and becauſe they did not or could not do it, they were made to pay 6000 Marks for the Damages done to Sturmyne and this Realm, and then diſmiſſed their Impriſonment.

The Genoeſes take ſome Engliſh Ships, and are puniſhed for it.

In this Year Hiſtorians ſay, that Printing began to appear in Publick, which had lain hid about Ten Years, after this Manner. One John Fauſtus, a Goldſmith and Citizen of Mentz, having caſually engraven ſome Letters upon a Piece of Metal, laid Ink upon them, and finding they made a fair Impreſſion, fram'd them into Words, and ſo arriv'd at ſome Probability of improving it into a more ſpeedy Way of putting out Books, which he communicated to certain Friends of his of the ſame City, viz. John Cuthemburge and Peter Schaffard, yet with an Injunction to keep it ſecret for a Time, that they might improve it. John Cuthemberge being a Man of a more publick Spirit, could not endure to keep ſo uſeful an Art private long, and therefore this Year began with Fauſtus to exerciſe it in publick at Strasburg, and by imparting the Knowledge of it to the Inquiſitive, he was a Means, that it not only was much improv'd by others, but was carried into ſeveral Parts of Europe, as Rome, by Conradus Gallus, a German, and to England by William Caxton, a Mercer of London, who introduced it into the Abbey of Weſtminſter in 1471, and afterward it ſpread it ſelf into many other Engliſh Monaſteries.

Printing uſed in publick this Year.

A. D. 1458. Reg. 36.

The Earl of Warwick about Michaelmas returned into England, and remain'd about the Court, moving and carrying on divers Affairs, as well in reference to the Publick as belonging to his own Charge. In November it happen'd, that as he ſat in Council in the Palace Royal at Weſtminſter, one of the King's Servants affronting a Yeoman of the Earl's Attendants, they fell to Blows, and the Earl's Servant having ſorely hurt and wounded the King's, he fled to ſecure himſelf. The King's Guards and other of his menial Servants, ſeeing their Fellow-Servant harm'd, and the Offender eſcaped, reflected upon the Earl his Maſter, as an Enemy to the Court and King, and ſince they could not be avenged of his Servant, reſolv'd to have amends of his Maſter, as being an Encourager of him in the Attempt; and watching him when he return'd from the Council-Chamber to his Barge, ſuddenly ſet upon him and his Retinue, the Yeomen with Swords, and the Cooks and Black-Guard with Spits and Fire-forks. The Earl's Men made as good a Defence as they could, while their Maſter, not without great Danger, by the Help of his Friends got into the Barge, and fled into the City of London, but many of them were dangerouſly wounded and hurt. The Queen ſhew'd more than ordinary Concern in this Affair, and as tho' ſhe had been engaged to make good the Quarrel, (which ſome from thence believed ſhe was the Mover of) commanded that the Earl ſhould be apprehended and impriſon'd in the Tower, where ſhe determin'd to have put a Period to his Life. This the Earl being advertiſed of by ſome of his Friends, feared to ſtay longer in the City, and therefore departing to Warwick, he took his Journey into Yorkſhire, where he found the Duke of York and his Father, to whom he declared the Occaſion of his coming, and what Danger he had eſcaped from the Queen and her Servants, (r) which malicious Intention, as he thought, was not to be paſſed over without juſt Reſentments; and he would leave it to their Judgments to take ſuch Methods to do it as were proper, while he ſhould go over to Callis to ſecure that important Garriſon; for it was not to be doubted, but the Queen would endeavour all ſhe could to wreſt it out of his Hands, and put it under the Command of ſome of her Friends, and ſo he poſted away with all ſpeed thither, and was receiv'd by the Garriſon with Joy, and all due Reſpect to his Authority. He was ſcarcely arriv'd there, and put Things

Reg. 37. A Quarrel between the Queen's Servants and a Yeoman of the Earl of Warwick.

The Earl of Warwick aſſaulted and in Danger of Life.

(q) He carried his Booty to Callis, and return'd not to England till new Troubles call'd him thither. Holl. p. 648.
(r) This Accident happen'd before he took the Booty. See Hol. Page 648.

A. D. 1458. Reg. 37.

in good order for his own Security, but the Queen, who imagin'd that the Earl of Warwick had raiſed this Stir to begin a new Quarrel, and ſet the Crown upon the Duke of York's Head, by the Advice of the Dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham, ſent a Meſſenger with an Order under the Privy-Seal to him, that he ſhould reſign the Captain's Office of Callis, becauſe ſhe had given that Charge to the Duke of Somerſet, whom the King intended ſhortly to ſend over thither. But the Earl of Warwick reply'd, That he was made Captain of Callis by Authority of Parliament, and would not reſign his Charge but into their Hands that gave it him, and therefore could not obey the King's Seal, becauſe he was accountable for ſo doing to him in Parliament; and ſo he held out the Garriſon againſt her. While theſe Things were done at Callis, the Duke of York and the Earl of Salisbury, with their Friends, entred into a deep Conſultation about the Aſſault offer'd to the Earl of Warwick by the King's Servants, and concluded, That this Diſorder proceeded purely from the Queen's Malice to them, who encouraged her Servants to ſlay the Earl of Warwick, that they might be the more eaſily ſuppreſſed and deſtroyed; and that now ſince Oaths and Promiſes were of no Force with the Queen and her Friends, but even the ſacred Pretences of Peace and Friendſhip were made uſe of to draw them more ſecurely into their Snares, it was high time for them to ſtand upon their own Guard, and with Sword in Hand to demand Satisfaction for the Injury intended, ſo that if they would not hearken to Reaſon, they might be brought to it by Force. And to this End, it was agreed, That the Earl of Salisbury ſhould take ſuch Troops of their Attendants as were in readineſs, which amounted to a Body of about 5000, and ſhould go up to London to the King, and put up his Complaints of the Wrong done to his Son the Earl of Warwick contrary to the late Agreement made between himſelf and his Lords, and demand the Satisfaction in Reaſon due; which if granted, he would lay down his Arms; but if denied, their future Actions would be juſtifiable in the Sight of all Men. The Earl of Salisbury according to this Plan began his March from Middleham Caſtle a little after Candlemas, and took his way thro' Lancaſhire, to go towards London; which, tho' the furtheſt Way about, yet he hoped to augment his Troops there. The Duke of York in the mean time was to raiſe another Army, and as Occaſion required to go to meet him, and ſo joyntly oppoſe their Enemies, if they ſtood upon the Defence of the Quarrel. The Queen who kept a watchful Eye upon all the Motions of the Lords, and at the firſt Beginning of this Conteſt imagin'd, that the Earl of Warwick had purpoſely raiſed this Combuſtion to ſet the Crown on the Duke of York's Head, thought it now unneceſſary to talk of any Parleys, and therefore by the Advice of her two chief, but enraged Counſellors the Dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham contrived to ſuppreſs them by Force, and to this End diſpatched Orders in the King's Name to James Touchet Lord Audley, who was a very potent Man in thoſe Countries, thro' which the Earl of Salisbury was to march, to raiſe an Army with all ſpeed, and by ſurprize to apprehend him: And that ſhe might engage as many Gentlemen of thoſe Parts to aſſiſt him with their Perſons and Intereſts in this Attempt as ſhe could, ſhe ſent down to ſeveral of them a Badge of her Favour and their Loyalty, a white embroidered Swan, which they ſhould wear in Token of their Love to the King. By theſe Arts ſhe drew ſo many to her Party, that the Lord Audley, who proſecuted his Commiſſion with due Zeal and Expedition, got together a Body of 10000 Men out of Cheſhire and Shropſhire in a very ſhort Time, and ranked them in Order of Battel, ready to receive him. The King and Queen hearing in what Readineſs the Lord Audley was to encounter their Enemies, came down towards him to be under his Guard as it were, and the King remain'd at Celesbill in Warwickſhire, but the Queen lay at Eccleſale in Staffordſhire, expecting a good Event of this Undertaking. The Lord Audley and his Spies had Intelligence of the Earl of Salisbury's Motions, and hearing that he drew near him, ranged his Men upon Blore-Heath, near Draiton in Shropſhire where the Earl was to paſs, ready to receive him. The Earl of Salisbury not ſuſpecting this Oppoſition, was ſurpriz'd at the firſt Sight but conſidering, that his Retreat would be diſgraceful to him, reſolv'd to abide the Battel, tho' much inferior in Strength, and pitched his Camp in the Front of his Enemy; a ſmall River, but pretty deep, being between them, and ſo remain'd the following Night. In the Morning, which was St. Tecla's Day, the Earl of Salisbury cauſed his Men to ſhoot a great Flight of Arrows upon the Lord Audley's Camp, and then ordered them to make a Retreat, as tho' they intended to fly; which when the Lord Audley ſaw, he commanded his Men to paſs over the River, and purſue them, giving charge to them to take the Earl of Salisbury if poſſible, alive or dead, as the Queen had order'd him; which they accordingly obeyed: but in the Hurry and Confuſion, before Half the Army was gotten over, the Earl of Saliſbury and his Men return'd in good Order upon the Lord Audley's Army, and fell upon them with great Fury, which tho' they couragiouſly oppoſed, yet thro' Diſorder and Surpriſe, they were after a ſharp Battel routed, and the Lord Audley and all his chief Captains ſlain, with above 2400 common Soldiers. In this Fight were the Two Sons of the Earl of Salisbury, Sir John Nevill and Sir Thomas Nevill dangerouſly wounded, and going into a neighbouring Town for Cure, were ſet upon by ſome of the Queen's Friends, and taken Priſoners, with Sir Thomas Harrington, who accompanied them, and all of them carried to Cheſter Caſtle; which Misfortune was a ſad Allay to the Victory in the Earl of Salisbury's Mind, becauſe he knew that the Queen would immediately put them to death, unleſs they were delivered; which happen'd as ſoon almoſt as deſir'd; for the Townſmen, who themſelves were well affected to the Duke of York, having received a Meſſage from the March-Men of Wales, That unleſs they were forthwith releaſed, they would come and pull down the Caſtle; were glad of the Pretence to ſet them at Liberty, and ſo ſent them away to their Father, who welcom'd them with all Joy.

A. D. 1459. Reg. 37. Reg. 38.

The Duke of York having receiv'd the News of this Victory reſolves no longer to conceal his Intention; and ſince the King and Queen ſought his Ruin, as a Competitor with them for the Crown, he determin'd either to get it, or periſh in the Attempt; and upon that Account haſtens to meet the Earl of Salisbury, that they might join their Forces together, and take all neceſſary Courſes to augment their Army ſo as to fear no Oppoſition, which they after Conſultation did, by ſending into all Parts of Wales, Shropſhire, and other Counties in the Marches of it. They wrote alſo to Callis to the Earl of Warwick, to bring over to their Aſſiſtance ſome Troops of his moſt experienc'd Soldiers, which he

The Queen endeavours to diſplace the Earl of Warwick.

Earl of Salisbury goes with an Army to the King.

The Queen orders the Lord Audley to raiſe an Army, and apprehend the Earl of Saliſbury.

A Battel between the Lord Audley and the Earl of Salisbury

The Earl of Saliſbury's Sons taken Priſoners, but releaſed,

Duke of York reſolves to get the Crown, and gathers an Army,

A. D. 1459. Reg 38.

he did, under the Command of Andrew Trollop, and John Blunt, Two Captains of great Experience and approved Policy in the late Wars in Normandy and Guien; which all being united into one Body, assembled in October, and encamped at Ludlow in Shropshire. The King had Intelligence of the Lords Proceedings, and that he might put a Stop to their further Designs, sent out Commissions into all Parts of the Nation, where he had any Friends, to raise an Army with all speed to suppress them; which he had no great Difficulty to do, because many out of Love and Duty to the King, but more out of Fear of the Queen, flock'd to his Standard, so that he had gathered a mighty Army in a short Space. With it the King in Person, accompanied with the Dukes of Buckingham, Exeter, and Somerset, and others of the Nobility, who were Favourers of the Lancastrian Line, marched forwards towards the Lords, and came to Worcester, where staying a while to refresh their Army, it was after some Consultation agreed, That a Messenger of some Account should be sent to the Earls and Duke, to offer them a free and general Pardon of all their Offences, if they would lay down their Arms, and become obedient Subjects. The Bishop of Salisbury, Richard Beauchamp, was the Person thought fittest to be employed in this Affair; and accordingly was sent to them with a Message of Pardon, which he delivered to them with the Gravity and Seriousness of a Prelate. The Lords gave no Answer till they had consulted among themselves, and then by the Earl of Warwick reply'd, That they dare not trust to the King's Pardon, because they had several Pardons before, and those confirm'd by Parliament, and yet found them of no Security to them, but rather a Snare to draw them into Danger of their Lives, as the late Assault upon the Earl of Warwick manifestly shewed, by which he had perished, had not God wonderfully preserv'd him. Yet if any Way could be devised for their Safety, to which they might trust without fail, they were ready to submit to his Grace, and sue for his Favour. This Answer being brought to the King by the Bishop, did not at all please him, and thereupon he commanded his Standard to advance towards them; but before he and his Army arriv'd at their Camp, he received a Letter from the Lords, declaring, That as they had heretofore given Demonstrations, that they only sought the Prosperity of his Majesty and the Nation, with the Security of their own Persons and Estates, so, if they knew their own Hearts, they intended nothing else by being now in Arms, and therefore they kept themselves in the furthest Parts of the Nation, not with any ill Design, but to abide his Majesty's coming, that they might in all humble and submissive Manner beg his Grace and Favour, and have all Grievances redressed, and tho' they were unjustly and untruly defamed as Traitors and Rebels, and their Lordships and Tenants robb'd and spoil'd, against his Peace and Laws, yet they were so tender of the Effusion of Christian Blood, that they would not stand up in their own Defence till Necessity compell'd them; and therefore besought him to accept them as his true and faithful Subjects, and hear their Complaints and Answers to the Calumnies of their Adversaries, that the Nation may be restored to its Quiet, and they to their Estates. This Letter bears Date October 10. and is subscribed. R. York, R. Warwick, R. Salisbury.

The King raises an Army to go against him, but offers Pardon.

The Lords Answer.

A Letter from the Lords.

The King having read this Letter, was not much better satisfied, but gave a Second Order for his Army to march towards them, till coming within half a Mile of the Enemy, they pitched their Camp, and the King immediately put out his Proclamation. That whosoever would lay down their Arms, and come over to him and beg Mercy, should be pardoned for this Attempt. Which Act of Grace being heard in the Duke of York's Camp, begat a great Discontent and Murmuring, the Generality of the People fearing a bad Issue of their Rebellion, and desiring now to provide for their own Safety. Trollop and Blunt with their Calisian Troops, were amaz'd to see themselves engag'd against their King, whom they always had served, and in whose Pay they still were; for the Earl of Warwick, who sent them over, had not declared to them the Reason of their coming; wherefore as soon as they saw where they were, they fled the next Night to the King's Army, and advertised him of the Duke of York's Design, to set upon his Camp suddenly, that he might at once destroy the King and his People; and by their Example drew many others to do the like, which much lessened the Lords Forces. This sudden Desertion of the Captains, in whom they put much Confidence, and of many of their People, was a Discouragement to the Lords to attempt any Thing further. They saw their Counsels betrayed, their best Soldiers gone, and the Remainder not willing to fight, and thought it in vain to run the certain Danger of Life, and so they resolv'd to provide for their own Safety, and depart. The Duke of York with his Younger Son Edmund, Earl of Rutland, fled privately into Wales, and from thence sailed into Ireland, where he was received with an universal Joy. The Irish offering him to live and die with him, as if he had been their Natural Prince. The Earl of March, the Duke of York's Eldest Son and Heir Apparent, accompanied with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and Sir John Wenlock, went into Devonshire, where by the Help of John Dinham, Esq; afterwards Treasurer of England in Henry the Seventh's Days, they bought a Ship at Exmouth for an 110 Marks, and sailed into Gernsey, and so to Callis, where being let in at a Postern by Sir William Nevill, Lord Falconbridge, the Earl of Warwick's Uncle, who kept the Town and Castle, they were joyfully received by their Friends. The News of their Flight being carried to the King's Camp, he sent out some Troops of Horsemen to pursue them, but all was in vain, they were got out of their Reach and out of Danger. As for the private Soldiers, who by the Retreat of their Leaders, were left to the King's Mercy, they were all pardoned and sent Home, except some few, who being remarkable for their Forwardness in this Rebellion, were some of them fined, and others hang'd and quarter'd. The Town of Ludlow, which belonged to the Duke of York, and had sided with him in this Rising, was plunder'd and robb'd to the very Walls. In the Castle the King took the Dutchess of York with her Two Youngest Sons, whom he sent to be kept under Confinement by the Dutchess of Buckingham her Sister. And the Duke of York and his Sons, with the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury were proclaim'd Traitors to the King, Enemies to their Country, and Rebels to the Crown: And then having made the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Clifford, Wardens and Keepers of the Northern Parts of England, as his trusty and most faithful Friends, and Henry, the new Duke of Somerset, Captain of Callis, he began his Journey towards London.

A Pardon proclaimed, which made the Rebels lay down their Arms.

The Lords dismiss their Army and fly.

Some of the Rebels executed.

When K. Henry was come to Coventry in his way Home, he call'd his Parliament to meet there Novemb. 20. and being met they attainted of High-Treason, Richard, Duke of York, and his Sixteenth Parliament, its Acts,

A. D. 1459. Reg. 38. his Eldeſt Son Edward, Earl of March, Richard, Earl of Warwick, Edmund, Earl of Rutland, Richard, Earl of Salisbury, Sir Thomas Harrington, Sir John Wenlocke, Sir Thomas and John Nevill, the Earl of Salisbury's Sons, and many others, their Goods were confiſcated, their Lands ſeized, and their Heirs diſinherited to the Ninth Generation. As ſoon as the Parliament was riſen, the Duke of Somerſet was ſent over with a choice Company of valiant and hardy Soldiers to take poſſeſſion of his Government at Callis, but when he came to enter the Haven, the Artillery ſhot ſo hotly upon him both from the Town and the Rice-bank, that he was forced to retire out of Danger, and land at Witſundbay, from whence he ſent his Commands to the Captains of the Town to receive him, ſhewing them his Commiſſion for the Lieutenancy of it, but not being regarded, he betook himſelf to the Caſtle of Guiſnes, and reſolv'd by Force to bring the Town into Obedience to him, for which end he maintain'd daily Skirmiſhes with the Garriſon of Callis, tho' more to his Loſs than Gain. In the mean time the Mariners, who carry'd him over, bearing a greater Affection to the Earl of Warwick than him, convey'd their Ships into the Haven of Callis, and in them certain Perſons, who were the Earl of Warwick's Enemies, as Jamin Findill, John Fellow, and ſome others, who being preſented to the Earl of Warwick he cauſed them forthwith to be beheaded.

Duke of Somerſet made Captain of Callis.

A. D. 1460. The Earl of Warwick takes the King's Ships from Sandwich.

The News of the ill Succeſs of the Duke of Somerſet being related to the King and Queen, they ſent over Richard, Lord Rivers, and Sir Anthony Woodvile his valiant Son with 400 Men to aid the Duke of Somerſet at Guiſnes againſt the Garriſon of Callis, who went down to Sandwich in order to paſs over, but lay there ſome time to expect a Wind. The Earl of Warwick who kept the Narrow-Seas with a good Navy having Intelligence of the Deſign watched his Opportunity, and ſent Sir John Dinham with a ſmall Number of Men to ſurprize them, who entring the Town took the Lord Rivers and his Son in their Beds, and having plundered the Town return'd carrying all the King's Ships, which were laid there to tranſport them, along with them, except a Veſſel nam'd Grace de Dieu, which could not be ſtirr'd, becauſe it was very leaky, all which he preſented to the Earl of March, of whom he had due Praiſe and Encouragement. With theſe Ships which were well Victualled and Manned, the Earl of Warwick immediately ſail'd to the Duke of York in Ireland to commune and conſult with him about their Return into England, and divers other Matters of Importance. The Wind and Weather were ſo favourable to the Earl's Voyage, that he paſſed and repaſſed from Callis to Dublin in leſs than 30 Days. The Duke of Exeter, who was then Lord High-Admiral of England, hearing of the Earl of Warwick's Voyage into Ireland, lay in the Way of his Return with a competent Number of Ships well mann'd to have ſeiz'd him as he paſſed by them, which the Earl of Warwick being aware of, prepared to give him Battle: But the Duke of Exeter when he came to put in Execution his Deſign found ſuch a great Inclination to the Earl of Warwick in his Captains, Mariners, and many of his Soldiers, that he durſt not meddle with him, and ſo let him paſs unattacked. Soon after the Earl's Return to Callis, becauſe all Attempts againſt him had proved Unſucceſsful hitherto, the Queen entertain'd a groundleſs Propoſal to deſtroy him made to her by Sir Baldwin Fulford, a Man of more Daringneſs than Prudence, who undertook upon pain of loſing his Head to kill the Earl of Warwick; but after he had ſpent the King 1000 Marks he return'd again without having done any Thing.

Some Attempts to take the Earl of Warwick, but in vain.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 38.

The King ſuſpects an Invaſion of England, and endeavours to hinder it.

The Earl of Warwick being return'd out of Ireland, and bringing his Mother to Callis, gave ſome Suſpicion to the King and Queen, that there were ſome freſh Reſolutions of invading England entertain'd by them of his Party, and that they might make their Endeavours in vain, two Methods were made uſe of as moſt effectual. 1. To ſuppreſs all ſuch Perſons as were known to favour the Duke of York and his Party in England: And 2. To guard the Coaſts well with a ſufficient Navy, that they might not dare to land any Forces, which could not be done without Hazzard. In order to the former of theſe the Earl of Wiltſhire, Treaſurer of England, the Lord Scales, and the Lord Hungerford were ſent with the King's Commiſſion to Newbury, a Town belonging to the Duke of York, to inquire out ſuch as favour'd the ſaid Duke, ſome of whom being found Guilty were hang'd and quarter'd, and the whole Town was plunder'd and ſpoil'd. From thence the Earl went to Southampton, and other Places, where he uſed the like Severity. The Fame of theſe Actions and Dealings, tho' juſt, much terrified ſuch Towns as knew themſelves obnoxious to the ſame Puniſhment; and becauſe Kent had given greater Proofs of their Affection to the Lords Side ſeveral times this Reign, than any other County had, not only in Jack Cade's Rebellion, but in betraying Sandwich, they expected nothing but Ruin, unleſs they could come under the Protection of the ſaid Lords: To that End they ſent a Meſſage to them at Callis to invite them over to their Defence, promiſing them their utmoſt Aſſiſtance. The Lords tho' in ſome Forwardneſs for their intended Deſign, yet would not venture till they had better Knowledge of their Sincerity, and therefore ſent over the Lord Falconbridge to try their Reſolutions, and concert with them about their further Proceedings. Sir Simon Manford, who for ſome time before was laid with a Navy of Ships well mann'd and victuall'd to defend the Sea Coaſts againſt all ſuch Attempts, was ready to oppoſe his landing, whereupon aroſe an hot Diſpute between 'em, but the Victory at length fell to the Lord Falconbridge, who took Sir Simon himſelf with many other Priſoners, and ſent them over to Callis to the Earl of March, where he with Twelve of the chief of his Captains were beheaded upon the Rice-bank. The Lord Falconbridge having thus removed all Impediments of his Landing was receiv'd into Sandwich with an hearty Welcome, and the Gentry of that Country and the adjoyning Shires immediately reſorted to him, ſhewing him their Cauſes of Fears from the Queen and her Friends, and earneſtly requeſting the ſpeedy Return of the Lords to free themſelves and the whole Kingdom from apparent Deſtruction, promiſing them their utmoſt Help and Concurrence. The Lord Falconbridge could not diſtruſt their hearty Proteſtations, which had all the Signs of Veracity in them, and therefore diſpatch'd away a Meſſenger to the Lords at Callis, to aſſure them, that he found a general good Inclination in all People in thoſe Parts to them, and a Readineſs to do them all the Service they could both in Body and Goods, and it was his Advice, that they ſhould loſe no Time, but paſſing over the Sea ſhould land in England, while the People were ſo hotly affected to them. The Earls were ſenſible of the Fitneſs of this Opportunity Kent invites the Lords to invade England.

The Lord Falconbridge at Sandwich invites the Lords to come into England.

to

A. D 1460 Reg. 38. to effect their Design, and sending the Messenger back to the Lord Falconbridge with a Declaration to be sent to the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and dispersed up and down the Maritime Countries to prepare the People for their Reception, and draw over all they could to their Aid, they made all the necessary Preparations for their Passage into England.

The Lord's Declaration.

The Sum of their Declaration was to this Effect, That the Duke of York, Earls of March, Warwick and Salisbury had divers Times offered and sued to come into the King's Presence to have declared for their Duty to God, His Highness, and Prosperity of the Realm these following Matters, viz.

I. The great Extortion, Murther, Robberies and Oppressions done to the Church and Ministers of it, against the Laws both of God and Man.

II. The Poverty and Misery of His Highness himself, who being cheated and defrauded of the Revenues of the Crown, which might and would support his Royal State, by the Destroyers of the Commonwealth, was forced to oppress and spoil his Subjects.

III. That the Laws were partially and unjustly executed and made to support their Injustice and Oppression, by such as should most love and tender them.

IV. That the Commons were marvellously taxed, and their Goods taken from 'em without Payment, because he permitted the Destroyers of the Land to live upon his own Revenues, suffering all the King's Possessions in France to be lost.

V. That the People begin to have new Impositions laid upon them, viz. every Town to find Men for the King's Guards after the Example of the French our Adversaries, which if continued to our Heirs, will be such a Charge and Bondage, as none of our Ancestors were subject to.

VI. That divers Lords had caused the King to write Letters to his Enemies in Ireland and France to conquer the said Kingdom and take Callis, which Letters were shew'd to the Duke of York by the Irishmen with Detestation of their Villany.

VII. That since the barbarous and shameful Murther of Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter at Bury, it hath been studied and conspired to have destroy'd and murther'd the Duke of York and his Issue of the Royal Blood, as also the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury, for no other Cause but for the true Heart they have ever born and do bear to the King's Profit and Wealth of the Realm.

VIII. That the Earls of Shrewsbury and Wiltshire, and the Lord Beaumont, the mortal Enemies of the said Duke and Lords, having the guiding of our Soveraign Lord, would not suffer the King to receive and accept them as he would have done, into his Presence, dreading the Charge, which would have been brought against them for destroying the Nation.

IX. That the said Earls of Wiltshire and Shrewsbury, and Lord Beaumont, not satisfied with the Kings Revenues and Goods, had stirr'd up and excited His Highness to hold his Parliament at Coventry, where an Act was made by their Provocation and Labour to destroy the said Duke of York, Earls of March, Rutland, Salisbury and Warwick, and their Issue and their Estates and Tenants were given up to their Hands, who robbed them and hang'd many of them without the King's Consent or Approbation.

These Mischiefs they declared, they could not but behold with Grief, and therefore now purposed again to offer themselves to the Presence of their said Sovereign Lord to declare them to him in the most reverent Manner, that he may have Pity and Compassion on his miserable Subjects, and not suffer these Mischiefs still to reign. To the effecting of which they required all People to whom their Declaration should come, in God's Behalf and their own, to assist them doing their Duty to their Sovereign, his Person and Dignity, to whom they have been and ever would be true as any of his Subjects alive, to which they called God, the Virgin Mary and all the Saints in Heaven to witness.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 38.

What Effect this Declaration had appeared in a short time: For the Earls of March, Warwick and Salisbury, who in a few Weeks after arrived at Sandwich with 1500 Men only, were no sooner arriv'd, but the Lord Cobham met them with 4000 Men, and when they had refreshed themselves a few days, they march'd thro' Kent to London, and were in their Way joyn'd by several Gentlemen and their Friends, who came in so thick, that before they got to the City they were increased into a Body of near 40000 fighting Men, many Gentlemen and Yeomen of the South-parts joyning with them near London, which they enter'd July 2. and were joyfully receiv'd by the Mayor and the whole City, whither also came the next Day Thomas Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Lincon, Salisbury, Ely and Exeter, with many other Priors and religious Persons to congratulate their Arrival, by whose Means they hoped for a Reformation of all Abuses in Church and State, tho' not such as follow'd.

The Lords welcomed and assisted in Kent.

The King, who at the Time of the Lords landing was at Coventry, was not unactive as far as in him lay, to stop the Progress of this Rebellion, for which End he appointed the Lord Scales to assemble what Troops he could, and get Possession of London, as the most important Place of the Kingdom, and which if secured, would alone baffle their Attempts. That Lord with the Earl of Kendall, Lord Lovell and others was zealous to obey the King's Command, and with all Expedition marching towards that City, arriv'd there before the Lords, and demanded Admission in the King's Name, assuring the Mayor and chief Citizens, that their coming thither was only to defend and keep the City from the Spoil of those Traitors, who, as the King was credibly inform'd were hastning thither. The Mayor, who secretly favour'd the Lords Undertakings, answer'd, That he needed no Help either to defend or govern the City committed to his Charge, nor would permit any armed Men to come within his Jurisdiction. This Reply much incensed the Lord Scales, who evidently saw the Disloyalty of the Citizens by it; and that he might annoy them, as much as was possible, he entred into the Tower and threatn'd them, that he would with his great Ordnance beat down their City, if they receiv'd the Rebels, which Menaces he endeavour'd after to make good.

The King sends the Lord Scales to secure London.

The Queen in this Time (for the King hated Wars, and would not mind his own Defence) gathered a good Army about Coventry, (which Place was then call'd, The Queen's secret Harbour) and making the Duke of Somerset (who was in June come from Guisnes into England) the Duke of Buckingham, and divers other Lords, the Captains and Commanders of it, march'd with it, having the King himself with them, to Northampton, where when the Queen saw that she had Power enough to encounter

The Queen gathers an Army against the Lords.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 38. counter their Enemies, ſhe took upon her to encourage them to vindicate the Rights of their King, whoſe peaceable Diſpoſition, and pious Temper beſpake their Fidelity the more to defend it, by how much it was of it ſelf the more unable or unwilling to act in its own Defence, and by her good Words raiſed in them a Reſolution to keep him on his Throne, or die for his Right.

While the Queen was thus preparing for her own and the King's Defence, the Lords at London were in great Conſultation how to proceed in their Buſineſs, and having, to keep up the ſame ſhew of Loyalty, to which by their Declaration they had pretended, taken an Oath in a full Convocation of the Clergy at St. Paul's that they had, and ever would bear faithful and true Allegiance to King Henry, and had no other Intentions, than to redreſs the Grievances of the Nation, and remove the Deſtroyers of their Country from about the King's Perſon; it was agreed, That the Earls of March and Warwick, William, Lord Falconbridge, and Henry, Lord Bourchier, call'd alſo Earl of Eu, ſhould march with an Army of 25000 Men towards the King and Queen, leaving behind them, to keep the Londoners in their promiſed Obedience, the Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Cobham, and Sir John Wenlocke, who by their Vigilancy kept not only the City in Order, but defended it againſt the Lord Scales, who annoy'd it with his great Ordnance, and did much Harm to the Citizens; but theſe Lords by mounting Guns on the other ſide of the Thames over againſt the Tower, and preventing all Supplies of Victuals to be ſent, put him to equal Streights and Loſſes. When the King and Queen heard that the Earls of March and Warwick drew near them, it was adviſed, that the King's Army ſhould paſs over the River Tyne, and encamp themſelves ſtrongly in the open Fields, and wait their coming, which was accordingly done. On July 9. the Earls with their Army encamp'd between Tonceſtor and Northampton, and reſolv'd the next Day for the Fight; but at the Mediation of the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and the other Biſhops which were preſent, it was thought convenient, that the Biſhop of Salisbury ſhould be ſent to the King to beſeech him to admit the Earl of Warwick into his Preſence to declare his Innocency, ond offer ſuch an Accord, as that all Things might be ſettled without Blood-ſhed. This Requeſt was deny'd by the Duke of Buckingham, and though repeated again and again, yet had no better Anſwer, the King's Party, it ſeems, truſting ſo much to their Strength and Ordnance, and being encourag'd by the Biſhop of Hereford to fight, would not hearken to any Propoſals of Peace.

The Lord Scales in the Tower annoys the City.

The Lords ſue for Peace, but being rejected come to a Battle.

The Earl of March, who being in the heat of his Youth, and very courageous, conſider'd not ſo much the ill Effects of a Battle as the Lawrels he longed for, ſeeing all Propoſals of Peace rejected reſolv'd to ſet upon the King's Army without Delay, and in the Night remov'd his Camp towards Northampton, marching in order of Battle; The Earl of Warwick led the Van-Guard, the Earl of March the Body, and the Lord Falconbridge the Reer. About Two a Clock in the Afternoon, July the 9th, the two Armies met, and the Earls of March, and Warwick having given a ſtrict Charge to their Soldiers, that they ſhould none of them lay Hands on the King, nor the Common People, but the Nobles and Gentlemen only, the Battle began and laſted for Five Hours, (or as others, Two Hours) with great Fierceneſs on both Sides; but at length by the Treachery of the Lord Grey, who went over to the Enemy with a good Party and aſſiſted them, the King's Side was vanquiſh'd with the Loſs of 10000, partly drown'd and partly ſlain, among which were theſe Men of Note, Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham, John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, the valiant Son of as valiant a Father, Thomas Lord Egremont, John, Viſcount Beaumont, and Sir William Lacy. The Duke of Somerſet eſcap'd narrowly, and with the Queen and Prince Edward fled into the Biſhoprick of Durham. Many were taken Priſoners. The King himſelf, who remain'd in his Tent during the Battle, being left alone, fell into his Enemies Hands, but the Earls of March and Warwick aſſuring him, That they ſought the Welfare of his Perſon, and Happineſs of the Realm, in deſtroying their malicious Enemies, he was much comforted; and being led into Northampton with Proceſſion, he tarry'd three Days there, and on July 16. arriv'd at London, where he was lodg'd in the Biſhop's Palace. A. D. 1460. Reg. 38. The Lords conquer.

This Victory reduced the Lord Scales to a low Condition, ſo that deſpairing of Help he reſign'd the Tower upon Terms, which yet he ſuppoſing hardly ſecure enough, to preſerve himſelf, he endeavour'd to have fled to the Queen in Diſguiſe; but being diſcover'd by ſome of the Earl of Warwick's Watermen they ſlew him, and ſtripping him of his Cloaths, left his Body naked on the Shore, and wallowing in his own Blood many Days. After this great Inquiry was made for the Favourers of the Lancaſtrians, and many of them fin'd, and ſome executed for Treaſon. Judge Thorp, ſecond Baron of the Exchequer, was taken in a Monk's Habit with his Crown ſhaven, and impriſon'd a while in the Tower, and after executed by the Mob at Highgate. The Lord Scales reſigns the Tower.

Queen Margaret hearing, that the King was taken, and that moſt of her Faſt Friends were dead, was in great Perplexities what to do; and fearing ſhe might alſo with her Son be betray'd to her Enemies, ſhe fled into Wales to the Caſtle of Hardlogh, having only Eight Perſons with her, and ſo got into Scotland, but in Lancaſhire, was robb'd of all her Goods to the Value of Ten Thouſand Marks.

The Victorious Lords having the King now in their Power, and ruling all Things almoſt at their Pleaſure, proceeded vigorouſly in the Execution of their Deſigns; and firſt call a Parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, October the 8th following, but in the King's Name, and then ſend into Ireland to the Duke of York to acquaint him with their Succeſs, and invite him to come with all convenient Speed into England, which when he heard he was greatly pleaſed, perſwading himſelf, that now no Obſtacle remain'd between himſelf and the Crown. Ambition needs no Spurs, Preparations are made with all Speed for the Duke to paſs into England. At Dublin he and his Retinue took Ship, and in a few Days landed at the Redbank near the City of Cheſter, and from thence by long Journies came to London upon Friday, October the 10th, which City he entred with Trumpets ſounding, and a naked Sword born before him, accompany'd with a great Train of armed Men. Reg. 39. Seventeenth Parliament, its Acts.

The Parliament was met Two Days before, and the Duke having paſſed through the City went directly into the Upper-Houſe or Chamber of the Peers, and placed himſelf in the King's Duke of York returns, and goes to the Parliament.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39.

King's Seat, (ſſ) laying his Hands upon the Cloth of State, as if he had taken Poſſeſſion of the Crown and Kingdom. When he had ſtood ſo a while he turned himſelf to the Lords, and looked upon them ſtedfaſtly, as tho' he would read in their Countenances their Thoughts and Reſentments of that Action. After he had ſtood a while in that Poſture, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Bourchier, whom King Henry, who was then in the Queen's Lodgings, had ſent to him, came into the Houſe, and having paid him the uſual Reverence, asked him Whether he would not go and ſee the King. The Duke at this Queſtion was obſerved to change his Colour, and then anſwer'd him in a Paſſion, That he knew none in this Kingdom, to whom he owed that Duty or Honour; but on the contrary, all Men owed it to him, and therefore King Henry ought to come to him.

Duke of York calls himſelf King, and poſſeſſes himſelf of the King's Lodgings, and claims the Throne in Parliament.

The Archbiſhop having received this Reply, went back to the King to let him know it; which the Duke of York perceiving, he roſe up, and following him into the Palace, got Poſſeſſion of the King's Lodgings, breaking open ſeveral Doors and Locks, that he might enter them. He ſtayed there but a little while, and then returned to the Houſe again, leaving his Servants and chief Attendants to keep them for him. Being again ſettled in the Regal Throne, he boldly made his Demand of the Crown, and the Regal Authority of England, in Words to this Effect. (t) 'That he approached that 'Throne, as the Place to him in Juſtice belonging, which, he ſaid, not as requiring their 'Favour, but friendly Indifferency, and true 'Adminiſtration of Juſtice, for the High and 'Mighty Prince, Richard II. Son of Edward the 'Black-Prince, Eldeſt Son of King Edward III. 'was the true and undoubted Heir of theſe 'Realms, and was in Poſſeſſion of the Regal 'Dignity, with all the Rights and Priviledges 'thereunto belonging, till Henry Earl of Derby and Duke of Lancaſter and Hereford, Son 'of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, Fourth 'Son to the ſaid King Edward III. and Younger 'Brother to my Noble Anceſtor, Lionell, Duke 'of Clarence, Third Son of the ſaid King Ed-'ward III by Force and Violence, contrary to 'his Duty of Allegiance done and ſworn, raiſed 'War againſt the ſaid King Richard, impriſo-'ned him, and uſurped and intruded upon his 'Royal Power, and aſſumed the Name and 'Authority of King, and after compaſſed his 'Death and Deſtruction, upon whoſe Deceaſe, 'having no Heirs lawfully begotten, the Right 'and Title of the Crown, and Superiority of 'this Realm, lawfully reverted and return'd 'to Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, Son and 'Heir to the Lady Philip, only Child of the 'aboveſaid Lionell, Duke of Clarence, to 'which Roger's (u) Eldeſt Daughter Ann, being 'my deareſt and Well-beloved Mother, I be-'ing the True and Lawful Heir, have an un-'doubted Right to the Crown. And if the 'Title be mine, why am I kept from it? If my 'Claim be good, why have I not Juſtice? For 'Men of Knowledge muſt own, that uſurp'd 'Poſſeſſion, tho' ſtrengthened with a lineal De-'ſcent, can nothing prevail, if continual 'Claim be lawfully made, and openly publiſh'd 'by the Right Heirs, as it hath been by Ed-'mund, Earl of March, my Uncle, Richard, 'Duke of York, (x) my Father, and my ſelf: 'but thro' ſiniſter Counſel and unjuſt Deten-'tion, I can neither obtain nor recover it, ſo 'that I am compell'd to make uſe of Force to 'regain my Right, and ſettle the Peace of the 'Realm, which thro' a Succeſſion of Uſurp-'ers has been miſerably ruined, and undone, 'eſpecially in this laſt Reign; and therefore 'I have, and now do take Poſſeſſion of the 'Royal Throne, truſting thro' the Aſſiſtance of 'you, the Peers of this Realm, to beautifie and 'maintain the ſame to the Glory of God, Ho-'nour of my Blood, and publick Welfare of 'all my People (y). This Speech ſtruck all the Auditors with a kind of Conſternation, and the Lords themſelves ſat mute, neither whiſpering nor moving, as if in ſome Diſcontent at what he had ſaid, or at leſt in a doubt what to do; for King. Henry's Piety and Holineſs, Succeſſion in the Third Degree, and Thirty eight Years Poſſeſſion of the Crown, had ſo far confirm'd moſt of them in the Opinion of his Right, that they were loth to be inſtrumental in depoſing him, whoſe very Innocency and Goodneſs entitled him to a better Crown than ever he had worn. The Duke of York, whoſe Eagerneſs to be King, taught him to expect a ready Compliance with his Deſires, was much diſappointed, when he ſaw no Man almoſt ſeconding his Wiſhes; wherefore being neither well contented, nor willing to ſeem much diſpleaſed, he adviſed them to conſider throughly of what he had ſaid to them, and do to him, what in Juſtice and Wiſdom they judged Right; and ſo departed to his Lodgings at Whitehall. (z) While the Duke was thus declaring and ſhewing his Title to the Crown in the Houſe of Lords, it happen'd, that in the Houſe of Commons a Crown, which hung up in the Middle of the Roof to adorn a Branch let up for Lights, fell down ſuddenly, without any imaginable Cauſe, and alſo another Crown upon the Top of Dover-Caſtle, which were both looked upon at this Juncture as ominous Accidents, which did betoken that the Crown ſhould ſome way or other have a Fall, and that there would be ſudden Alterations in the Government.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39.

Adviſes the Lords to conſider of his Right to the Crown.

The Crown hanging now in doubt as it were, between King Henry and the Duke of York, and Conſultations being held every Day by the Lords about their Titles, on whoſe Head it ſhould be ſettled; The Duke of York taking upon him a (ſſ) He did not ſit down on the Throne, he only took hold of the Cloth of State.

(t) His ſitting on the Throne, and making this Speech, is very much to be doubted: For John Whethamſted, Abbot of St. Albans, who was preſent in the Houſe of Peers, makes no Mention of any ſuch Speech in the Hiſtory that he wrote of this Reign, and particularly this Revolution. Hol. 655.

(u) As a Proof of the Forgery of this Speech, we ſhall inſtance one Miſtake, which could not come from the Mouth of the Duke of York, he ſays, Which Roger's Eldeſt Daughter Ann— She was not the Eldeſt Daughter, the Lady Elinor Mortimer, as we have ſaid elſewhere was Elder, tho' ſhe left no Iſſue, and ſo the Right of Inheritance devolv'd to Ann. But this may be an Error of the Author; and indeed in the original Speech 'tis only ſaid, Unto which Roger's Daughter call'd Ann, &c. See Hol. pag. 656. The Nonſenſe of the Oration is as remarkable as the Subject of it, He tells them in the firſt Paragraph, This Noble Realm, and our Natural Country ſhall never be Unbuckled *from her daily-*Feaver, except I as the Principal Phyſician, and you as the Truſty Apothecaries conſult together in making of the Potion, and try out the Clean and Pure Stuff from the Corrupt and Putrified Drugs.

(x) His Father was not Duke of York. His Uncle Edward had the Title, and his Father only that of Earl of Cambridge, which Earl was beheaded for Treaſon at Southampton in the Third Year of Henry V.

(y) He did not make uſe of the Term My People, and it had been arrogant in him. His Words were, To the Publick Wealth, as well of you all here preſent, as of all the poor Commons of this Kingdom and Regiment.

(z) Whitehall was not then built. He went to his Lodgings in the King's Palace at Weſtminſter, near the Abby.

kind

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39.

kind of Majeſty, kept in the King's Lodgings, and tho' near King Henry, would not for all the Requeſts and Prayers that could be uſed, vouchſafe to viſit him, till ſome Concluſion were made in the Matter, ſaying, That he was ſubject to no Man, but God only, under whom, none was Supream in this Realm, but he. He ſent alſo a Meſſage to James II. King of Scots, to quit the Engliſh Dominions. King (a) James at the Duke's Requeſt had entred the Kingdom of England with a powerful Army, and beſieged Roxborough, upon the Promiſe, that he would reſtore to him the Towns which the Engliſh had taken away from him. (For that King was very unwilling to meddle in the Diſpute, and would not be induced to it but by this Advantage.) The Duke had his Meſſengers tell the Scotch King, that the Siege was ſo diſpleaſing to him and all his People, he could hardly keep them from taking up Arms to relieve it, thanking him for his Aſſiſtance, and telling him, that he had now no more need of him. The King of Scots anſwered, He was glad at his good Succeſs, and asked the Meſſengers, Whether they had a Commiſſion to deliver up the Towns to him according to the Duke's Promiſe? They anſwer'd, No. Whereupon the King reply'd, Neither will I quit the Siege, which for all theſe Threats, whether his, or People's, I hope to put a ſpeedy End to. And play'd upon the Town with his Cannon more furiouſly than ever, with a Reſolution to gain it before any Succour could come; but e're he could effect it, he was ſlain by the Breaking of a Cannon, no Man elſe ſave the Earl of Angus being hurt by it. Yet this Accident did not put an End to the Siege, for the Scots continued their Aſſaults rather the ſharper, and the Beſieged being reduced to a low Condition by their great Loſſes, yielded themſelves to the new King James III. their Lives and Goods being ſaved. About the ſame Time died Charles, King of France, in a ſtrange Manner; for he being ſick, ſome of his Courtiers inform'd him of a Deſign to poiſon him; whereupon he forbore any Food for Seven Days, and after not being able to eat, died.

Duke of York takes on him a Regal Majeſty and Command.

King of Scots beſieges Roxborough.

Charles King of France died.

The Crown diſputed, but at laſt ſettled on theſe Conditions.

While theſe Things were doing, many hot Diſputes had paſſed between the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, about the Settlement of the Crown; ſome thought it very unreaſonable to call King Henry's Title in Queſtion, who had been ſo long in Poſſeſſion of the Sovereignty, and ſo much the rather, becauſe the Duke of York himſelf had in ſwearing Allegiance to King Henry ſo often, and declaring him his lawful Sovereign, tied up himſelf from Claiming the Crown, if he had any Right to it. But on the other Side, the Duke of York's Friends (which were not a few) argued that the Duke's Title was ſo clear, and ſo well known to them all, that it would be the greateſt Injuſtice in the World to deny him his Right, and tho' King Henry, it is true, had been long in the Poſſeſſion of the Throne, yet his Uſurpation being ſo evident, he ought to be as willing to recede from what he was wrongfully poſſeſſed of, as they were in Juſtice bound to declare him deprived. 'Tis true, they ſaid, the Duke of York had often ſworn Allegiance to King Henry, and taken him for his lawful Sovereign, yet he never renounced his Right, and 'tis plain, his Oaths and Promiſes were out of Fear or Force, not willingly. Theſe Arguments were thought ſtrong on both Sides, and therefore the middle Way was pitched upon by the Lords, and upon All Saints-Day, an Agreement was made between theſe two Princes, King Henry, and Richard, Duke of York, under theſe Articles.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39.

I. That notwithſtanding the clear and undiſputable Title of Richard, Duke of York, to the Crown of England, as Heir to Lionell, Duke of Clarence, the ſaid Duke tenderly deſiring the Wealth and Proſperity of this Land, and to lay aſide all that may be a Trouble to the ſame; and conſidering the long Poſſeſſion of the ſaid King Henry, who hath all his Time been named, taken, and reputed for King of England, and Lord of Ireland, is contented, and agreed, that the ſaid King Henry, ſhall be taken and reputed King of England, and Lord of Ireland, during his Natural Life, and the ſaid Duke ſhall honour him as his Sovereign Lord.

II. That the ſaid Richard, Duke of York, with his Two Sons, Edward, Earl of March, and Edmund, Earl of Rutland, ſhall promiſe and bind themſelves by ſolemn Oaths, neither to do, procure, or ſuffer and Thing to the Prejudice of the Natural Life of King Henry VI. or to the diminiſhing of his Royal Dignity, but ſhall withſtand to their utmoſt Power any Perſon that ſhall attempt it, as God ſhall help them.

III. That Richard, Duke of York, ſhall from thenceforth be called and reputed the Very and Rightful Heir to the Engliſh Crowns, and after the Deceaſe of the ſaid King Henry, the ſaid Duke and his Heirs ſhall immediately ſucceed to them.

IV. That the ſaid Richard, Duke of York, ſhall have by the Authority of this preſent Parliament, Caſtles, Mannors Lands and Tenements, with their Appurtenances, to the yearly Value of 10000 Marks over and above all Charges and Repriſes, of which 5000 Marks ſhall be for his own Eſtate, 3000 for the Earl of March, and 2000 for the Earl of Rutland, yet with ſuch Intents and Conſiderations, as ſhall be declared by the Lords of the King's Council.

V. That if any Perſon imagine, or compaſs the Death of the ſaid Duke, and thereof be convicted, they ſhall be adjudged guilty of High Treaſon.

VI. That the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament aſſembled, ſhall take an Oath, to accept, take, worſhip and repute the ſaid Richard, Duke of York, and his Heirs, as aboveſaid, and the ſaid Duke ſhall protect them in keeping this Agreement.

VII. That this Accord and Agreement ſhall be notified and publiſh'd by the King's Letters Patents, and his Conſent and Agreement be openly declared to all and every one of them; and if the ſaid King Henry ſhall break, or go againſt any Point of this Accord, then the ſaid Crown and Royal Dignity, ſhall immediately devolve and come to the Duke of York, if he be alive, or to the next Heir of his Linage.

VIII. That all Statutes and Acts of Parliament, made in the Time of Henry IV. or V. to entail the Crown on their Heirs, ſhall be annull'd and repeal'd.

IX. That the Duke of York ſhall be Protector of the Realm for the future, and be called Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Cheſter.

(a) He was ſo far from entring the Engliſh Dominions at the Requeſt of the Duke of York, that he came to revenge the Death of the Duke of Somerſet, his Mother's Brother, whom the Duke of York had been the Means of killing at the Battle of St. Albans.

This

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39.

This Agreement drawn up in the Form aboveſaid, was engroſſed, ſealed, and ſworn unto by both Parties on All Saints-Day, and then it was enacted by the Parliament, that it be made unalterable on all Hands. King Henry was obſerved to be very much pleaſed with this Agreement, not doubtleſs, becauſe he was willing his Son ſhould be excluded from the Crown. But becauſe he feared more ſevere Dealings with himſelf, and hoped Time would better provide for his Son, and therefore appointed a ſolemn Proceſſion the ſame Day to give Thanks to God for this peaceable Settlement of Affairs. In it the King rode to the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, attended with the Duke of York, Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and many other Lords, with his Crown upon his Head, and heard Even-Song, and then return'd to the Biſhop's Palace, where he continued ſome Time. The next Day Richard, Duke of York, was by Sound of Trumpet ſolemnly proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown of England, and Protector of the Nation, during the King's Life. After theſe Things the Parliament made an Act, 'That the Parliament (b) at Coventry, Nov. 20. An. 38. Hen. VI. 'ſhall be repealed, and all the Acts, Statutes and 'Ordinances made by the Authority of the ſaid 'Parliament, diſannull'd, becauſe that Parliament was unlawfully ſummon'd and holden, 'and the Knights and Burgeſſes not duly choſen, 'but privately appointed by thoſe Men, who 'ſought the Deſtruction of the Nobility and 'Commonwealth: And, that a Woman at 'Fourteen Years of Age at the Death of her 'Anceſtor or Parent, ſhall without any Difficulty or Queſtion, have Livery and Seiſin of 'the Lands deſcended to her: And then the Parliament was diſſolv'd, being the laſt that ever King Henry call'd, or ended.

A Proceſſion to thank God for this Agreement.

Duke of York rules as Protector, and cauſes the King to ſend for the Queen.

And now the Duke of York's Power began, as Guardian of the King's Perſon, he took care of all Things, but chiefly of himſelf, how he might keep what he had obtained; for he very well knew that the Queen, who was a Woman of a maſculine Spirit, and the Lords of her Council, who were his utter Enemies, would make all the Oppoſition they could to this Settlement, and either by Force or Fraud undo all; whereupon he cauſed King Henry to ſend for her, and her Son Prince Edward. But the Queen, (who by that Time the Meſſengers arrived, was got at the Head of a good Army of 18000 Men, which ſhe put under the Command of the Dukes of Exeter and Somerſet, Earls of Devonſhire and Northumberland, Lords of Clifford and Roſſe, who encouraged her with great Hopes of Victory, to engage her Adverſaries, and reſtore her Husband to his Dignity, and her Son to his Succeſſion) refuſed to go along with them. Which when the Protector had Knowledge of, he aſſigned his truſty Friends the Earl of Warwick and Duke of Norfolk to be the Keepers of the King; and he himſelf, and the Earls of Salisbury and Rutland, with a ſmall Body of Men departed from London, December 2. to go into the North to repreſs the Queen, and her northern Adherents, ordering the Earl of March to follow him with all the Forces he could gather Upon Chriſtmas-Eve, the Duke arrived at his Caſtle of Sandal, near Wakefield in Yorkſhire, and there muſter'd up all his Tenants and Friends to the Number of 5000. With theſe he intended to oppoſe the Queen's Army, who, by his Scouts, he underſtood were marching towards him, which the Queen, and Lords of her Party haſtned, that they might fall upon him before the Earl of March could join with him. When they drew near, the Duke found the Queen's Forces much to exceed his, and therefore it was the Advice of the Earl of Salisbury, and Sir David Hall, That he ſhould keep himſelf within the Walls till the Earl of March ſhould arrive, becauſe the Queen had no Artillery with her, and ſo could do them no Harm in that Time.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39.

Duke of York goes to Wakefield againſt the Queen.

The Queen and her Army came before the Caſtle, and having laid two Ambuſhes under the Command of the Lord Clifford and Earl of Wiltſhire at the beſt Advantage, the Queen and Duke of Somerſet, who commanded the Body of the Army, preſented themſelves in Sight of Sandal, and going up to the very Walls, braved the Duke to come out and fight them. The Duke being hot and furious at this Bravado, and counting it a Shame to be ſhut up in a Caſtle by a Woman, which he had never been in ſo many Years of the French Wars, reſolved to venture out in the open Field, and give her Battle. All his Friends were much againſt it, but not being able to diſſwade him from it, by all the Arguments they could uſe, they all marched out of the Caſtle upon the laſt Day of December, and going down the Hill in very good Order, came into the open Field before the Face of their Enemies, who immediately joined Fight with them. Soon after the Battle was begun, the Ambuſhes roſe, and encompaſſed the Duke and his Men on every Side, ſo that within Half an Hour he himſelf was ſlain, with many of the Perſons of Note that were with him, valiantly fighting, and his whole Army utterly defeated, 2800 of them being killed. The Earl of Salisbury was wounded and taken, with ſeveral Gentlemen and others. Robert Aſpell, the Duke's Chaplain, and Tutor to the Earl of Rutland, who ſtood at ſome Diſtance to ſee the Event of the Battle, with his Pupil, who was then about Twelve Years of Age, perceiving that it was likely to prove unſucceſsful and fatal to his Lord, fled with the Young Earl to ſecure him, but was overtaken by the Lord Clifford, who in the Heat of his Fury, ſtabb'd the young Prince to the Heart, tho' the poor Child with Tears begg'd Mercy of him upon his Knees (c). The Chaplain pleaded much for the Child's Life, and promiſed the Lord, That if he would ſpare him, he ſhould be his Servant for ever. But Clifford ſwore fearfully, That as his Father had ſlain his, ſo he would be the Deſtruction of him and all his Race; and then ſlaying him, departed in Triumph to find the dead Body of his Father, whoſe Head he cut off, and having made a Crown of Paper, and ſet it on it in Deriſion, preſented it to the Queen, whoſe Tent was at Hand, and ſhe not long after, ſent it with other Lords to be ſet upon Poles over the Gate of the City of York. The Earl of Salisbury, who was committed to the Care of the Duke of Somerſet, and by him impriſon'd in the Caſtle of Pomfract, with a Promiſe to ſave his Life for a large Sum of Money, was a little after by the Common People, who hated him, pull'd out of the Caſtle, and beheaded, and ſo his Head, with others, was ſent to York.

Duke of York kill'd and his Army routed the 30th of December.

The Lord Clifford ſlays the Earl of Rutland, and curs off the Duke of York's Head.

King Henry, by the Inſtigation of his Governours, the Duke of Norfolk and Earl of Warwick, ſent Commiſſions into the Parts about Coventry, to raiſe what Forces they could to ſup-

(b) Holinſhead, p 659. ſays, This Parliament declared that of Coventry a deviliſh Council.
(c) He could not ſpeak for Fear, but he held up his Hands for Mercy. Hol. 659.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39.

preſs the Northern Rebels, but like a Torrent they came down upon them towards London, plundering and robbing, ſo that they were irreſiſtible by any Strength that could be ſuddenly got together, and paſſed on without controul.

A. D. 1461.

The Queen and her Army marches towards London.

The Queen having obtain'd this Victory over the Duke of York, was ſenſible, that tho' the Advantage might do her much good, becauſe the Commons generally follow the conquering Side, yet it had done her Enemies Side but very little Harm, becauſe it was but a ſmall Party, and thoſe pick'd up in the Country about Wakefield, which ſhe had conquer'd. She knew Warwick's Courage and Intereſts were great in London, where he had a ſtrong Army to oppoſe her, and the Earl of March was gone into Wales, where his Father had many Tenants and Dependants to gather an Army, ſo that ſhe had no ſmall Difficulties to grapple with, before ſhe could accompliſh her Deſigns, and ſettle her Husband and Son in their Rights. She expected no ſmall Oppoſition on both Sides, and therefore after a ſerious Conſultation with the Lords and other grave Men that follow'd her Intereſts, it was reſolv'd, That ſhe her ſelf, the Prince and Duke of Somerſet ſhould march towards London with the greateſt part of her Army, and Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, and James Butler, Earl of Ormond and Wiltſhire, who raiſed a great Number of Iriſh and Welſh to the Queen's Aſſiſtance, ſhould obſerve the Earl of March, and gather freſh Forces out of her Friends to encounter him. The Earl of March in the mean time having heard of his Father's Death at Glouceſter, where he then lay, was ſtrangely amaz'd and diſcourag'd at the Accident; but being comforted by his Friends, who told him 'twas his Father's Raſhneſs, not his Enemies Power, that had been the Cauſe of this Misfortune, he remov'd to Shrewsbury, and there declaring his Father's Death, the Queen's Cruelty, and the Ruin of the Kingdom to all the Inhabitants of that City, and the adjoyning Countries, he got an Army out of the Marches of Wales, and the Places near, to the Number of 23000, who out of Love to Mortimer's Race offered themſelves readily to go againſt the Queen and his Father's Murtherers. With theſe he departs from Shrewsbury to follow the Queen's Army, which was marching towards London, and revenge his Father's Death; but at his firſt ſetting out, hearing that Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, and the Earl of Ormond with a great Army of Welſh and Iriſh were purſuing him, he turn'd back to fight them, and on a large Plain near Mortimer's Croſs on the Eaſt-ſide of Hereford, met them. On Candlemas-day in the Morning, when the Sun at its riſing appear'd to the Earl of March like Three Sons, and ſuddenly running into One gave him (as he gueſſed) an Omen of Victory, the two Armies entred the Battle, and after a ſharp Conflict, the Earl of March put the Queen's Forces to Flight, with the Slaughter of 3800. The two Earls of Pembroke and Ormond fled, and many Gentlemen of Note were taken, and to propitiate York's Ghoſt were beheaded at Hereford.

Earl of March gathers an Army of 23000 Men, and engages the Forces of the Earls of Pembroke and Ormond and conquers.

The Queen, who was marching towards London with her Northern Rabble, who after they had paſſed the River Trent, plunder'd the Villages and Towns, as if they were entred an Enemy's Country, heard of the Diſcomfiture of her Friends; but being elevated with the Thoughts of her former Victory, and knowing that the Mayor and many of the chief Men of London were for her, ſhe went on confidently in hopes of ſoon recovering that Loſs. But when ſhe approach'd St. Albans, ſhe receiv'd the News that the Earl of Warwick and Lords, who had the Government of the King, were coming againſt her with a numerous Army, raiſed by the King's Authority, and having the King himſelf at the Head of them, (for the Commons of the City of London fearing they ſhould fall into the Hands of the Northern Men, flocked to the Lords to defend the City againſt the Queen). The Northern Lords and others that were with the Queen, adviſed her to paſs thro' St. Albans and meet their Enemies on the other ſide of the Town; but the Earl of Warwick having ranged his Archers in the middle of the Town, they were forced to retreat, and find another Way; which having done, the two Armies join'd upon Barnard-heath on the North-ſide of St. Albans. The Battle was fierce, and the Victory remain'd dubious a certain time; but at length through the Treachery of Lovelace, who kept back the main Body of the King's Army from aſſiſting their Brethren, till they being over-power'd were forced to fly, the Queen's Side gain'd the Victory, and with the Slaughter of 2300 Men obtain'd the King into their Power, with the Lord Bonvile and Sir Thomas Kiriell: Who upon the King's Promiſe of Safety to them ſtay'd with his Majeſty, but to their Coſt: For, when the Queen heard that the Commons had beheaded Judge Thorp at High-gate, ſhe cut off both their Heads.

A. D. 1461. Reg. 39.

Queen and Lords engage at St. Albans, and the Queen conquers.

After this Battle, which was fought upon February the 15th, the King and Queen with Prince Edward, now about Eight Years Old, and the Northern Lords went to the Abby-Church and gave Thanks to God for this Victory, and then the King made the Prince Knight, with Thirty others who had ſignalized their Courage in fighting for her, which done the King and Queen were conducted to their Lodgings in the Abby. But the Town of St. Albans was not at quiet. The Northern Men ranſack'd and plunder'd the Houſes without Mercy: Whereupon the Abbot and chief Inhabitants made an humble Petition to the King and Queen to reſtrain their Soldiers Rudeneſs and Theft, which was granted, and a Proclamation accordinly put out; but they reply'd, That it was their Bargain to have all the Spoil of every Place beyond the Trent, and ſo they continued their pillaging and Robberies.

The Northern Men plunder without controul.

While the Queen lay at St. Albans her Army being in want for Proviſion, ſhe gave an Order to the Mayor of London to ſend her a ſufficient Quantity of Lenten-fare for her Soldiers, which he readily obey'd; and having filled ſeveral Carts was conveying it to her, but the Commons of the City in a great Company met them about Cripple-gate, and ſtopp'd them, ſaying, They would not feed them that would cut their Throats, and rob them of all they had. The Mayor with many mild Exhortations adviſed them to let them paſs, being for the Relief of the King and his Friends, but he could not perſwade them to it, and he ſaw it was in vain to uſe any Force with them: Whereupon the Mayor fearing the Queen's Diſpleaſure, ſent the Recorder of the City to the King's Council at Barnet, and the Dutcheſs of Bedford and Lady Scales with ſome Biſhops to the Queen to excuſe the Matter, and pacifie her Diſpleaſure, promiſing the Queen to admit her into London, when Things were a little better appeaſed among the Commons. The Queen was pleaſed with the Propoſals, and paſſed by the Diſappointment of Relief for her Army, ſending

The Mayor of London ſends Proviſion to the Queen.

400 Men

A. D. 1461. Reg. 39.

400 Men to prepare for her entring into the City, which if ſhe could ſecure to her ſelf, ſhe hop'd to win all again.

The Earl of March coming towards London, cauſes the Queen to withdraw

But while theſe Things were acting, News came to the Queen, that the Earl of March, who had vanquiſh'd the Earls of Ormond and Pembroke was joyn'd with the Earl of Warwick, and the Forces eſcap'd from St. Albans, and that they both were coming towards London, making a mighty Army. The Queen fearing their Forces thought not fit to oppoſe them, and ſo withdrew from St. Albans into the North, (becauſe ſhe had few or no Friends in Kent or Eſſex). The Earl of March having certain Intelligence of the Queen's Departure, thought it not convenient to purſue her, but took his Way directly towards London, and was there receiv'd with univerſal Joy by all the Commons, and many other Citizens, February the 28th.

King Edward's popular and military Election.

His coming to London being known, the Gentry of the South and Eaſt-parts flock'd to him, bringing great Numbers to his Aſſiſtance. In this Concourſe of People it was thought convenient to ſettle Matters fully, and place the Earl of March on the Throne, if poſſible: And to that End, March the 2d, the Earl of Warwick drawing up his Army into St. John's Field in the midſt of Throngs of People, which he caſt into a Ring round him, read the Agreement made the laſt Parliament between King Henry and the Duke of York, which having told them was notoriouſly broken by King Henry, and ſo his Crown forfeited, he demanded of them, whether they would have King Henry to reign ſtill or no? They all cry'd out, No, no. Then he again ask'd them, Whether they would have the Duke of York's Eldeſt Son to reign over them, according to that Settlement? They unanimouſly cry'd out, Yea, yea. The Affection of the People being thus known, a general Council of the Nobles, Biſhops, Gentlemen and chief Citizens was ſummon'd at Baynard's Caſtle, and there the Earl of March declared again his Title to the Crown, and recited the Articles made the laſt Parliament, by which he was to have Poſſeſſion of it, if King Henry broke the ſaid Articles, as undeniably he had. The whole Council after a long Debate at length concluded, That becauſe King Henry had done contrary to the Agreement in the laſt Parliament made and concluded, and was inſufficient of himſelf to govern the Realm, he was therefore to be deprived of all Regal Authority and Power, as being incapable of it, and a Detriment to the Commonwealth of England; and that Edward, Earl of March, Son and Heir to Richard, Duke of York, having the unqueſtionable Title to the Crown of England, was by them all unanimouſly nam'd, elected and admitted for the King and Governour of this Realm. The Earl of March modeſtly declared his Inſufficiency for ſo great a Charge, being as yet young (d) and unexperienced: but being encourag'd by the Arch-biſhop and other Lords he accepted their Petition, and took upon him the Name and Title of King of England. The next Day he went in Proceſſion to St. Paul's, and there offer'd his Thanks to God for this his Exaltation to a Thorne by ſinging Te Deum, which done he was with great State conducted to Weſtminſter, and there in the Great Hall ſet in the King's Seat with St. Edward's Scepter in his Hand; where being throng'd with Multitudes of People to be Spectators of the Ceremony, it was again ask'd them, whether they would have the Earl of March for their King, and ſerve, love, honour and obey him as their only Sovereign and Lord; they all joyfully anſwer'd, Yea, yea. Then he took the Homage of the Noblemen there preſent, and after was conducted by them to the Abby, where having ſat in the Quire till Te Deum was ſung, he went to St. Edward's Shrine and offer'd according to the uſual Cuſtom. Things being thus finiſh'd, he return'd by Water to St. Paul's, and took up his Lodgings in the Biſhop's Palace, and the next Day was proclaimed King of England by the Name of Edward IV. in thd Streets of London and adjoyning Towns.

A. D. 1461. Reg. 39.

The Earl of March made King with all the uſual Ceremonies.

K. Henry's Character

Thus ended the Reign of Henry VI. many Years before his Death (for he lived twelve Years longer) after he had reign'd thirty eight Years, ſix Months, and three Days, a Prince very Pious and Religious, but always attended with ill Fortune; for whatever Side he was of, the Victory ever went againſt him, as the former Hiſtory ſhews. He had no Genius for Government nor Parts fit for the Management of State Affairs; but being a great lover of Charity and good Works, he might have been as good a King as England ever had, if he had been guided by a wiſe and good Council; but he was ruled by the Queen and her Favourites, who were envy'd by a proud Nobility, and was the Cauſe of great Miſeries to the Nation. His Queen indeed may ſeem to have excell'd her Sex as much as the King ſunk below the Dignity of his own, but her ambitious aſſuming the Regal Power beyond her Sphere, made it thought no Rebellion to take it out of her Hands, and put it where it would be better order'd and was more due. His Fall was much pitied, becauſe as to his Perſon undeſerv'd; but the common Good ſo much requir'd a Change, that it was judg'd better, That One ſuffer an Injury, rather than the whole Nation ſhould periſh.

(d) In his twentieth Year.

THE Remarkable OCCURRENCES IN THE Reign of HENRY the Sixth.

The Author of King HENRY VI's Life having taken Notice of the Remarkable Occurrences of all Kinds which happen'd in his Reign, we ſhall only add the Names of thoſe Great Captains and Men of Learning, who diſtinguiſh'd themſelves moſt in this Space of Time.

THE firſt and moſt Eminent for Feats of Arms was John Lord Talbot, created Earl of Shrewſbury, the Terror of France and the Glory of England; The Lord Scales, the Lord Poynings, the Lord Clifford, the Earl of Arundell, Richard, Earl of Salisbury, Father of the Famous Richard Nevill, Earl of Warwick, Sir Matthew Gough a Welſh Man, who after he had ſignaliz'd himſelf in the French Wars for almoſt 20 Years together, was kill'd at laſt by the Rabble in Cade's Rebellion, Sir Thomas Rampſton, Sir Thomas Kiriell, Sir John Grey, Sir John Aubmond, Sir Francis Surienes a Spaniard, who ſpent his Days in the Engliſh Service, and for his Valour was made Knight of the Garter, Sir Thomas Curſon, Captain Gonville, and Captain Andrew Trollop, were all brave Soldiers and wiſe Commanders. Many others were noted for their Courage and Conduct in the Wars of France. But theſe are the Names that ſhine moſt in the Hiſtory of thoſe Times. The moſt eminent for Learning were, John Hainton, a Monk of Lincoln.

Robert Coleman, a Franciſcan Frier of Norwich and Chancellor of Oxford.
Will. White, a Prieſt in Kent. He was a Wickliviſt. He marry'd a Wife, and continu'd Preaching till he was proſecuted for Hereſie and burnt.
Alex. Carpenter, he wrote againſt the Biſhops for perſecuting the poor and godly Chriſtians.
Richard Kendall, a Garmmarian.
Thomas Iſmalit, a Monk of Sion.
Walter Hilton, a Monk of Sheen.
Rob. Hounſlow, a Monk of that Town in Middleſex.
John Tilney, a Monk of Yarmouth, an excellent Divine.
Dr. John Low, Biſhop of Rocheſter.
Dr. Thomas Ringſted, a Civilian and Divine.
Dr. John Felton of Magdalen College, Oxon.
Nich Botleſham, D D. in the Univerſity of Paris.
John Holbrook of Surrey, a Mathematician.
Peter Pain, a Wickliviſt. He fled to Bohemea, and liv'd there in great Reputation for his Wiſdom and Learning.
Nicholas Upton, a Civilian. He wrote a Treatiſe of Heraldry.
Will. Beckly, Profeſſor of Divinity in Cambridge.
John Torpe, a Monk of Norwich.
Dr. John Capgrave, an Auguſtine Frier of Kent, the moſt learned Man of his Order in England.
Humphrey, Duke of Glouceſter, a Patron of Learning, and learn'd himſelf particularly in Aſtronomy. He wrote a Treatiſe, call'd Tabula Directionum.
Roger Onley, he was accuſed of Sorcery in Elinor Cobham's Plot, for which he was hang'd, tho' he was ſuppoſed Innocent. He was Author of a Book, call'd Contra vulgi Superſtitiones, and another, De ſua Innocentia.
Nicholas Cantlew, a Welſh Man of an ancient Family, and a Monk of Briſtol.
Hen. Wickengham of Norwich, a noted Preacher.
John Lidgate, a Monk of Bury, the beſt Poet of his Time.
Dr. Nicholas Hoſtreſham, a Phyſitian.
John Blackney, Prior of Ingham.
Thomas Beckington, Bp. of Bath, wrote againſt the Salick Law, which was defended by the French Writers, and occaſion'd a War with the Pen, as well as of the Sword.
John Baringham, a Frier of Ipſwich.
Dr. David Bois, a Welſh Man.
John Brome, an Auguſtine Frier.
Michael Trigury, a Corniſh Man Rector of the Univerſity erected at Caen by K. Henry.
John Amundiſhaw, a Monk of St. Albans.
Oſwald Anglicus, a Monk of the Order of the Charterhouſe.
John Keningale, a Monk of Norwich.
Peter of St. Faith's, the ſame.
Dr. Reginald Pocock, Biſhop of Chicheſter, a great Favourer of Wickliff's Principles, for which he was depriv'd.
John of Bury, a Monk of Clare.
Rob. Fleming, he wrote a Gr. and Lat. Dictionary.
Dr. Tho. Gaſcoigne, ſometime Chancellor of Oxon.
William Staplehart, a Monk of London.
Robert Finningham, a Monk of Norwich.
John Chandler, Chancellor of Wells.
Sir William Botoner, of Briſtol, an Antiquary.
Dr. John Stow, a Monk of Norwich.
Thomas Lanley, a Monk of Halm.
Cardinal Beaufort, Great Uncle to the King.
William Coppinger, A. M. of Oxford.
Tho. Lacy, an Aſtronomer and Mathematician.
John Talaugem, a Monk of Worceſter.
William Sutton, an Aſtrologer.
Robert Batſack wrote a Treatiſe of Chivalry and War, intituled, De Re Militari.
William Grey, Biſhop of Ely.
Cardinal Kemp, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury.
Adam Molins, Lord Privy-Seal, was a Man of great Learning, he loſt his Head in his Maſter's Quarrel.
Dr. Thomas Chillenden, L. L. D.

Theſe that follow were Hiſtorians.

Sir John Bourchier, Lord Barnes, tranſl. Froiſſard.
Roger Wall, a Herald, wrote the Reign of Henry the Fifth.
John Pole, he wrote the Life of Sr. Walburgh.
Thomas Walſingham, a Monk of St. Albans.
Thomas Radburn, a Monk of St. Swithins.
John Whethamſtead, Abbot of St. Albans.
Nicholas Mountacute.
Nicholas Bungey.
Tho. Dando wrote the Life of Alfred K. of Eng.
Nich. Cautelupus, the Cambridge Hiſtoriographer.
Rob. Bale Recorder of Lond. wrote a Chronicle of the Cuſtoms, Laws, Foundations, Magiſtrates, Offices, Orders, Changes, &c. of the City.

THE

E. Lovegrove delin.
P. Vanderbanck Sculp.
KING EDWARD THE IIII.th

A. D. 1461.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF EDWARD IV.

A. D. 1461. Richard, Duke of York ſlain at Wakefield Fight by Queen Margaret's Forces.

RICHARD, Duke of York, overthrown by his own Raſhneſs, and the happy Conduct of Queen Margaret, at the Battle of Wakefield in Yorkſhire, left the Juſtice of his Title with a more proſperous Fortune to his Son Edward, Earl of March, and then Duke of York. His Head during Life, buſied, with Expectations of Sovereignty, was mock'd with a Paper Crown after his Death, and being fix'd on a Pole was ſet on the Walls of York. For the Queen, to make his Pretenſions to the Kingdom the common Scorn, forgot that Compaſſion ſhe ow'd Human Nature in Calamity, and in a phantaſtick Cruelty expoſed it thus to the barbarous Mirth of the Beholders. With him died his young Son Edmond, Earl of Rutland, then but 12 Years Old, coming too ſoon with his Tutor to the School of War; and learning at firſt the ſharpeſt Leſſon from the Lord Clifford, who moſt inhumanly ſtab'd him proſtrate at his Feet, intreating but for Life.

The unlucky Fate of the Richards.

In the very Haven, after a long and tempeſtuous Voyage, thus periſh'd the Duke of York; as if it had been in the Fate of all the Richards who were either in Fact or Title Kings of England, to end by violent Deaths. Richard the Firſt and Second preceding him: His Son Richard the Tyrant, and Richard, Duke of York his Nephew, following him in the like Diſaſter, though ſeveral Ways, and upon different Quarrels.

Edward, Duke of York perſiſts tn his Father's Claim, and gathers an Army to revenge his Death.

This great Overthrow was ſuddenly rumor'd thro' the whole Kingdom, and ſtretched up to the Higheſt, to advance the Reputation of the Queen's Felicity. And ſoon it arrived at Glouceſter, where Edward now Duke of York lay with ſome ſmall Forces, expecting Directions from his Father: By whoſe Death perceiving himſelf in ſo foul Weather to ſit alone at the Helm, he began more warily to ſteer his Courſe: And conſidering how dangerous Delay is to increaſe the Approaches of Misfortune, remov'd to Shrewsbury. By the way his Army ſwel'd up to 23000 fighting Men; which might appear ſtrange if we weigh the neceſſary Unexperience of his Youth, being then but 18 Years of Age, and the ſlender Retinue that uſually waits on Infelicity. But now he was the Head of the great Body of that Faction, which his Father at the Expence of ſo long Trouble, had purchaſed to his Side; and whom the Queen's implacable Nature had made reſolute, and only to hope for Safety by running into the common Danger. Moreover all the Men of Power who inhabited between Glouceſter and Shrewſbury, had Dependency on him as Heir to Mortimer; or held in chief of his mighty Confederate the Earl of Warwick.

With this ſudden and unexpected Addition of Forces, he entertain'd a Confidence to be able to revenge his Fathers Death, and obtain that Greatneſs which as yet had been in vain attempted. He therefore look'd about, where he might on the beſt Advantage make Experience of his Fortune: Fortune appearing eaſie to be courted by him as if enamour'd with his Youth; having been ſeldom obſerv'd but froward to Age, in any Deſign that depends chiefly upon Courage.

Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, and James, Earl of Ormond fight Edward, Duke of York at Mortimer's Croſs.

And Occaſion was immediately offer'd: Certain Diſcovery being made of a great Power raiſed by the adverſe Party, with purpoſe to ſurprize him in the Amazement of the late Misfortune. The Army conſiſted of Welſh and Iriſh according to the ſeveral Nations of the two Commanders, Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, and James Earl of Ormond: Pembroke half Borther to Henry VI. as Son to Queen Catherine, Dowager to Henry V. by Owen Tudor: And Ormond a moſt faithful Servant to the Houſe of Lancaſter, by whoſe Gift in England he enjoy'd the Earldom of Wiltſhire.

A Prodigy of three Suns appearing at once.

Againſt theſe two the Duke of York led back his Forces, and in a large Plain near Mortimer's Croſs, near Ludlow in Shropſhire on Candlemas-Day in the Morning, gave them Battle. Before the Fight, the Sun (as by many Authors it is aſſerted) appear'd to the Earl in the Reſemblance of Three Suns, and ſuddenly united into One: The Truth of which I will not diſpute, but certainly the Pretenſion of ſuch Apparitions ſtrangely prevails with the ſuperſtitious Multitude, and therefore it had been both the Practice and Advantage of the moſt expert Commanders to ſet them on Foot: Yet how this Omen could be expounded happy to his Deſign, I underſtand not, unleſs we ſeek the Interpretation from the Event; for that indeed gave him the Victory, and brought the Glory of the two adverſe Generals over to his Side, ſo that the three Suns which with equal Brightneſs appeared in the Morning, before Evening ſhin'd alone in him. For the Two Earls and their whole Army were put to Flight, with the Slaughter of 3800 on the Place: Many Welſh and ſome Engliſh of Name were taken Priſoners, and afterward at Hereford beheaded, among whom an extraordinary Fortune hath made Owen Tudor, the Father of the Earl of Pembroke, moſt the Diſcourſe of Poſterity. For the good luck of an amiable Perſon, wrought him into the Affection, and ſoon after advanced him to the Marriage of Catherine, Daughter of France, and Widow

Duke of York conquers them.

to

A. D. 1461. to the moſt glorious Prince our Nation ever gain'd Honour by, Henry V. Yet all that this ſo envied Splendor in a Wife got him, was, to render his Life obnoxious to Impriſonment and Faction, and his Death more eminent on a Scaffold.

Duke of York marches to London.

This Victory raiſed Edward's Imaginations high ſo that now he reſolved to ſpend his Fortune no longer in ſmall Enterpriſes: And leſt the Spirit of his Army ſhould begin to languiſh, having no Enemy near to find him Imployment, he reſolv'd to ſearch for one about London, whither he had Intelligence the Queen with her triumphant Forces directed her March, not without Hopes of obtaining Admiſſion, becauſe the Mayor and others were her Friends: Moreover, it concerned the Policy of his Affairs, to retain the Poſſeſſion of the capital City of the Kingdom, whoſe Commons continued firm to his Service, and in which the Lords of his Party had the Cuſtody of King Henry's Perſon, left to their Faith, when the Duke of York went his laſt fatal Expedition.

The Queen engages the Earl of Warwick, and vanquiſhing him on Shrove-Tueſday, Feb 17. takes her Husband.

But in the Way at Chipping-Norton, he met the Earl of Warwick, who, with the Lords King Henry's Keepers, whom they brought with them, had lately fought and loſt the Field to the Queen at St. Albans. In which, beſide the Honour of the Day, and Slaughter of Two thouſand of her Enemies, ſhe recover'd the Perſon of her Husband. Warwick, tho' he brought with him only a Relation of his late Overthrow, yet it was with ſuch a Courage as diſdain'd Misfortune, and coveted nothing more than by the Tryal of a new Day to perſwade, or elſe to force back Victory to his Side.

And oftentimes a ſmall Loſs to an Army, like opening a Vein to a Body, doth rather correct than any way impair the Health; whereas too much Proſperity, like the worſt Surfeit, ſuddenly becomes uncureable. And ſo the Two late obtain'd Conqueſts wrought in the Enemy only Inſolency and Diſorder. For the Queen, wanton with Succeſs, vainly imagin'd a Security from future Competition, and either wanted Power to reſtrain her Soldiers, or licenc'd them to a free Spoil; by which unruly Violence ſhe untied the Affection of the Commons, who by their Quiet and Profit, meaſure the Vertues of Princes. And indeed they had Title to their often Complaints againſt the northern Troops, who, as ſoon as they had paſt Trent, as if there they had parted with all Obedience to Diſcipline, made uſe of all Kinds of Licence, that might ſerve their Avarice or Pleaſure. And having by the Way left no Towns, and in them no Place how ſacred ſoever unſpoiled; after the Flight of Warwick, they deſign'd for London, hoping to find it abundantly ſtor'd for Prey, and utterly unable for Defence.

Q. Margaret's Army ſpoil and ravage all the Country South of Trent.

City of London deny Queen Margaret Reception.

But the Citizens perceiving Hoſtility in their Approach, ſhut their Gates, and arm'd for Reſiſtance; and with ſuch Valour and good Order behav'd themſelves, that the rude Aſſailants were with Loſs repulſt, and the Queen perſwaded to retire Northward, knowing the Diſorder of her Men had begot her in the Place where ſhe then lay encamped, nothing but ill Aſpects and worſe Wiſhes: She therefore diſlodged from St Albans, and every Day as ſhe march'd towards the North, new Relations came of the Greatneſs and Reſolution of the Earl of March's Power, who, with the Earl of Warwick was on his Journey to London.

And doubtleſs the Report of his Approach confirm'd the City in her Courage to reſiſt the late Aſſault; which otherwiſe would without queſtion have comply'd with the Fortune of the more powerful. For preſently after the Departure of the Queen, the Earl of March on the Twenty eighth of February, made his triumphant Entry, and was receiv'd with ſuch Acclamations, as an over-joy'd People could expreſs, who only hoped for Safety by the Fortune of his Side. To encreaſe the Glory of this Entry concur'd, beſides his Title to the Crown, his late Victory at Montimer's Croſs, the Memory of a moſt glorious Father, and great Authority of his Confederate Warwick, the Beauty of March's Perſon, than which that Age beheld not any more excellent. Neither is the outward Form a ſmall Circumſtance to induce the Multitude to Reverence; ſince as Deformity in a Prince, hath oftentimes occaſion'd Contempt even to Deprivation: So on the contrary, hath an amiable Shape ſtrengthned very weak Pretenſions, and in Antonious Heliogabalus was ſufficient Title to an Empire, even in a military Election.

A. D. 1461.

City of London receive the Duke of York joyfully.

Beauty an Inducement to make Kings.

Earl of Warwick draws the Citizens of London to elect Edward, Duke of York, King.

But the Earl of Warwick, (whoſe Mind was ſtill in labour, and felt continually moſt violent Throws, till it had brought forth a ſettled Sovereignty to the Houſe of York) contented not himſelf with this general Applauſe, knowing how the leaſt Change of Fortune would create new Affections. He therefore reſolv'd ſo to faſten the City to his Deſigns, that any Alteration in Edward's Fortune ſhould be Ruin to them; and thereupon cauſed on the Second of March a general Muſter of all his Forces to be made in St. John's Fields; where, when he found an univerſal Confluence of all Men, anſwerable to his Expectation; he caſt his Army into a Ring, and with a loud Voice, made to be read the Agreement which the laſt Parliament had made between Henry VI. and Richard, Duke of York. By which Henry (out of Compaſſion to a long Poſſeſſion) was permitted to enjoy the Crown during his natural Life; the Remained to Richard and his Heirs, in whom it was then apparently proved that the Title to the Kingdom did remain. In which Agreement was likewiſe manifeſted, That Henry ſhould make immediate Forfeiture, whenſoever either he, or any of his Party ſhould attempt to diſanull this Act. This being read, and commented on with the beſt Efficacy of Language, to expreſs the foul Breach on King Henry's Side, in the Deſtruction of Richard Duke of York: The Queſtion was propoſed to them, whether they would longer continue in their Obedience to Henry's Uſurpation, who ſo impiouſly had violated his Faith? To which with an univerſal loud Conſent of Voices, they cry'd out, No, No. Then were they demanded, Whether they would admit Edward, whoſe Title to the Crown was ſo apparent, and whoſe Wrong had been ſo great in a perfidious violent Entry, and a long injurious Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom by the Family of Lancaſter? To which with Acclamations of Aſſent was anſwered, Yea, Yea.

A. D. 1461. Mar. 3. Reg. 1.

Edward, Duke of York, elected King.

Popular Elections of Kings exploded

Thus by the Soldiers and the People, was Edward's Title approv'd, and he admitted King March 3. 1461. And happily did this Ceremony than appear needful, in regard the ſame Voices had vow'd Obedience to another. Otherwiſe, whoſoever ſhall alledge, that the Suffrage of the multitude is neceſſary to confirm a Prince, deſtroys the Right of Succeſſion, and in that the Monarchy, which ſo long and triumphantly hath ruled this Nation. And to underſtand the Uncertainty and Injuſtice of all popular Election, Hiſtory inſtructs us, That no Tyrant yet in England, by what indirect Practice ſoever

he

A. D. 1461. Reg. 1.

he attain'd, or Cruelty maintain'd the Government, but entred in by a ſeeming Approbation of the Commonwealth, and ſettled his State by Confirmation of the People. For I know not by what univerſal Diſtemper of Humours it happens, that generally when the Head of this Kingdom hath been ſick, the whole Body was diſeaſed; ſo far, that Uſurpation hath been legitimated, and Tyranny applauded: Which Misfortune muſt have neceſſarily been occaſion'd thro' the Power of the prevailing Faction; and Fear which poſſeſt all honeſt Minds: Who tho' they neither wanted Knowledge to ſee the Injury, nor Deſire to redreſs it, yet private Intereſt made them too cowardly to undertake the Remedy.

Edward's Title to the Crown of England.

But in Edward's firſt Entrance on the Kingdom the popular Suffrage (which in the Inauguration of Chriſtian Princes is of ancient Cuſtom eſteem'd a convenient Ceremony) met with a juſt Title. For he by his Grand-mother, Ann, Daughter and Heir of Roger Mortimer, Son and Heir to Philippa, only Child of Lionell, Duke of Clarence, third Son to Edward III. King of England; of neceſſity muſt have (where Women are admitted to inherit) better claim to the Crown than Henry VI. though in the fourth Deſcent from Edward III. by John of Gaunt, being but his fourth Son. For however Caſuiſts may diſpute, or civil Lawyers argue; that the being remov'd one Degree further, can no way prejudice Succeſſion, whereby the younger Brother may come to be preferr'd before the Elder Brother's Son, if by chance the Elder die during his Father's Life; yet 'tis an Injuſtice ſo againſt Reaſon and Cuſtom, that whoſoever yet attempted it, was reputed to violate the Laws of Nature.

Edward accepts the Kingdom.

From St. John's Fields, the Principal of the Army, and Common-Council of the City, brought News of this Election to Edward, Earl of March, remaining at Baynard's Caſtle: Who ſoon as he underſtood the Intention of their Addreſs (with ſuch Modeſty as ſome Clergy-Man may have uſed at his Conſecration, who by ſimoniacal Practice hath obtain'd a Biſhoprick) refuſed that a while, which moſt ambitiouſly he coveted. But ſoon the Animation of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Earl of Warwick, the Biſhops of London and Exeter, and divers others of Eminence prevail'd, and he at their Requeſt took on him the Royalty.

King Edward declares his Title to the Crown, but requires the Peoples Approbation which he had again.

That Night he reſted, the next Morning with as much Ceremony and State, as the Shortneſs and Unquietneſs of the Time could licenſe, in ſolemn Proceſſion he went to St. Paul's Church; whence after Te Deum ſung, and Oblation made, he rod to Weſtminſter, there ſeated in the moſt perſpicuous place of the great Hall, with the Scepter of St. Edward the Confeſſor in his Hand, himſelf made Declaration of his double Title to the Crown. Firſt, by deſcent, as Heir to the third Son of Edward III. the Line of whoſe eldeſt Son Edward the Black Prince extinguiſhed in the Depoſition and Parricide of Richard II. procured by Henry of Bullingbrooke, firſt King of the Houſe of Lancaſter, Edward the Third's ſecond Son William dying without Iſſue. Secondly, By Authority of Parliament, which upon Examination of the Duke of York's Title, conferred the Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom immediately on him or his Heirs, when Henry VI. ſhould make Forfeiture of it, by Death, Reſignation, or Breach of that Accord ſworn there ſo ſolemnly by them. And that this Accord was broken, the Slaughter of the Duke oppreſt with unequal Numbers on K. Henry's Party at the Battle of Wakefield, did ſadly manifeſt. Nevertheleſs he proteſted himſelf ready to forgo the Juſtice of his Claim, rather than to enter upon it without the free Vote. At which unanimouſly the Aſſembly cry'd K. Edward, K. Edward, joyful that their Voices might confirm him King, who had daign'd them ſo humble a Complement, as to profeſs that he would not receive the Title without their Suffrage. The Formality of this ſecond Election thus paſt, he went in Proceſſion to the Abby; whence after much Solemnity and Homage of all the Nobility there preſent, he return'd by Water to the Biſhop of London's Palace, and was immediately proclaim'd King throughout the City by the Name of Edward the Fourth.

A. D. 1461. Reg. 1.

K. Edward proclaimed, and one Walker executed for ſaucy Language.

The firſt Fortnight of his Reign was dy'd, I will not ſay ſtain'd, with the Blood of Walter Walker a Grocer, who keeping Shop at the Sign of the Crown in Cheapſide, ſaid he would make his Son Heir to the Crown; a bold Jeſt broke in an evil Time, yet do I not ſide with them in Opinion, who tax the King of Severity in this Execution, unleſs I could clear this Man from being particularly factious for the Houſe of Lancaſter, or know that theſe Words were utter'd in innocent Mirth, without any Scorn to King Edward's Title. And however perhaps the extraordinary Puniſhment of ſuch ſaucy Language, was not then unneceſſary to beget Authority, and make Men cautious to diſpute the Deſcent of Princes, when the Queſtion was ſo nice, and Arguments not improbable on either Side.

But here in her very firſt Courteſie, Fortune raiſed K. Edward higher than the Endeavours of a long Ambition had done his Father. For now was he conſecrated King in the Imperial City of this Realm, adorn'd with every Circumſtance of Sovereignty; and all his Enterprizes hitherto ſo flatter'd with Succeſs, that he could promiſe nothing but Proſperity to his Hopes. Yet was the Ground whereon he built uncertain, and his State brought into Compariſon with his Competitor, frail and obnoxious to Ruin.

K. Henry's Title to the Crown.

For Henry had equal Dignity with the Advantage of a long Reign, an uninterrupted Deſcent in Majeſty for 60 Years, a Sovereignty acknowledged Abroad by all Chriſtian Princes, and obey'd at Home by all Engliſh Men without Diſpute, a Title according to the Law Salick indubitable, and which had been confirm'd at the firſt Entry of his Grand-father Henry IV. into the Kingdom, not only by Reſignation of Richard II. by general Acknowledgment of all the Nobility, and by Authority of Parliament, but even by Approbation, nay particular Negotiation of Edmund, Duke of York; Edward, Duke of Aumerl; Richard, Earl of Cambridge, Grand-Father, Great-Uncle, and Great-Grandfather to the late anointed K. Edward IV. Only a feeble Judgment, and a long evil Fortune rendred Henry VI. inferior, which to counterpoiſe Q. Margaret and the Lords of her Side were daring and vigilant, omitting no Stratagem or Endeavour that might add to the Honour or Safety of their Deſigns.

Q. Margaret and the Lords of her Party raiſe an Army to dethrone King Edward.

Whereupon ſhe continu'd ſtill in the North, and obliging that People every Day more to her Service, labour'd to prepare ſuch an Army as might upon the worſt of Fortune be able enough for Defence: And ſoon ſhe found how much her own and the Authority of the great Lords of her Side prevail'd, having raiſed 60000 fighting Men, and they all reſolv'd with Expence of their Blood to buy back that Majeſty, which the Houſe of Lancaſter by evil Fate had loſt. An Army if arm'd and order'd well, able

Q. Margaret's Army conſiſts of 60000.

to

A. D. 1461. Reg. 1.

to oppoſe the mightieſt Enemy, or undertake the boldeſt Enterprize. On ſight of which the Queen entertain'd a Confidence eaſily to ſcatter the Forces of the New Muſhroom King, who in a Night ſeem'd to have ſprung up to Majeſty; eſpecially when ſhe underſtood how with unequal Power he march'd Northward, a Clime not unlikely to prove as diſaſtrous to him as to his Father.

King Edward's Reſolution to maintain his Right

King Edward on the other Side as ſoon as the Voice of the People had ſaluted him Prince, reſolv'd with hazzard of his new-gain'd Sovereignty to extirpate his great Oppoſer: For while the Side of Lancaſter was ſupported with the Aſſiſtance of ſo large a Portion of the Kingdom, which as yet adhered to Henry, he could be King but at the courteſie of his Faction, and the Body of the Land muſt of Neceſſity grow monſtrous, being charg'd with two Heads, each of which look'd divers Ways: He therefore while his Men had yet the Memory of their late good Fortune freſh in their Courage, march'd towards the Queen, and choſe rather, as worthier his Spirit, to provoke than expect an Enemy.

He marcheds from London, March 12.

King Edward's Arrival at Pomfret Caſtle.

Of his Arrival at Pomfret Caſtle when it was underſtood, and that part of his Army led by the Lord Fitzwalter, had poſſeſt it ſelf of Ferribrig, a paſſage over the River Aire of great Importance: All they of Lancaſter began carefully to look to their Affairs. King Henry, the Queen, and Prince (who were by their ſeveral Weakneſſes unfit for Action) retired to York, there to attend the event of Buſineſſes. The Army being committed to the Charge of the Duke of Somerſet, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford.

K Henry's Army, commanded by the Duke of Somerſet &c.

Among theſe it was reſolv'd that Ferribrig, in regard of the Conſequence of the Place, was at any hazzard to be recover'd, and the Enterprize left to the Undertaking of Clifford; who early the next Morning, leaſt Delay might betray his Deſign to the Enemy, with a competent Number march'd thither, and that with ſuch Diligence and Secrecy, that before there was the leaſt Suſpicion of an Aſſault, the uncircumſpect Guard was entred upon and defeated. With the Tumult the Lord Fitzwalter, and the Baſtard of Salisbury were awaken'd, and ſuſpecting a Mutiny among their own Soldiers, roſe haſtily from their Beds, and coming down encounter'd a mercileis Enemy, who deny'd all Quarter, and on the Place ſlew them.

Lord Clifford gains Ferribrig of Edward's Men.

The Loſs of this ſo comodious Paſſage, and Slaughter of ſuch eminent Perſons came firſt to the Ear of the Earl of Warwick, who ſomewhat too much tranſported with the evil Fate of their firſt Attempt, poſted in all haſte to K. Edward, in whoſe Preſence he kill'd his Horſe, and ſaid, Sir, God have mercy on their Souls, who for love of you in the Beginning of your Enterprize have loſt their Lives, yet let him flie who will flie, by this Croſs (kiſſing the Hilt of his Sword) I will ſtand by him who will ſtand by me, fall back, fall edge.

Earl of Warwick's Fears.

Words certainly, tho' mingled with a high Reſolution ſtrangely diſtemper'd, and repreſenting ſo much of Danger as might have troubled the Courage of the Army. And howſoever partial Hiſtory in mentioning the Actions of Great Men, will not allow them to participate with the Vulgar in the Weakneſſes incident to human Nature, yet every greateſt Spirit hath his Allay of Imbecillity. The moſt knowing Scholar hath found a Period, beyond which his curious Search could not move; the wiſeſt Politician hath diſcover'd where he err'd, and bluſh'd at the Miſtake; and the boldeſt Soldier at ſome time or other hath found the Coward trembling in him. We may by our Endeavours raiſe Nature ſomewhat above her Frailty, but never triumph over her till Death.

Great Men have their Frailties.

A. D. 1461. Reg. 1.

And certainly Warwick was too much amaz'd at this Accident; but ſoon he ſettled himſelf, and by his ſtout Comportment animated the fainting Army: But King Edward, whoſe Youth was beautified with Valour and Wiſdom, even to Wonder, ſoberly entertain'd this ſad Report, and to oppoſe againſt any Fear which might ſhake the Soldiers; cauſed immediate Proclamation to be made, That it was lawful for any Man whom the preſent Loſs, or Fear of future Danger diſcouraged, ſafely to depart; That whoſoever ſhould perform the Duty of a Soldier and fight manfully, ſhould have a certain and a moſt large Reward: On the contrary to any Man who ſhould continue in the Army, and hereafter fly away, the ſevereſt Puniſhment and Liberty for any one to kill ſuch a Coward, with promiſe of double Pay.

King Edward's Courage and Licenſe to his Soldiers to depart.

No Man accepted the Offer of ſo contemptible a Safety; and indeed the Body of his Army conſiſted of Southern Men, whoſe Flight had perhaps been as unſafe as the preſent Danger: Moreover the Example of the Valiant perſwaded the reſt, who bluſh'd to appear ſingle in their Fears; whereby not being known they grew afterward to have equal Title, with the moſt daring to a glorious Victory.

None left the Army for fear.

The King ſeeing the Spirit of His Army ſo bold, and ſo devoted to his Service, thought the Loſs of Time might endanger the Loſs of his Deſign; and thereupon reſolv'd with the firſt Convenience to bring his Fortune to the Tryal of a Battle. The Lord Falconbridge and Sir Walter Blunt, in regard the Duke of Norfolk was then diſabled by Sickneſs, had the leading of the Vanguard, who finding the Paſſage of Ferribrig impoſſible on the ſudden to obtain, three Miles above, at Caſtleford paſt the River: and ſoon after about Dindingdale diſcover'd the Lord Clifford, whom they ſuddenly overtook and encompaſt; in vain labouring to retire to the main Battle. But he perceiving no way to eſcape from his Enemies but thro' Death, defended himſelf bravely with his ſmall Forces even to the Envy of them who overcame, till ſhot with an Arrow thro' the Throat, he periſh'd. The Lord John Nevill, Son to the Earl of Weſtmerland, with almoſt all thoſe unfortunate Troops fell there with their Leader the Lord Clifford; who in too mild a manner paid them the great Debt he ow'd to Juſtice for the Murther of the Young Earl of Rutland.

Lord Falconbridge defeats the Lord Clifford, and ſlays him.

Next Day being Palm-Sunday, early in the Morning both Armies came in Sight: A fatal Meeting, which like the Union of the Soul with the Body, never parts but by Death. The Field was between Caxton and Towton, from the latter of which this Battle afterwards took Name. On full Survey of King Henry's Hoſt ſo dreadful in advantage of Number, Proclamation was made in King Edward's Camp, that no Quarter ſhould be given nor Priſoner taken. A neceſſary Cruelty not to be avoided but with danger of his own Ruin: In regard otherwiſe the common Soldier might in hope of Spoil, or of the Ranſom of an Enemy, be wanting to his Duty.

K. Henry and K. Edward's Army come to a Battle at Towton.

It was about the Hour of Nine, when the Armies drew near; 60000 for Lancaſter, for York ſcarce 40000; only the Preſence and Courage of King Edward made an Equality. The Lord Falconbridge, to whom the Van was committed, and who was moſt able for the Place, when

A. D. 1461. Reg. 1.

when the Fight was ready to begin, charg'd his Archers, ſoon as they had ſhot, to fall Three Strides back, and make a Stand, whereby they might avoid the Arrows of the Enemy: Which Stratagem happen'd as was expected; for the northern Men with a ſudden Fury anſwer'd the Onſet, and having emptied their Quivers, haſted to hand Blows. But the Arrows, which they had diſcharged at Adventure by reaſon of the Fogg, having never reach'd them againſt whom they were ſhot, turn'd now to their Annoiance and Trouble, ſo far, that the Splinters of them ſticking in the Ground, pierc'd and gall'd their Feet, and forc'd them to a confuſed Stop. In this Trouble the Southern Men ſhot another Flight, and the Wind conſpiring with their Cunning, blew a Tempeſt of Hail and Snow into their Faces; by which the Vanguard of King Henry, led by the Earl of Northumberland and Andrew Trollop, gave back.

The Lord Falconbridge's good Conduct.

Yet did not the main Battle tremble with this Motion; but, as if the Enemy had gain'd no Advantage, continued with the firſt Conſtancy. Ten Hours Victory hung in Suſpence; equal Courage appeared on both Sides, equal Hopes of Good, equal Deſpairs for Fear of bad Succeſs, which occaſion'd ſo much Cruelty in the Fight. But at length (the Field ſtain'd with Blood, and the Earth groaning with the Burden of ſo many Heaps of dead and dying Bodies) the Northern Men began to hope for Safety only in flight. Neither did they yield to the prevailing Fortune of the Enemy, until their Courages were diſmay'd with ſight of ſo many eminent Perſons ſlain before their Eyes. For the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmerland, the Lords Beaumont, D'acres, Gray and Wells, and Andrew Trollop, who was famous in the French Wars, with divers others of the greateſt Reputation, for Nobility and Courage, had already fallen, and in their Slaughter taught the Survivers what to expect. The Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, ſeeing all Things deſperate, the greater Part of the Army ſlain, the reſt broken and flying, poſted to York, to carry the fatal News of this Overthrow to the unfortunate King, whoſe Vertue yet had a Patience greater than his Ruin.

K. Henry's Army worſted, and many of Note ſlain.

In no Battle was ever power'd forth ſo much Engliſh Blood; for in this, and the Two precedent Days were ſlain 36776 Perſons, all of one Nation, many near in Alliance, ſome in Blood, fatally divided by Faction; yet all animated with the ſame Zeal to maintain their Princes's Right, which being ſo difficult to reſolve, doubtleſs made the Quarrel on either Side, how ruinous ſoever to their Families, not unſafe to their Conſciences. And it is worthy Obſervation, that in this ſo long and cruel Conflict between the Two Houſes, never any Stranger of Name was preſent at our Battles; as if we had diſdain'd to conquer or periſh by other Weapons than our own.

The Number of the Slain.

King Henry perceiving how deſperate his Hopes were in England, with the poor Remains of his Party, ſecured himſelf by flight into Scotland. And with ſuch haſte, that before King Edward got to York (where he hoped to have ſurpiz'd him diſmay'd with the late Diſcomfiture) nothing was there left but the City humbly devoted to the Diſpoſe of the Conqueror. But on the Walls yet remain'd the Heads of Richard, Duke of York, and his Friends, an ignominious Spectacle, unluckily there ſtanding to incenſe him to Cruelty. For on ſight of ſo barbarous an Injury, he gave preſent Command, that Thomas Courtney, Earl of Devonſhire, ſhould be beheaded with Three others taken in the former Battle; that theſe new Heads might relieve them, who had ſtood Centinel ſo long; and that his Father and Friends might not want that buſie Part of the Body to be incloſed with them in the Grave. An Action too much ſavouring of the ancient Heathen; the Souls of Chriſtians no way requiring their Murthers to be reveng'd, or their Injuries appeaſed with ſuch an Offering.

K. Henry's Flight into Scotland.

A. D. 1461. Reg. 1.

King Edward's Severity to the Captives.

After this dire Oblation, he ſent Part of his Forces to clear the Coaſts toward Scotland, from the Dreggs of War; where to terrifie that People prone to Innovation in King Henry's Quarrel, ſome Examples of Severity were made. In the Intrim, he, with as glorious Triumph and large Joy as a Victory could beget, which brought no leſs to him than abſolute Sovereignty, march'd toward London. By the Inhababitants whereof, who were deeply intereſted in his Fortune, he was with all the Solemnity of a ſecure Gladneſs entertain'd June 29. To the Triumph of his Entrance, ſoon ſucceeded that of his Coronation, perform'd on the 29th of June, with uſual Ceremonies, but moſt unuſual Congratulations.

K. Edward returns to London, and is joyfully receiv'd.

K. Edward crowned and his Title confirm'd by Parliament.

Immediately, that no Circumſtance of Sovereignty might be wanting, a Parliament was ſummon'd; by which his Title might be reconfirm'd, his Partakers rewarded, his Enemies puniſh'd. And tho' private Reſpects were his chief Buſineſs, deſiring to diſannul all Acts made heretofore in Prejudice to the Houſe of York and its Adherents; yet the outward Pretenſion was the Safety and Quiet of the Realm. For he publickly profeſt his only Care to be, that ſuch wholeſome Laws might be enacted, as might redreſs Diſorders crept into the State, by free Licence given to Rapine in the former Troubles. By which Appearance of Solicitude for quieting the Kingdom, he gain'd Authority among the Wiſe, and created a Belief in all, that his Government in Peace would be as fortunate as his Succeſs in War. Having by his Wiſdom and Providence thus gotten the good Opinion of the Generality, he beſtowed his Graces on particular Perſons, whom Blood join'd with Merit rendred dear to him. His Brothers, George and Richard, he created Dukes, the Elder of Clarence, the Younger of Glouceſter. John, Lord Nevill, the Earl of Warwick's Brother, he made Viſcount Mountacute, Henry Bourchier, Brother to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Earl of Eſſex, and William, Lord Falconbridge, Earl of Kent. He raiſed divers others to the Title of Barons, and honour'd many with Knighthood. The Concluſion of this great Aſſembly was Puniſhment; for John, Earl of Oxford, Aubery Vere his Son, Sir John Teddenham, Knight, William Tirrel and Walter Mountgomery, Eſquires, were without any Tryal convicted of Treaſon, and beheaded on Tower-Hill. A rough Proceeding, which ſavoured ſomething too much of the Conqueror, and made John, Earl of Oxford, his implacable Enemy, Heir to the late Earl.

King Edward rewards his chief Adherents with Honours.

A. D. 1462. Reg. 2.

Buſineſs thus happily ſettled at Home, to check the Audaciouſneſs of our tranſmarin Neighbours, (who had thrown Injuries on our Nation weakned by Diſcord) the Earls of Eſſex and Kent, with the Lord Audley, were ſent with 10000 Soldiers to ſcour the Narrow Seas; who firſt landing in Brittain, took the Town of Conquet; and afterward invading the Iſle of Ree, pillag'd that little Country, and with Victory return'd. By which Enterprize, tho' of no ſignal Conſequence to his Affairs, yet King Edward King Edward's Atchievements by Sea.

A. D. 1462. Reg. 2.

ward made the French to underſtand how unſafe it was to provoke the Engliſh govern'd by an active Prince, who might perhaps hereafter in Perſon appear abroad, for the Recovery of thoſe Provinces, which nothing but our Diſſention could have loſt. As likewiſe to terrifie all foreign States from adhering to K. Henry, who both in Courage and Fortune was ſo far inferior.

And now was the Proſperity of Edward in ſo full Splendor, and ſo dark a Cloud hung over the Houſe of Lancaſter, that Henry Beaufort, Duke of Somerſet, and Sir Ralph Piercy, forſook the Ruins of that Family they had ſo long endeavour'd to ſupport. To King Edward the Submiſſion of Two ſo eminent Perſons appear'd as welcome as a Victory; and they by his Favour were preſently reſtor'd to full Poſſeſſion both of their Honours and (a) Eſtates; and the ſame Grace promiſed to any, whom their Example ſhould perſwade to return to their Allegiance.

Duke of Somerſet and Sir R. Piercy ſubmit to King Edward.

Yet did not the indefatigable Queen loſe any Thing of her Spirit or Endeavours, by her late ſo ſad Diſcomfiture, and Revolt now of her chief Adherents, which were able perhaps to break her Fortune, not her. And having upon full reckoning perceiv'd, that ſhe muſt account of no Power at Home, ſhe made her Addreſſes to all Princes abroad, whom Alliance, Reaſon of State, or Compaſſion of ſo great a Diſaſter, might move to her Aſſiſtance. But, as it is in the Fate of all Women, who uſurp on their Husbands, ſhe had been unhappy in the Management of his Proſperity, and now was much more uncapable to oppoſe againſt his ſo great and conſtant Infelicity. Great Undertakings being ſeldom ſucceſsful in that Sex, whoſe Government over Man, as in Nature it is monſtrous, ſo for the moſt part in it ſelf hath it been diſorderly and ruinous. But certainly, how erroneous ſoever it was heretofore, ſhe was now defective only in the Event, which is not ruled by ours, but by a higher Mind.

Q. Margaret's Induſtry to recover King Henry's Crown.

She draws the King of Scots to aſſiſt her.

For with the King of Scotland (with whom as in the neareſt Place of Safety, ſhe left her Husband) to confirm a ſecure Friendſhip, ſhe contracted a near Alliance, by promiſing the young Prince her Son in Marriage to the Lady Margaret, his Siſter. And that this Marriage might not ſeem a Gift but a Bargain, ſhe bought the Lady by the Delivery of Berwick into the Scots Hands, the ſtrongeſt Fort the Engliſh had in the North. But the Unfortunate are ever Loſers in their Traffick, and forc'd to purchaſe what otherwiſe they would with Difficulty be perſwaded to receive.

Her Succeſs with the French King.

With Lewis XI. the French King, ſhe prevail'd little, though near to him in Conſanguinity; for the Diſcontent of his Nobility, held him in continual Suſpition. Otherwiſe ſhe had Title to promiſe her ſelf large Supplies from ſo potent and politick a Prince, whoſe Intereſt it muſt in Reaſon have been, by fomenting Diſcord at home, to hinder us from any Attempt abroad. After much Sollicitation, ſhe obtain'd that he declar'd himſelf for King Henry, by prohibiting all Favourers of the Houſe of York Acceſs into the French Dominions, and opening them to all thoſe of the Party of Lancaſter. A negative kind of Help, which rather ſhew'd there yet was Sanctuary left for Henry's unhappy Friends, than any conſiderable Aid to be expected.

Philip Duke of Burgundy, tho' a mighty Prince, and near allied to Lancaſter, (whoſe Wive's Mother was Philippa, Daughter to John of Gaunt) yet by Age, and a paſſionate Love to Quiet, was become altogether unactive. Neither had Charles, Earl of Charolois, his Son, though of a daring Spirit, and an Affecter of Buſineſs, Leiſure to look over into our Iſland, being engag'd in domeſtick Troubles, and ſuſpitious of the Deſigns of the French King.

A. D. 1462. Reg. 2.

Other Princes not able or not willing to help her.

With Charolois, the Duke of Brittain held a ſtrong Confederacy; and both of them Intelligence with the diſcontented Lords of France. The War which was afterward ſo known by the Name of the Weal Publick being at that Time among them privately in Contrivance; ſo that all theſe neighbouring Princes, to whom the Affairs of England might ſeem conſiderable, were wholly taken up with Attention to their own.

The War in France for the publick Good.

The Emperor Frederick III. was more remote, and ſo cautious from entring into the Quarrels of other Men, that by any Art, and even with Loſs he would decline his own. Moreover, he juſtly ſtood in continual Fear of the growing Fortune of the Turk; who, having lately ſubverted the Eaſtern, threatned now Ruin to the Weſtern Empire: And queſtionleſs had not the great God of Armies miraculouſly given a Stop to his Victories, Chriſtendom had now been only ſeveral Provinces enſlav'd to his Tyranny. For Pride and Emulation had then turn'd our Arms upon our ſelves, and left our Bodies naked to the Scourge of the common Enemy.

The Succeſs of the Turk.

Spain was far off, divided between a Chriſtian and Mahometan Government, each labouring the Extirpation of the other, ſo that they had Liberty to be Actors in no Tragedy but their own. And indeed no Conflict is ſo fierce and irreconcilable, as when Religion animates to War, and makes it Piety to be cruel.

Stirs in Spain.

To her Father Renate therefore, who enjoy'd the ſpecious Title of King of Sicily, Naples, and Jeruſalem, but Poſſeſſion of none of them, the afflicted Queen was forc'd to make a ſad Retreat. A poor contemptible Lord, living now to ſee his Son-in-Law, once the greateſt Monarch of the Chriſtian World, a Prince as merely titular as himſelf. As if it had been the Fate of theſe Two, that the one could ſay, he might have been, the other that once he was a King.

Leaving therefore foreign States intentive to their own Deſigns, with her Son, whom to move Compaſſion ſhe had carried up and down, the Queen return'd to Scotland; by her long but unſucceſsful Labour, having gathered together 500 French; a Number ſo ſmall and ſo unworthy the Name of an Army, that it was but a competent Retinue for ſo great a Princeſs. With theſe nevertheleſs ſhe ſailed to (b) Tinmouth, from whence ſhe was repulſed by the Inhabitants as ſoon as ſhe landed, and forc'd again to put to Sea. But there (for where may the Unfortunate meet with Friendſhip?) ſhe found the Winds her Enemies, whoſe unruly Force drave her at length diſorderly to Berwick; and the French under the Command of Monſieur Varrennes into the Hand of the Baſtard Ogle, whom the King had ſent to watch their Enemies; and he ſlew above an 100 of them, and took almoſt all the reſt Priſoners, the Captain and ſome few only eſcaping.

Q. Margaret with 500 French, lands at Tinmouth, and is oppoſed.

(a) Mr. Thin in his Hiſtory of the Dukes of England, ſays, that the Duke of Somerſet had only a Penſion of a 1000 Marks a Year granted him, which was never paid; and he places his ſubmitting to King Edward on the Second of December, in the Year 1463.

(b) She took Alnwick, and garriſon'd it.

Here

A. D. 1463. Reg. 3.

Here ſome thin Regiments of Scots reſorted to her, in company of whom ſhe enter'd Northumberland; and having won Banbury-Caſtle, paſſed into the Biſhoprick of Durham, her Husband marching in the Front, that the Name and Preſence of K. Henry might invite the People to their ancient Service, and add Authority to the Deſign. But ſoon ſhe found her Error; for Hope, not Compaſſion perſwades to Danger: And the Commonalty ſat ſtill, when by riſing they underſtood themſelves only likely to ſhare in the King's Misfortune: For having upon a juſt Account diſcover'd how War is only neceſſary to the moſt deſperate, and that in the End it leaves them to nothing but Beggary and Puniſhment, they were reconcil'd to the Love of Peace, and every Man betook himſelf to Induſtry. And for the Nobility, the King had won them either by the Reputation of his Fortune, or Terror of his Courage; ſo that no Man of Eminency reſolv'd to change Subjection: Only Henry, Duke of Somerſet, and Sir Ralph Piercy, who not long before had forſaken K. Henry in his Tempeſt; now upon a falſe Hope of fairer Weather fled back again. For it is a ridiculous Cunning in Hiſtorians to aſcribe the Actions of great Men perpetually to Policy, ſince Irreſolution prevails equally in them as with the Vulgar. And why might not Deſpair beget Submiſſion in theſe two to K. Edward, and a vain Appearance of a Return of Fortune to K. Henry's Side, perſwade them to this laſt Revolt?

K. Henry with an Army of Scots invades England.

Duke of Somerſet and Sir R. Piercy revolt to him.

Upon this ſo weak Acceſs of Power, Queen Margaret perceiving ſo unſound Friendſhip in her Husband's native Country, deſtroy'd it as if an Enemy's. And wanting Force to reach the Proſperity of her Competitor, fell cruelly upon the common People, who had hitherto been only ſubjects to his Fortune, bearing inwardly a moſt paſſionate Love to the Family of Lancaſter. But this outragious Carriage of the Army, chang'd abſolutely their Affections to the Queen, who was queſtionleſs by Neceſſity compell'd to Things unlawful, whereby to prevent the Diſbanding of her Forces, which were only paid and kept together by a licentious Spoil.

The Outrages of the Scotch Army.

To oppoſe this Attempt, which only betrayed the Weakneſs of the Enemies, King Edward ſent down John Nevill, Lord Mountacute, himſelf ſtaying behind to raiſe an Army, befitting the Greatneſs of his Name and preſent Quarrel. Giving likewiſe Order that his Navy ſhould guard the Seas, to hinder any Succours to the Queen from foreign Confederates: But this was an unneceſſary Caution; no State Abroad being ſo deſperate as to embark it ſelf in the broken Seas of her Fortune.

Lord Mountacute ſent againſt the Scots.

Mountacute at Land had a braver Occaſion to ſhew his Courage; who having in the Biſhoprick of Durham gather'd ſome convenient Forces, and receiv'd others from King Edward, then at York, march'd directly againſt K. Henry. By the Way the Lords Hungerford, and Roſs, and Sir Ralph Piercy preſented themſelves to hinder his farther Courſe; but perceiving the good Order and Courage of his Army, all fled but the valiant Piercy. Who diſdaining to ſecure his Life with Loſs of his Honour, or to ſhew the leaſt Weakneſs beneath his Name or Spirit, fought it out with his Regiment, till over-preſt with Number, he and his were all cut to pieces. The valiant Knight contenting himſelf, that he had ſaved the Bird in his Breaſt, as he ſaid; that is, died in his Loyalty.

He defeats Sir R. Piercy.

A. D. 1463. Reg. 3.

Encouraged with this Succeſs Mountacute attempts, without Expectation of any farther Succour or Direction, to finiſh the preſent War, and immediately marches to a Plain call'd Levells, near the River Dowell in (c) Hexhamſhire, where King Henry's Army lay encamped. The Camp he ſuddenly aſſaults in the Night, and had taken it without any Loſs, had not the Enemy beyond Expectation gather'd themſelves into ſome Order, and valiantly oppoſed. But no Courage could withſtand the Fortune and Spirit of Mountacute, for the Queen's Camp at length was loſt, and in it taken the Duke of Somerſet, the Lords Hungerford, Roſs, Moulins, and Sir Thomas Huſſey, with Sir Thomas Wentworth and Sir John Findern: Somerſet on the Place loſt his Head, the reſt ſent to Newcaſtle to ſuffer there the ſame Puniſhment, with twenty Gentlemen more, but King Henry and the Queen eſcaped (d) into Lancaſhire at the firſt on-ſet, whoſe Tragedy drew not yet near the laſt Act.

Near Hexham K. Henry's Army furpriz'd and routed by the Lord Mountacute.

King Edward whoſe Fortune fought for him, even in his Abſence, encounter'd the News of this Victory in his march towards Durham; ſo that finding the Preſence of his Perſon and Army needleſs he return'd towards York: Giving command to Warwick to take in all the Forts and Caſtles, which yet in the North held out, as (e) Alnwick, Banbury and Duſtambury. On the Way he was certified of the Apprehenſion of King Henry's Perſon, who was ſurprized as he endeavour'd by ſhifting from Place to Place to have recover'd Scotland (f). With the Joy of which Report King Edward return'd to London, whither as yet he never came but glorious by the Acceſſion of ſome new Triumph.

K. Henry taken, and the Indignities caſt on him by his Enemies.

Thomas, the Son of Sir Edward Talbot of Lancaſhire, apprehended King Henry as he ſat at Dinner at Waddington-Hall, in Cleatherwood in Lancaſhire, and forgetting all Reſpect due to ſo great a Prince, like a common Malefactor with his Legs tied under the Horſe's Belley, (g) guarded him up towards London. By the Way the Earl of Warwick met him, who adding Indignities to his Affliction, with the general Reproaches of the People, (the Acclamations they give to the Unfortunate) arreſted him, and taking off his Gilt Spurs, led him Priſoner to the Tower. The only Companions of his preſent Calamity were Dr. Manning, Dean of Windſor, Dr. Bedle, and Mr. Allerton a young Gentleman, all of ſo divine a Calling, as ſhew'd no Misfortune could ſeparate him from his Piety, nor them from their Duty.

The miſerable Queen ſeeing the Deſolation of her Greatneſs, her Husband impriſon'd, all her great Friends fled or ſlaughter'd, made again her Retreat into France; and with her Son Prince Edward, (whoſe Preſervation flatter'd her with ſome hopes, that one day he might rebuild the now ruin'd Houſe of Lancaſter) fled to her Father's Court. A moſt wretched Sanctuary to her Fears, where ſhe had only leiſure

Q. Margaret fled with Pr. Edward to her Father.

(c) Once a County by it ſelf, under the Juriſdiction of the Arch-biſhop of York, but now annex'd by Act of Parliament to Northumberland, the Arch-biſhop retaining his Eccleſiaſtical Power over it.

(d) The Queen fled to Scotland. Hol.

(e) Theſe Caſtles ſays Thin in his Hiſtory of Dukes, were yielded to King Edward by the Duke of Somerſet, for which Cauſe he was again taken into the King's Favour.

(f) Holinſhead writes, he got into Scotland, and did not return into Engand till the next Year.

(g) Tied to their Stirrups.

A. D. 1464. Reg. 4.

by long Patience to prepare her Mind for future Misery.

But this her Dejection raised Edward up to an unsuspected Sovereignty, so that now he began to set strong the disjointed Body of his Kingdom. And knowing Liberality the only Ligament that ties Affection to a Prince, he resolv'd by attainting his Enemies to enable himself to reward the Services of his Friends. And tho' he pretended the Gate of Mercy ever to stand open to the Submission of the Lancastrians, yet few or none accepted the Favour, either distrustful of his Reality, or feeding their Hopes with Imagination, that the Tide of Fortune would not always flow with so impetuous a Torrent.

K. Edward attaints the Lancastrian Nobles, and gives their Honours and Estates to his Friends.

But King Edward angry, that a Faction so contemptible in their Ruin, should disdain his Clemency, proceeded to punishment (b). The Earldom of Pembroke, an Honour heretofore enjoy'd by Jasper Tudor, half-Brother to Henry VI. (who, with Henry Piercy, Earl of Northumberland was then fled with King Henry,) he bestowed on Sir William Herbert, a Knight of Wales, both for Descent and Power most eminent, and to whose Aid a great Part of the present Felicity was owing. To the Lord Mountacute, whose Person and Service he equally lov'd, be gave the opulent Possessions belonging to the Family of the Piercies, together with the Honour of Earl of Northumberland.

Sir William Herbert made Earl of Pembroke.

Lord Mountacute made Earl of Northumberland.

But the most open Hand cannot satisfie the Expectation of great Deservers, who set so high a Price upon their Merits, that they leave their Princes no Power of Reward. The greatest Benefit being received in the Degree of a Debt, not a Gift. And certainly Mountacute and his Brother Warwick, had by too much Merit even disoblig'd the King; what Honour soever they were in future to have, being so little able to cancel the Obligation, that it could scarce defray the Interest. And in that Way was this Title and Inheritance accepted, which gave the King ocasion to distaste whom otherwise he would have with Passion embraced. Whereupon reflecting on the Danger of adding Power to them, who wanted only Will to do Mischief, and knowing how easily Innovation might be resolv'd on, when nothing but the Conscience was to be perswaded; he began seriously to wish the Mightiness of that Family he owed the Crown to in some Degree lessened. Yet that he might no way appear unthankful to so great Deserts, he thought fit to weaken their Strength, and yet to add to the Splendor of their Title. Whereupon he willingly admitted the Friends of Piercy to interceed for Restitution both of his Honour and Revenue, and soon granted it; rewarding Mountacute with the more specious Stile of Marques. But this State-trick was by the Brothers easily understood, and accepted with the same Brow they would have entertain'd an Injury.

The Earl of Warwick and Lord Mountacute not satisfied with their Rewards.

This the King dissembled; and to build his Estimation high in the Air of popular Applause, endeavour'd by all the Arts of humble Greatness to raise himself into the Opinion of the Multitude. His Presence was easie to any Man's Love or Curiosity, his Aspect clear and smiling, his Language free and familiar. And to the Ladies, who have also their Share in the Motion of States, he applied a general Courtship, which used by a Prince of so amiable a Personage, made them, who are usually the Idols of others, to be Idolators of him. Among his Nobility he was so courteous and free in Gesture, and liberal in Affability, that he appeared King, not in his Assumption of State, but in their Application of Duty. This he did to win outward Applause; while to settle an inward Sense of his Wisdom, he look'd into Abuses of Officers, and reform'd them. Neither was there any Oppression or Mistake in Government, but what he relieved or corrected. And that it might appear how zealously he sought due Administration of Justice in greater Causes, he in Person sat Three Days together on his Bench at Westminster-Hall, to see a foul Rape on a Widow punish'd; which, tho' it little advanc'd the uncorrupted Execution of the Laws, yet it serv'd happily for Example, and created what he then most courted, a good Opinion of him in the Minds of all Men.

K. Edward labours to endear himself to the People.

Thus he grew upon his People at home, while abroad the neighbouring States began to decline the Danger of his future Enmity, who ever measure the Power of Princes by that Sway and Affection they have among their Subjects. Charles, Earl of Charolois (a Widdower, but without Heir-male) Heir to a large and opulent Territory (the Seventeen Provinces with the Dutchy and County of Burgundy, and the greatest Part of Picardy, being subject to Duke Philip his Father) first made his Address; who, bearing an implacable hatred to Lewis XI. King of France, desired to gain so Potent a Neighbour to his Party; and that he might secure his Friendship against all Faultering, he, by his Ambassadors entreated a Marriage with the Lady Margaret, the King's Sister: A Motion heard in England with much Acceptance, and which, if every Circumstance were well weighed, brought both Honour and Security. But it was thought by some intimate with the Earl in his most secret Counsels, that really he never intended this Marriage, having from his Mother, Neece to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, deriv'd an irreconcilable Malice against the House of York. And that this Negotiation aim'd only to temporize with England, in case the Duke of Brittain and the French King's Brother should desert him and make their Peace with Lewis, against whom these Three were then in Confederacy; but this I believe an Overcunning in Conjecture, since Marriage among Princes, as it seldom confirms a sound Friendship, so doth it never extirpate an ancient Hatred; the Proof of our and all Times shewing how false a Love is created by Alliance. But the Thoughts of Princes are so unknown to Posterity, that they are beyond the Scrutiny of the present Time. I will not therefore dispute what the Earl's inward Designs were; but certainly, both according to Reason of State and the Event (which is the best Light Historians can discern by) as it was pretended, so was it intended.

Edward's Alliance courted by Foreign Princes.

A Treaty of Marriage between the Lady Margaret, King Edward's Sister and the Earl of Charolois.

Marriages with Princes do little good.

(i) The Marriage of his Sister being thus far advanc'd, the King began to advise with his Council concerning his own. A strong Alliance abroad was soon resolv'd most necessary both for the Dignity and Safety of his Crown; and among all the Princesses which that Time glories in, and of whom several were proposed to his Choice, viz. Margaret, Daughter of the King of Scots, and Isabel, Sister of Henry IV.

King Edward's Marriage resolv'd on, and sought in France with the Lady Bona.

(b) This was done in the last Year while King Edward was at York. See Hol.

(i) This Marriage was not proposed till the 6th Year of his reign nor effected till the 8th.

King

A. D. 1464. Reg. 4.

King of Caſtile; the Lady (k) Bona was thought worthieſt his Bed, in reſpect of the Excellence of her Beauty, Greatneſs of Birth (as being Daughter to Lewis, Duke of Savoy) and the mighty Marriage of her other Siſter Charlotte, with Lewis XI. King of France, with whom ſhe then was. This laſt Conſideration being a main Inducement, as by which all Fear might be taken away of a Tempeſt from that Coaſt, whence Queen Margaret ſeem'd to prepare a Storm.

The Earl of Warwick Agent for the King's Marriage

To this Negotiation the Earl of Warwick was deputed as the fitteſt Perſon, both for his great Faith to the King, and Authority in the Kingdom: Who, no ſooner arriv'd at the French Court, where the young Lady then reſided in Company of her Siſter, but he was with all Triumph entertain'd, and his Motion heard with Joy and Acceptation.

The Conſummation of it ſought by both Parties.

The Ambition of the French Queen to have her Siſter married to ſo great a Prince, concurring with the many politick Reſpects, which overſway'd King Lewis. And ſoon after for an abſolute Concluſion of all Buſineſſes, Monſieur D'ampmartin was deſign'd Ambaſſador for England. Theſe Two Kings equally ſolliciting the Conſummation of this Marriage. Edward, that he might without Fear of more Danger enjoy the Glory of a late recover'd Kingdom. Lewis, that freed from the Danger of an Engliſh Invader, and Importunities of Queen Margaret, for Aſſiſtance, he might give a Period to his buſie Projects at home, by laying the Devil of Civil War, raiſed by a tumultuous Nobility.

King Edward's Love to the Lady Gray

But while Policy acted ſeveral Parts abroad, Love on the ſudden chang'd the whole Scene at home. For the young King, after Hunting in Wychwood Forreſt, coming to viſit the Dutcheſs of Bedford, at her Mannor of Grafton near Stony-Startford in Buckinghamſhire, for a Grant of ſome Lands taken from her Maintenance, was ſollicited by a fair Petitioner the Dutcheſs's Daughter Elizabeth, Widow of Sir John Gray, ſlain on King Henry's Part at the Battle of St. Albans. The King could not but yield to any Requeſt made by ſo conquering a Beauty, and preſently himſelf grew as earneſt in ſolliciting her, tho' in a more unlawful Suit. But ſhe arm'd her Soul with a Modeſty able to break the hotteſt Battery of Luſt; and tho' on every Side aſſaulted by the Engines of Temptation, ſhe repulſed her Enemy ſo nobly, by telling him, That tho' ſhe knew her ſelf unworthy to be a Queen, yet ſhe valued her Honour and Perſon more, than to be the grateſt Prince's Concubine; that he offered Parly upon honourable Terms. For when the King perceiv'd her adorn'd with a Chaſtity ſtrong enough to reſiſt him, who had ſcarce ever fail'd to be victorious in thoſe Attempts, he grew enamour'd with the Beauty of her Mind, and reſolv'd her Vertue was Dower enough to marry her to the higheſt Throne. Reaſon of State, which his Mother and Friends were not wanting to preſs him paſſionately with, argued ſharply againſt a Marriage ſo unequal to Majeſty, by alledging the Peril of angring ſo potent a Neighbour as K. Lewis, and ſo dangerous a Subject as Warwick; as likewiſe the Inconvenience of raiſing a Widow to his Bed, who could bring nothing with her but her Poverty, and an unprovided Iſſue; who, if not advanc'd by him, would be a Scorn to his Children, if advanc'd a ruinous Charge to his Exchequer, and an Envy both to the Princes of his Blood, and the Nobility of his Kingdom. But Love like a cunning Sophiſter eaſily refell'd all politick Arguments, and perſwaded Reaſon her ſelf almoſt to be of his Side.

A. D. 1464. Reg. 4.

The Inconveniences of the Marriage of the Lady Gray removed.

King Edward's Arguments for his Marriage with the Lady Gray.

For he repeated to the King his own Prerogative, which being ſo large, why ſhould he then be denied the Liberty of a free Choice, which is allow'd the meaneſt Subject? Why might not he wooe with his own Eyes, and make Election where his Fancy beſt delighted? As for the Lady her ſelf he found her in the Treaſures of her Mind moſt abundant, and in the Perfections of her Body excellent to pleaſe him, who, and not the State, was to marry. For her Birth, ſhe was by the Father Sir Richard Woodville Noble in her Deſcent at Home, by her Mother of the Houſe of Luxenburg, (l) a Family with which the greateſt Princes of Chriſtendom had near Alliance. As for marrying a Subject * and the Widow of his Enemy, the latter argu'd more Charity, and the former could not but tie the Affection of his People, when they ſaw their Prince diſdain'd not Affinity with them. For a Precedent to authorize theſe his intended Nuptials, he had Edward the Black Prince his Great Uncle, great indeed if not the greateſt among all the Princes of his Name. And for the threaten'd Danger from King Lewis or the Earl of Warwick; from France he could never expect how near ſoever the Alliance had been but an unfaithful Amity; and ſhould this his Marriage thruſt Warwick upon rebellious Attempts, the Rebel would but fondly run upon his own Ruin, ſince it could not ſtand with the Majeſty of a King, to hold his Crown by ſo baſe a Tenure, as to have his Actions aw'd by a Subject. Theſe and ſuch like Arguments, which Love is cunning upon all Occaſions to enforce, prevail'd ſo far with him, that though the Old Dutcheſs of York his Mother moſt violently oppoſed the Match, by thtowing the higheſt Calumnies upon the Lady Gray, and alledging a Pre-contract between him and the Lady Lucy; yet one Morning ſecretly did he marry her (m). For the Diſparity of Birth or Fortune is no Impediment; and for the Pre-contract, upon Examination the Lady Lucy her ſelf acquitted the King, only laying to his Charge the Guilt of a moſt winning Courtſhip, which ſhe hop'd would end in Marriage. And though afterwards during the Uſurpation of Richard the Third, in open Parliament it was alledged againſt the Lawfulneſs of King Edward's Marriage, that by ſtrange Potions and amorous Charms the Lady Eliz. Gray had bewitch'd him to her Love, and likewiſe another Pre-contract was aſſerted with the Lady Eleanor Butler, Daughter to the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Widow to the Lord of King Edward marries the Lady Elizabeth Gray againſt his Mother's Will.

Edward falſly ſaid to be contracted with Lady Lucy and Eliz. Butler.

(k) In Michaelmas Term this Year, there was a Call of Serjeants at Law, Thomas Young, Nicholas Geneie, Richard Neal, Thomas Bryan, Richard Pigot, John Greenfield, John Catesby, and Guy Fairfax, Eſquires. They kept their Feaſt at Ely-Houſe in Holborn, to which the Lord Mayor and Aldermen were invited; who perceiving the Lord Gray of Ruthin, Lord Treaſurer, had taken the upper Seat which belonged to the Lord Mayor, Ely-Houſe being in the Liberties of the City, the Mayor went home with his Brethren, and would not ſtay to dine, to the great Diſcontent of the new Serjeants. 'Twas order'd alſo by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Common Council, That this Inſtance ſhould be regiſter'd for a Precedent to their Succeſſors. Hol.

(l) And why might not he marry her, as well as John, Duke of Bedford, a Prince as wealthy as himſelf, marry her Mother.

* She was Servant to Queen Margaret, Wife to King Henry VI. and married to Mr. Gray who was Knighted at St. Albans on the Day of the Fight in which he was kill'd.

(m) On the Firſt of May.

Sudly.

A. D. 1464. Reg. 4.

Sudly; I cannot but believe, that all thoſe Scandals were by ſome of the Tyrant's wicked Inſtruments ſuggeſted to the Minds of that Aſſembly: For had there been a Juſt Exception againſt this Marriage, neither George, Duke of Clarence, nor the Earl of Warwick, in their frequent Calumnies againſt the King being in open Rebellion, had left it unmention'd.

King Edward's Marriage diſtaſted by his Friends.

But no ſooner had King Edward obey'd his Fancy in taking her to his Bed, and in that taſted the forbidden Fruit (forbidden I mean by Politick Reſpects) than he ſaw himſelf Naked of Friends at Home and Abroad to oppoſe againſt any new ariſing Difficulty. But as yet by the Bravery of his Carriage did he add an Honour to the Act, Courage and Love, either denying him to foreſee or to regard the Danger. Though as ſoon as the Marriage was divulged, he preſently diſcern'd another Face of Men. Monſieur D'ampmartin, the Embaſſadour Extraordinary from France, full of Indignation, return'd, and the Nobility in general look'd diſcontented, or elſe but forced a Smile. The ſo high Advancement of this one Lady and her Children, lately beneath ſo many in Fortune, begetting an univerſal Envy in the reſt. But when the Earl of Warwick underſtood how mighty an Affront by this was given to his Imployment; he entertain'd none but diſdainful Thoughts againſt his Prince; and expreſt ſo bold a Diſcontent, that Lewis of France, who was quick to perceive, and careful to foment any Diſpleaſure which might tend to the Diſturbance of another Kingdom, began to enter into private Communication with him. For ever after this common Injury, (ſo they call'd the Error of Love in the King) the Earl held a dangerous Intelligence in France, which after occaſion'd ſo many Confuſions to our Kingdom. Nevertheleſs upon his Return he diſſembled all Diſcontent, and in every Circumſtance of Reſpect applied himſelf to applaud the Marrage, and in particular the excellent Perſonage of the Queen. The King Interpreted the Intentions of the Man according to the Appearance, unwilling perhaps to rack his own Nature ſo far, till it had confeſt that his Carriage might diſſemble Danger. And in the mean time he raiſed his Wife's Kindred as near as poſſibly to his own Greatneſs, he ſearch'd out all Means for their Advancement (n). The Lord Richard Woodville her Father he created Earl of Rivers, and High Conſtable of England, with an annual Fee of Two Hundred Pound out of the Exchequer, whom ſhortly after he made Lord Treaſurer. Her Brother Anthony he created Lord Scales, the Daughter and Heir to which Title, by the King's earneſt Sollicitation, he not long before had wedded; and her Son Thomas he raiſed to the Honour of Marqueſs of Dorſet, for whom he procur'd in Marriage the Heir of the Lord Bonvile and Harrington. By his own free Gift enobling them with Titles, and by the Induſtry of his Mediation enabling them with Poſſeſſions, to make thoſe Titles no Scorn to the Owners.

The Earl of Warwick incenſed at the King's Marriage, yet diſſembles his Anger.

The Queen's Kindred advanced.

The Earl of Warwick in Diſcontent, endeavours to raiſe a Rebellion

Every unmarry'd Lord imagin'd the beſtowing of theſe two great Heirs on the Queen's Kindred, an Injury to his own Hopes; and Warwick thought every great Office conferred upon another miſplaced. For his many Services begot ſo great an Inſolency, that he ſcarce allow'd the King a Share in the Diſtribution of his own: Hereupon his Thoughts grew dangerous, and only Opportunity was wanting to thruſt him into Action. He conſider'd the Vaſtneſs of his Poſſeſſions, the Greatneſs of his Authority among the Commons, and the general Dependencies of the Men of War upon him; and hence concluded, it was as eaſie for him to uncreate as to create a King. But he found the general Humour of the Kingdom not yet fully ripe for Miſchief; the Vulgar enamour'd on the much Courteſie of their Prince, the Lords neareſt to him in Blood and likelieſt to incline to his Faction dear likewiſe to the King, and all of the Houſe of Lancaſter who in Probability would at firſt Invitation take fire in any Combuſtion of the State, exil'd and poor. Sedition therefore for the preſent was but an Embrio in his Brain, which after when Time had deliver'd, became ſo vaſt and bloody a Monſter: Nevertheleſs he was not unmindful of his Deſign, cheriſhing unkind Thoughts in any whom he ſaw diſtaſted at the King, and caſting forth Speeches which might leſſen the Honour of his publick and private Actions; with which Diſcourſes, as with ſlow Poyſons he infected many Limbs of the general Body. Then upon Pretence of Infirmity, and Preſcription of Phyſicians for the Change of Air, with Licenſe from the King he retired to his Caſtle at Warwick. Where his Obſervation was, what Lords great in Power or Treaſure reſorted to him, and with what Countenance; whether they undervalu'd the Weakneſs of the King's Judgment, or hated the Advancement of the Queen and her Kindred; whether they were troubl'd at any private Repulſe or open Affront, or generally at the publick Buſineſs, or whether they repented not the ſo violent Oppreſſion of the Family of Lancaſter; any Diſcontent making for his Purpoſe, which either pointed at the Errors of the King, Pride of the Queen and her Kindred, or the Miſ-government of the State. Upon the Affections of the meaner ſort he gain'd by a profuſe Hoſpitality, an open Kitchen and Buttery perſwading more with them than any Duty to Juſtice: upon the Good-will of the better ſort he won by bowing his Entertainment down to an endearing Familiarity, ſaluting every Man courteouſly by his Name, and engaging them by trivial Benefits. And with all ſorts by his great Service to the Crown, and a Carriage Noble both in War and Peace.

A. D. 1465. Reg. 5.

Warwick retires from Court, and obſerves all Malecontents.

His Arts of gaining a Party.

The King, though he wanted the Virtue of Cowards, Suſpicion, began nevertheleſs to have the Earl in ſome Jealouſie; his unuſual Retiredneſs from the Court, and ſo expenceful purchaſing the Vogue of the People, argu'd both diſtaſte againſt his Prince, and a Hope to maintain any unlawful Enterprize by Faction. But either in Policy he diſſembled his Diſtruſt, not having yet any firm Ground to build a juſt Accuſation, or in good Nature would not eclipſe the Earl's Greatneſs, by which himſelf enjoy'd a Benefit little leſs than the Crown. But that the Storm threatned from France, for incenſing King Lewis in the diſcourſed Marriage of the Lady Bona, might be diverted; he made ſtrong Confederacies round about him. With Henry, King of Caſtile, and John, King of Arragon, (that Spain, however far remote might be near in Friendſhip) he enter'd into a League, and upon the Concluſion of it, granted a Licenſe for the Tranſportation of certain Cotſwold Sheep thither, a Grant that is complained of ſtill, as a mighty enriching to the Spaniards, and as King Edward ſuſpects Warwick's Actions.

King Edward makes ſtrong Alliances againſt any threatning Troubles.

(n) She was alſo ſolemnly crown'd at Weſtminſter. Hol.

great

A. D. 1465. Reg. 5. great an empoveriſhing to the Engliſh Merchants. With Scotland he made a Truce for Fifteen Years, that he invading France, or invaded by the French, might be ſecure however not to have that Nation, according to their Cuſtom upon all Advantages, Enemies at his Back. His Embaſſadors in the Low-Countries, urged the Duke of Burgundy to the Accompliſhment of the Marriage between his Son the Earl of Charolois, and the Lady Margaret the King's Siſter. And ſo happy Succeſs had this Negotiation, that though for ſome Years it had hung in Suſpence, and Warwick now oppoſed it, as prejudicial to King Lewis his Friend, yet it was now abſolutely agreed on, and the Baſtard of Burgundy, and ſome others ſent over with full Inſtructions and Power to give the Treaty a final Concluſion. For whatſoever Diſſimulation the Earl of Charolois uſed at firſt, he now intended this Marriage ſeriouſly: In regard he found himſelf lie open to the Malice of King Lewis a moſt dangerous Neighbour, who by Policy or Fortune had broken all thoſe great Confederacies the Earl had before in France. Wherefore there was now no Safety but in arming himſelf by a ſtrict Amity with the Engliſh, a Nation forward and fierce to attempt any thing upon the French, and in their Attempts ſcarce ever but proſperous. Neither was the Courage of the King's Youth, and his continual good Succeſs in War a ſmall Inducement; conſidering it gave a certain Hope, that he upon any Invitation of Honour or Profit might be perſwaded to croſs the Seas, and undertake the ancient national Quarrel. And for the Danger of any Alteration in the Government, there was then no Ground for Suſpicion: The King honour'd and lov'd by his People, the adverſe Faction of no Power, and the Earl of Warwick having never yet declared himſelf but moſt paſſionately affected to the Houſe of York. Wherefore in Reaſon of State being no Impediment, the Marriage was ſoon agreed on, and upon the Agreement, many Triumphs, glorious but Martial, according to the Nature of that Time, ſo addicted to Arms, were celebrated between the Baſtard and his Retinue, and the Engliſh Lords and Gentry.

Lady Margaret's Marriage urged again and agreed to.

A. D. 1466. Reg. 6. But to interrupt the Jollity of theſe Triumphs, an Expreſs came from the Low-Countries, with the News of the Death of Duke Philip: Preſently the Baſtard return'd, and our Council ſtood at a gaze, being in ſome Suſpence what Alteration the Buſineſs might Receive, the Earl now abſolute in Poſſeſſion of his Father's Dominions. But that Scruple was ſoon taken away, by an Embaſſadour ſent to haſten the full Performance of the Marriage. Whereupon the Lady was carried over with all the Ceremonies of Greatneſs, and at Bruges marry'd to Duke Charles (o). That Nation which exceeded all the World in Bravery and Riot, exceeding even it ſelf, at this Triumph, in the Wantonneſs of a ſuperfluous Pomp. In thoſe Countries ſhe liv'd ſome while his Wife, though ever barren, with as much Love from him, as he could ſpare from his ambitious Wars, but ſhe continued long his Widow in much Reputation among the Natives, and good Eſteem with neighbouring Princes. Two Things render'd her much the Diſcourſe of thoſe Times. An extraordinary Love and Care in the Education of the Poſterity of her Husband, and an extream Malice againſt Henry the Seventh. To ſupplant whom, becauſe there wanted true, ſhe countenanced the Suppoſititious Princes of the Houſe of York, and by continual Practices revenged in part the Injury of that Diſreſpect he ever caſt upon her Family. A. D. 1466. Reg. 6.

Philip Duke of Burgundy dies, and the Earl of Charolois ſucceedshim. Lady Margaret marry'd to the Duke of Burgundy

This ſo potent Alliance, and his Confederacies with Foreign States, made King Edward imagine himſelf in great Security, when indeed he was moſt unſafe: For during theſe Treaties Abroad and Triumphs at Home, the Earl of Warwick quicken'd ſo far his Deſigns, that now there appear'd a dangerous Life in them. The Body of his Faction was grown Mighty but Monſtrous, being compacted of ſeveral Natures. For into the Conſpiracy of this great Enterprize he had drawn the Clergy and the Laity, and moſt of them of Affections moſt oppoſite. (p) The Archbiſhop of York was the principal Actor, becauſe he mov'd upon the Soul, and made Treaſon an Act of Religion. The eaſie Multitude; who build their Faith upon the Man, not the Doctrine, thinking it meritorious to rebel, in regard his Function ſeem'd to give Authority to the Action. With the Archbiſhop the Marqueſs of Mountague conſented, but ſecretly; either cunningly diſſembling Miſchief, or elſe wiſhing well to both Sides, being in himſelf divided between a natural Love to a Brother, and an Allegiance to a Prince; or perhaps projecting to make his Benefit, out of which Party ſoever ſhould prevail. With theſe agreed many eminent Perſons of King Edward's Court, whom either Deſire of War, having never lived but in the troubled Stream of Diſcord, or want of expected Recompence, render'd diſcontented.

The Earl of Warwick's Conſpiracy, and the chief Perſons engag'd in it.

All the Partakers in the Calamity of the Houſe of Lancaſter, moſt paſſionately at firſt Overture embraced this Motion, as Men whom Deſpair had made fit for the moſt hazardous Attempt; and who having found nothing but evil Fortune at Home, and Contempt Abroad, were inſtructed in a Patience ready with Joy to ſuffer a not inglorious Death. Among whom Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter was a ſad Example, who after his Ruin by the Fall of Henry the Sixth was reduced to ſo miſerable a Condition, that all ragged and bare footed he begg'd for his Meat in the Low Countries, the abſolute Prince whereof and he marry'd two Siſters, the Daughters of Richard, Duke of York. With this ſo unfortunate a Lord, all the reſt who ſhared with him in Miſery, ran violently into this War. But the wonder of the World then was at the powerful Sorcery of thoſe Perſwaſions, which bewitch'd the Duke of Clarence, the King's Brother to this Conſpiracy; but he was Young and Purblind in foreſeeing the Event of Things, profuſe in Expence beyond his Revenue, and almoſt beyond the King's Power to ſupply, grudging the Favours conferred upon the Queen and her Kindred; valuing his Birth too high, as who forgot the Brother of a King is but a Subject, forward upon any Terms to make himſelf greater, eaſily lending Ear to dangerous Whiſpers, and as raſhly giving Conſent. Theſe Preparatives made this Young Prince fit to undertake any Michief, which the Earl of Warwick miniſtred moſt plentifully.

The Lancaſtrians fall in with Warwick.

Henry, Duke of Exeter begs in the Low-Countries.

The Duke of Clarence joins in Rebellion with Warwick.

And firſt to ſupply the Narrowneſs of his preſent Fortune, a Humour moſt Troubleſom at the Inſtant, he gave him in Marriage the Lady Iſabell his Daughter, and Co-heir to the Rich Earldom of Warwick: Whereupon in hatred

(o) She was marry'd in the following Year. Com.

(p) George Nevill, made ſo by King Edward not many Months before.

againſt

A. D. 1466. Reg. 6.

against the Queen he concurred and in Diſcontent againſt the King's ſo ſlender Rewards; but in promiſing Greatneſs to Clarence's Ambition, he exceeded even Proportion, though not Probability, conſidering the Earl's unlimited Power. But firſt to make the Friendſhip ſtrong by a near Alliance, they ſail'd over for the Conſummation of this Marriage to Callis, of which Town the Earl of Warwick was Captain, and in which the young Lady then remain'd with her Mother. Soon was this Ceremony paſt, and ſoon did the Earl invite his Son-in-law from the Softneſs of the Nuptial Dalliance, as who had contrived this Marriage for Buſineſs, not for Pleaſure, and deſign'd the firſt Iſſue of their Embraces to be a Monſter, and the moſt unnatural one; War between Brothers.

A. D. 1467. Reg. 7.

Duke of Clarence marry'd to the Earl of Warwick's Daughter at Callis.

He acquainted therefore his Son-in-Law by what Line he had founded the Depth of the People's Affection to the preſent King, and what a Tempeſt he was able to raiſe when he ſhould reſolve for Motion. He told him how in the North 15000 Men had been in Arms, pretending revenge upon the Governours of St Leonard's Hoſpital in York, for converting the Alemony they receiv'd from the Country every Year in Corn to their own Uſe, by which they both defrauded the Poor, and the charitable Intention of the Donors; whereas indeed the arm'd Multitude were mov'd, firſt by his Counſel only, awaiting his Preſence, with Reſolution to run any Hazard of his Command. And tho' the Marqueſs Mountacute raiſed Forces in King Edward's Name, by which he quieted the Commotion, and beheaded Robert Huldron (q) their chief Captain, yet were the People ready upon the firſt Summons to reaſſemble; and the Marqueſs (who by ſuch Appearance of Fidelity had won upon the eaſie Faith of the dull King) prepared to bring his Forces, and join in any Enterprize he ſhould appoint. He ſhewed farther, how by this his Brother's Diſſimulation, his Intelligence held perfect in the King's Council, and all the Reſolutions of State might be without Difficulty prevented, ſince no ſooner made but diſcover'd.

A Rebellion in York appeaſed by Marqueſs Mountacute.

Marqueſs Mountacute appeaſes a Rebellion.

A. D. 1468. Reg. 8.

Duke of Clarence and Earl of Warwick go into England to dethrone King Edward.

The Duke, who before held the Earl's Courage and Authority with the People in great Eſtimation, now began to wonder at the ſo cunning Management of this ſo great Buſineſs. Neither could he ſuſpect the Succeſs, the Earl having ſo order'd Things, that he left little or nothing to fortune; whereupon he gave his Judgment entirely up to his Father-in-Law's Diſcretion, with whom he return'd into England, openly profeſſing and juſtifying his Reſolution to Rebellion. The Vanity of Ambition ſealing up his Eyes ſo far, that he could not perceive the Unnaturalneſs of his Revolt, and the certain Hazard of Ruin, in warring againſt a Prince ſo great both in Arms and Fortune.

Againſt their Return, the Arch-biſhop of York had wrought ſo diligently to ripen Miſchief, that the Multitude diſperſed before, were again in the Field, but under Leaders of a far more eminent Name. For Henry, Son to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Henry Nevill, Son to the Lord Latimer (the one Nephew, the other Couſin-german to Warwick) had the Conduct of theſe Forces; both Gentlemen great in Blood and Spirit, but in regard of their unexperienced Youth, ſubmitting themſelves to the Directions of Sir John Coniers, a Commander bold in Courage and ſober in Advice. Their March was not now directed againſt any petty Town in the North as before, but towards London, the Head of the Kingdom; and the Cauſe of their taking Arms, not upon any trivial Injury or Oppreſſion, but out of Deſire of publick Juſtice, by throwing down a licentious Uſurper, and re-inveſting in the Sovereignty King Henry, their lawful Monarch, ſo injuriouſly detained Priſoner in the Tower. This Pretence carried with it much of Bravery, pleaſed the Humour of moſt of the Northern Men, paſſionately ſtill affected to the Line of Lancaſter, and took generally with the Commonalty, a Beaſt as prone to unſeaſonable Pity, as to inhumane Cruelty, and ever deſirous to change Government, becauſe naturally it can endure none.

Rebels led by Sir J. Coniers, and march to London.

A. D. 1468. Reg. 8.

The noiſe of theſe Arms waked King Edward; for he now perceiv'd his Title to the Crown, (for which he imagin'd he had had ſo clear a Sentence) brought again to tryal, and the Sword made Judge. He caſt his Eye about him, and found every where the Way open to his Jealouſie, and none to Security: And thoſe Lords, from whom he might expect Supply, being near to Warwick in Friendſhip or Alliance, and the Marqueſs Mountacute, in whoſe Service he had ever found moſt Truſt and Fortune, even Brother to his Enemy. How could he therefore believe, but notwithſtanding all their outward Profeſſions of Loyalty, privately they might favour Rebellion? As for the Queen's Kindred, (of whoſe Faith in regard of their own Intereſt, he remain'd ſecure) he could draw little Confidence: Their Greatneſs ſo Young, that it had yet taken no deep Root in Opinion, and their Forces only weak Beams ſhot from the Sun of the King's own Power. But no Conſideration in this Trouble begot ſo much Scorn and Rage in him, as the Revolt of Clarence, whoſe giddy Ambition made him rather chuſe to become a Ward to a rough and inſolent Guardian, than to ſhare with his Brother a King in the Treaſures of Fortune. The Forces of the Rebels he weigh'd more by the Reputation of their Leader Warwick, than by the Number; though even that grew every Day more Formidable.

King Edward in great Streights to oppoſe this Rebellion.

His Friends weak.

King Edward ſends to the Earl of Pembroke to raiſe the Welſh, and oppoſe their Paſſage.

To prepare againſt theſe dangerous Motions in his Engliſh Rebels, he ſpeedily ſent to the Earl of Pembroke Commiſſion to raiſe what Welſh Forces he could; having in this general Suſpicion of his diſloyal Subjects, moſt Confidence in the Valour of the Welſh, and their natural hatred againſt the Engliſh Name. He requir'd the Earl to give Battle by the Way, while himſelf gather'd as great an Army as the preſent Danger, and Cauſe in Controverſie requir'd. The Earl joyful of the Command, puts ſuddenly into the Field with his valiant Brother Sir Richard Herbert, having under their Conduct 7000 Men. To them ſoon joyn 800 Bow-men, led by the Lord Stafford of Southwick, not long before created Earl of Devonſhire. With theſe Forces he reſolv'd to hinder the Rebels in their Journey, and having Notice by his Spies that they took their Way by Northampton, againſt them he led the whole Body of his Army: Having given Order to Sir Richard Herbert with 2000 Soldiers to wheel about, and charge the Enemy in the Reer.

Earl of Pembroke oppoſes Warwick.

Sir John Coniers repulſeth the Welſh with Loſs.

Sir John Coniers was too valiant to be ſurprized, and ſo carefully had ſtrengthen'd the Reer-ward, that the Welſh were repulſed with Loſs, and Forced by Flight to ſeek their Safety. Whereupon he retir'd to his Brother, while Coniers upon new Inſtructions, or elſe fearful

(q) This Inſurrection happen'd in the Year 1469. Hol.

leaſt

A. D. 1468. Reg. 8.

left Pembroke in the Way might gain ſome Advantage, diverted from his direct Courſe to London, and march'd to Warwick, where the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick had levied a mighty Hoſt. Pembroke waits cloſe upon their Journey, expecting the Opportunity either to cut off ſome Part of the Enemy diſorder'd, or to give Battle to the whole Army. But while he was conſtant in this Purſuit of Glory, and ſhewed all the Parts of a great Commander, a ſmall Diviſion between him and the Lord Stafford ruin'd the whole Attempt. For encamping at Banbury, a Queſtion grew concerning an Inn, to which Stafford pretended as having long uſed the Houſe; but in which Pembroke, in regard of his Preheminence as General, and Commodiouſneſs of the Place, was reſolv'd to lodge. This ſo trivial Diſtaſte (if there were no farther Treaſon in it) grew ſo high, that Stafford withdrew himſelf, and his Engliſh Archers leaving the Welſh in Arms and Number far inferior to the Enemy; which Defect nevertheleſs was ſupplied by their great Courage.

A Difference between the Earl of Pembroke and Lord Stafford.

For when the Rebels who ſoon had Notice of this unhappy Diſcord, gave the Earl's Camp next Morning a Camiſado, or ſudden Aſſault: The Welſh entertain'd the Charge ſo ſtoutly, that they took Sir Henry Nevill the Leader; but (what favour'd too much of Barbariſm) moſt cruelly ſlew him in cold Blood. By which Act they raiſed ſo fierce an Appetite of Revenge in the Enemy, that the next Day they gave the Earl Battle, and the Fight was long and cruel. Neither had the Victory fallen ſo abſolutely to the Northern Men, but that John Clopton, Retainer to the Earl of Warwick, appearing upon the Top of a neighbouring Hill with 500 ragged and diſorder'd Men, under Warwick's Standard; and the Northern Men at their Approach crying out, A Warwick! a Warwick! made the Welſh believe all the Rebel Forces were there, and that it would be but fooliſh Deſperation to fight it out againſt an Enemy freſh and ſo far Superior in Number; whereupon they fled.

Earl of Pembroke's Forces utterly defeated.

In the Battle and Flight 5000 of the Welſh were ſlain, and among the few Priſoners, the Earl of Pembroke and Sir Richard Herbert were taken, whoſe Heads ſoon after were ſacrificed upon the Scaffold, to the Ghoſt of Nevill. Their Valour and brave Conduct begetting an univerſal Sorrow to the King's Party for their Deaths, and even an Envy in the conquering Enemy. Neither did the Lord Stafford, the Author of this Overthrow Eſcape condign Puniſhment: For by diligent Enquiry made by King Edward's Order, being found in (r) Devonſhire, without legal Proceſs, at Bridgewater he loſt his Head. Having ſo inconſiderately manag'd his Buſineſs, that he betray'd King Edward's Army upon a falſe Apprehenſion of an Affront; and yet provided not thereby to win Favour ſo far with the Enemy as by their Arms to protect himſelf from the King's juſt Indignation.

Earl of Pembroke and his Brother taken and beheaded.

The Rebels go into Northamptonſhire, raiſe the People under Robin of Riddiſdale, and behead the Earl of Rivers.

This Victory added yet a bolder Courage to the Attempt of Warwick; but into the Northern Multitude it infuſed a Madneſs, not to be cured by any Counſel or Direction. For immediately ſome Companies of them retired into Northamptonſhire, where aſſociating to them certain of the moſt deſperate Inhabitants, no Miſchief was left unacted. The Name they gave their Commander, (if ſuch a diſorder'd Rabble could obey any) was Robin of Riddiſdale, and their firſt Aſſault on Grafton, a Seat belonging to King Edward's Father-in-Law the Earl of Rivers. The Place their wild Rage ſoon poſſeſt, and among the other Spoils violently taken there, were the Earl himſelf, and Sir John Woodville, his Younger Son. Theſe they preſently led to Northampton, and there beheaded without any Form of Law; that deform'd Body having no ear open to any Diſcourſe but to that of Blood and Fury. An envied Life and cruel Death was the Sum of all thoſe Favours conferr'd by Fortune on this Lord, eſteem'd ſo happy in his own Marriage with Jaquet, Widow of John, Duke of Bedford, and Daughter to Peter of Luxenburgh, Count St. Paul, and in his Daughter's with the preſent King. For as the Aſcent to theſe ſtrange Heights is ever envied, ſo the Deſcent is ruinous and fatal; not any one of Seven Sons which this Lord was Father to, leaving behind him Iſſue to perpetuate his Name; ſome of them likewiſe extinguiſhing violently. A Miſery either ſeldom happening or not obſerv'd in meaner Families.

A. D. 1468. Reg. 8.

A. D. 1469. Reg. 9.

This great Defeat, and theſe Inſolencies ſo beyond the Sufferance of a Prince, together with the Earl of Warwick's openly profeſſing himſelf Head to this vaſt Body of Rebels, ſtruck an Aſtoniſhment in the King's Army, and I will not ſay Fear, but ſtrange Diffidence in the King himſelf; which inclin'd him to liſten to the ſafer, though leſs noble Advice of them, who perſwaded him to end all Diſſention with the Earl by Treaty. For in this ſo univerſal Diſeaſe of the Kingdom, there was ſome ſound Men, both of the Clergy and Nobility yet left, whom Faction did not engage in Miſchief, and who out of Experience of paſt Miſeries, were willing to prevent future. By their Mediation (tho' the Armies by this Time were ſo near encamp'd, that they could hardly part without Battle) were every Hour made new Overtures of Peace, and on both Sides not unwillingly receiv'd. The Earl of Warwick, (whoſe Pretence was that of all Rebels, The Good of the Kingdom) entertain'd theſe Treaties with a Humility beneath his Nature, and late Advantages; neither appear'd ſtubborn to bend down to the loweſt Submiſſion, ſo Proviſion might be made for the publick Benefit. Yet never in all theſe Appearances of a Calm, did he neglect to prepare himſelf againſt the rougheſt Storm of War, knowing the beſt Way to be reconciled upon ſafe Terms to an Enemy, is not to be neceſſitated to Peace.

K. Edward ſeeks a Peace with the Earl of Warwick.

Warwick's Carriage.

But the King of a pliable Nature, apt to receive any Impreſſions which beſt pleaſed his preſent Humour, would not trouble his Quiet to believe there might be Fallacy in Warwick's Pretenſions. Whereupon, imagining that had receiv'd Perfection which was then but in Agitation, he neglected the Order of War, and began in his Camp to taſte the Pleaſures of Court. Which evil Diſcipline obſerv'd by the Earl, he takes the Advantage, ſuddenly ſets on the King's Field, kills the Watch, and in the dead of Night at Woollny within Four Miles of Warwick, ſurpriſeth his Perſon, buried in a careleſs Sleep: So that he no ſooner waked but found how falſe his Dream had been, which flatter'd him with Peace.

K. Edward neglecting his Guard is taken by the Earl of Warwick Priſoner.

This ſo unhappy Negligence betray'd the King to an inſulting Enemy, who upbraided his Priſoner in the moſt inſolent Terms with Ingratitude to his great Merits; and boaſted, It

(r) He was found at Brent near the River Axe in Somerſetſhire, and carried to Bridgwater the next noted Town in that County, and there beheaded. Hol.

A. D. 1469. Reg. 9.

was now both in his Power and Reſolution to plain that Mountain he had raiſed, and raiſe the humbled Valley of King Henry's Fortunes, up to the Throne he once poſſeſt. And preſently ſent away the King Priſoner to Middleham-Caſtle in Yorkſhire, there to be kept by his Brother the buſie Archbiſhop of that See; not daring to retain him longer, left his Army might unite, and hazard the Recovery of their Prince.

Earl of Warwick upbraids K Edward with ingratitude and ſends him Priſoner to Middleham Caſtle.

In this middle and unſafe Courſe of managing his great Fortune, queſtionleſs the Earl committed a main Overſight. For either by a free Dilivery with ſome Conditions advantageous to himſelf and Friends, (and what Conditions would the King not then have ſign'd?) he ſhould have caſt a perpetual Obligation upon him, or elſe by deſtroying him, have ſecur'd his Deſign from after Hazard; knowing that no Priſon could hold a Prince, which would not open to Corruption or Battery; and no Brother could have a Faith ſo ſtrong which would not be in Danger to be weakned either by Threats or Promiſes. But perhaps this Way of Policy was only beaten by that Time; and the proud Earl took a Glory to keep the whole Kingdom at his Devotion, and the Two Competitors his Captives; for both of them his Fortune had impriſon'd.

The Earl's impoliticknes in keeping King Edward.

King Edward's Eſcape from impriſonment.

But K. Edward grew ſoon weary of the Reſtraint, as whom a long Practice in the Liberty of Pleaſure, had not indued with ſuch a Tameneſs as armed King Henry: He therefore preſently caſts his Eye about to find ſome Way to redeem his Perſon from Captivity, and his Honour from ſo dark an Error as by Negligence to have been ſurpriz'd. And having upon Pretence of neceſſary Exerciſe for Health, obtain'd Licence to hunt in the adjoyning Park, he ſo contriv'd with Sir William Stanly and Sir Thomas Burgh, that unexpected they came to his Reſcue with a Number and Reſolution far Superior to thoſe who guarded him. With them he eſcapes to York, and ſo to Lancaſter, where the Lord Haſtings, Lord Chamberlain had gathered ſome Forces. With this Increaſe of Followers he march'd directly to London, his Company growing by the Way to ſuch a Body, as might not unworthily be termed an Army.

The City of London's joyful Reception of him.

Into the City he was receiv'd with the accuſtomed Triumph, the Affecton of the Inhabitants being ever devoted to his Proſperity. The Occaſion of which extraordinary Zeal was certainly either a Delight to continue him their Prince, whom their Voices firſt inaugurated King, or a Hope by his Re-eſtabliſhment to recover thoſe vaſt Sums of Money, his Neceſſities heretofore had borrowed in the City; or elſe a general Affection born him by the Merchants Wives, who having (according to the uxorious Humour of our Nation) a Command over their Husbands, urged them on to ſide with that Prince, the Beauty of whoſe Perſonage, not the Juſtice of whoſe Title, mov'd them.

Warwick's Perplexities for his Eſcape and the recalling his Army

But the Earl of Warwick, as ſoon as he had Intelligence of the Eſcape, and the Fortune which attended it, was diſtracted with a Thouſand ſeveral Imaginations. He had juſt Reaſon to ſuſpect his Brother the Archbiſhop's Faith, as corrupted by the King's Perſwaſions; as likewiſe the Weight of his own Reputation in the Kingdom, grown lighter by ſo evil managing ſo good a Fortune. He condemn'd the Folly of his too much Confidence, in having disbanded his Army, and knew the Difficulty, if not the Impoſſibility, ſuddenly to reinforce it. But this was the inward Part of him; outwardly he deſcended nothing from the Height of his Greatneſs and Reſolution. And to ſecure his former Deſign, he directed his Letters to all the Lords of his Faction, and adviſed them to reaſſemble for the common Safety.

A. D. 1469. Reg. 9.

Peace endeavoured, and an Interview concluded.

The Solicitation of thoſe good Men, who heretofore had labour'd Peace, continued ſtill; and ſo effectually endeavour'd, that in fine they brought both Parties to agree upon an Interview in Weſtminſter-Hall. There was Interchange of Oaths for Safety on both Sides, and nothing but a perfect Re-union of Friendſhip generally expected.

The Breach widened by the Interview, and the War revived.

But no ſooner was the Earl of Warwick (who came accompanied by the Duke of Clarence) wiſh'd to expreſs his Deſires, but he fell into a bold Expoſtulation of Injuries, and his Language ſwell'd to ſuch Intemperance, ſo far beyond the Limits of that Modeſty becomes a Subject's Mouth; that the King full of Indignation departed the Hall, and immediately took his Journey to Canterbury: On the other Side, the Earl, wild in his Anger, poſted to Lincoln; both making Preparation for a Second Enterview, when the Sword ſhould both diſpute and decide the Controverſie. Whoever perſwaded theſe Two great Spirits to this Meeting, err'd groſly in Judgment, how zealous ſoever they were in their Intention. For who could poſſibly imagine but the Thunder of War ſhould neceſſarily follow that Storm, which the Recapitulation of Injuries muſt beget? Since Expoſtulations, (unleſs there be ſome apparent Miſtake, or that the one Party by evil Fortune be bowed to an over-low Submiſſion) may well give a Growth to Rancour, but never extirpate it. But Experience condemns all Interviews, till by Commiſſioners (who with more Patience can argue) all Diſſentions are reconcil'd. And moſt of all againſt any between a Prince and his Subject; ſince a Subject hardly contains his Language from Inſolency, when by the diſproportionable Greatneſs of his Fortune he is admitted upon even Terms to conteſt with his Sovereign; and a Prince goes down more than one Step from Majeſty, when he is forc'd to deſcend ſo low, as to hold Parly with a Rebel.

The ill Effect of Interviews.

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10.

Warwick's Party under Sir Rob. Wills victorious.

The King underſtanding that the greateſt Part of the Earl's Forces were under the Conduct of Sir Robert Wells, and that by his good Diſcipline they were become expert Soldiers, and had done ſome Service againſt Sir Thomas Burgh; ſent for Richard, Lord Wells, his Father, that having Poſſeſſion of him, he might either draw away the Son from Warwick, or at leaſt take off the Edge from his violent Proceedings. The Lord Wells in Obedience to the King's Command, with his Brother-in-Law Sir Thomas Dimmock directed his Journey toward the Court; but having by the Way ſecret Notice of the King's high Diſpleaſure, and how unſafe his Approach would be, ſecured himſelf in Sanctuary. But the King reſolv'd upon any Terms to get him, granted a general Pardon, and receiv'd him with Promiſe of all fair Uſage. Upon which he came forth, and only at his Approach to the King's Preſence, was adviſed by Letters to recal his Son from Rebellion, and himſelf to bear a loyal Heart. Theſe Letters diſpatch'd with as much Authority as a Father could challenge, he remain'd in a kind of Twilight between Favour and Ruin, till the Meſſenger's return: Who, bringing back no Anſwer from the Son in Obedience to his Father's Command, but rather a Juſtification of his Enterprize, ſo far incenſed the King, that he preſently cauſed the Lord Wells and Dimmock to be beheaded at Stamford. An Act barbarous and

The Lord Wells not prevailing by Letter with his Son to lay down his Arms, is beheaded.

King Edward's Unfaithfulneſs to his Word.

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10.

and unfaithful! For what juſt Grounds ſoever the King might have to build Suſpicion on, that Wells did not effectually perſwade his Son, or that inwardly he wiſh'd better to the Affairs of Warwick, yet ought he not to have violated his Word. And it is a moſt poor Excuſe, to ſay a ſudden Rage was guilty of this Miſchief.

Sir Robert Wells furious to revenge his Father's Death is beaten, and after beheaded.

The Report of this Execution clouded generally the Reputation of the King, but in Sir Robert Wells it begot nothing but Fury and Revenge. And indeed Rage ſo far blinded his Judgment, that contrary to all Perſwaſion and ſober Direction, not attending Warwick's coming, who every Day was expected; he drew out his Forces, and charged the King's Army, who receiv'd him with equal Courage, and (while hope of Vengeance tranſported him too far) incloſed him, and with 67 more took him Priſoner. Upon the Place and in the Flight were ſlain of the Enemy 10000, on the King's Side only 1300, they who eſcap'd, to make their Flight the ſwifter caſt away their Coats, which gave to this Battle the Name of Looſe-Coat-Field. The Priſoners immediately were executed, Sir Robert Wells having only in his ſhort Delay of Death the longer Liberty to expreſs his Hatred againſt the King and his perfidious Cruelty.

The Earl of Warwick's Flight to Callis.

This Overthrow forced Warwick to new Reſolutions; for his main Forces by the Precipitation of the Commander being deſtroy'd, he foreſaw that ſuddenly he could not recover an Army able to give the King Battle, and how open to be ſurprized the leaſt interim would render him: Whereupon leiſurely (for his great Spirit diſdain'd any thing that reſembl'd Flight) he retir'd to Exeter, whence having diſmiſſed the Remainder of thoſe Troops which attended him, he went to Dartmouth, there with many Ladies and a large Retinue he took Ship, and directly ſail'd to Callis; while the King no way labour'd either by Land or Sea, to impeach their Journey, either content with the former half-Victory (for nothing could have made it perfect, but the Surpriſal or Deſtruction of Warwick) or holding ſo little Intelligence even in a conquer'd Enemy's Cap, that he knew nothing of his preſent Deſign: The Earl having tried as ſtrange a Viciſſitude of Fortune, as in ſo ſhort a Space, was ever obſerv'd in Story, by the Benefit of a proſperous Gale ſoon was brought before Callis, where being Captain of the Town he expected Entrance, but the Cannon was preſented him, and no Commiſeration of the Dutcheſs of Clarence's being in Travail, could obtain ſo much as Admittance in her preſent Neceſſity, only the poor Relief of ſome few Flaggons of Wine, was ſent her. Monſieur de Vanclere a (s) Knight of Gaſcoiny, Lieutenant of the Town, thus confidently refuſed his Captain Admiſſion; profeſſing, that however he ow'd his preſent Command to Warwick's Bounty, his Loyalty to the King did cancel all inferiour Obligations: By which Bravery of Carriage he won ſo great Reputation with the King and the Duke of Burgundy (who ever hated the factious Pride of Warwick, and even from the Beginning of theſe Troubles had labour'd to continue Vanclere firm in his Allegiance) that from the King he received by Letters Patents the Captainſhip of Callis in chief, and from the Duke an annual Penſion of 1000 Crowns during Life. Into thus much Honour and Profit did Diſſimulation work him, (t) yet a Friend to Warwick, while under-Hand by the Subtilty of Council he ſteer'd the Earl of Warwick to Safety, and by falſe-appearing Fidelity betray-ed his Prince: For he aſcertain'd the Earl of his good Intentions to his Affairs; and that even now, but that he knew it could not but be ruinous to both, he would declare himſelf for him. For if the Earl entred the Town he would only impriſon his Perſon, to be detain'd till the King were pleaſed to command it forth to Execution. Conſidering that the Inhabitants were but unſure Friends, and the Lord of Duras, the Earl's profeſt Enemy, Marſhal of all the Forces in the Town. Moreover the Burgundian Territories encompaſſed Callis by Land, and their Fleet was in Readineſs to block it up by Sea, ſo that no Way would be open to his Eſcape: Wherefore he adviſed him for his preſent Security and future Hopes, preſently to addreſs himſelf to King Lewis of France, who was ever ready to entertain any Lord of another Nation in Quarrel with his Prince. But above all would welcom the Earl both in regard of the near Intelligence he had long held with him, and the Hatred he bore King Edward for affronting the Lady Bona, and the Duke of Burgundy for ſo often confederating with the Rebels of France.

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10.

Monſieur Vanclere adviſes Warwick to apply himſelf to Lewis King of France.

By this Counſel the Earl of Warwick ſteer'd his Courſe to Deep, by the Way making Prize of whatever appertain'd to the Duke of Burgundy or his Subjects. And no ſooner was he landed there, but he was moſt ſolemnly invited to the Caſtle of Amboys (u), where King Lewis then kept his Court. The Ceremony (ſhort ever with Men of Buſineſs) paſt over at the firſt Meeting, ſuddenly they entred into Council how to renew the War, and reſtore King Henry; whoſe Re-eſtabliſhment in the Kingdom Lewis ever moſt paſſionately urg'd, not in Reſpect of the near Alliance, Commiſeration of his long Troubles, or Opinion of his better Title; but only becauſe he knew him inferiour in Courage to King Edward, and therefore the leſs dangerous Neighbour; and probably while any of the Houſe of York remain'd, civil War likely to keep the Engliſh Arms buſied at Home. Wherefore by his Importunity Queen Margaret (who hitherto had liv'd an Exile in France, and now upon the King's Invitation came to Court) was perfectly reconcil'd to the Earl of Warwick. Warwick, who before had chaſed her out of the Land, dethron'd her Husband, and opprobriouſly impriſon'd him, cut off the many Branches, and almoſt pluck'd up the very Root of the Tree of Lancaſter: But Neceſſity took away the Sting from Nature, and united them in the neareſt Friendſhip. For that there might not be left any Footſteps of former Diſcontent or Path to future Jealouſly, a Marriage was concluded and celebrated between Prince Edward the Queen's Son, and the Lady Anne, younger Daughter to the Earl. And on this Marriage was agreed that King Edward ſhould be depoſed, King Henry re-inthroned, the Crown to be entail'd upon Prince Edward, and for Default of his Iſſue, to come to the Duke of Clarence and his Poſterity: By which Conveyance human Policy did her Part to perpetuate the Succeſſion of the Kingdom in the Poſterity of Warwick. But the Almighty made a Mockery of this Babel, which fell ſoon to Ruin by Self-diviſion and Confuſion, not of Languages but Affections. For the Duke of Clarence began now to

K. Lewis of France receives the Earl of Warwick gladly.

Q. Margaret reconcil'd to the Earl of Warwick.

P. Edward marry'd to the Earl of Warwick's younger Daughter.

K. Edward endeavours not to hinder him.

Warwick deny'd Entrance into Callis by Vanclere.

Monſieur Vanclere made Governor of Callis by King Edward.

(s) He was hardly prevail'd upon to let Two Flaggons of Wine be ſent to her. Com.

(t) Philip de Comines took an Oath of Fidelity of him to King Edward by Appointment of his Maſter the Duke of Burgundy.

(u) Whither came alſo Jaſper Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, and John, Earl of Oxford.

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10.

consider how by following the Earl's desperate Counsels, he had gain'd nothing but the Conscience of an unnatural Revolt, and how ruin'd he were if the Success of this Enterprize should not be Prosperous, and if Prosperous how upon the Destruction of a Brother, he had built himself a less Greatness than he might have enjoy'd, without Sin or Hazzard; there being a vast Distance between the Nearness of two Sons of one Mother, and only Husbands to two Sisters: Neither had he any sure Ground for Confidence, that when King Henry were restored, hereditary Malice might not prevail, and destroy him for the Crime of his Family. And now more than ever he found himself declin'd, being forced to submit not only to Warwick, but to a new young Prince; having before acknowledg'd no Superiour but the King and him a Brother. Neither was the Dutchess of Clarence her self a weak Engine, on which this Alteration moved. For however, as a Daughter she might wish Prosperity to the Attempts of Warwick; yet ever since the last Agreement of Reinvesting the House of Lancaster in the Kingdom, she found in her Mind a strange Alienation from the Faction. And indeed either she began to dislike the Variety of her Father's Resolutions, as whom Ambition led violently to build and pluck down, or in Conscience thought the Justice of the Claim was wholly in King Edward; having in her Childhood (and those Impressions are ever deepest) been instructed to affect the House of York, and approve the Title: Or (and that is the most probable in a Woman) she envied perhaps the Preferment of a younger Sister, hating that Fortune should throw down the Priority of Nature. However, it was, yet certainly by her Means King Edward labour'd to recal his Brother, and though not suddenly, yet in the End prevail'd: For having sent over a Gentlewoman (her Sex took away Suspicion from the Practice) with full Instructions both to advise the Dutchess not to work the Ruin, or at best the lessenning of her Husband by those Counsels held then between Queen Margaret and the Earl of Warwick, as likewise to promise (if she perswaded her Husband) to him and her as much Love and Greatness as the Tie of Nature, and so great a Merit might justly challenge: He in fine got a Promise, that as soon as the Duke were disintangled from his present Engagements, he would declare the natural Affection he owed a Brother.

Duke of Clarence relents, and condemns his joyning with Warwick.

The Dutchess of Clarence discontented

K. Edward by the Dutchess of Clarence draws off his Brother from Warwick's Side.

This weak Hope, with the late Victory and seeming Banishment of his Enemies, loosened King Edward to his accustom'd Wantonness and Riot. For certainly, never lived Prince whom Adversity did more harden to Action, and Prosperity more soften to Voluptuousness: So that by the Jugdment on his Life, we may say, like a Stone cast into the Air, he was by Necessity forced up to Glory while his Center remain'd beneath in the Sense of Pleasure: And so improvident was his Memory, that he forgot the greatest Injuries, and resumed the Archbishop of York into Favour, not bearing so much as a watchful Eye over a reconcil'd Enemy: By which his Counsels were betray'd and he perswaded to a false and most dangerous Security.

King Edward's voluptuous Nature and Unwariness.

But the Duke of Burgundy, whose Recreation was Business, and whose Delight, Extent of Dominion; who by having long wrastled with Lewis XI. had learnt all the Slights of War and Peace, labour'd to disperse the Storm before it fell upon England. Whereupon he daily advertised King Edward of all Passages in the Court of France, his Intelligence holding good there, and who knew how near Danger came to him, should our King be overthrown. He advised him by vast Promises (which no way oblig'd Performance) to win some, and sowing the poysonous Seed of Emulation, to recal others: As likewise to send over some great Lord into France, who pretending Discontent, shall adhere to the Faction, and under-hand discover all their Counsels. But above all he sollicited him to rig up and set forth his Navy whereby to prevent their landing: Affirming it to be a most ridiculous Madness in a King (unless urged by inevitable Necessity) to stake his Crown at a Battle against the Resolution of a Rebel.

Duke of Burgundy endeavours to hinder it, but could not.

The King, contrary to this sober Counsel never endeavour'd to hinder the Return of Warwick, but building on the Protestations of the Marques Mountacute, and the Archbishop of York, securely gave himself over to Licentiousness. In which Interm, the Earl with his Retinue, conducted by the Bastard of Bourbon, Admiral of France, sail'd back into England, King Lewis having furnish'd him with a full supply of Monies; and for Soldiers he needed no Foreign Levies, his Name and Faction was so great at Home: For though the Country by Civil War was much dispeopled, yet the Commonalty, being for the most part born and bred up in Tumults, were naturally addicted to Arms, and prone upon any Innovations to take the Field. Neither could the Duke of Burgundy, though most passionately he labour'd it, hinder the Earl's landing by giving him Battle at Sea; for the Winds fought for Warwick and dispersed the Burgundian Fleet (the best in that Age commanded upon the Sea) casting some Ships upon the Coast of Scotland, others upon the remotest Parts of Holland.

K. Edward misguided suffers Warwick to land.

Neither did the King any way repent his Error when he understood the Earl was landed, but presently dispatched a Messenger to the Duke of Burgundy intreating him to continue his Army at Sea, to prevent Warwick's Flight back into France, as if he were ascertain'd Fortune would never deny him Victory. So secure was he grown by an over-bold Presumption, the Bastard-Daughter of a long Prosperity. But they whom Experience had instructed to more Caution, pitied his Mistake and foresaw his Ruin. And he himself not long after understanding how mightily the Earl increased in Power, began to think his Safety brought into Hazard; which he much more believ'd when he found the Nobility, whom he summon'd to his Aid to excuse themselves, and the common Stream of People to depart wholly from his Service.

King Edward's Confidence in Subjects, deceiv'd.

Dr. Goddiard justifies the Earl of Warwick's Proceedings.

And indeed, even in the City the adverse Faction was grown so strong, that Dr. Goddiard, Chaplain to the Earl, at St. Paul's Cross in his Sermon dared even to act the Herald, and conclude Edward an Usurper. And thereupon to commend the most religious Intentions of the Earl, and to exhort the Audience to joyn with him in restoring their imprison'd Sovereign King Henry to his Scepter, and the Commonwealth to Liberty; and the like did most of the Clergy of England.

The People drawn to Rebellion by his Sermon.

The credulous Multitude took this Heresie for true Doctrine, and with some of the zealously ignorant, it so far prevail'd, that in pure Devotion they committed High-Treason. But would to God the Pulpit might only speak Things Sacred; Matters of State having room enough to be discussed in Council-Chambers, and other

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10.

other Places erected for publick Aſſemblies. For certainly how erroneous ſoever the Tenet be, if utter'd there by a Prieſt with Appearance of Religion, it gets too much Authority in the Ear, and too much Ground upon the Conſcience, as this Opinion did, which was no ſooner receiv'd, but all began to incline to Revolt; and with the firſt got away the late reconcil'd Arch-biſhop, and the Marqueſs Mountacute his Brother; both having ſo often and ſo ceremoniouſly vowed never to forſake the Title of King Edward, and both now perfidiouſly breaking thoſe Vows, and with the loudeſt crying out. Long live King Henry.

A general Revolt from King Edward.

The Treachery of Mountacute, who having raiſed in K. Edward's Name 6000 Men, turn'd now with them to Warwick, and the general Defection of the Land threw the King down into extream Deſpair. For thoſe few Lords who conſtantly adher'd to his declining Fortune, commanded over ſo ſmall a Number, that to reſolve upon a Battle were to betray themſelves to Slaughter: And when Misfortune drove their Thoughts upon Safety by Flight, they knew not whither to reſolve: No Land being willing to receive that Prince, who is forced to flie his own. But while his Imaginations remain'd thus confuſed, he had hardly eſcap'd a Surprize in the Night, had not his former Misfortune ſerved him now for Inſtruction: And finding his Stay only begot Diſreputation to his Quarrel, and Danger to his Perſon, he began his Flight towards Lincolnſhire. But the Earl ſent after him his Light-horſe, following with the whole Body of his Army; and ſo cloſe did the Light-horſe purſue him, that with much Difficulty, and with Loſs of all his Carriages in his Paſſage through the Waſhes he reach'd Linn. The Queen, who was the Cauſe of theſe Alterations, ſeeing her Husband gone, and with him all hopes of Safety, all Friends vaniſhing with Proſperity, was forced to betake her ſelf in all haſte, though great with Child, to the Divine Protection in the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, with a ſmall Attendance; ſuch as were faithful to her running to other Churches for the like Protection.

King Edward's Flight, and hard Eſcape.

Lord Haſtings accompanies King Edward in his loweſt Fortunes.

The Lord Haſtings, faithful to the King in all Fortunes, and who had yet 300 Horſe under his Command, ſtay'd ſome ſhort Time behind; and now when he imagin'd the King paſt the reach of emminent Danger, he diſmiſſed his Forces and followed after. At parting he commended the Faith of the Soldiers to their Prince, which nevertheleſs for the Preſent he adviſed them to diſſemble, becauſe there was no preſent Security, nor Hope of doing after Service, but by Submiſſion to the prevailing Faction. E're long he promiſed to Return, when a better Fortune would invite them to ſhow the Loyalty of their Affections; the Violence of the Storm being too mighty to continue, and King Edward in Faction at Home and Abroad too potent, ſo eaſily to quit a Kingdom; however for the preſent he withdrew himſelf a while.

A D. 1471. Reg. 11.

King Edward's Eſcape by Sea into Holland, and Danger in it.

Having exhorted thus his Soldiers, he obey'd Neceſſity, and by ſpeedy Flight went after the King: Who having hired Three Ships, one of England and two of Holland, preſently embarked, having in his Company the Duke of Glouceſter, the Earl Rivers, the Lords Scales and Say, and in Retinue about One Thouſand (x). As ſoon as they were put to Sea, the King encountered Dangers as great as he had eſcap'd at Land. For the Eaſterlings (a People ever famed for Sea Affairs, and then at Enmity both with France and England) had ſet forth not long before ſome Men of War; who having deſcry'd theſe Ships, and gueſſing them to be Engliſh, made Sail after them. The King by Benefit of the Wind got firſt to the Coaſt of Holland, and in regard it was Ebbingwater caſt Anchor ſo near the Shore, the Eaſterlings (being Ships of far greater Burthen) could not reach them: But the next Tide infallibly had expoſed them a Prize to the Enemy, had not the Lord Gronteere, Lieutenant for the Duke in Holland by mere Accident been at that time at Alquemare, a Sea-Town cloſe joyning to them. He as ſoon as he underſtood by a Meſſenger ſent from King Edward, that thoſe Three ſmall Veſſels carried in them the Fortune of England, commanded the Eaſterlings to forbear Hoſtility, and licenſe thoſe Paſſengers a quiet landing. And preſently himſelf came Aboard the King's Ship, expreſſing in the Obſequiouſneſs of his Reſpects as much Ceremony and Love, as was due to ſo great a Majeſty, and the Brother-in-law to his Prince. And no ſooner had he attended the King Aſhore, and found how unprovided of all Things neceſſary, the Suddenneſs of his Flight had made him and his Followers; but he furniſh'd him and them according to their Quality and Want. For the King's Eſcape was ſo haſty, that not only his Apparel and other Furniture were loſt or left behind, but even his Treaſure: So that to defray the Charge of his Tranſportation he was neceſſitated to give the Maſter of the Ship a Gown furr'd with Martins: and remain beholden to the Lord Gronteere for his Expences to the Hague, whither he was conducted to expect the coming of the Duke. Who as ſoon as he had perfect Knowledge of the King's ſo ruinous Succeſs in England, and Arrival in Holland as to a Sanctuary, began to repent his ſo near Alliance, and caſt about how to cloſe with the adverſe Faction. And now indeed his Time was to act the moſt cunning part of Subtilty, by endeavouring to retain the good Opinion of his Brother-in-law, and yet ſecure himſelf from Hoſtility with the Earl of Warwick. Whereupon before ever he came to the Hague he diſpatch'd his Agent to Callis, to ſhow the chief Men of the Town, that the Peace heretofore concluded between King Edward and himſelf, was no way perſonal: But between whatſoever Princes ſhould rule in either Dominions, and betwixt Nation and Nation, and therefore by no Change of King or length of Time diſſolvable. Upon which Conſideration he intreated (for loth he was at the ſame Time to wreſtle both with France and England) that the Name of Edward might be chang'd into Henry, and the former League continue ſacred as before.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

The Lord Gronteere's Kindneſs to King Edward in his Eſcape.

Duke of Burgundy wavering in his Friendſhip to King Edward.

The unſettled State of England, and the univerſal Deſires of the Merchants of the Staple at Callis, ſoon effected the Duke's Purpoſe. For they who had continual Traffick into the Low Countries, and vented all their Wool to the Subjects of the Duke, had been diſabled to pay their uſual Tribute to the King, if free Intercourſe had been denied. Whereupon unwilling to diſcontent and impoveriſh ſo great a Body at home, and too haſtily to run into a dangerous Quarrel with a moſt potent Enemy abroad, the Earl for the preſent diſſembled his inveterate Hatred, and recall'd his Soldiers who had ſpoiled all the Duke's Territory bordering upon Callis. And that the Duke might make himſelf

Duke of Burgundy courts a Friendſhip with K. Henry and his Party.

(x) Seven Hundred Perſons.

ſtrong

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

ſtrong in a Faction potent with the preſent Time, he renew'd his Friendſhip with the Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, whom he ſolicited earneſtly to endear him to King Henry, and revive in him the Memory of their ſo near Kindred. To acquaint him how zealous himſelf and his Father had ever been for the Honour and Safety of the Family of Lancaſter, in which himſelf did ſo much participate. As likewiſe to promiſe all the perfect Offices of a Confederate and Neighbour, if ſo be that his Faithful Intentions might receive a true Interpretation.

Duke of Burgundy accepted into Friendſhip with K. Henry.

This did the Dukes voluntarily offer to negotiate; Somerſet in reſpect of Propinquity in Blood, Exeter, of thoſe many Favours receiv'd in the Low Countries during his ſo miſerable Exile: Both out of an extream Malice to the Earl of Warwick, who had ſubverted their Families, and to whoſe Aid, they envied the King ſhould owe his Reſtitution. And eaſily was the Duke brought upon good Terms with King Henry; his Neighbourhood and Friendſhip being of ſo notable Conſequence, and the very Appearance of diſclaiming the adverſe Party (what ſecret Aid ſoever he afforded) being ſo diſadvantageous to any Pretence King Edward might have to renew the War.

Duke of Burgundy keeps fair with K. Edward, who was then in his Court.

This Aſpect, full of a ſmiling Flattery, did the Duke of Burgundy bear to the preſent Fortune of the State. While upon King Edward he caſt ſuch a ſupercilious Look, as the World's wiſe Men uſually do upon Men in Adverſity. Often ſharply he reprehended his ſo great Careleſneſs and Neglect of wholeſome Advice, which had ruin'd him, and obliged him to this ſo wretched Flight. He objected the much Contempt this Misfortune would throw upon his Quarrel, and how loth Friends would be to adhere to his preſent Neceſſities, ſince he knew ſo ill to manage Proſperity. Yet remembring that hereafter there might happily be a Change in Fortune, he often chang'd his Humour, and amid theſe Reprehenſions mingled ſome paſſionate Complements of Love. He proteſted ſeriouſly that he wiſh'd all Happineſs to his Affairs, to advance which he would neglect no Induſtry; yet he deſired his Pardon if for the preſent he diſſembled, conſidering it might at once draw on a War from his Two moſt dangerous Neighbours, England and France; againſt both which Nations ſhould he be neceſſitated to a Quarrel, he ſhould be very unable to defend himſelf, much leſs to ſerve another. And when a Proclamation was ſet forth by the Duke, prohibiting his Subjects any way to aid the Pretences of King Edward or his Faction, and that it was with much Indignation receiv'd by the King, he proteſted the Intention of it to be only to betray King Henry to an unſafe Security, that in the interim he might without Suſpicion levy a greater Aid for his Deſigns. K. Edward (whom a ſhort Adverſity had already inſtructed much) appeared to take the falſe Coin of theſe Excuſes for currant, and by Example of the Duke, practiſed to diſſemble. But after this Time it was noted, that he never bore the Duke ſo ſincere Affection as before. Princes beſt maintain a near Friendſhip by keeping at large Diſtance; Jealouſie and Emulation take their Growth with Familiarity, and if either be neceſſitated to demand Supply, Reaſon of State oftentimes weakens Love, and roots up good Nature.

K. Edward hates the Duke of Burgundy for his Diſſimulation.

To increaſe King Edward's Diſcontent abroad, no News came from England but what ſpoke abſolute Ruin to his Hopes. For tho' here he heard firſt the Comfort of his being Father to a Son, Prince Edward, yet was this Son born poorly in Sanctuary, and chriſtned without the Ceremonies belonging to a Prince, and if Fortune beyond Expectation alter'd not, Heir apparent only to his Father's Miſery. Neither did that wild Inſurrection of the Men of Kent, which enſued preſently upon his Flight, effect any Thing, or ſo much as openly pretend for King Edward. But ſome diſorder'd Companies gathered into one, hoped to fiſh fair in the troubled Stream of the Kingdom, and by the Advantage of the preſent Diſtraction of State to purchaſe Treaſure to themſelves. Whereupon they directed their March (if ſuch Stragglers can be ſaid to march) towards London; where by the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Mayor they were ſoon ſuppreſt, and ſome for the general Terror, made Examples in their Puniſhment, which much raiſed the Reputation of the Earl. But after this all Things tended preſently to Quiet, and K. Henry being ſet at Liberty, (y) went in ſolemn Proceſſion to St. Paul's Church, the Clergy, Nobility and Commonalty re-acknowledging all Obedience to him. And, as if there were left no Memory of King Edward, or Hope to re-eſtabliſh his Title, every Man addreſs'd himſelf to King Henry, and all his former Servants recover'd their loſt Honours and Places. But that this might not appear to be the Act of Faction, but the univerſal Conſent of the Kingdom, a Parliament was ſummon'd (z); wherein nothing was denied, which the prevailing Party thought fit to be authoriz'd.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

King Edward's bad Condition in England, and Prince Edward's Birth.

An Inſurrection of the Kentiſh Men.

K. Henry ſet at Liberty.

A Parliament eſtabliſhes K. Henry, and diſinherits K. Edward, and condemns his Claim to the Crown.

King Edward therefore and all his Adherents were attainted of High Treaſon, their Lands and Goods confiſcated. He and his Poſterity for ever diſabled to inherit not only the Crown, but any other hereditary Eſtate; his Claim to the Kingdom rejected as a moſt unjuſt Pretenſion, and his former Government condemn'd as of a tyrannous Uſurper. And that there might be a great Example of their Juſtice, John Tiptoft, Earl of Worceſter, Lord High Conſtable of England, and Lord Deputy of Ireland (having been apprehended in the Forreſt of Waibridge, on the Top of a high Tree, which expreſſed the Precipice of his Fortune) was on the Tower Hill beheaded.

Earl of Worceſter beheaded

Next they proceeded to entail the Crown upon King Henry and his Heirs Males, for Default of which, to George, Duke of Clarence, and his Heirs for ever. By which Intail, the Earl of Warwick ſhew'd not only the Extent, but the Inſolency of Greatneſs, as if the Title of the Kingdom appertain'd to them, who were neareſt in Alliance to him, not next in Blood to the Crown. For if the Juſtice of Lancaſter's Claim had the Preheminence for want of Iſſue of King Henry, why ſhould not the Sovereignty fall to the Duke of Somerſet? Or if that Line were crooked in reſpect of Baſtardy, why not to the Houſe of Portugal, without any Blemiſh deſcending from John of Gaunt? Or if the Houſe of York had the better Title, why was George, Duke of Clarence then ſet down but Second in the Intail? Or if the Right were in Warwick himſelf (for his Power order'd and diſorder'd all) why was the Kingdom to deſcend firſt of all to the Younger Daughter? But prepoſterous Ambition never knew how to give an Account to Reaſon.

The Crown entailed by Parliament.

Then were the Earls of Oxford, Pembroke, and many others reſtor'd to their Eſtates and Titles, and the Duke of Clarence (that greater (y) On the Twelfth of October.

(z) The Twenty ſixth of November.

Hopes

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11. Hopes might not invite him to return to his Brother) poſſeſſed of the Dutchy of York.

And laſtly, the Government of the King and Kingdom committed to the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick; ſo that King Henry (in whoſe beſt of Fortune it was never to poſſeſs more than the Name of King) ſeem'd not to be ſet at Liberty, but only to have changed his Keeper, and get his Priſon ſomewhat more enlarged. But Queen Margaret and Prince Edward, tho' by the Earl recall'd, found their Fate and the Winds ſo adverſe, that they could not land in England, to taſte this running Banquet to which Fortune had invited them. And ſtaid ſo long by Neceſſity; that Diſcretion inſtructed them, in the End there was no Hope of Felicity, ſcarce of Safety in their Return.

The Government put into the Duke of Clarence and Earl of Warwick's Hands.

The Re-eſtabliſhment of King Henry in the Kingdom by the univerſal Acclamation of the Parliament, and the general Silence of the other Faction, no Man ſo much as mentioning the Title of York, cool'd that Fervour of Reſpect with which the Duke of Burgundy had at firſt embraced King Edward; eſpecially when the Treaſon of Monſieur Vauclere was apparent: For of Callis, both the King and the Duke ever thought themſelves ſecure, he having declared himſelf ſo faithfully, and they rewarded him ſo liberally. But now the Traitor turned his Inſide outward, and with the loudeſt proclaim'd his Joy for the Proſperity of Warwick: And ſo far did the Vanity of his former Services betray him, that he boaſted even his Treaſon for Merit. And whatever Meſſages the King ſent to him, he rejected with Scorn, to whoſe more notable Affront, he wore enamel'd in his Hat, the Bear and ragged Staff, the Earl's Cognizance.

Vauclere revolts from K. Edward to the Earl of Warwick.

The Neglect which accompanied his Adverſity, made the King weary of any further Dependances, and urge the Duke to have Licence for departing. For although the Dutcheſs neglected no Duty of a Siſter, and woo'd him moſt paſſionately to a longer Stay, yet ſo little had his Fortune inſtructed him to Patience, that neither Love nor Fright of Danger could detain him longer. For the Duke was diſtemper'd with ſuch an Ague of Diſcourteſie, that thoſe Fits which before came but every Third or Fourth Day, became now Quotidian; neither knew the King to how high and dangerous a Malice the Diſeaſe in Time might riſe. His Importunity therefore in the End prevail'd, and under Hand obtain'd a large Supply of Money, and ſome Men. Four great Ships of Holland, and Fourteen of the Eaſterling's Men of War well arm'd, he hired for the Tranſportation of his Forces; which conſiſted of the Engliſh who accompanied him in his Flight, and had eſcaped over after him, and 2000 Dutch Men. With the Ships he covenanted, that they ſhould ſerve him till Fifteen Days after his landing; and to the Dutch Soldiers he gave ſuch large Promiſes, that they vowed their Lives to the greateſt Cruelty of his Fortune.

K. Edward obtains Leave to depart, and an Aſſiſtance of Men and Money from the Duke of Burgundy.

King Edward's Forces.

At Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire he landed (a), where the People naturally devoted to the Houſe of Lancaſter, (ſhewed in the Malice of their Looks, what evil Luck they wiſh'd him) tho' they wanted Courage with their Arms to oppoſe him.

His Landing in Yorkſhire.

Which ſo diſmal Aſpect made him more wary in his March to York, fearing it might preſage the general Riſing of the Country. But when he came thither, and found the Citizens ſo well pleaſed with the preſent State, and ſo in their Opinion confirm'd for King Henry, he began to deſpair the Recovery of the Crown. And in that Reſolution, perceiving them obſtinate beyond any Hope of Remove, faſhion'd his Behaviour by a new Art, pretending he came to recover his Dukedom and Eſtate. Whereupon, tho' he could not move them to Obedience by the Authority of his unqueſtion'd Right to the Crown, yet by relation of his preſent Calamity, he perſwaded them to Compaſſion. So that whom they refuſed to ſerve as King, which had been an Act of Loyalty, they condeſcended to aid as Duke of York, which was abſolute Rebellion. It being High Treaſon in a Subject, tho' never ſo apparently injur'd, to ſeek his Remedy by Arms. And by the Senſe of his own Misfortunes, he made his Oratory ſo powerful, that all began to exclaim againſt the Injuſtice of the laſt Parliament, in conferring the Dutchy of York, which by Right of Primogeniture belonged to Edward, upon his Second Brother George, Duke of Clarence. Which Act could not be imagin'd, freely granted by the Parliament, but extorted by the overgreat Sway of Warwick: And had Edward by Uſurpation of the Crown, deſerv'd ſo heavy an Attainder, he might yet quit himſelf from the Crime, having been excited thereunto, not by his own ambitious Deſire of Reign, but by the Inſtigation of Warwick; who no longer would ſuffer the Government of his King, than the King knew how to obey his inſolent Direction; and who had thus planted and ſupplanted Princes, not out of Love to Juſtice, but only thereby to tranſplant the Sovereignty into his own Family.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

The Citizens of York aſſiſt King Edward to recover his Honour and Eſtate, but not the Crown.

Thus the Commonalty argued for Edward, and made him yet partake in the Fortune of a Prince, by not permitting him to bear the Burthen of his own Faults; and that he might recover the Dutchy belonging to his Family, many Perſons of Power and Name reſorted to him, he ſolemnly ſwearing never to attempt hereafter the Re-obtaining of the Kingdom. The ſame Oath ſwore Henry of Bullinbrook, when pretending to the Dutchy of Lancaſter, he landed in the North, and arm'd againſt King Richard, which he broke as Edward after did upon the like advantage. So that with Humility we ought to wonder at the Judgments of the Almighty, who permitted Perjury now to unbuild the Greatneſs of Lancaſter, which at firſt was built by Perjury.

K. Edward ſwears not to attempt to recover the Crown.

K. Edward ſwore on the Holy Sacrament he would not attempt the Crown.

Leaving therefore a Garriſon in York (a ſafe Retreat upon the worſt Occaſion) he march'd towards London; about which Place he had ever found his Fortune moſt kind and proſperous. And confidently led on his Forces (which could not deſerve the Name of an Army) although the Marqueſs Mountacute with a far ſuperior Power lay then at Pomfret to hinder his Journey. Nigh which when King Edward came expecting Battle; Mountacute who had both Ability and Opportunity to have deſtroy'd him, let him quietly paſs, not permitting any Act of Hoſtility to be ſhow'd, or Advantage taken.

K. Edward marches to London by Marqueſs Mountacute's Permiſſion.

This groſs Over-ſight in ſo abſolute a Commander receiv'd ſeveral Interpretations, according to the Complexion of the Men who diſcourſed it. The more Religious who favoured K. Edward's Title thought Almighty God, intending to ſet the Crown upon the Right Head, had infatuated the Counſels of his Enemies: The more Vulgar judg'd it Cowardize in the Marqueſs which durſt not fight againſt that Majeſty for which he had ſo often fought, and Mountacute's Act variouſly interpreted.

His March to York.

(a) On the Twelfth of March.

againſt

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

againſt a Prince who had never been in Battle but Victorious: But the more indifferent eſteem'd it a piece of over-cunning (which in the Event is ever Folly) to let his Forces paſs, whereby after he might incloſe him between his and his Brother's Army, and ſo without Hazard deſtroy him, or elſe ſome Intelligence which ſecretly he held with K. Edward to whoſe Love and Benefits he owed ſo much. Whence this Miſtake proceeded, I will not diſpute, but certainly it ſerv'd well to the King's Purpoſe and Safety; and receiv'd from the Earl of Warwick and his Faction no other Name than that of Falſhood and Treaſon.

King Edward's Army mightily increaſed, and the claims the Crown.

King Edward was no ſooner paſt this Danger, but many of the Nobility with mighty Forces repair'd to him at Nottingham, either deſirous of another Revolution of State, not having found their Expectation anſwer'd in the laſt; or directed by their better Angel to adhere to that Side which ever was more juſt, and ſuddenly more likely to be more fortunate. But before they would ſolemnly declare themſelves, they intreated and ſoon prevail'd with him to caſt off the poor Intention to a Dutchy, and lay his Challenge to, what was his Inheritance, the Kingdom. For it would leſſen, even to Contempt, the great Reputation of his Birth and former Victories, to let the People perceive that a ſhort Eclipſe of Fortune had made him fall ſo low, as to depoſe himſelf from the Royalty. Neither could they juſtifie their taking Arms to ſettle a Subject in his Inheritance. Since the Law is open to end ſuch Controverſies, and if he would ſubject himſelf to the Law, the laſt Parliament, had for ever diſabled him from any ſuch Claim.

K. Edward haſtens to fight the Earl of Warwick.

Weaker Arguments would have been of Power enough to have perſwaded his great Spirit; but by theſe he was confirm'd in his own Thoughts; and ſo being proclaim'd King, with that Title, and a full Army he march'd directly to Coventry (b) fierce in his Deſire to give Warwick Battle, who lay there encamp'd. But no Provocation could bring him from his Trenches, knowing his Army divided, and thoſe Forces he had there under his Command, unequal to maintain Fight with the King. For the Marqueſs Mountacute was not yet return'd from the North, and the Duke of Clarence, tho' often and earneſtly ſollicited excuſed himſelf, and kept his Power apart. So reſerv'd a way in them, made Warwick begin to hold both in Suſpicion; but moſt of all Clarence, whoſe Forces were ſo near and in ſo good Order, that there could be no Excuſe but in the Unpreparedneſs of his Mind.

K. Edward and the Duke of Clarence reconcild.

The King therefore perceiving nothing could force Warwick upon uneven Terms to fight, march'd againſt Clarence, and as ſoon as he drew near, both Armies prepared for the Encounter: But as a Plot in a well-contriv'd Comedy is ſo cunningly wrought, that it diſcovers not it ſelf till the laſt Scene, and then Expectation acknowledges her ſelf deluded by Invention. So this Reconciliation between the Brothers agreed on long before, on the ſudden now broke forth when all outward Appearances threaten'd Hoſtility. For the Duke of Glouceſter and other Lords ſeeming to abhor the inhuman Nature of the prepared Battle, paſt often formally between the Brothers, and urg'd them by all Reſpects both Religious and Politick to prevent a Quarrel ſo ruinous and ſo ſcandalous to both; wherein the Triumph could not be but almoſt the Deſtruction of the Conqueror. After much Mediation and much ſeeming Reluctancy, that was in the end concluded, which had long before been reſolv'd on: And the Duke of Clarence ſubmitting himſelf to King Edward, brought with him all thoſe Forces which upon Warwick's Reputation, much more than upon his own, he had raiſed. But that in this Agreement he might not appear to forget the Office of a Son-in-law and a Friend, he jointly with the King ſent to intreat the Earl to enter League with them; for Confirmation of that Title which himſelf had firſt defended, and to avoid the Effuſion of ſo much Blood as this Quarrel muſt neceſſarily draw. For Conditions he himſelf ſhould ſet down his own, knowing he would be ſo rational in his Demands, as to require nothing above the Decorum of a Subject to ask, or a Prince to grant.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

Peace offer'd the Earl of Warwick.

Warwick refuſes to ſubmit to an Agreement.

But Warwick had a Spirit too ſtubborn to bow to any Conditions, which himſelf had not been the firſt Propoſer of; and as an Injury threw back all Offers of Courteſie, and reſolv'd to be reveng'd or die. And now too late he began to curſe the Error of his Indulgency, which had added Power to theſe Brothers only for his own Deſtruction. From Edward he could expect no Safety, for he deſerv'd it not; having cancell'd all former Obligations by his laſt Revolt, by which he forced him to ſo hazardous a Flight, and from George he could not look for a true Faith, conſidering that for the only Appearance of better Hopes he had heretofore broke it even with a Brother. And from both what thought of perfect Friendſhip, unleſs (and that his Nature could never ſuffer) he would fall beneath his former Height, in which ſhould he continue, Suſpicion would never let him remain ſecure from Danger. That Subject ſcarce ever having been reputed Innocent, in whoſe Power it was to be Nocent.

K. Edward goes to London, and is receiv'd by them after a feign'd Reſiſtance.

Whereupon K. Edward ſeeing himſelf by all the Charms of former Friendſhip and Promiſe of Future, unable to lay the Spirit that raged in Warwick, left him obſtinate in the Proſecution of his own Deſigns: And accompany'd with his late reconcil'd Brother, and follow'd by a gallant Army march'd to London; where the Citizens out of Conſcience of their late Oath taken ſo ſolemnly to K. Henry, and by the Inſtigation of the Duke of Somerſet, Archbiſhop of York, and others of Warwick's Friends, made ſome ſhow of Reſiſtance (c): But ſoon the Care of their own Safety abſolv'd them from that Scruple, inſtructing them that Oaths by Fear extorted lay no Obligation upon the Soul (d). And with much Alacrity they yielded up to him their City, together with the Perſon of King Henry, who was reſerv'd ſtill to be made the Sport of Fortune, and again impriſon'd in the Tower. For certainly Hiſtory ſhows us not an Example of any Prince, who in ſo many Viciſſitudes, never met with one

(b) He came before Warwick the 29th of March.

(c) The Arch-biſhop of York on the 9th of April brought King Henry out of the Tower, and carried him thro' the City to ſhew him to the Citizens, hoping that his Preſence would confirm their Loyalty; but the Terror of King Edward's Approach with a mighty Army, drew them from their Obedience, and the Prelate was forced to come to a Treaty, and deliver up the Tower and the King, which he did the next Day.

(d) Philip de Comines writes with much more Reaſon than this Author has; for that he ſays, That the Citizens were engaged in his Intereſt, by the Debts Edward ow'd them, and the Importunity of their Wives; for as to their Conſciences certainly their Firſt Oaths to King Henry juſtified their Second.

fully

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

fully to his Advantage: So that juſtly we might have condemn'd him for Unhappy, had he not been endued with ſuch a Piety as raiſed him above his Fortune, and united him to God.

At (e) his Entrance into the City, as a general Applauſe entertain'd King Edward, all thoſe Inhabitants who had ſecretly wiſhed happy Succeſs to his Affairs, now openly expreſſing their Triumph; ſo the Queen and thoſe many of the King's neareſt Followers, who for the Space of Six Months had ſecured themſelves in Sanctuary, ran forth to congratulate their own, as well as his Happineſs in his Reſtitution. And even in this general Alacrity concurred the Votes of many Merchants, Natives and Foreigners, who before had hated him and ſupplied King Henry with Money to his Deſtruction. For the King out of the Mildneſs of his natural Diſpoſition, and a Deſire that at this univerſal Triumph there ſhould not be a ſad look ſo much as among his Enemies, gave their Offences a general Pardon. Only letting them underſtand that he knew both the Value of his own Mercy, and of the Greatneſs of their Forfeitures, their aiding the contrary Faction having loſt them their Eſtates and Liberties, and in Rigor their Lives. Neither was this an unhappy Policy in him, to oblige many by the forgiving that, the Extremity of which had he taken (his Buſineſs being then ſo unſettled) might have endanger'd a Mutiny in the City, upon the firſt Approach of the Enemy.

K. Edward welcom'd by his Friends, pardons his Enemies.

Having therefore by his happy Fortune comforted his Friends, and by his Clemency won upon the Affection of the Reſt, and ſo ſettled the Town to his Obedience, that he ſuſpected no Danger at his Back: He led forth his Army to oppoſe the Earl of Warwick, who having reunited his ſcatter'd Forces by eaſie Marches was come to St. Albans (f). The Reaſon of bringing his Power ſo near London was a Confidence he had, that his Reputation among the Inhabitants would draw many to his Part, or at leaſt ſo divide them, that they ſhould be no Advantage to the King. But the King jealous of their Levity, as one who had known them (how affectionate ſoever they pretended themſelves to be to his Fortune) ſiding ſtill with the Prevailer, interpoſed his Army between the (g) City and the Enemy, whereby he cut off even the Poſſibility of Intelligence: And that the Preſence of King Henry might not be the Occaſion of any Tumult in London, nor his Eſcape add Authority to Warwick's Quarrel, or hereafter endanger a further War; he took him to the Battle: Whereby the Poor diſtreſſed King, what Side ſoever prevail'd, was morally certain of Deſtruction.

K. Edward leaves London to fight the Earl of Warwick at St. Albans.

K. Henry carry'd to the Battle.

Upon a Plain near Barnet mid-way between London and St. Albans the King pitch'd his Field. The Van-guard was commanded by the Duke of Glouceſter, the Rear by the Lord Haſtings, the main Battle by himſelf (h). The Common Soldiers needed no Incouragement of Words, (i) the great Examples of their Leaders was the beſt Oratory. And none of them but underſtood their Lives, Eſtates, and Liberties were at Stake: Their Prince, if over thrown, every Day not unlike to produce new Troubles, and new Dangers; if Victorious, a full Concluſion of the War, with Wealth and Triumph.

The Battle in a Plain near Barnet. King Edward's Army.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

On the other Side the Earl of Warwick with as bold a Reſolution prepared his Forces. The Right Wing which conſiſted of Horſe, he committed to the Earl of Oxford, in whoſe Company fought the Marqueſs Mountacute; the Left to the Duke of Exeter; and the main Battle which was compoſed of Bills and Bows (the beſt Sinews of our Engliſh Strength) to the Duke of Somerſet: He himſelf giving Direction in every Quarter. And when he had ſurvey'd his whole Hoſt, and liked both their Order and their Courage, he ſent away his Horſe, reſolving to fight on Foot, and that Day to try the utmoſt of his Fortune; prefixing to his Imaginations no Mean between Victory and Death. Then he lovingly imbraced all thoſe great Commanders, in every of whom appear'd a Reſolution equal to the Cauſe; and having by many Proteſtations declared their ſincere Faith and Forwardneſs to the preſent Service, every Man betook himſelf to his ſeveral Charge. Nothing extraordinary to be obſerv'd in ordering the Field on either Side, but that neither George, Duke of Clarence, on K. Edward's Side, nor the Marqueſs Mountacute on the Earl's commanded any Way in Chief that Day: So impoſſible it was to extirpate that Suſpicion, which by their former Actions had taken Root in their Brother's Minds.

The Earl of Warwick's Army.

It was Eaſter-Day (k) in the Morning (a Day too ſacred to be profaned with ſo much Blood) when both Armies prepared themſelves to fight. That for the King took Courage from the Juſtice of their Quarrel, and the Fortune of their Prince. That of the Earl from the long Experience and noble Valour of their Leader, and from the Piety of him for whoſe Redemption that Day they had brought their Lives to the Hazard. Both fought for their Kings, both Kings having been crown'd, and by ſeveral Parliaments acknowledged. And indeed the Queſtion was ſo ſubtil, that even among Divines it had held long, and at that Day remained not abſolutely decided. No marvel then if the common Soldier had on both Sides the ſame Aſſurance of Truth, ſince if they have any, their Faith for the moſt is led by the Direction of their General. Both Armies therefore had equal Juſtice, which made them with equal Fierceneſs begin and continue the Fight.

The Battle fought on Eaſter-Day.

Six Hours the Victory was doubtful, Advantages and Diſadvantages indifferent on both Sides, till at length Error brought Diſorder to Warwick's Army, and that a final Overthrow. For the Earl of Oxford (l) giving his Men a Star with Streams for his Badge, begot in the Army a Miſtake that they were part of the Enemy whoſe Badge was the Sun: (which Miſtake might eaſily happen by the thick Miſt that Morning), wherefore being in the Right Wing, and preſſing forward they were thought King Edward's Men flying, which made their own main Battle fall fiercely on them in the Back: Whereupon Oxford ſuſpecting Treaſon in War-

The Earl of Warwick's Army overthrown.

(e) On the 11th of April.

(f) He encamp'd on Gladſmore-Heath, towards St. Albans.

(g) He encamp'd on the ſame Heath in the Night nearer Barnet.

(h) And the Duke of Clarence. In the main Body the Unfortunate King Henry was carry'd in Triumph.

(i) King Edward ſpoke to his Soldiers, and gave the uſual Names of Traytors and Rebels to their Adverſaries, and the Earl of Warwick was not behind him in hard Words in his Speech; calling him Tyrant and Uſurper. Holinſhead, pag. 684.

(k) The 14th of April.

(l) This brave Lord routed King Edward's Left Wing, and drove them out of the Field before that fatal Miſtake happen'd.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

wick (whoſe haughty and reſerved Ways were ever liable to Suſpicion) fled away with eight hundred Men, and King Edward with certain freſh Troops of Rutters for ſome ſuch Purpoſe reſerv'd, perceiving Diſorder in the Enemy violently aſſaulted them, and ſoon forced them to ſhrink back. Warwick oppoſed againſt their Fear both with Language and Example; but when nothing could prevail, he ruſh'd into the thickeſt of the Enemies, hoping either his whole Army would bravely follow, or otherwiſe by Death to prevent the Miſery of ſeeing himſelf overthrown. Mountacute perceiving how far into Danger his Brother was engaged, ran violently after to his Reſcue, and both preſently oppreſt with Number fell, and with them the Spirit of the Army, which thereupon immediately fled. In their Deaths they both clear'd thoſe Calumnies with which they were blemiſhed. Warwick of having ſtill a ſwift Horſe in readineſs by Flight to eſcape from any apparent Danger in Battle; Mountacute of holding Intelligence with King Edward, or betraying at Pomfret the Quarrel of his great Brother. For that Story is to be rejected as a Fable forged by Malice, which Reports that the Marqueſs having put on King Edward's Livery was ſlain by one of Warwick's Men, and that the Earl labouring to eſcape, at a Wood's Side where was no Paſſage, was killed and ſtripped to the naked Skin by two of King Edward's Soldiers. Yet both of them in their Deaths partaking with the common Condition of Men; the poor being ever eſteem'd as vicious, the overthrown as Cowards. By which Judgment we impiouſly ſubject the Almighty Diſpoſer of Human Affairs to our deprav'd Affections, as if Felicity or Infelicity were the Touchſtone by which we might diſcern the true Value of the inward Man.

Earl of Warwick and his Brother the Marqueſs Mountacute ſlain.

False Reports about their Deaths.

K. Edward carries the News of his Victory to London himſelf.

King Edward as ſoon as he ſaw the Diſcomfiture of the Enemy and certainly underſtood the Death of the two Brothers; that himſelf might be the firſt Reporter of his own good Fortune, with King Henry in his Company poſted up to London. He came into St. Paul's Church at Evening Prayer, and there offer'd up his own Banner, and the Standard of the Earl of Warwick, the Trophies of his Morning Service, where waited on him an univerſal Acclamation, the flattering Shadow which never forſakes Victory. The dead Bodies of Warwick and Mountacute he cauſed to be expoſed three Days barefaced in St. Paul's Church, that no Pretences of their being alive might ſtir up any Rebellion afterward.

To the Duke of Clarence and the Duke of Glouceſter was left the Care to Quarter the Soldiers, whoſe Enquiry ſoon found that on both Sides that Day were ſlain four thouſand ſix hundred and odd. On the King's Side of Eminency only (m) the Lords Bourchier and Barnes, the former Son and Heir to the Earl of Eſſex, this laſt to the Lord Say: On the other Side were kill'd the Earl of Warwick and the Marqueſs Mountacute attended with three and twenty Knights. The Duke of Exeter, who by his many Wounds was reported dead, recover'd Life, and got into Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, but was never more ſeen in Action; his Body after ſome length of Time being caſt upon the Shore of Kent, as if he had periſh'd by Shipwrack: The Manner of his after-Life and Death left uncertain in Story. The Duke of Somerſet and Earl of Oxford fled towards Scotland, but fearing that through the length of the Way they might fall into their Enemies Hands, they turn'd into Wales to Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke.

The Slain in Barnet-Field.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

To this violent End came the Earl of Warwick, the greateſt and buſieſt Subject our latter Age hath brought forth. And indeed how was it poſſible ſuch a ſtormy Life could expect a calmer Death? in his Spirit, Birth, Marriage, and Revenue he was Mighty, which raiſed his Thoughts above Proportion. For all theſe Benefits of Nature and Fortune ſerv'd him only as Inſtruments to execute his Rage; into which every ſmall Diſpleaſure taken or miſtaken from his Prince, threw him head-long. His Bounty extended it ſelf moſt in Hoſpitality, which was dangerous to the Gueſt, for his Meat was infected with the Poiſon of Faction. The open Aim of all his Actions was at the Publick Good, which made his Power ſtill recover Strength, though ſo often weaken'd by evil Fortune; but his ſecret Intention was to advance his own Greatneſs, which he reſolv'd to purchaſe tho' with Sale of the publick Safety. He was queſtionleſs Valiant, for a Coward durſt not have thought on thoſe Dangers into which he entred upon the ſlighteſt Quarrels. His Soul was never quiet, diſtaſted always with the preſent Affairs; and his Pride like a fooliſh Builder, ſo delighted to pull down and ſet up, that at length part of the Frame himſelf had raiſed, fell upon him and cruſh'd him to Death. He was a paſſionate Extoller of Chaſtity in a Prince, which proceeded rather from Spleen than Zeal, becauſe in that he tacitly made the King Contemptible for his voluptuous Life. Being bred up from a Child in Arms (the worſt School to learn Religion in) he had certainly no tender Senſe of Juſtice, and his varying ſo in approving contrary Titles, ſhew'd either a ſtrange Levity in Judgment, or elſe that Ambition not Conſcience ruled his Actions. The Pretences of his Revolt from King Edward, were neither to the World Politick nor to himſelf Honeſt. For what greater Hopes could he conceive by reſtoring a Family himſelf had ruin'd? Since Injuries make ſo deep an Impreſſion, that no after-courteſie can take it away? Or how could any Violence offer'd to his Daughter's Honour by the King (for that was then by him pretended) Licenſe him to War? Since no Injuſtice in a Sovereign can Authorize the Subject to Rebellion. But who will give a true Account of his latter Attempts, muſt look back upon his firſt Familiarity with Lewis XI. For never had France ſuch a Merchant to vent Diſorder in Foreign Kingdoms, and buy up the Faith of all the greateſt Officers to neighbouring Princes. But when by the moſt powerful Engines of Policy and War, he had ſcrewed up his Intentions to the Higheſt, by making himſelf King in Authority though not in Title, the Crown being entailed upon the Two Princes, who had married his Daughters: Almighty God in one Overthrow ruin'd him, and permitted his Sons-in-law, with their Wives not long after to end by ſtrange Deaths, none of them anſwering his Hope, but the Younger Daughter and that prepoſterouſly to his Deſign. For ſhe indeed by marrying Richard, Duke of Glou-

The Earl of Warwick's Character.

His Hoſpitality.

His Courage.

The Cauſe of his Revolt from K. Edward.

His Younger Daughter was a Queen.

(m) On the King's Side were kill'd the Lords Cromwell and Say, the Lord Mountjoy's Eldeſt Son; the Lotd Bernard's Son, Sir Humphry Bourchier, and 1500 Soldiers. On the Earl's Side, himſelf, the Marqueſs his Brother, Sir William Tirrell and 7000 Soldiers. Hol.

Hall ſays, there fell in all 10000 on both Sides.

geſter,

A.D. 1471. Reg. 11.

ceſter, the Butcher of her Husband Prince Edward, became Queen to an Uſurper, and ſoon after by Poiſon (as it was juſtly ſuſpected) made Reſignation of her Crown. His Grand-Children by Clarence, who arriv'd to any Age, died by the Ax upon a Scaffold; and all that Greatneſs he ſo violently labour'd to confirm in his Poſterity, by violent Deaths was reduced to nothing: The large River of his Blood, divided now into many Streams, run ſo ſmall, they are hardly obſerv'd as they flow by.

The Marqueſs Mountacute's Character.

Of his Brother the Marqueſs Mountacute little can be clearly ſpoken: So reſerv'd were his Imaginations and ſo obſcure his Ways; eſpecially to us who look on him ſo far off, and with ſo imperfect a Light. Neither of himſelf can he afford much Hiſtory, having never been but Second in any Buſineſs of Moment; and like ſoom poor Gameſter ſeldom or never play'd his own Cards. He had certainly as much Valour and Diſſimulation, as render'd him both a perfect Soldier and Courtier. He never miſcarried, in any Battle, till the laſt, in which he periſh'd; ſo that indifferently we may aſcribe to his good Conduct and Fortune, the Proſperity of his Succeſs: His Affections being divided between a King and a Brother, made him ſuffer that Misfortune that ever attends Neutrality: Though indeed he may be rather ſaid to have been for both, than either. His Nature was nothing ſo ſtubborn as his Brother's, which perhaps was bended to Plauſibility, by the Dependances of his Fortune. The Deportment of Men ſeldom ſwelling to a diſtaſtful Pride, unleſs from the very Cradle flatter'd with Reſpect, without the Competition of an Equal. He abhorred Peace, whoſe ſtrict Rules circumſcrib'd him within the narrow Limits of his own Revenue, and lov'd War which called not his Expences to acount, and equal'd, if not elevated him above thoſe great Men, whom he muſt have envied in a quiet State. In a Word, the Diſpoſitions of theſe two Brothers are beſt diſcovered to us by the King himſelf, of whom Warwick was ſtill either eſteem'd or hated, Mountacute lov'd or pitied.

His Valour and Diſſimulation.

His Love of Wars.

King Edward's Love to the Marqueſs Mountacute.

The Affection which K. Edward bore Mountacute during Life, appear'd by the good Language he always uſed of him, even when in Arms againſt him, which perhaps occaſion'd ſome Jealouſie of his Faith in Warwick; and after Death in permitting his and, and for his ſake, his Brother's Body the Honour of a convenient Burial. For after they had both lain two or three Days barefaced in St. Paul's Church, expoſed a Spectacle obnoxious to ſuch Paſſions, as the Beholders were inclined to either by Nature or Faction; they were carried down to the Priory of Biſham in Barkſhire, where among their Anceſtors by the Mother's Side the Earls of Salisbury, the two unquiet Brothers reſt in one Tomb.

Q. Margaret lands, and takes Sanctuary

Queen Margaret now when it was too late landed at Waimouth in Dorſetſhire having in (n) her Retinue ſome few French Forces, the wary King Lewis loth to venture much upon an after-game of Fortune. And here when ſhe expected the Acclamations of Triumph, ſhe firſt received the News of Warwick ſlain and his Army defeated. Which to her Mind, prepared then to have received ſome Taſte of Happineſs, was ſo ſad a Diſtraction, that ſhe knew not which Way to direct her Reſolutions, but her Courage failing her ſhe ſwooned. At length Deſpair forced her to the common poor Refuge of Sanctuary. And in Bewly in Hampſhire, a Monaſtery of Ciſtercian Monks ſhe regiſtred her ſelf, her Son and Followers for Perſons priviledged. To her in this Agony of Soul came Edmund, Duke of Somerſet (who had eſcaped from the Overthrow at Barnet) with his Brother the Lord John Beaufort, John Courtney, Earl of Devonſhire (Brother to Thomas, who being taken at Towton-Field was beheaded at York) Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke (o) Younger Son of Owen Tudor by Queen Katherine Dowager, John Longſtrother, Lord Prior of St. John's, (p) and John, Lord Wenlock, who had received his firſt Advancement to Honour by his great Services to King Edward, and now by the Folly of his Ingratitude, had likned himſelf to a ruinous Faction.

A.D. 1471. Reg. 11.

Several great Perſons join her, and Promiſe their Aſſiſtance

Theſe noble Perſonages greater far in the Reputation of what they had, or might have been, than in their preſent Power, labour'd what they could by their Advice and Preſence to raiſe up the Queen, ſunk with the Weight of her Misfortunes. They related to her the Hopes ſhe yet might retain in the Amity with France, and Authority ſhe had in England: Multitudes yet ſurviving, whom if not Affection to the Title, the Smalneſs of their own Fortunes, and Safety of their Perſons, would neceſſitate to take Arms. All Overthrows rather ſowing, than taking away the Seeds of War. Neither if ſhe look'd indifferently upon the laſt Battle, had ſhe reaſon to be Diſconſolate. For if ſhe reflected on the Number of the Slain, it was not Conſiderable; or upon the Death of the General the Earl of Warwick, ſhe might receive that Loſs as a Benefit; he having been indeed a cruel Enemy, but never but an inſolent Friend; whoſe Fortune had it continued Proſperous as it began, it might have been a Queſtion whether the Duke of York's or his Uſurpation would have been the more inſupportable. They urged farther the Authority Somerſet, Devonſhire, the Lord Prior, and Wenlock had in England, and the Multitudes Pembroke might arm in Wales. But above all, what a Confluence of the boldeſt Youth there would be to the Prince, would he but take the Field, and appear in his own Quarrel. Nothing having advanced the Title of York, but March's Preſence in all Battles, or foil'd the Reputation of Lancaſter, but King Henry's unactive Piety, and fighting ſtill by Deputies. The Soldiers thinking it in vain for them to hazard their Lives, where the Prince whom it concerns, timorouſly refuſeth to venture his own.

They comfort and encourage the Queen to attempt a Recovery of the Crown.

The Prince encouraged to appear in Arms.

But all theſe Arguments ſet off by the moſt perſwaſive Oratory, could not recover the ſad Queen to a perfect Life in her Spirit. For either ſo many Diſaſters, and falling ſo thick together, made her deſpair of Succeſs; or elſe the Soul before a great Miſchief hath a certain divining Knowledge of future Accidents. And now ſhe began to think that ſmall Time her Husband had been re-inveſted in the Kingdom, was but a Lightening before the Death of all Sovereignty in his Family. Yet when ſhe looked upon the Prince, hope flatter'd her Deſires, that he might hereafter revive the Greatneſs of his Blood; but then the Memory of forepaſt Misfortunes, made her a melancholy Prophe-

Q. Margaret deſpairs, but endeavours to get her Son's Right.

(n) She landed on the very Day that the laſt Battle was fought upon.
(o) The Earl of Pembroke was then raiſing Forces in Wales, and did not join her at all.
(p) The Prior of St. John's and the Lord Wenlock came from France with her. Hol.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

teſs of future Ruin. Howſoever the Objects of her Thoughts were diſmal, ſhe diſſembled them, and was as buſie in all Politick Contrivances, and as forward in ſetting forth the Army as the moſt reſolute Commander. (q) But when ſhe perceived the Lords earneſt to have the Prince preſent in the Battle, ſhe violently oppoſed it, in reſpect of his Youth, want of Experience, and the ſo mighty Venture: For if he periſh'd in this Storm, even Hope it ſelf would in him be Shipwrack'd. She therefore urged earneſtly to have him convey'd back into France, where in Safety he might attend the Succeſs of the preſent Enterprize, which if unproſperous, he might there remain, till by the Increaſe of Years and Power, he might be inabled to fight his own Quarrel. But the contrary Opinion overrul'd in her all the Paſſions, both of a Woman and a Mother; and having already loſt ſo much at this Play of Fortune, ſhe was perſwaded like a deſperate Gameſter, to hazard at one Caſt the Remainder of all her Stock.

The Queen refuſes to let her Son be in the Battle.

Having therefore yielded to this Reſolution, ſhe leaves the Sanctuary and puts her ſelf in Arms; The very Name of Prince Edward, like a Diamond, attracted Multitudes to the War. Her Companies immediately ſhe advanced to Bath, where the Duke of Somerſet, and the Earl of Devonſhire were high in Reputation, and by whoſe Authority daily new Forces came in to the Prince's Service. Yet were they not grown to ſo full a Number, as might encourage the Queen to think upon a Battle. Whereupon ſhe keeps her ſelf in the Town, until the coming of Jaſper (r) Earl of Pembroke, upon the Addition of which Welſh Forces, ſhe reſolved to take the Field, and encounter King Edward.

Q. Margaret and her Son the Prince gather Forces.

Who as ſoon as he had perfect Intelligence of her Reſolutions, gathered his Army together, which he (ever too confident of Peace, ſo amorouſly courted by him) had after the Victory at Barnet, licenſed to diſperſe it ſelf. And with ſo unexpected Suddenneſs he made his Preparations, that before the Return of Pembroke, he incamp'd at Marlborough, within fifteen Miles of Bath (s), and by the Interpoſition of his Army, hindered all Succours which could come to the Enemy from Wales. Which ſo near Approach diſtracted the Reſolutions of the Queen, and made her ſuſpect her Safety, if ſhe remain'd longer there. Wherefore ſhe retired to Briſtol (t), from whence ſhe ſent to the Lord Beauchamp of Powyke, who had the keeping both of the City and Caſtle of Glouceſter, to deſire Paſſage over the Severn there, but he refuſed her, and forced her to march up to Tewksbury, there to endeavour to croſs the River.

K. Edward ſpeedily re-aſſembles his Army, and encamps at Marlborough.

In her Way thither, as ſhe paſt by Glouceſter, which in Diſcretion ſhe durſt not Aſſault, tho' by the former Diſcourteſie provoked; he taking Advantage of the Place and ſome Diſorder in the Queen's Rearward, fell ſuddenly upon it and carry'd away, after ſome Slaughter of the uncircumſpect Soldier, much of her Artillery. This Loſs troubled her a little, but when ſhe found her ſelf purſu'd by King Edward ſo cloſe, that before ſhe could reach Tewksbury (u), he with his Horſe were in Sight; Deſpair ſeiz'd her, ſo that ſhe began only to look which way to flie. And indeed to that Extremity was her Buſineſs reduced, that there was left no other hope of Safety: The King having ſo much odds in Courage and Number. But the Duke of Somerſet prevail'd againſt her Fears, and the ſober Opinion of moſt of the beſt Commanders; upon which, neglecting to eſcape at firſt into Wales, where Pembroke had raiſed mighty Forces for her Service, ſhe was ſoon by the King neceſſitated, either to yield or endure the Battle. Whereupon ſhe reſolv'd to fight it out that Day, which was the laſt, and that which decided the great Quarrel between the two Houſes.

Q. Margaret flies to Tewksbury, and is forced to engage King Edward.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

The Duke of Somerſet pitch'd his Field in a Park adjoining to the Town, and entrench'd his Camp round ſo high and ſo ſtrong, that the Enemy could on no Side force it; and when he perceiv'd an inevitable Neceſſity of preſent Fight, he Marſhal'd his Hoſt for the Service. The Foreward he and his Brother commanded, the Earl of Devonſhire the Rear. In the main Battel was the Prince, under the Direction of the Lord Prior, and the Lord Wenlock. The Queen ſeeing the Hour draw near, and that there was need the Soldiers ſhould have Advantage of Valour to equal the Enemy, who had it in Multitude, took the Prince with her and rode about the Army. In her Looks appear'd nothing but Life and Reſolution, in her Language almoſt an Aſſurance of Victory; ſo cunningly ſhe conceal'd the Wound her Deſpair had given her, that then only it bled inward. She told them, That it reſted in their Courage that Day to reſtore their impriſon'd King to Liberty and his Crown; and themſelves not to Safety only, but to Honour and Treaſure; for the Wealth of the rebellious Cities ſhould be their Spoil, the Kingdom their Inheritance to be divided only among them, and all thoſe Titles the Enemies ſo proudly wore, to be conferred upon their Deſerts. If the Inequality of Number frighted them, ſhe ſhow'd it was not ſuch, but that they might be confident their great Hearts animated by the Juſtice of the Cauſe, would eaſily take away the Diſparity. Then ſhe wiſh'd them to look upon the Prince (whoſe Perſonage the fond Mother thought would make them like deſperate Lovers contemn Danger) and fight for him their fellow Soldier, with whom they were to ſhare in Fortune, and who once in Poſſeſſion of the Throne, would never forget them, by whoſe Courage he was ſeated there.

Q. Margaret's Army, and its Leaders.

Q. Margaret animates her Soldiers to Fight.

The Soldier generally appear'd reſolv'd againſt the ſharpeſt Danger, receiving her Words with much Alacrity: And as ſoon as the Signal was given bravely repulſed the Duke of Glouceſter, who having the leading of King Edward's Vanguard, had aſſaulted the Queen's Camp. Upon which Repulſe, the Duke of Somerſet ſeeing Glouceſter retire with ſome Appearance of Flight (an Appearance indeed it was only to betray the Enemy) ran after ſo far in the Purſuit, that there was no Safety in the Retreat. Then did Glouceſter on the ſudden turn back upon him, and having by this Deceit

The Duke of Somerſet's Wing deſtroy'd by the Duke of Glouceſter's cunning.

(q) This long Account of the Queen's Deſpair is not very certain, but very natural, ſhe being a Woman of a Maſculine Spirit.

(r) The Earl of Pembroke did not join her.

(s) Marlborough is Twenty Four Miles from Bath, and not at all ſituated to cut off the Communication between Briſtol and Wales, the King lay at Cirenceſter in Glouceſterſhire.

(t) She was very well receiv'd and ſupply'd by the Citizens of Briſtol, and was ſo far from ſhunning the King's Army, that ſhe came to Sudbury in Glouceſterſhire and inſulted King Edward's Quarters. Some of her Scouts entring the Town and bringing off Five or Six of his Men.

(u) She march'd the Night before, and that Day Thirty Six long Miles, and encamp'd at Tewksbury the Third of May. Hol.

intiſed

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

intiſed him from his Trenches, he cut all the Vanguard in pieces. The Lord Wenlock who had the Conduct of the main Battle, and whom it concern'd to have reliev'd the Duke, only looking on as if he were a Spectator, and no Actor in the preſent Tragedy. Somerſet enraged with his Diſcomfiture, and having Wenlock's Faith in ſome Jealouſie; upon his eſcape back upbraided him with the moſt ignominious Terms of Cowardize and Treaſon, and tranſported by the Heat of Paſſion, with an Ax he had in his Hand ſtruck out his Brains.

A Diſorder in the Queen's Camp.

This Outrage begat nothing but Diſorder in the Queen's Camp; and ſo great grew the Confuſion that no Man knew whom to obey, or how or where to make Reſiſtance againſt the aſſaulting Enemy. So unhappy is Government both in War and Peace, when all Authority is not conferred on one: A multitude of Commanders dividing the Obedience of the Inferior, and ever diſtracting Reſolutions among themſelves. Whereas Nature inſtructs us to a Subordination, and as in our own, ſo in a publick Body, it is monſtrous either to have no Head, or elſe to have more than one.

K. Edward conquers the Queen's Army.

The King took Advantage of this Uproar, and by it gain'd a moſt entire Victory: for entring without any Oppoſition the Queen's Trenches, he committed a moſt cruel Slaughter on all who reſiſted. Three Thouſand of the Common Soldiers (for they always pay for the Raſhneſs or Folly of their Commanders) were ſlain that Day, and among them the Earl of Devonſhire, the Lord John Beaufort, and ſome other Gentlemen of Name (x). The thick Woods of the Park preſerv'd ſome, and the Sanctuary others, but them only for a while; for King Edward who was never an overſcrupulous obſerver of religious Rites, with his Sword drawn would have entred the Church and forced them thence. But a good Prieſt careful to maintain the Immunity of the Place, with the Euchariſt in his Hand, oppoſed the Violence and would not let him enter a Place ſacred to our moſt merciful God, until he had granted to all there his Mercy by a free Pardon. But this Pardon betray'd them, for on the Monday after they were taken out of the Church, and all beheaded in the Market-Place at Tewksbury (y). Among whom thoſe of principal Note were the Duke of Somerſet, and the Lord Prior of St. John's, and many other Knights of great Reputation and Fortune. By which Violation of the Sanctuary he made good the Opinion which the World before had conceived of him; that Religion never could prevail ſo far upon his Conſcience as to be any bar either to his Pleaſures or Revenge.

He violates the Priviledges of Sanctuary, and breaks his Promiſe.

Q. Margaret and Prince Edward taken.

The Queen half dead in her Chariot was taken in the Battle (z), and not long after, the Prince was brought Priſoner to the King by Sir Richard Crofts, who taking Notice of the Proclamation, whereby the Reward of a Hundred Pound by the Year during Life was promiſed to whoſoever ſhould yield up the Prince's Body, dead or alive, to the King, (with Proteſtation not to offer any Violence to his Perſon if alive) brought him unhappily to his Death: Which when the good Knight afterward found, he repented what he had done, and openly profeſſed his Service abuſed, and his Faith deluded.

K. Edward again breaks a ſolemn Promiſe.

For King Edward preſently upon the Delivery of the Prince, cauſed him to be brought into his Preſence, and entertain'd him with ſome Demonſtration of Courteſie: Moved perhaps thereunto by the Innocency of his Youth, Compaſſion of his Misfortune, or the Comlineſs of his Perſon, the Compoſition of his Body, being guilty of no Fault but a too feminine Beauty. At firſt it was ſuppoſed the King might have ſome charitable Intention, and reſolve happily to have ſettled him in the Dutchy of Lancaſter, his Father's Inheritance, a Patrimony too narrow for a King, and ſomething too large for a Subject; and for that End is ſaid to have enter'd Diſcourſe with him, to make Tryal whether his Spirit would ſtoop to acknowledge a Superior. He therefore queſtion'd him what mad Perſwaſion had made him enter into ſo raſh an Enterprize, as to take up Arms againſt him, where the very Attempt was Rebellion, being againſt his Sovereign, and Folly being in Oppoſition to a Prince ſo far in Power above him? He expected an humble Anſwer, as if he were to beg his Life, or ſoft and gentle, according to the Complexion either of his Fortune or his Face. But he with a Reſolution (as bold as his Grand-father Henry the Fifth, would have replied with) anſwer'd, 'That to recover his Father miſera-
'bly oppreſſed, and the Crown violently uſur-
'ped, he had taken Arms. Neither could he
'be reputed to make any unjuſt Claim, who
'deſir'd no more than what had been poſſeſſed
'by Henry the Sixth, the Fifth and Fourth, his 'Father, Grand-father, and great Grand-fa'ther Kings of England; and acknowledged
'by the Approbation not of the Kingdom on'ly but the World, and even by the Progeni-
'tors of K. Edward.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

K. Edward courteouſly entertains Pr. Edward, and talks with him.

The Prince's Anſwer to King Edward.

By the Spirit of which Language when the King perceived how much his Life might threaten Danger, with a Look full of Indignation he turned from him, thruſting him diſdainfully away with his Gauntlet (a). Which ſo mighty Rage obſerv'd, and his ſo diſtemper'd parting out of the Room: The Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, the Marqueſs Dorſet, and the Lord Haſtings, ſeiz'd ſuddenly upon the Prince, and with their Poniards moſt barbarouſly murther'd him. Of whom we can make little Mention, his Youth having perform'd nothing worth Story, though it promiſed much. For under the Government of a Mother (the worſt Education for a Son) he had been bred up, until this laſt Scene of Life; which he acted alone, and bravely, ſo that Poſterity laments his Misfortune yet, and applaudes the Juſtice of the Almighty in Puniſhment of his Murtherers. For all of them came to violent Ends: Glouceſter being Executioner of the Reſt, and of him the Earl of Richmond, the next ſurviving Kinſman of the butcher'd Prince. The Severity of which Example, holds a Glaſs before the Eyes of the Wicked, and ſhows them how rotten is all that Greatneſs, which is not raiſed upon, and maintain'd by Vertue; and as the Conſcience is ever after ſuch a crying Sin, inwardly tortured upon the Rack of Fear; ſo ſeldom doth the Body eſcape outwardly an exemplary Death by Violence.

Prince Edward murthered by K. Edward his Brethren and Friends.

The Prince's Death revenged.

After this general Defeat of the Enemy, the Death of the Prince, and all the great Partakers (x) This Battel was fought the Fourth of May, and 3000 private Soldiers were ſlain.

(y) The Duke of Somerſet, the Prior of St. John's, Sir Thomas Treſham, Sir Gervaiſe Clifton and others were formally tried before the Duke of Glouceſter, the Duke of Norfolk, and preſently condemn'd.

(z) She was not taken in the Battle, but in a Monaſtery near Worceſter. Hol. 688.

(a) He ſtruck him with his Gauntlet. Hol.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

kers with the Houſe of Lancaſter, and the Surprize of the Queen her ſelf: the King returned toward London (b): This being the only compleat Victory he ever gain'd, from which no Man of Eminency eſcap'd; and no Man, who might pretend to a Competition, was now preſerved except King Henry, and he Iſſueleſs, and in Priſon.

King Edward returns to London, and carries Queen Margaret in Triumph.

And to make this Triumph reſemble ſomething of the Roman, the King carried with him his great Captive the moſt afflicted Queen Margaret. A Woman moſt unfortunate to her ſelf, and moſt ruinous to this Kingdom. For after her Marriage into England, ſoon finding her Husband's Weakneſs, ſafe however in being directed and ſtrengthened by ſober Counſel, ſhe never left off inventing new Machinations till ſhe wrought him into her ſole Command, with the Deſtruction of his neareſt Friends. So that to make the Proſpect of her Greatneſs larger, ſhe broke down and levell'd his ſtrong Bulwarks. The Duke of Glouceſter, which might perhaps a little check her ambitious Eye, being taken quite away, left her open to every Tempeſt. Having therefore by fomenting Diſſention at home, loſt (except only Calais) all our wide Territories abroad: By the Murther of the good Duke, her Husband's Uncle, ſhe gave Liberty to the Houſe of York, to make their juſt Claim to the Crown; and in the end to put her out of that Government, ſhe prepoſterouſly managed. In her Proſperity, ſhe was rather ambitious than wanton; though from the laſt Opinion did not abſolutely acquit her. Which Aſperſion certainly was caſt upon her, by Reaſon of her too intimate Familiarity with ſome of the younger and finer Lords: For the more diſcreet and aged, either diſlik'd her Projects, or were diſlik'd by her, as Perſons too cautious to conſult with a giddy Woman. Her mighty Confidence in the Duke of Suffolk, who wrought her Marriage with England, had left the largeſt Part of that falſe Suſpicion upon her Name. For they who are juſt to her Memory, cannot but ſay, beſide that ſhe was religious, ſhe was even too buſie to think of Love Matters. But perhaps the Misfortune of her Carriage gave ſome ſmall Occaſſion of the Report. Her proſperous Fortune preſents her to us in the worſt Colours a factious, buſie, and imperious Queen. Her Adverſe in the beſt, a moſt induſtrious Woman to recover what her Folly had loſt, an excellent Wife, and a moſt indulgent Mother. And had ſhe never appear'd in Action but when Misfortune had compell'd her to it, ſhe had certainly been numbered among the beſt Examples of her Sex: But now the Merits of her latter Part of her Life, by redeeming the Errors of the former, ſerve only to level her with the Indifferent. The Time ſhe continued a Priſoner in England, ſhe ſhewed us no Face but that of Deſolation; the Strength of her Spirit, either broken in the Murther of her Son, or elſe ſhe accounted it a needleſs Imployment now to raiſe her ſelf above her Sorrows. After ſome time, her Father, with the Sale (c) of much of that poor Eſtate, of which he remained yet in Poſſeſſion, ranſomed her for 50000 Crowns; whereby ſhe was redeemed to another Air, tho' not to a freer Fortune. In Addition to her other Miſeries, ſhe was puniſh'd with a long Life, which ſhe ſpun out ſadly and ingloriouſly, living humbly upon the narrow Exhibition her Father did ſteal from himſelf to afford her. Her Life was much the Talk of the preſent and ſucceeding Times, becauſe it concurr'd to the Deſtruction of the Houſe of Lancaſter, a Family beyond any then in the Chriſtian World, both in Extent and Dominion, Greatneſs of Alliance, and Glory of Action. Her Death was ſo obſcure (for who counts the Steps of the Unfortunate?) that it is not left certainly in Story when ſhe died.

Q. Margaret's Character.

Her Ambition.

Her Chaſtity.

Her Religion.

Her Grief.

Q. Margaret ranſom'd by her Father.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

But King Edward, by her Misfortune reckoned his own Felicities; and now juſtly conceived himſelf ſecure in that Throne, he ſo paſſionately had endeavoured to ſit at eaſe in. But becauſe the Scene of his Fortune had had more Changes than any King in England yet, except his Competitor, he continued ſtill with a moſt watchful Eye to look about him. And not knowing to how dangerous a Growth Enemies might arrive, which for the preſent appeared weak, he thought fit to take Order with Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, who remained in Wales, with a Power unable to offend the King, but able enough conſidering the Nature of the Place, to defend himſelf. Wherefore, that without a publick Trouble he might deſtroy ſo private a Perſon, he ſent Roger Vaughan ſtrong both in Kindred and Followers, with Commiſſion by ſome Stratagem to entrap him. But the Earl had a Diſcovery of his Plot, and to deceive the Deceiver, ſeemed to give Opportunity for Execution of the Deſign; by which means he got Vaughan into his Poſſeſſion, and preſently cauſed him to be beheaded. But knowing this Act concurring with the whole Progreſs of his Life in Oppoſition to the King, would bring him to Ruin, either by open Power or ſecret Practice, he reſolv'd to ſail over into Brittain, and under the Protection of that State to ſecure himſelf from the preſent Storm. With him he carried his Nephew Henry, Earl of Richmond, Heir of the Tudors Family by the Paternal, by the Mother's Side of the Houſe of Somerſet, for the Civil War had now deſtroyed all thoſe great Dukes, who had with Loſs of their Lives ſhewed their Devotion to King Henry, and left the Inheritance of their Honour, with a far more favourable Aſpect to this young Earl.

K. Edward endeavours to ſettle his Kingdom in quiet, and vanquiſh the Earl of Pembroke.

Earl of Pembroke flies into Brittain with Henry Earl of Richmond

By the Duke of Brittain, they were received not only with Promiſe of Safety, but with an Allowance of a Penſion. Him perhaps the Conſideration of the Inſtability of humane Affairs, moved to this noble Pity. But Peter Landois (the ſole Director of the Duke, and a wicked Man) perſwaded his Maſter to give them Entertainment out of a covetous Deſign one Day, to make a good Merchandize for himſelf by Sale of them into England.

Duke of Brittain receives them, and allows them a Penſion.

Yet could not the King bring his Happineſs to that Quiet he deſired; ſome few ſmall Drops fell upon him after the great Tempeſt: For (d) a baſe Son of William Nevill, Earl of Kent, (e) commonly known by the Name of the Baſtard Falconbridge, having been employed

The Baſtard Falconbridge raiſes ſome Stirs by Sea and Land.

(b) There was a Riſing in the North in Favour of King Henry, and King Edward before he went to London march'd Northward to ſuppreſs it; but the Northern Men hearing of the ill Fortune of their Friends in the South, deſired the Earl of Northumberland to mediate with the King for a Pardon, which he did actually at Coventry. The King did not come to London till the 21ſt of May.

(c) He borrowed the Money of the French King, and pawn'd only Naples and Sicily for it, Two Kingdoms that never were in his Poſſeſſion.

(d) Thomas Nevill.

(e) Baſtard Son to the brave Lord Falconbridge. Hal.

Vice-

A. D. 1471. Reg 11.

Vice-Admiral by the Earl of Warwick, during the late Combuſtions of the Kingdom, to hinder all Succours which might come from the Low-Countries to King Edward's Aid, ſoon as he underſtood the Earl's Death, ſet up for himſelf, and fell to Trade in open Pyracy. His Conditons were ignoble as his Birth, and only can be ſaid a fit Inſtrument to move the baſer Multitude to Sedition. Between Dover and Callis he robb'd moſt, and had now got under his Command a Navy great enough to work Miſchief. Eſpecially having the chief Men of Callis (who had ſided lately with the Earl) of his Confederacy, and by that Means Safety upon all Occaſions in their Harbour. Gathering therefore into his Retinue many of thoſe who had eſcaped from the two former Overthrows, and preſuming upon the Affection of the Kentiſh and Eſſex Men, he ſailed up the River of Thames.

His Navy.

The Intention of his Arms he gave out to be for the common Liberty, and the Redemption of the King and Queen impriſon'd by an Uſurper. By which Pretence, ever powerful to incline the Vulgar to Sedition, he invited to the Quarrel ſo great a Multitude, that the Number was reckoned 17000 fighting Men; moſt of them the Dregs and Lees of former Rebellions: Such who having been heretofore on King Henry's Side, and wanting Courage to make good the Undertaking, had by Flight eſcap'd; or elſe Men whom Guilt of ſome enormous Diſorder had prepared for any Attempt; becauſe neither of them could hope to remain long ſecure from Puniſhment, when once the ſevere Eye of a peaceable Government, ſhould look narrowly into their Offences.

His Army of 17000

With this Army he march'd to Kingſtone hoping there to have croſſed the River, but being debarr'd, he led his Army into St. George's Fields, (f) and from thence with his Ordinance made ſome ſmall Battery on the City. And to ſtrike the more Terror, in the mean time he cauſed 3000 of his Men to be tranſported by Boat at St. Katherine's, to make an Aſſault on the other Side at Aldgate and Biſhopſgate. Who being ſet a Shore with a Courage as deſperate as their Quarrel, offered to force an Entrance, but by the Citizens were bravely repulſed. The Lord (g) Mayor and Aldermen, directed by the great Experience of the Earls of Eſſex and Rivers, and the Marqueſs Dorſet, neglecting no Part of the beſt Commanders And ſo valiantly they purſued the Rebels (who ſoon began to ſhrink) that Falconbridge with much Difficulty recovered his Ships. For he over-confident of Succeſs, had commanded them to fall as low as the Downs, little fearing he ſhould ſo ſoon be forced to ſeek Safety at Sea, and having vainly deluded himſelf and his Soldiers with Expectation of great Forces from Wales under the Conduct of Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke. With much Danger of being deſtroyed at Black-heath, where, for a while he entrench'd, he got at length to Sandwich, and fortified the Place. Few of the Rebels, who had any weak Hope of Pardon, following their General upon a forc'd Retreat.

He aſſaults the City, and is repulſed by the Mayor.

The Commons entring thus upon every ſlight Invitation into Rebellion, when the Preſervation or Reſtitution of King Henry was but mention'd, made the King begin to conſider how dangerous his Life was to the State: and that his Death would diſarm even the Hope of his Faction, for ever reflecting more upon the Wars. It was therefore reſolv'd in King Edward's Cabinet Council, that to take away all Title from future Inſurrections, King Henry ſhould be ſacrificed. For howſoever, ſome either to clear the Memory of the King, or by after Cruelties gueſſing at precedent, will have this Murther to be the ſole Act of the Duke of Glouceſter: I cannot believe a Man ſo cunning in declining Envy, and winning Honour to his Name, would have undertaken ſuch a Buſineſs of his own Council, (h) and executed it with his own Hands. Neither did this concern Glouceſter ſo particularly, as to engage him alone in the Cruelty; nor was the King ſo ſcrupulous, having commanded more unneceſſary Slaughters, and from his Youth been never any Stranger to ſuch Executions. In killing the Prince he had Clarence, Dorſet and Haſtings for his Conductors; and in the very Murther of his Nephews (which was the ſecuring his Uſurpation) he truſted Tyrrel: So confident had his innate Inhumanity made him, that he doubted not but others might be faithful in Villany. But the Death of King Henry was acted in the dark; ſo that it cannot be affirmed who was the Executioner; only it is probable it was a Reſolution of State. The Care of the King's Safety and the publick Quiet, in ſome ſort making it, however cruel, yet (i) neceſſary.

A. D. 1471. Reg 11.

K. Henry's Death reſolved on by K. Edward and his Council, and effected, but by whom is not known. Duke of Glouceſter not the Murtherer of King Henry.

But that the World might not ſuſpect King Henry lived ſtill, and thereupon be ſtirred up to new Deſigns; he was no ſooner dead, but with ſome Show of Funeral Rites, his Body was brought into St. Paul's Church, where upon Aſcenſion-Day, with his Face uncovered, he was expoſed to the Curioſity of every Eye. For the King was reſolved rather to endure the Scandal of his Murther than to hazard the Queſtion of his Life, which continually gave Life to new Seditions. From St. Paul's next Day, the Corps obſcurely without any Ceremony (in thoſe Days with much Piety obſerv'd toward the Dead) was conveyed to the Black-Friers, and from thence by Boat to Cherſy, in Surry. Whence, after it had reſted ſome while, it was removed to Windſor, and there at length found Quier. The King having even after Death partaken with the Troubles and Diſgraces of his Life.

K. Henry being murthered, is expoſed bare faced in St. Paul's Church.

The Reaſon of burying him thus in the Dark, I cannot gueſs to be any Diſreſpect to ſo great a Prince; but only to ſtop the Diſcourſes of the Commons, who always pity them dead, to whoſe Deaths their Votes concurr'd. Unleſs it be true what is commonly written, that the People began to cenſure hardly the King for his Death, becauſe at what time his Body lay in St. Paul's, and after in Black-Friers, a large Quantity of Blood iſſued from his Noſe. A moſt miraculous Way of ſpeaking the Barbariſme of his Murther, and giving Tyrants to underſtand that the Dead dare in their Language tell the Truth, and call even their Actions to Account. For this manner of bleeding was never obſerved to happen, but when againſt Law, Nature had been oppreſſed with Violence, and ſeemed to challenge Juſtice.

K. Henry's Corps bled in St. Paul's and the Interpretation of it.

With what Aſpect he entertain'd his Fate, I cannot write: But well we may believe, he could not but ſmile upon Death, who by a continual Exerciſe in Vertue, from his very Infan-

K. Henry Sixth's Character.

(f) On the 12th of May.

(g) Thomas Stockton, Mercer.

(h) Sir Thomas More in his Life of Edward V. ſays the Duke of Glouceſter ſlew him with his own Hand without the King's Privity; and it was conſtantly reported in his Time, who was Contemporary with him, tho' it was in his Youth.

(i) The Author vindicates K. Henry's Murther as neceſſary.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

cy had triumph'd over Sin, which only makes Death Formidable to a Chriſtian. Of his outward Actions, all good Men of that Time took a reverend Notice; eſpecially of his due Obſervation of all the Laws of the Church, his exemplary Piety, Humility beneath the State commonly uſed by Princes, and a Modeſty even to Admiration. But they were the Vertues, which crowned the firſt part of his Life, which was paſt over in a full Proſperity, and appertain not to my Story. His Misfortune and Death only fall to my Task. And in his Misfortune he expreſſed ſo ſingular a Fortitude, that he was never obſerv'd to be dejected upon the Report of any ſad Accident. But entertain'd all Afflictions as ſent from the Almighty, and abſolutely reſign'd his Will to that of Heaven. How innocently he ſpent the laſt Ten Years of his Life, which was in as much Adverſity as ever Prince ſuffer'd, his ghoſtly Father gave a happy Teſtimony: Affirming that in all that long Trial of the inward Man, he never in Confeſſion could accuſe himſelf of any actual Sin. His Imployment was Prayer, and his Recreation only pious Diſcourſes which perſwaded Man to ſet a true Value upon heavenly Things, and throw a juſt Contempt upon the World. And to ſuch Reputation the Sanctity of his Life arrived among the Common People, that after his Death they honour'd him with the Devotions due to a Saint. And King Henry the Seventh (who owed the higheſt Opinion to his Holineſs, becauſe he had fore-profeſſed he ſhould enjoy that Crown for which the two Houſes then ſo much conteſted) labour'd his Canonization with the Pope, but that ſucceeded not; for however the World was aſſured of his Piety, there was much Queſtion of his Government: So that he might be term'd a juſt Man, but an unjuſt King. Since his Title to the Crown was unjuſt; for though it came by Deſcent to him, yet was it but a continued Uſurpation: His Reign, was guilty, I will not ſay through his Demerit, but thro' his evil Fortune, of much Miſchief, and the Effuſion of a Sea of Chriſtian Blood: And however in the Contemplative Part he was Religious toward God, in the Active he was Defective to the World: So that to have made him worthy that Honour Henry the Seventh would have provided for him, he muſt either (being reſolv'd in Conſcience his Title was juſt) have fully perform'd the Office of a King; or knowing it queſtionable have ſubmitted it to be diſputed freely, and upon the Reſolution made Reſignation of what he unlawfully poſſeſſed. But Juſtice which commands any Diminution of Greatneſs, is ſeldom obey'd by Princes, and Death only makes them ſurrender up what was violently by their Progenitors uſurped, and unjuſtly by themſelves continued, for till Death, Ambition betrays the Conſcience, and Fear of being leſs makes it not dare to ſee the Truth, which perſwades to Reſtitution.

K. Henry the Seventh endeavour'd to have him Canoniz'd.

Falconbridge in Sandwich ſubmits to the King.

King Henry thus taken away, the Forces under Falconbridge's Command, which before had the ſpecious Title of a juſt War, could now pretend to nothing but an unjuſt Sedition. And ſo low they fell both in Courage and Reputation, that all they intended was but to make ſhow of War, whereby the eaſier to work their Peace: No Man of Name or Power, who before ſecretly had favoured them, but openly proteſted againſt the Enterprize. In Sandwich Nine Hundred of them remained, till they certainly underſtood the King's Approach with a mighty Power; then they ſent forth Sir George Brooke, to acquaint his Majeſty with their Deſire to return to his Obedience, if they might by his Pardon be ſecured of their Lives and Liberties. They proteſted it was no Fear or preſent Neceſſity induced them to this Submiſſion, having Confederates enough Abroad to relieve them upon Extremity, and for the preſent Victuals for Six Months, and Ammunition to oppoſe any Aſſault. If this Offer might be accepted, they would give up with themſelves, the Town and Caſtle, together with all the Shipping in the Harbour; if not, Neceſſity would force them to their own Defence. And if they muſt die, they would ſell their Lives at ſo dear a rate, that the King might repent his Purchaſe; conſidering he had kill'd ſo many, who would have been as bold to have fought his Quarrel, and loſt ſo good Shipping, and ſo commodious a Haven-Town; for they were reſolv'd to ſee both conſum'd with themſelves, that the Victory might be no Triumph to the Conqueror, and the Conquer'd might have that Comfort in their Ruin.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

The King pardons them, and receives the Town and Shipping

The Propoſition was accepted by the King, and the Duke of Glouceſter (whoſe Wiſdom and Valour had wrought him high in the Opinion of the King) was ſent with a general Pardon to the Rebels, and Authority in the King's Name to receive the Town, the Caſtle, and all the Shipping in the Harbour.

But after executes the Leaders, and Fines many of the Followers. K. Edward again breaks his Promiſe.

But the King, who never let any Pardon be an Impediment to his Purpoſe, having them in his Power, cauſed the Laws ſeverely to proceed againſt them. And for the Example of the reſt, Spicing and Quintin (two of the chief in this Rebellion) were executed at Canterbury, and their Heads ſet upon thoſe Gates, which at their laſt being at London, they ſo furiouſly aſſaulted. And that the King might not only draw Blood, but Treaſure from this Buſineſs, a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer was directed to the Lord Denham, and Sir John Fog, to inquire againſt all Offenders in the laſt Rebellion, and to inflict on them either corporal or pecuniary Puniſhment. But the Commiſſioners who underſtood both the Neceſſity and Intention of the State, made rather choice of the latter, knowing Death would but incur the Cenſure of Cruelty, and no way advance the King's Benefit. Whereas great Fines weaken as much the Diſcontented, and make the Prince as ſecure from Danger, even with the Reputation of Clemency.

Falconbridge put to Death at Southampton.

And that Falconbridge the firſt mover of this Sedition might have no more Priviledge than his Complices; coming into Southampton he was apprehended and put to Death. The inſerting of his Name in the former Pardon, though often pleaded by him, ſerving only to make him ſuffer the ſame Execution with the reſt.

The Archbiſhop of York made a Priſoner for Life.

The Puniſhment of theſe ſucceeding ſo well, the King proceeded againſt others. And firſt againſt the Archbiſhop of York, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, who with his ſpiritual Authority had ſet a Gloſs of Religion upon all the latter Attempts. And by his working inclin'd the Commons of the North to ſo conſtant a Reſolution for King Henry. With him the King took Order, becauſe he found his Ambition irregular, and ſent him to be kept Priſoner in the Caſtle of Guiſnes. Where deſervedly he endured a long Reſtraint, and never attain'd Liberty till Death enlarged him. No Man afforded the poor Comfort of Pity to his Affliction, becauſe in his Proſperity he had been Inſolent and Factious.

The

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

And his Goods, Eſtate, and Archbiſhoprick ſeized.

King Edward very unfaithful.

The Manner of the Attachment was according to the Cuſtom of the King, unfaithful. For having admitted the Archbiſhop, after Barnet-Field, not only into Favour, but a ſpecial Familiarity; as he was hunting with him near Windſor, he promiſed to come to More-Park, (a Place in Hartfordſhire, which was not long before purchaſed, and built up moſt commodiouſly by the Archbiſhop) and there to hunt with him; with this Caution, that there might be nothing but a liberal Mirth, and friendly Entertainment. With much Complacency, the Archbiſhop retired to his Houſe, joyful to ſee the King ſo free in his Affection, without Memory of former Diſcontents. And that the Entertainment might not be altogether beneath the Majeſty of his Perſon, againſt the King's coming, beſide all coſtly Proviſion, which the Shortneſs of the Time could make; he had gathered together of his own and his Friends, Plate and other rich houſhold Stuff, to the Value of 20000 l. Next Day expecting the Preſence of the King, on the ſudden, Sir William Par, Knight, and Maſter Thomas Vaughan entred the Houſe, and by Virtue of a Commiſſion to that Purpoſe, confiſcated all thoſe Goods to the King's Uſe; and having arreſted his Perſon and ſent that to Priſon, ſeized upon all his Eſtate both Temporal and Eccleſiaſtical: The former forfeited for ever, the latter during the Archbiſhop's Life.

The Earl of Oxford fortifies St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, and held it out againſt the King.

The Crime objected againſt him was Treaſon, for ſecretly aiding the Earl of Oxford, who at that Time had fortified and held St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, ever ſince Barnet-Field. For the poor Earl ſeeing the whole Iſland loſt from the Houſe of Lancaſter (in whoſe Defence he had been ſo conſtant) and all the great Favourers of the Quarrel deſtroyed; having no Place of Safety to ſhelter himſelf abroad, took this Corner of the Kingdom, and endeavour'd to make it good. But this was but the Enterprize of a deſperate Man; for all his Hope this way could be only to prolong a wretched Life without Servitude. As for Liberty he was his own Goaler, and his Fortreſs his Priſon. The whole Number of his Soldiers were but 70, ſcarce enough for his Retinue. Yet with theſe he managed his Buſineſs ſo happily, that tho' beſieg'd, he revictualled the Place, and made his Defence good ſome Months. But when Richard Forteſcue, Eſq; of the Body to the King, (k) and then Sheriff of the County, came down, and by open Offer of the King's free Pardon to all the Earl's Men, and ſecret Practiſing, had wrought them to his Purpoſe; the Earl was forc'd to yield, and with him the Lord Beaumount, Two of the Earl's Brothers, and Thomas Clifford; all Perſons of great Name and Quality. The King receiv'd them to Mercy, as far as their Lives were concern'd: But for their Eſtates (for now he began to husband his Victories to the Benefit of his Treaſury) he confiſcated them wholly; not allowing the diſconſolate Counteſs any Part of her Joynture. Inſomuch that during the Life-time of King Edward (for all that while was the Earl kept Priſoner near Callis, in the Caſtle of Hames) ſhe was forc'd to live upon the Courteſie of her Friends, a kind of better Sort of Alms.

Richard Forteſcue, Sheriff of Cornwall, cauſed Michael's Mount to be yielded.

A. D. 1472. Reg. 12.

All now were reduced to Order, except the Earls of Richmond and Pembroke; and them the King laboured to fetch in: For now either his Nature was alter'd to a ſtrange Miſtruſt, which in his Youth had been ſo taxed of an uncircumſpect Confidence; or elſe he began to be govern'd by a Council of a more wary Judgment, and whoſe Sight could diſcern Danger afar off. And certainly, who compares the firſt and laſt Times of the King's Government, ſhall perceive a ſtrange Difference in the Policy; unleſs in thoſe Affairs wherein he obeyed his own Direction, and in them remain'd a Tincture of his natural Error. The Change of Government may be aſcribed to the Duke of Glouceſter, a Man whom the Conſcience of his own Infidelity, made jealous of the Faith of others; who thought no Enemy alive and with Liberty, but full of Danger, how weak ſoever his Power or Pretence might be; and who at this Time held the Stern of the Council, while the King at Pleaſure wanton'd in his Cabin. By his Advice Commiſſioners were ſent over to the Duke of Brittain, in whoſe Dominions the Earls remained, to expoſtulate the Injury of giving Entertainment to any Evil affected to the State of England. Pembroke having been upon all Occaſions an open Rebel, and Richmond only wanting Age to take Arms, and who ſhortly appeared to threaten no leſs Dangers. They deſired him 'as he reſpected any Confederacy with Eng- 'land, and the Common Policy of Princes, not 'to diſoblige the King by harbouring his Ene'mies, and ſuccouring ſuch who could bring 'nothing but Ruin to their Abettors: Neither
'to prefer Faith with Two miſerable Exiles,
'before Love to a Prince, who had both the 'Power and Intention to join with him in any 'War, that might tend to the Safety or Ho'nour of his Dutchy. They concluded with an earneſt Requeſt, 'That he would deliver up
'into their Hands the Two Fugitives, that ſuch
'Order might be taken as was ſafeſt for the 'preſent State. Or if the too ſcrupulous Ob-
'ſervance of an Oath perplex'd him, that at 'leaſt ſuch Care might be had, that they might 'neither attempt Confederacy abroad, or a
'Power to enable them to return home.

A. D. 1472. Reg. 12.

K. Edward endeavours to get the Earls of Richmond and Pembroke into his Power from the Duke of Brittain.

Duke of Glouceſter manages all Affairs of State.

Pembroke and Richmond demanded of the Duke of Brittain.

The Duke made Anſwer, 'That in Point of 'Honour he could not condeſcend to the King's
'firſt Demand; having upon their Arrival
'there given them his Word. But for the ſe-
'cond Part, he would beyond the King's own
'Deſire conſult for the Safeguard of his Ma-
'jeſty, and reſtrain them from any Power to 'attempt new Enterprizes. And perhaps, as 'it would preſerve his Reputation clearer to 'the World, ſo would it more advance the 'King's Purpoſe to let them remain in Brittain,
'rather than to have them returned into Eng-
'land; conſidering, at Home they had a great
'Kindred, and by the Slaughter of the reſt,
'were grown chief of the Faction of Lancaſter:
'Whereas, if they continued with him, they
'ſhould be in a free but a ſafe Cuſtody, in a Coun'try where they were ſo far from Power, that 'they wanted Acquaintance: And that him-
'ſelf would narrowly look that no diſconted
'Perſons ſhould reſort to them, or that they
'ſhould make their Addreſſes to any other
'Prince. Whereupon he entreated his Ma-
'jeſty to conſider him as a Confederate moſt re'ligious in Maintenance of that Amity, here'tofore ſo happily begun, and hitherto ſo faith-
'fully maintained.

Duke of Brittain refuſes to ſurrender the Earls of Pembroke and Richmond to K. Edward; but promiſes to keep them from diſturbing his Nation.

With this Anſwer the Ambaſſadors return'd, and the Duke made good his Promiſe to the (k) Forteſcue was not Sheriff of the County at that Time, but one Bodringham, who favoured the Beſieged, and gave the Earl an Opportunity of Victualling his Garriſon. Hol.

A. D. 1472. Reg. 12.

King. For presently he remov'd all their English Servants, and set Brittains to attend them, who did rather observe than serve them: Men who cunningly mark'd not only who made their Dependencies upon them of the English, or with what People they held Intelligence, but even their Looks, and sent the Copy of them into England, oftentimes with a false Interpretation. Then (that Two together might not animate each other, and enter into dangerous Counsels) they were kept divided, and all Communication either by Language or Letter, absolutely forbidden. And (that both being in the same Restraint, might not conspire to the same Escape) there was a Guard set upon them, who narrowly, tho' respectfully watch'd them. So that we may guess this great Care the King took for their Restraint, to have wrought a strange Effect. Richmond esteeming himself more considerable as he was more suspected; and by the Fears of the King making Valuation of his own Prerences. Great Thoughts crept into his Mind by the Circumspection of such great Princes; and the Vulgar both abroad and at home began to believe (for they always think there are strange Depths even in the Shallows of Princes Actions) there was much Mystery in Richmond's Title, and Danger in his Liberty. Whereas had he lived unsuspected by the King, he had perhaps died unobserv'd by the World.

Duke of Brittain sets Spies upon the Earls of Richmond and Pembroke's Actions.

By this Negotiation with Brittain, having secured himself of these Two Earls, who might endanger the Quiet of the Kingdom at Home, he began to look abroad, whither yet he had never Liberty to cast his Eye: His Pleasures, or Dangers hitherto so taking up his Time, that he had only served his Appetite, or Safety; but now he had quieted all Civil Troubles, and even rooted up the very Fear of War hereafter; he therefore thought it necessary to look first upon France, a Nation which had made Benefit of our Ruin; and while we busied our Thoughts and Courage in Destruction of each other, recovered so much Life, that they were grown dangerous. Of their farther Growth the King was fearful, and resolv'd, if he could not make them less, at least to keep them at a Stay. Whereupon, having Intelligence of a Marriage in Agitation between Duke Charles (Brother to Lewis XI. and then Heir apparent to the Crown) and the Daughter and sole Heir of Charles, Duke of Burgundy, he endeavoured by all Arts to break off the Treaty. For he considered how formidable the French would grow to our Kingdom, should the so large Territories of the Seventeen Provinces with the other Dominions of the Duke be added to them. How they would then be enabled to revenge those many Injuries the Fortune of our Victories had done them, when we should be left to our own Arms, the Burgundian (by whose Aid we had entred and conquer'd France) now prepared to war upon us. How France superior always to the English in Multitude, and Extent of Territories, and defective only in commodious Havens, would by this be enlarged with a mighty Sea Coast, and with as good Men for Navigation as the World then had; by which they would have absolute Command at Sea, and keep us within the narrow Limits of our Island: If they would permit us that. These Considerations made the King solicite both the Duke of Brittain and the Count St. Paul (the Two earnest Mediators for Duke Charles) to desist from farther Negotiation in the Marriage. Brittain he moved to reflect upon his own Danger, if Charles should survive King Lewis, as by Course of Years it was probable, and have so great an Empire under his Command, telling him, That greater Princes, like greater Rivers swallow up the less, and after a while retain no Memory of them. And if he presumed upon the Friendship between him and Duke Charles, and the many Courtesies done him, it was a treacherous Hope that never yet kept Faith. That Brittain never enjoyed all the Privileges appertaining to the Dutchy, but when France was disabled to break them.

K. Edward endeavours to hinder the Growth of the French by a Marriage with the Heiress of the Duke of Burgundy.

The Danger of the French King's being Master of the Netherlands to England and all Europe.

He dissuades the Duke of Brittain from furthering it.

With the Count St. Paul he dealt another Way, by representing to him, The near Friendship that ought to be between them Two, in Respect of the so near Alliance, being Uncle to his Queen; by which he entreated him not urge a Business so prejudicial to the Crown of England, which in a near Degree concern'd his own Blood. Withal he advised him, to take Care of himself, and not to exasperate too far King Lewis, to whom the Treaty of this Marriage was most unpleasing; in Regard to the Safety of his own Estate. To foment Discord between Brothers, being injurious to Religion, and unsafe to Policy: For Nature reunites them, and throws both their Malices on him, who occasioned the first Breach; and so he for the most part is yielded up a Sacrifice to the Reconciliation. He concluded, with the Madness of his Actions, who would provoke the just Anger of so subtil, and so revengeful a Prince, for the frail Amity of so weak and inconstant a Man as his Brother Duke Charles, who so often had been entrap'd.

He discourages the Count de St. Paul from mediating in it.

From both these Princes he received such Answer as shewed they resolv'd to prosecute their Design, but not to have him suspect it; giving fair Protestations of their Desire to be overrul'd by the King's Direction. But neither of them understood the Business to be of that dangerous Nature, as it was conceived in England. For tho' King Lewis had no Son at that Time, yet was there every Day Expectation he might have; the Queen likely to conceive, and Lewis in much Health and Strength of Body. And indeed, soon after a young Dauphin was born, who succeeded in the Kingdom. Moreover they considered the Malice between the Brothers grown to that Height, that all Attempts of Reconciliation was needless; and that there was no such certain Way to maintain a general Dissention in France, as by enabling Duke Charles with a Power to make good the former Contestation. Nothing likely to incline him to seek Friendship with his Brother, but being disabled to continue an Enemy.

The Duke of Brittain and Count St. Paul dissemble their Designs to K. Edward.

The King suspecting the Reality of their Intentions, and being resolv'd upon any Terms to prevent the Marriage, had in his Determination to have forgot all former Discontents justly conceived against King Lewis in abetting the contrary Faction of Lancaster, and to have entred into a particular League with him against the Duke of Burgundy: But before he would make the Overture, he tried by his Ambassadors to know the certain Resolution of the Duke himself, who had in the Marriage of his Daughter always held his Thoughts apart from the World. And in Truth the End of his Intentions was to keep all neighbouring Princes in Expectation, but to conclude with none. For at the same time when Duke Charles had so many underhand Promises, with the self same Hope did he entertain Maximilian, Son to the Emperor Frederick the Third, Nicholas, Duke of Calabria, and Philibert, Duke of Savoy. His Ambition being to create many Dependancies upon himself, and never to marry her to no Man, unless he should be forced to it by some evil Fate in War,

Duke of Burgundy's Policy in marrying his Daughter.

A. D. 1472. Reg. 12.

War, and then he doubted not but by her to work himself safe and honourable Conditions.

The Duke of Burgundy declares against the Marriage to K. Edward's Ambassadors, and satisfies the King.

Much importun'd by the English Ambassador to give his Resolution, and not knowing to what Danger the King's Suspicion might grow, or to what new Leagues it might incline him; he answer'd him faithfully that he intended no such near Alliance with Duke Charles. And that all those Appearances of Treaty were only to retain him in Discord with his Brother, who otherwise might chance to be reconciled, and hazard to destroy that Faction, which the Necessity of his Affairs did inforce him to advance. He desir'd therefore the King not to listen to every false Suggestion, but to believe he would do nothing in so material a Point, without much Advice, and Care had for Satisfaction of so great a Confederate, and so near an Allie.

Charles the King of France's Brother dies.

This so absolute Resolution of the Duke took away the former Jealousie, which soon after would howsoever of it self have vanish'd. For Duke Charles, not without a strong Suspicion of Practice in King Lewis, died of Poison, and so fixed a Period to those many civil Wars which had distracted the State of France, and to all those busie Ambitions, which had so much disquieted his own Content.

A. D. 1473. Reg. 13.

K. Edward in Debt, calls his Parliament for Supply.

At Home the King was continually stung by a swarm of Creditors, who during his late Troubles had supplied him with Treasure, and for whom Gratitude did oblige him to provide Repayment. He found his Exchequer empty, and a Necessity to desire the Commonalty to contribute with their Purses, that many of his best Friends might not be ruin'd. He therefore summon'd a Parliament to be held at Westminster, wherein though the Reformation of Abuses, and enacting Laws wholsome for the present Time was pretended, a liberal Subsidy was the Aim. But in the Beginning all those Acts which had been heretofore made during the first part of King Edward's Government, and abrogated by King Henry the last Parliament when for a Time he was restored, were reviv'd and enacted to continue in full Force for ever: And whatever other Statutes were made by King Henry, repealed. By Virtue of which Acts all the Nobility who had adhered to the House of York, and had been for that Attainted, were restored in Blood and to their Patrimonies; and all of the contrary Faction found Guilty of high Treason, and their Estates confiscated to the King. Then for Relief of the King's great Necessities (for all those so mighty Fortunes serv'd only to reward the Multitude of his Adherents) a full Subsidy was granted; In Recompence of which he gave them a general Pardon. And indeed by that, liberally repaid them; for by the late Civil Wars, the Lapse into Treason was so universal, that scarce any Estate could be safe if License were given to Informers, the Cormorants of a Commonwealth, who swallow much, but seldom or never grow Fat; and least of all Advance that they most pretend, the King's Benefit.

Acts of Parliament repealed by K. Henry, re-enacted by K. Edward again.

A general Pardon.

Lewis de Bruges much honour'd by the King.

Some few Days before the Parliament began, Lewis of Bruges a Netherlander, Lord of Gruthuse and Prince of Steinhuse came over into England, who was receiv'd by the King with all the Demonstrations of Amity: And on the Thirteenth of October in the Parliament-Chamber created Earl of Winchester, receiving with the Title the Ancient Arms of Roger Quincy, heretofore Earl of the Place, with Addition of the Coat of England in a Canton. The Reason of this so extraordinary Favour conferred upon a Stranger, was the much Application of Respect he made to King Edward, when by the prevailing Fortunes of the Earl of Warwick, he was forced to flie for Refuge under the Protection of the Duke of Burgundy. For he being a Nobleman of that Country, composed himself totally to comfort the King, distracted with his present Affliction.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

Soon after him, the Parliament being newly ended, came Ambassadors from the Low-Countries; who, after the first open Audience, (wherein for the most part passed only the Complement of Princes) being admitted to the King and some few Lords most intimate to the King's Resolutions, spoke to this Purpose,

An Embassy from the Duke of Burgundy to King Edward to invite him to a War with France.

May it please your Majesty,

'WE are sent by our great Master the 'Duke of Burgundy upon an Embassy, 'that may prove strange at the first Apprehension, and even in it self Contradictory. To 'Congratulate your Majesty the Glory of that 'Peace you enjoy, and to invite you from it, 'to a new War. But Glory is like Time, ever-'lastingly in Motion, and when it stops it ends.

K. Edward invited to a War with France.

'Your Majesty hath by the happy Conduct 'of your Power and Fortune, restored the 'Kingdom to it self: That was an Act of Ne-'cessity. For you could not be your self, if 'your great Enemies had not been reduced to 'nothing. Now as great a Justice doth invite 'you to the Recovery of a larger Kingdom. 'Which we know your high Spirit cannot re-'fuse to undertake, least the World have just 'Reason to suspect you took Arms to live, not 'to reign. For if your Title to the Crown of 'England be just, as Man did always allow in 'Judgment, and Almighty God hath approv'd 'in the Success; the same Title is good to the 'Crown of France: Both having been united 'into One ever since the Usurpation of Philip de Valois.

King Edward's Title to France.

'The People's Affection to Princes of their 'own Nation enacted an injurious Law; that 'authoriz'd Injustice, and confirm'd the Sove-'reignty in the Heirs-Male. The Female were 'excluded, as if the Distinction of Kind could 'make a Difference in Right, and the being 'born a Woman were to be born Illegitimate; 'for the Law Salique in a Manner bastardizeth 'the whole Sex.

The Injustice of the Salique Law in France.

'Your great Ancestor Edward the Third, 'whose Name and Magnanimity you inherit, 'with his Sword abrogated this Law: And cal-'led the Law-makers to a severe Account at 'Crescie and Poitiers, where more Veins of 'France were open'd, and more Blood issued, 'than any Time records, considering the small 'Numbers of the English. In the latter of the 'two Battles John, Son to Philip of Valois, la-'bouring to make good the Pretensions of his 'Father, was taken Prisoner, and so continued 'less than a free Subject, by endeavouring un-'justly to be a Sovereign.

Edward the Third's Victories in France.

'The little Handful of Men with which the 'English then opposed the vast Armies of the 'French, not only showing the high Advantage 'the Nation hath in Courage; but the mira-'culous Justice of the Almighty, who delights 'to make the Destruction of Usurpers his own 'Work, and not to permit Man by his Power 'to rival Heaven in the Punishment.

English conquer'd France with small Forces.

'Your Majesty needs not History to perswade 'you to the Quarrel, or Example to assure 'you of the Success The Justice of the Claim 'will easily prevail with you to draw again 'your Sword, which hath been hitherto almost 'ever unsheathed in Vindication of your Right;

King Edward's just Claim to France.

A. D. 1473. Reg. 13.

and that with ſo much Proſperity, that they who admire your Valour and Direction, applaud your Fortune.

K. Edward oblig'd in Policy to War with France.

'But if the Nature of Man, delighted in the Felicities of Peace, ſhould adviſe your Majeſty to ſatisfie your Mind with the Triumph of thoſe Victories you have already purchaſed; Yet neither a juſt Revenge, nor diſcreet Policy will admit it. For how can England remain ſafe from future Injuries, and acquit her ſelf in Honour againſt thoſe who have heretofore affronted her; if France, where all the late Combuſtions were firſt conceived, remain unpuniſh'd?

King of France the Cauſe of the Civil Wars in England.

'The huge Body of the Civil War lies now a dead Trunk, wounded to Death by your Arm, but yet Lewis of France, the Head of that Monſter, tho' contrary to the ordinary Courſe of Nature, retains ſtill a Life, and quickens Miſchief hourly againſt this Kingdom; leaſt otherwiſe his own be not ſecure. And ſhould your Majeſty out of Deſire to avoid the further Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, permit him to continue in the unjuſt Poſſeſſion of a Kingdom, he would interpret his Safety and your Mercy to be either a blind Ignorance, or a degenerate Fear: And from your Lenity draw the Boldneſs to prepare new Troubles againſt your Quiet.

A War with France neceſſary to purge our Malecontents.

'And if it be not an over-much Care in a Confederate and an Allie, to make ſo narrow a Scrutiny into your Majeſty's Affairs, our Maſter believes that this War will not be unneceſſary for the preſent State of England. In regard this Way thoſe many evil Humours, gather'd in the Body of the Kingdom by the late Diſorders, will be eaſily purged away, or at leaſt diverted. Seeing Experience teacheth us how impoſſible it is, for a Nation nurſed in Civil War, ſuddenly to embrace a Peace, and endure a ſevere Government. And ſhould the Diſcontented not vent themſelves thus Abroad, how dangerous it might make the Diſeaſe at Home, is eaſie to be conjectured.

Small Preparations neceſſary for a War with France.

'But all this ſhows only the Juſtice and Neceſſity of your War: Preparations great enough to oppoſe a King of France, yet we have not touched upon. And that indeed is it, our Maſter gave us in our Inſtructions moſt to acquaint your Majeſty withal: As by which it will be moſt apparent, how without any Reflection upon his own Occaſions, he invites you to this Undertaking. For his Highneſs underſtands how far this Overture lies open to a falſe Interpretation, conſidering his Enmity with King Lewis, did not the Circumſtance of the Buſineſs ſhow how your Majeſty is rather deſir'd to a Triumph than a Battle.

The Allies of France few.

'Never had France ſo many Enemies ſo powerfully united, and never ſo few Friends, if ſhe may be ſaid to have any. For except only the poor Duke of Lorrain, who happily may be a Burthen, never an Aid to any Prince; we can hardly reckon a Confederate. For ſo treacherous have been all King Lewis's Arts, ſo diſſembling his Nature, that the World hath concluded it much ſafer to be at Enmity with him, than upon the faireſt Terms. His Friendſhip having ruin'd ſome, his Arms never any Man.

Confederates againſt France.

'In Confederacy with our Maſter, and in abſolute Reſolution to invade France, are the Duke of Brittain and the Count Saint Paul. Brittain able of his own Subjects to bring a powerful Army into the Field, Saint Paul by his Kindred and Intelligence to cauſe a general Revolt of all the Nobility from the King.

'And indeed, ſuch hath been the Character of that politick Prince (for that Epithete his poor Shifts have got him) that a continual Contempt hath been thrown by him upon the great Lords, and a moſt near Familiarity enter'd into with the baſeſt People. His Barber being more acquainted with the Affairs of State, than the whole Body of his Council. A. D. 1473. Reg. 13.

The French Nobles ſlighted by their King.

'This prepoſterous Courſe of Favour, hath made the greateſt States of the Kingdom ſcorn their preſent King, and reflect upon your Majeſty, whoſe Comportment in War and Peace hath been ſuch as juſtly makes your Triumph in the general Affections of your many Friends, and utter Deſtruction of your Enemies.

K. Edward promiſed great Aſſiſtance to conquer France.

'If it may therefore pleaſe your Majeſty to admit of that Greatneſs your high Deſcent hath Title to, and your Predeceſſors have had Poſſeſſion of: The Arms of theſe great Princes are prepared to ſerve you. Our Maſter firſt honoured your Majeſty as a potent Neighbour, great in your ſelf as in Dominion. Then by Marriage he grew into the neareſt Degree of Correſpondence; the Title of Brothers, (a Ceremony uſed between Princes) being of due in Alliance between you Two: Laſtly, He had the Happineſs which Potentates ſeldom have (tho' with ſome Trouble to your Majeſty) to enjoy entire Familiarity: By which thoſe other Reſpects, common among Perſons of like Quality, and which are often but weak Ties of Amity, are converted into a perfect Friendſhip. So that the Deſire his Highneſs hath to advance your Majeſty's Glory and Command, proceeds only from Love to the Poſterity of your Perſon, and Juſt Claim.

Duke of Burgundy's Friendſhip with King Edward.

'With how powerful Forces he will concur to this great Action, hath been of Purpoſe omitted: Becauſe the World hath had ſufficient Teſtimony, how able his Highneſs hath been to oppoſe, if not oppreſs, King Lewis without borrowing Aid from a Confederate.

Duke of Burgundy's Power aſſerted.

'He therefore intreats to know your Majeſty's Reſolution, whether you will paſs over and perſonally make your own Claim to the Crown. Your Majeſty's only Preſence being of Power to raiſe a fuller Army in the very Heart of France, than yet ever King of England led to conquer France.

King Edward's Reſolution deſir'd.

This Overture took generally with the great Lords, who in their Infancies by their Nurſes having been told no Stories but of our Triumphs in France (and thoſe Tales imprint deeply in the Memory) and now for many Years ever acquainted with the Wars at Home, embraced Danger as the only Means to Honour. Moreover an Appetite of Glory, mingled with a Noble Emulation of the Powers of their Fathers, made every Man of Name thruſt forward to this Action. Neither were the more Covetous backward, conſidering they were to War with a richer, and a more effeminate Nation; and not unlikely to return loaden with Spoil, if not to remain there in a fertiler and a pleaſanter Country. The Soldier, who was in a manner all the Gentry of the Land (for the Civil Wars had engaged them all to the ſtudy of Arms) reliſh'd this Buſineſs more than the great Lords. For they, having been bred up in the free Licenſe of War, abhorred to be circumſcribed within the narrow Bounds of the Laws, which never have abſolute Power but in Peace. So that the whole Body of the Kingdom paſſionately affected the Quarrel, and by their univerſal Acclamations in Praiſe of it, per-

A War with France encouraged by the Engliſh Nobility and People.

A. D. 1473. Reg. 13.

perſwaded the King ſoon to declare his Aſſent.

K. Edward promiſes to invade France in the Spring.

Whereupon ſending for the Ambaſſadors, he ſhowed his Reſolution to the War, which he would undertake in Perſon, and that very Spring (for it was now preſently after Chriſtmas) tranſport his Forces into France. He deſired therefore to underſtand, in what readineſs the Duke of Burgundy had his Army, and where he would appoint the Place for the Engliſh to joyn, and which way ſhould firſt be taken. To which the Ambaſſadors made anſwer, That the Duke had his Forces ſo well prepared, that if the King would nominate a certain Time when he would be at Calis; the Duke would be ſure three Months before to waſte the whole Country belonging to the French, and to have his Men ſo expert, that they ſhould be able to inſtruct the Engliſh, unacquainted with the Place. And as for Tranſportation of his Soldiers they deſired his Majeſty not to trouble himſelf, in regard his Highneſs would provide Boats for that Purpoſe.

The Confederacy againſt France ſhew'd K. Edward.

Then that the King might perceive how faithfully the Duke dealt with him, they ſhowed the Articles agreed upon between the Dukes of Burgundy, Brittain, and the Count St. Paul, to joyn in a War offenſive againſt King Lewis; as likewiſe a Catalogue of the Names of all the great Lords of France, who held ſecret Intelligence with them, and who would revolt from the French King, as ſoon as the Duke's Army took the Field.

Duke of Brittain rejoyced in the Confederacy of K. Edward keeps up his Reſolution to invade France.

With this ſo ſatisfactory Anſwer, the Ambaſſadors returned to the Duke, who in this attained the Ambition of many Years working. For all the Fear which troubled his buſie Mind was, leaſt King Edward won by the Practices of King Lewis, might be induced to ſide with France, or elſe to remain a Neuter. And indeed the laſt he ſuſpected moſt, knowing the Nature of our King ſo prone to Voluptuouſneſs, to which the Noiſe and Trouble of the Wars never gives free Licenſe. He therefore by continual Embaſſies, kept him conſtant to his Reſolution, and with larger Promiſes of Supply, and clearer Appearances of Succeſs, prick'd forward his Ambition to the Enterprize.

King Edward's Ambition to conquer France, and the Engliſh antipathy againſt the French.

But all theſe Arts were Needleſs, for the King was forward to the Quarrel; either out of a brave Emulation of Henry the Fifth his Predeceſſor of the other Line; or out of a Confidence as eaſily to throw King Lewis out of the Throne of France, as he had King Henry out of the Sovereignty of England; or perhaps not to appear backward in an Attempt of Glory, when the Expectation of the Kingdom called upon him to arm. For unleſs ſome Malice rancor'd in the Genius of our Nation againſt the French, the Saxon Government having received a final Overthrow by them, in the Conqueſt of Duke William (though to that great Buſineſs conſpired all the adjacent Countries) it would be our wonder why the Engliſh were never ſparing of their Lives or Treaſure, when any War might be advanced againſt the French; and of this ſo extraordinary Forwardneſs in his People, the King took a great Advantage.

The Reaſon why the Engliſh are always ready to War with the French.

To compact the Body of this Enterprize, Money the Nerves and Sinues of War were wanting. The ordinary Courſe for Supply was by Parliament, and that at this Time was held Difficult if not impoſſible: In regard the King but a little before had diſſolved the Aſſembly, having received for Diſcharge of his Debts a large Contribution; and to urge them to a Second Aid, would probably end in Diſtaſte, if not in Denial. Neither could it appear leſs than extream Exaction, to force the Farmers, who make up the greateſt Number in any Payment, to yield to a Subſidy, conſidering the Precedent Troubles of the Kingdom had utterly impoveriſh'd them by hindering Tillage and all good Husbandry. And for the Nobility who pay a large Share in all general Collections; they for the moſt part prepared themſelves for the Expedition. And it could not but rebate the Edge of their Courages to be at a vaſt Charge not only in the particular ſetting forth of their own Perſons and their Retinue; but in the general Preparations. There was therefore a New Way found out, by former Ages never known without oppreſſing the Commons, to ſupply the King, the Name it bore was a Benevolence, (though many diſproved the Signification of the Word, by their Unwillingneſs to the Gift) and it was cunningly and diſcreetly required only of the better ſort of People, who were known to have a plentiful Revenue, of whom he got a particular Catalogue. And eſpecially of ſuch whom Eaſe and Wealth were likely to detain at Home. Knowing that the heavieſt Burthen might be laid on them without a publick Murmur, as Men hated by the Soldier, and upon whoſe Proſperity ever attends a common Envy.

A. D. 1473. Reg. 13.

K. Edward furniſhes himſelf with Money for this Expedition by a Benevolence and not by Parliament.

K. Edward ſupplies himſelf with Money for the War by a Benevolence

The Way of raiſing the Benevolence.

In advancing this Contribution no Policy was omitted, either by private Menaces, or publick Entreaties. Some came in led by fear (not knowing to what Indignation a Denial might provoke the State) Others were cunningly perſwaded to a vain hope of enjoying the King's particular Favour by their Forwardneſs: Few granted it for Love to the Enterprize; moſt only becauſe their Neighbours did it, and they wanted Courage to diſobey Example. In Hiſtory a Widow is much ſpoke of, who having freely, and ſomewhat above the Proportion of her Eſtate, contributed Twenty Pound, receiv'd from the King a Kiſs. Which his ſo extraordinary Favour (extraordinary to a Widow declin'd in Years) ſo overjoy'd her, that ſhe doubled the Sum, and preſented it to the Collectors. By which ſlight Paſſage, a Judgment is eaſie to be made of the King's Nature; either of it ſelf full of Humanity, or without Difficulty bending to the loweſt Courteſie, when it any Way concern'd the Advancement of his Profit.

A Widow's Generoſity by a Kiſs from the King.

By this Art Monies were raiſed, and now nothing was wanting to the Expedition. The univerſal Language of the Kingdom being of the Wars, and all Exerciſes Military. No Perſon of Blood or Quality, but prepared for the Journey, except only thoſe whom Infancy or extream Age exempted, or the neceſſary Adminiſtration of the Commonwealth. And all they who went, emulated each other in the Glory of their Armour, the Richneſs of their Pavilions, the Bravery of their Horſes Furniture and Servants Apparel. Every Man being held ſo far to recede from Honour, as in his Preparations he expreſſed an Unwillingneſs to the Buſineſs.

The general Preparation for an Expedition with France.

The Army conſiſted of 1500 Men at Arms, 15000 Archers, 8000 common Soldiers, beſide 3000 Pioneers (l) appointed to guard the Ord-

King Edward's Army that invaded France.

(l) And a Thouſand Men belonging to the Train. In all 31500 Men.

nance

A. D. 1473. Reg. 13.

nance and the Carriage. Three Thousand good Soldiers were sent into Brittain, to joyn with his Forces, and assault France on the other Side.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

K. Edward hastes into France.

All Things disposed in so full a Readiness, the King sent over to the Duke of Burgundy, to acquaint him with the State of the Army, and to know in what Forwardness Businesses were on that Side. Who returned Answers full of confident Promises, and Exhortation to the King to make all possible Haste over, the Summer coming on apace; which if past further without Action, would indanger the Loss of the whole Expedition for that Year. He assured him moreover of certain (m) Towns under the Government of the Count St. Paul, which should be surrendred into the King's Hands, for Retreat to the English upon any Occasion of the Badness of Weather or Fortune. And indeed how weak soever the Duke knew the Condition of his Army, yet fearful he was to express it, least the King should take Advantage to give over the Undertaking. The King's Nature being known diseased so much with the Love of Peace, that the Duke was justly Suspicious how sound soever it appeared for the Present, it might upon the least Distemper fall into a Relapse.

Some Towns to be surrendred to K. Edward.

Upon these Assurances from the Duke, the King gave Order that all his Forces should repair to London: Whence after some few Months spent in Preparations, he march'd towards Dover. But before he took Shipping, that the Progress of the War might be the more Successful, the Beginning was made according to the Old Heroick Strain of Bravery. For the King sent Garter an Herald over with a Letter of Defiance to Lewis of France; in which he was requir'd to surrender up to the King of England, the Realm of France, as due to him by the Laws of Inheritance, and violently wrested away from Henry the Sixth, by Charles the Seventh, and as unjustly possessed by Lewis: By which voluntary Resignation of the Crown, it was shew'd how without Effusion of Blood, the King of England should be enabled to restore the Clergy and Nobility to their ancient Greatness and Priviledges, and the Commons to their Liberty: Of which they had all been so cruelly depriv'd by the injurious Usurpation and tyrannical Government of Charles and Lewis. It showed likewise how far the Kingdom of France in general, would by this receive Benefit, considering it would be eased of all those many and unsupportable Exactions, which by those covetous Princes, had been laid upon it. It concluded with a threatning of all the Mischiefs which accompany War, and an absolute Despair of all future Mercy, or Care to be had of Lewis's Provision; If upon so fair an Admonishment, and Summons given, he refused to yield the Kingdom.

A Letter of Defiance sent by an Herald to K. Lewis.

This Letter saith Comines (an Author of that Time, happy in writing many cunning Particulars of the Princes he serv'd, but rude in the Art of History, and ever blemishing the Glory of our Nation) was penn'd so elegantly both for Language and Matter, that he believ'd it was beyond the Abilities of an English Wit; a bold and ridiculous Censure. For how could he who was born no Native of France, and never had been instructed in any Learning, judge of Language? Or how of the witty Contrivance of the Letter, since in his own History, which is receiv'd by the World with so universal an Applause, there is an apparent Defect in Order and Method? And without Vanity our Nation may assume to it self the Praise, (considering the narrow Limits of the Island,) to have produced as many Scholars admirable in all Degrees of Knowledge, as any Country on this side the Alpes. Neither was that Age (though according to the Necessity of the Time, more expert in Arms than Arts) without Excellent Wits famed for Literature. But this Digression the Reader must pardon; a Sense of our Nation's Honour thrust my Pen out of the Way, if this be from the Purpose.

Phil. Comines's Censures of the Letter confuted, and a Judgment of his History.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

Habington condemns Comines unjustly.

Whatsoever the Letter was in the Composure, it was such in the Substance, that it discomposed King Lewis, and troubled all his Imaginations. He read it softly and fearfully; which was beneath that part of Understanding he was most Master of, even Policy it self. For it could not but beget strange Interpretations in the Court, when the Message of an Enemy deliver'd publickly by Letter should be kept concealed. The Demand must probably be easily conjectured, and this silent Way of answering could not but procure Suspicion, that his Resolution might descend to yield more than became a Prince. But in the Manage of this, as in all other Businesses, King Lewis delighted to give Order alone, and show his Authority Independant of any Council, without perplexing himself at all to satisfie Opinion.

K. Lewis's Disturbance at the Letter.

Having read the Letter he withdrew himself into a Wardrobe, and commanded the Herald to be brought to his Presence. To whom he in answer to the Letter said, That he knew the King his Master had not resolv'd upon this Enterprize, out of his own Disposition; but overcome by the Sollicitation of his People, and the Perswasion of the Duke of Burgundy, and the Count St. Paul. His People infatuated with a vain Presumption of Victory, because heretofore the Success of their Wars in France had been fortunate, never considering the Disparity of the State of Things, or the Uncertainty of Events, especially where Fury and Fortune, two blind Powers, bear the whole Sway. The Duke of Burgundy, (loving War for it self, and having rashly engag'd himself into many Quarrels) out of Desire to draw the King of England into his Dangers, or at least at another's Cost, to beat the bargain of Peace to a lower Rate. The Reason why he had so labour'd King Edward to take Arms, and revive an absolute Title to the Kingdom of France, being only for his own Preservation which was threatned by all his injured Neighbours, or else as it is reported of People, diseased of the Plague, in Envy to the Health of other Nations desirous to infect even his neerest Allies with the Contagion of his Quarrel. As for the Count St. Paul, who had ever subsisted by Dissimulation, and causing Division between Princes, whereby his Assistance either for the Prosecution of the War, or Conclusion of Peace might be required as Necessary: All his Hopes in this Quarrel were only to fish in troubled Waters, and by an universal Combustion to raise himself into Authority, in regard Peace levelled him with inferior Lords, and made his Service of no Use.

K. Lewis discourses with the Herald, and desires of Peace with the English.

King Lewis proceeded to tell him in how miserable a Condition the Burgundian Army was, having been broken at the Siege of Nuz (a desperate and mad Undertaking) and being now return'd Home, the Soldier destroy'd either by the Sword or Famine; and that small

The Weakness of the D. of Burgundy discovered to the Herald.

(m) St. Quintine and others.

Number

A. D. 1474 Reg. 14.

Number which escaped, so wretched that the Duke might well expect Protection from the King, but could no way be of Power to advance his Purpose. He added how the Season of the Year, Summer being almost past, must of Necessity deter the King from crossing the Sea, and many other Arguments against the present Undertaking; as if the Herald being perswaded to Quiet by Oratory, France might have been reprieved from War for that Year. And to make him the more his Friend, he gave him with his own Hand three hundred Crowns, with Promise of a Thousand more, if the Peace, so much desired by him, took effect.

The Herald promises to promote a Peace with K. Edward.

The Herald, overcome much by his Perswasions, but much more by his Money, reply'd, 'That no Pains on his Part should be omitted, 'that might tend to the Service of his Majesty's 'Intentions; and that he, as far as his Observation upon the King's Nature could reach, 'imagined no great Difficulty to bring his 'Master to a fair Agreement; but that, as yet, 'the Motion would be most unseasonable, considering, that after so vast a Charge in levying 'of an Army, and so universal an Applause to 'the Design, his Majesty could not retire, until, at least, he had led his Forces into France 'and made some Appearance of intending what 'so constantly he had pretended. He desired him therefore to let his Army pass over to Callis, and thither to send his Herald to desire a safe Conduct for his Ambassadors, with Order to make Addresses to the Lords Stanley and Howard, and himself; and that the Way should be prepared so plain for King Lewis his Purpose, that there should be no Impediment at the worst to a fair Respect, if not to a full Satisfaction of his Desires.

The English Herald sent away.

All this Discourse past in Private: In Publick there was Caution, by the King's strict Command given, That no French Man should have any Communication with him; and as soon as possible he was dismissed with many fair Words, and thirty Ells of Crimson Velvet for Reward. The King after his Departure, expressing in his Look and Carriage, much Cheerfulness and Courage, either comforted by the faint Hopes our Herald gave him, or else cunningly dissembling his Fears.

K. Lewis's impolitick Management in Treating so with the Herald.

The Order of this Discourse between them, is delivered to us as a high Reach of Policy in King Lewis. But to an indifferent Understanding it appears nothing but the ordinary Wit of Cowardize; and certainly how covetous soever the Necessity of his Occasions made him to buy Peace, yet his manner of Traffick at this Time was beneath the Spirit of a Prince. For although his Largess to the Herald wrought the wish'd Effect, yet he might have been deceiv'd by him, and by his so earnest Desire to avert the present War, have endanger'd to bring it much more fierce upon him. Neither could it be imagined common Discretion to impart his Fears to an Enemy, who might perhaps betray them to the Scorn of the English Army, or to negotiate Peace with a Herald (though a Person of much Worth and Understanding) yet commonly a Stranger to the Knowledge of the more inward Resolutions of State, but the Management of this Business thus, took a good Effect, and that concurring in a Prince, whose other Actions were politickly order'd, made it have so happy a Censure.

Upon return of the Herald, the King embark'd for Callis, and after him follow'd his Army, which was transported in certain flat bottom'd Boats of Holland and Zeland, by them usually called Scuts (n), lent as before covenanted by the Duke of Burgundy. And notwithstanding the Commodiousness of the Vessels and Multitude, being Five Hundred in all, three Weeks were they in their Passage, among all the Forces there not being one Page. Which as it instructs us in the vast Numbers of the Soldiers, so doth it in the Strength and Power, in regard they were all able Men, who undertook this Enterprize, and who came not to learn but to make Proof of their Knowledge in Arms.

A. D. 1474 Reg. 14.

K. Edward passes over to Callis with his Army.

As soon as he heard they were certainly ashore, the Duke in all Haste came to congratulate the King's safe landing, and happy Arrival of the Army; for there was just Ground for fear that the French Navy might have endeavour'd to trouble their Passage: But the Duke coming with a very small Train, much afflicted the Expectation of the English, who thought to have seen him march to meet them with 2500 Men at Arms well appointed (o), beside a large Power of Horse and Foot; as by his Embassadors and his own Articles had so amply and frequently been promised: But to take away this Suspicion from them for fear it might any way drive back their thoughts toward England; he told them, That his so private comming to the King was only to express his Joy for the King's Safety and theirs, and that his Army was further in the Country so well prepared for the present Design, that they should have no Reason to think him any way to have boasted. He therefore invited them to march up into the Land, where they might be better accommodated, and conducted the King to Bullen; a Town which having been heretofore morgaged by the French, to Philip Duke of Burgundy, with a large Part of Picardy; was notwithstanding the often tender of the Money by Lewis still detained violently by Duke Charles. There he gave the English a free Entertainment, and still kept their Expectation high. From thence he went with them to Peron, another Town of Picardy kept upon the same Terms. Into which he admitted but few of the better Sort of the English, and over those too he carried a watchful Eye: The Army forced to lodge in the Field, which was the less Inconvenient in regard of the Season of the Year, and the Commodiousness of Pavilions and Tents, with which they were so plentifully furnish'd. The Duke perhaps loath to trust the Army in Possession of so important a Place least their Expectation being disappointed they might attempt to give him some Trouble. To Peron the Count St. Paul sent to congratulate the King's Arrival in France, to promise all Service to his Enterprize, and his Towns to his Use and Command. Whereupon the King removed to St. Quintin, over which St. Paul commanded, there to accommodate his Army, till the Duke's Forces were in Readiness to take the Field. But as some over-hasty Troops having got the Start of the Army came confidently toward the Gates, expecting to be receiv'd, if not with Triumph, at least with all the Demonstrations of Joy; the Artillery from the Town shot against them, and some of the Garrison issued forth to skirmish, in which Two or Three of the English perish'd. This

Duke of Burgundy comes with a small Retinue to congratulate K. Edward's Arrival, which dis-contented him.

The English Army disgusted at the Duke of Burgundy's and Count St. Paul's Behaviour to them.

(n) Five Hundred Flat-bottom'd Boats.
The King landed at Callis the 4th of June.

(o) The Duke of Burgundy was to have joyn'd K. Edward with 4000 Horse and 9000 Foot. His Forces were then besieging Nuis in the Electorate of Cologne.

Apperance

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

Appearance of Hoſtility from a Confederate, confirmed the former Jealouſie of the Army, and raiſed a ſtrange Murmur both againſt St. Paul, and the Duke, which was increaſed by the Difficulties of a tempeſtuous Night, with which the Engliſh after were troubled: For an extraordinary Rain fell, and made the ſo open Lodging very unpleaſing, with Danger of Diſeaſes to the Army.

Duke of Burgundy not able to ſatisfie the Suſpicion of the Engliſh.

The Duke of Burgundy oppoſed againſt this Diſcontent with his Authority, but in vain: For not able to give Satisfaction for his own Weakneſs and Breach of Promiſe, he was more diſabled to clear Suſpicion from another. Whereupon he took his leave of the King, intreating his and the Armies Patience for a while, till he brought his Forces to join with them, and a full Account from the Count St. Paul, of his Garriſon's Demeanure at St. Quintin.

But this his Departure compared with the former Carriage of Things, begot yet a ſtronger Doubt of their Intentions in the Engliſh, who being Strangers in that Place, and not having any particular Aim in Conduct of the Buſineſs, but only a general Reſolution to regain France, interpreted theſe Delays and falſe Play to direct Treaſon. And began openly to inveigh againſt their own Folly in confiding on the Promiſes of ſuch, who indeavour'd not the Glory of the Engliſh Name, or the King's Title, but only their own Safety: For Preſervation of which, under a ſpecious Pretext of recovering a Kingdom, they had ſeduced them into a ſtrange Country, in hope hereafter to ſell them to the French. And altho' this Diſcourſe were only in the Mouth of the common Soldier; yet did the Thoughts of the Commanders participate with the Vulgar, tho' not ſo freely opened. For hitherto there had been no Aſſurance given of any real Intention either in Burgundy or St. Paul.

The Engliſh Complaints of the Duke of Brittain's Treachery.

Their Diſcontents defended.

The much Indignation expreſſed by the Engliſh upon this Occaſion was thought a ſtrange kind of rude Ignorance, and a Note even of Barbariſm. Which Cenſure favours too much of Malice, conſidering it could not be judged blind Preſumption that induced our Nation to this Undertaking; the State, for it, having the faireſt Apperance of Human Reaſon, and the Religion of the ſtrongeſt Oaths. And if the unexpected Treachery of St. Paul ingendred Choler; why ſhould this Paſſion be ſo Contemptible, ſince an Injury from a Friend is ever quicker and ſharper to the Senſe; and all Nations remov'd from their own Seats upon dangerous Adventures, are prone to Suſpicion. And for Ignorance in Art of War, I ſee not how by Malice it ſelf it can be obtruded upon the Engliſh, ſince their only Miſery was too much Experience in Arms, which ever begets Knowledge. Neither could they be but Skilful even in the Military Exerciſe of the French, few of the Soldiery who were now of any Age, but their Youth had been bred up and inſtructed under the Command of that great Captain Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury and others: Not full twenty Years expired, ſince we turn'd our Swords upon our ſelves, and gave France Liberty to recover Breath.

K. Lewis ſends an Herald to propound a Peace with the Engliſh.

But this Dilatory Way in the Duke, and Treachery in the Count, prepared the Army to a good Thought of Peace; and brought the two Confederates, into more Hatred than an open Enemy: So that when an Herald came from K. Lewis, he was receiv'd into the Engliſh Camp with much Humanity; and friendly invited by the Soldier, to refreſh himſelf with Wine and Meat, till the King, who was then at Dinner, was at Leiſure to give him Audience. For Lewis, following the Inſtructions of our Herald, as ſoon as he underſtood King Edward was landed, and had heard likewiſe of ſome Diſguſts, appearing between him and the Duke; reſolv'd to ſend to him, and attempt to perſwade him to a Peace: But ſo poor was he in the outward Ceremonies of Majeſty, that no Herald attended on his Camp; whereupon he was enforced to ſuborn a Fellow, a Servant of one Monſieur de Hale, of whoſe Wit and Confidence he had taken ſome Notice, to act the Part. Who having received full Inſtructions from his Maſter, addreſſed himſelf to the Lords Stanley and Howard, and the Engliſh Herald, by whoſe Aid being brought to the King, he handſomly delivered his Meſſage. The Effect of which was, To ſhow the great Deſire the King his Maſter had to live in perfect Amity with all neighbouring Princes, but above all with his Majeſty of England, as the King, who in the Extent of Empire, and his own Proweſs was moſt Conſiderable; That he had much Reaſon to believe the preſent War had not received the firſt Life in England, eſpecially not in the Diſpoſition of the King; which (as he was inform'd) abhorr'd the unneceſſary drawing of Chriſtian Blood; That they who had firſt hatch'd this Quarrel, did it only with their Neighbour's Danger to procure their own Safety, and when they had made an advantagious Peace, to conſpire with him, who before had been the common Enemy, for beating back their beſt Friend the Engliſh; That he doubted not but that his Majeſty would ſuddenly find good Ground for Suſpicion, when he ſhould perceive the Duke of Burgundy, not able to bring into the Field one entire Regiment; all his Forces having been utterly broken upon deſperate Services, to which an innate Love to War had madly engag'd him. Then he proceeded to excuſe his Maſter's ſuccouring the Faction of Lancaſter: To which he proteſted he never gave Aſſiſtance for it ſelf, but only for the Earl of Warwick's Sake, whom he ſupported only to affront Burgundy, whoſe irreconcilable Enemy Warwick had ever profeſſed himſelf. And if he had inclined more to favour King Henry, he might well excuſe it, in reſpect of his near Kindred to him and his Wife Q. Margaret, and ſomething too in Reaſon of State, to oppoſe Burgundy who pretended to be a Friend (how falſe ſoever he prov'd) to the Houſe of York. That if his Majeſty would be pleaſed to ſearch up to the very Head of this Buſineſs, he ſhall find more Streams of Aſſiſtance to have flowed from Burgundy than from France to K. Henry; Duke Philip and this Duke (till his Marriage with the Princeſs Margaret) having moſt paſſionately laboured the Supportation of that Family, to which they were ſo near in Kindred. The Concluſion was to deſire his Majeſty to grant a ſafe Conduct for two Horſe, in whoſe Company ſhould come Embaſſadors enabled with larger Inſtructions, and who ſhould make Propoſal of ſuch Conditions, as could not be rejected by the King or Kingdom of England, ſince they ſhould be for the Honour and Profit of both; unleſs it would better ſtand with his Majeſty's Liking to aſſign a Place of Treaty in ſome Village between both Armies, to which they might joyntly ſend Commiſſioners.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

The French Herald's Speech to deſire a Treaty.

French King's Reaſons for aſſiſting the Lancaſtrians.

Duke of Burgundy aſſiſted the Lancaſtrians.

This Meſſage deliver'd in a ſoft Tone, expreſſing much Humility, and ever aſcribing to the King's Greatneſs of Spirit and the Nation's Glory; together with a Promiſe to make Overture of Conditions both Honourable and Profitable, begot a favourable Audience. And many

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

K. Edward and his Nobles agree to a Treaty of Peace.

many of the great Lords, who had plentiful Revenues at Home, were as forward as the King to liſten to Peace, and forſake unneceſſary Dangers Abroad. Neither did the greateſt Statiſts diſlike a Treaty, conſidering that all our Wars in France had rather purchaſed Fame than Treaſure to our Kingdom, and when our Soldiers returned Home, their Scars were greater than their Spoils. And howſoever we had by Starts and Fits got Poſſeſſion of the largeſt Territories in France, yet ſtill we retired back again; as if the Divine Providence had decreed to have our Empire bounded within our Seas. Moreover they who affected the Happineſs of a Kingdom and loved their own Country, deſir'd rather France under a Foreign Governour, leaſt if in Poſſeſſion of our King, England being the leſs, both in Extent and Fertility, might be reduced to the Condition of a Province, and live in Obedience to a Deputy, enriching the greater Kingdom with her Tribute. Other Conſiderations likewiſe of the preſent State of the Wars, prevail'd to give leave for a Treaty; Whereupon with Reward of 100 Angels in a Gilt Cup, the Herald was diſmiſſed, a Safe-Conduct granted, and the Place for the Commiſſioners appointed in a Village near Amiens, the Armies to abide at Four Miles Diſtance on each Side: For the King were nominated, the Lord Howard, Sir Anthony St. Leger, and Dr. Morton; for the French, the Baſtard of Burbon, Admiral of France, the Lord St. Peire, and the Biſhop of Eureux.

The Place, and Commiſſioners appointed for it.

Peace agreed between K. Edward, and the King of France upon a Payment of certain Sums.

Theſe Men at the firſt Meeting brought almoſt the Treaty to a Concluſion, for on both Sides they brought Minds diſpoſed to Peace. And altho' the Engliſh Commiſſioners at firſt demanded the Crown of France as due to the King by Right, from which in Honour he could not recede; and afterward with much Appearance of Difficulty condeſcended to be content with Normandy and Guien, yet they themſelves knew well Princes never uſed to part with Countries upon Treaty, before the Battle hath impoſed a Neceſſity to yield. And indeed the Engliſh expected not that Lewis would be frighted out of ſo important Limbs of the Body of France, only upon the braving of an Enemy. Soon this firſt Flouriſh of Buſineſſes came to more eaſie Terms. Edward deſir'd to be gone without Loſs of Honour, Lewis to have him gone with as much Reputation as he deſir'd. Edward had occaſion for Money, and Lewis was willing to make him a Bridge of Gold from Callis to Dover, whereon to carry back his Army. And ſhortly to both their Contents an abſolute Agreement was made, whereby 75000 Crowns were to be paid to K. Edward before his Departure out of France, and 50000 annually.

King of France paid King Edward a Tribute.

Concerning the Annuity of 50000 Crowns, there is much Controverſie among French and Engliſh Writers about the Name. They call it a Penſion, we a Tribute. And certainly the later (to ſpeak without Partiality to our ſelves) hath in it much more Propriety of Language. For a Prince who over-awed by a powerful Army mediates by ſubmiſſive Meſſages to divert the Battle, and afterward buys his Safety not only with a preſent Sum, but an annual Payment cannot have a freer Name than Tributary. And as for Penſions they are granted upon Petition to the Poor and Weaker, not upon Fear to the Mightier. But to compare the greater Actions of Princes to the Cuſtoms of Subjects: The 75000 Crowns (p) was the Fine K. Lewis paid for France, and the 50000 annually the Rent: Only the Farm was too mighty to be ſet, and the Tenant too ſtrong and ſtubborn ever to quit Poſſeſſion to his Land-lord.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

The Princeſs Elizabeth affianced to the Dauphin.

Then for Eſtabliſhment of Future Peace (that Poſterity might Partake in the Benefit of this Agreement) it was concluded that the Princeſs Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter to K. Edward, ſhould marry with Charles the Dauphin, Son to Lewis; and for her preſent Maintenance (q) 5000 Crowns from France ſhould be paid in the Tower of London; and after the Expiration of Nine Years, ſhe and the Dauphin to be inveſted in the Dutchy of Guyen. And that on the Engliſh Side there might be no Fraud; upon Payment of the firſt Sum the Lord Howard and Sir John Cheinie, Maſter of the Horſe, were to remain Hoſtages until the Army were returned into England. But that the King might not ſeem to forget his Confederates, the Duke of Burgundy and Brittaine were comprehended if they would accept the Peace. The Count St. Paul was abandon'd in this Treaty, as a menial Servant and Subject to the Crown, being Conſtable of France; and who by his Diſſimulation and Treaſon, had moſt offended the Nature of our King. And uſually thus to reconcile great Princes, leſſer are offer'd up for Sacrifice.

The Army pleaſed, but the Duke of Glouceſter angry at the Peace.

This Peace was generally received by the Army with Applauſe, as by People who began to conſider no Victory before the Battle certain, and in the Battle much Hazard. Only the Duke of Glouceſter, who ſtood aloof off on the other Side, for Honour frown'd at this Accord, and expreſſed much Sorrow, as compaſſionating the Glory of his Nation blemiſh'd in it. He repeated his Jealouſie of the World's Opinion, which neceſſarily muſt laugh at ſo chargeable a Preparation to attempt nothing; and ſcorn either the Wiſdom or Courage of the Engliſh, when they ſhall perceive them in ſo full Numbers, and ſo well arm'd to paſs the Sea, after a Defiance ſent, and challenge to a Crown, to return back without drawing a Sword: Moreover to forſake the Amity of ſo conſtant Friends, and in extream Neceſſity to betray them who were beguiled by a common Diſſembler; whoſe Shifts and Tricks of State, like the Slights of Hand in Jugglers, are diſcovered, and wondred at by thoſe Fools only, whom he Cozens. And what carried with it an Appearance of moſt Danger, to neceſſitate the Duke of Burgundy to a Peace with K. Lewis, whereby both may hereafter join in a common League againſt us: Who by this one Act have forfeited all Leagues with our ancient Confederates, and frighted any other Princes from joyning with us.

Glouceſter, and his Faction's Aim in diſliking the Peace.

With Glouceſter agreed many of the Army, who were either Dependant upon him, or who had as unquiet Thoughts as he; ſome likewiſe, who having ſet up the Reſt of all their Fortunes upon this Gain, found themſelves undone in their Hopes, becauſe the Princes had drawn Stakes. But moſt of a diſcontented Humour, that maliciouſly always interprets the Actions of Princes to the worſt Senſe. But the Duke of Glouceſter had a further and more dangerous Aim; as who by the Diſhonour of his Brother, thought his Credit receiv'd increaſe, and by how much the King ſunk in Opinion, he ſhould riſe. And in regard good and quiet Men were delighted in the Accord he would be numbred with the Wicked, and unquiet, to add a luſter to his Faction by drawing the Nation's Honour to his Part.

(p) He receiv'd but 72000. Phil. de Com.
(q) It ſhould be 50000 Crowns. Phil. de Com.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

This Peace no dishonour to the Engliſh, as was reported.

But why this Peace ſhould endure ſo hard a Cenſure, both at Home and Abroad is ſtrange, and above all why K. Lewis ſhould aſcribe any Honour to himſelf, or think the Advantage on his Side. For what Eclipſe ſoever the Engliſh Glory ſuffered, certainly the French by a moſt ſervile Way purchaſed Safety. They deſcending beneath the Honour of Men by Money to wave a Battle; we being only Faulty in not having perform'd more than Men. For if we conſider our ſelves ſubject to the Chance of War, why was not an honourable Peace to be preferred? Eſpecially ſince if we had fail'd in the Succeſs, how wretchedly had our Forces been broken in their Hopes, and how impoſſible on the ſudden to re-inforce the Army? And if the French had declin'd the Battle into what Neceſſities had we faln, the Summer almoſt paſt, and both Burgundy and St. Paul refuſing to let us have Towns to Winter our Men? And if we look upon the Peace it ſelf, nothing is in it diſadvantagious to our Honour or Profit. Conſidering it brought not only a great preſent Sum and annual Revenue, but brought it from the then greateſt Prince in Chriſtendom enforced by Fear. And for Convenience, the Marriage of the King's Daughter to the Dauphin, could not but be eſteem'd of main Conſequence. Why then won that Apothegm ſo much Reputation, that reported our King to have gain'd Nine Battles in which he perſonally fought, and never to have loſt any but this? Since in this he overcame a Prince of far greater Power than he ever fought with before, with no Diſadvantage, but that the Victory was purchaſed without Blood, which ſhould be eſteem'd an Addition to the Glory of it. And if you caſt your Eye back upon the Courſe held in the moſt famed Empire, and eſpecially in the Roman, which was the nobleſt, you ſhall find they never refuſed their Friendſhip to any Prince who humbly (as Lewis of France did to King Edward) requeſted it; and accounted it more Glory to have Kings their Tributaries, than their Kingdoms Farm'd out for a more profitable Revenue. But of this enough, and but enough, ſince it tends ſo much to the Vindication of the Engliſh Honour; which the French vaunted ſo much to have ſuffered in this Treaty. In which they think us by their Wits miſerably over-reach'd, and perhaps indeed we were, if the Articles be only judged by their Fears, and not by the Difficulties of our Army at that Time, and the juſt Jealouſie of the King that his Confederates intended not his but their own Advantage.

The pretended Advantages of the Peace.

Duke of Burgundy in Diſcontent at the Peace, comes poſt to K. Edward, and upbraides him for his Sloath and Cowardize.

The News of this Peace no ſooner came to the Court of the Duke of Burgundy, but in all haſte he poſted to the Engliſh Camp, attended only by 16 Horſe. The Diſtraction of his Look and Geſture expreſſed the Wildneſs of his Thoughts; ſo that the whole Army diſcover'd his Diſcontent before he utter'd it. His firſt Addreſs to the King was, in Queſtion of the Truth of the common Report that ſpoke a Peace concluded between him and K. Lewis? Which when he was reſolv'd was true, he preſently broke into a moſt paſſionate fierce Language, upbraiding the King with Inglorious Sloath; and the indefatigable Courage of former Kings of England; upon whoſe Attempts waited ever the nobleſt Victory. He made a ſcornful Repetition of the Mirth his Enemies would make at his Return; as if he had come over with ſo huge an Army, Merchant like to traffick for a little Money; and the Contempt he muſt needs become to his own People, when they ſhould preceive the great Conqueſts their Contributions have brought Home. And when it was intimated to him, that he and the Duke of Brittaine were included in the Peace; he diſdainfully rejected it, proteſting that for the Love he bore the Engliſh Name, not Care of his own Safety, he had perſwaded K. Edward to this Enterprize. And to ſhow how little Dependancy his Fortune held on any other, and how without Mediation of an Allie, he was able to make his own Peace; he vowed to conclude none with France, until the Engliſh Army had been Three Months at Home. After he had thrown forth theſe diſorder'd Speeches, in much Diſcontent he left the King: Who wonder'd to hear himſelf ſo diſdainfully intreated; having ſeldom been accuſtom'd to any Language, but what was poliſh'd to delight by Flattery. But they who miſliked the Peace, commended the Spirit of the Duke, being overjoy'd to hear their unquiet Thoughts, which Fear reſtrain'd from Utterance, ſo freely ſpoken; yet they had little Cauſe to Triumph when Edward had reply'd with equal Boldneſs, That 'twas his own Falſehood, and not his Cowardize that had diſpoſed his Mind to a Peace: for had he met Actions ſuitable to his Brags, he had never comply'd; but he could not fight in their Cauſe, who had not Heart enough to defend themſelves, and therefore choſe to ſide with a fair Enemy, rather than a treacherous and falſe Friend (r).

Count St. Paul's bad Condition.

But the Count St. Paul, aſcertain'd of this Peace, was ſeiz'd upon by a far other Paſſion. For by diſſembling with theſe three Princes, in hopes to win Love and Reputation with the more Fortunate; he had offended them all, ſo far, that he knew not to which confidently to fly for Refuge. France was irreconcilable, becauſe he had been ever practiſing againſt the Quiet and Safety of that State; and who both by the Ties of Alliance (as having marry'd the Siſter of K. Lewis's Wife) and Loyalty, as who held much Land in France, and executed the Place of Conſtable; being oblig'd to ſeek the Preſervation of his Country; had for many Years nouriſh'd Treaſon, and ſometimes brought the Crown it ſelf to the Hazard. Then from England or Burgundy, there was no Probability of Friendſhip, both having been deluded by his Promiſes, and in the laſt Buſineſs at St. Quintin provok'd to the higheſt Indignation. For altho' the Engliſh only ſuſtain'd the Loſs in point of Safety, in the preſent Expedition; yet in point of Honour, the Duke had his Share in Suffering: He having before the King's Paſſage out of England, covenanted for the Faith of the Count St. Paul. But certainly the Miſery of a petty Prince is lamentable, and his Eſtate moſt unſafe, when there is any Jealouſie growing between his more potent Neighbours. For Neutrality is incompatible with his Fortune, in regard his Country ſhall then lie open to the Spoil of every Army, if he deny to declare himſelf; and if he declare himſelf, he muſt run the Hazard of anothers Fortune. And oftentimes the very Situation of his Principality enforceth him to take part, not with the Stronger or Juſter; but with the nearer neighbouring, as in Danger of whoſe Rage his Eſtate is moſt ſubject. But in Addition to the Miſery of his Fortune, St. Paul had the unquietneſs of Mind, raiſed up into a high Ambition, by the cunning of Wit. For he had ſo many, and ſo far Fetches in his Imaginations, and of them ſome had proſper'd ſo

The bad Eſtate of Petty Princes.

St. Paul's deep Politicks.

(r) His Words were, better have Peace with an old Enemy, than the Promiſes and Familiarity of a new Diſſembling Friend.

much

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

much to his Advantage; that it made him Pre sumptuous of his Abilities to diſſemble, and therefore continue in it, till at laſt the Diſcovery took away all Belief from his after Pretenſions, and happily too from his real Intentions. But among the greateſt of his Misfortunes, is to be reckon'd, the Time he lived in: For had he not met with ſo Politick a Prince as Lewis of France, who had likewiſe the Start of him in good Luck, he queſtionleſs might have attained ſome one of thoſe many Deſigns, he ſo wittily and probably contriv'd. But in the Conduct of their Affairs, Princes ſhall find a diſcreet Honeſty not only toward God, but even to the depraved World, the ſafeſt Rule of human Actions. For the abſolute Diſſolution of a State was never known to happen by Obſervance of Faith or Religion; and ſeldom in the Time of a good Prince, I mean if his Goodneſs were active, not over-ruled by evil Counſel to Miſgovernment.

St. Paul addreſſes to King Edward.

St Paul in this Diſtraction of Thoughts endeavour'd to recover a Game quite loſt, and made his Addreſſes to the King of England, whom he believed to be of the eaſieſt Nature, and from whom he expected leſs Severity, becauſe the King had ſuffer'd leſs than the others by his Diſſimulation. He therefore firſt excuſed the Diſtaſt given the Engliſh at St. Quintin, caſting the whole Fault upon the unhappy Raſhneſs of his Soldiers billeted in the Town, and the Jealouſie of the Townſmen: Then he adviſed him to be wary of giving too much Faith to K. Lewis, who was reſolved after the Departure of the Engliſh Army to obſerve no Covenant; wherefore his ſafeſt Courſe would be to demand Eu and St. Valerie to billet his Soldiers in this Winter, which he was ſecure Lewis's Fears durſt not deny, and by which Grant he would not be neceſſitated to ſo ſudden a Return. Laſtly, (obſerving the Avarice of the King's Diſpoſition in the laſt Treaty) he tender'd him the Loan of 50000 Crowns, and promiſe of all faithful Service in the Future.

K. Edward rejects Count St. Paul's Offers,

But the Memory of former unfaithful Paſſages, and deſire to enjoy the Pleaſures of Peace, made the King ſo far Deaf to theſe new Propoſitions; that it ended even in ſcornful Language of the Offerer, which drove St. Paul into utter Deſpair. For the King was not to be remov'd from his new-begun Amity with Lewis, which every Day by the Interchange of Favours, and by labouring to excel each other in Confidence, gather'd increaſe. For preſently upon Concluſion of the Articles between the Commiſſioners, a Truce being made, until the Peace were ratified by the Oaths of both the Princes; the Engliſh Soldiers had free Admiſſion into all the French Towns. And one Day ſo great Number of the Army went to make merry in Amiens, as might have endanger'd the Surpriſal if there had not been faithful Intentions in K. Edward. But he to ſhew the Integrity of his Mind, and to take away all Occaſion of Jealouſie of any underhand Deſign, ſent to K. Lewis to intreat him to give Order for Reſtraint, if by entering in ſo large Multitudes the Soldiers endanger'd Suſpicion; which Lewis (never overcome in Complement) refuſed with many Proteſtations of his Confidence; only deſiring our King, if he diſliked the Abſence of ſo conſiderable a Part of his Army from the Camp, to ſend ſome Yeomen of his Crown to guard the Gates, in regard he was reſolv'd no French Man ſhould ſtop the Paſſage of the Engliſh. But our King ſtrain'd his Courteſie much too high, when to out-vy King Lewis's Favours, he offer'd to give him a Catalogue of all the French Noblemen, who had conſpired with St. Paul in this War, and had given Faith to Revolt to the Engliſh. For as in the Rule of common Juſtice, this Diſcovery could give no better an Attribute to the King than that of State-Informer; ſo could it not but infinitely prejudice the Affairs of England; conſidering it would ſhut up for ever the Paſſage to all Intelligence, if this Peace ſhould chance to break hereafter. And indeed by ſo voluntary undertaking that Office, which an honeſt Mind thinks it ſelf unhappy to be forced to, preſents his Nature to us moſt ignoble; ſince this Treaſon was only Intentional, and as the State of Buſineſſes now ſtood in France, reconciled to the Engliſh, it no way concern'd the Safety of his new Confederate.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

King Edward's overfondneſs of King Lewis, and Treachery towards the French Noblemen.

K. Lewis's Kindneſs and Fidelity to the Engliſh.

On the other Side K. Lewis ſhow'd himſelf moſt affectionate to the Engliſh, when, contrary to the Circumſpection of his Nature, he rejected all the Suſpicions of his Council, who wiſh'd him to be watchful that K. Edward by pretending this Peace, did not betray him to a ruinous Security: When likewiſe he ſent ſuch exceeding Plenty of all Proviſion to the Engliſh Camp, and liberally feaſted thoſe ſo innumerable Multitudes, who daily reſorted to Amiens. But perhaps ſome State-Criticks will interpret the Former in him, not a good Opinion of our Faith; but a Conceit of a dull ignorant Honeſty in our Nation not quick to take Advantages; and the latter only an obſequious Way to continue us in our former Reſolution for Peace. What ever Paſſion prevail'd with him in other Courteſies, I am confident he expreſſed more Nobleneſs than in any other Action of his Life; When he refuſed to deſtroy the Engliſh Army, having oftentimes ſo fair Opportunity, by reaſon of the many Diſorders the Truce begot.

An Interview of K. Edward and King Lewis at Picquigny.

While theſe Paſſages of Endearment laſted between the Two Kings, a Place convenient for an Interview was found out at Picquigny, a Town three Leagues from Amiens, ſtanding upon the River Some, and Commiſſioners were ſent to provide there ſhould be no Danger of Treaſon in the Place, for the King were the Lord Howard, and Sir Anthony St. Leger; for the French, the Lord of Beuchage and Comines. In the Choice of which Place Comines lays a groſs over-ſight to our Commiſſioners. For he affirms by reaſon of a Marſh on both Sides the Cauſey, on which the King was to come to the Bridge where the Meeting was; his Perſon might have been in Danger, if the French had not meant good Faith. And if this were true, it certainly deſerv'd a Signal Reprehenſion; in regard the ſad Experience of thoſe Times taught, there could not be too much Circumſpection at ſuch an Interview: But the Succeſs guilty of no infelicity; clear'd the Commiſſioners either from the Fault, or from much of the Blame.

The Courteouſneſs of the two Kings to each other at their Meeting.

At the Meeting there was as much interchange of Courteſie, as could be between two Princes. The French King was firſt at the Grate (for theſe two Lions could not without Danger of Combat meet but at ſo ſafe a Diſtance) and our King was a Gallant in the Management of his Body, (1), by bending himſelf lower at Salutation: In which he expreſſed Youthfulneſs and Courtſhip. In their Language was much of Sweetneſs and endearing, and in their Behaviour an Appearance of Congratulatory Joy.

(1) Philip de Comines ſays this Interview was on the 29th of Auguſt, 1475. but that could not be, for K. Edward landed at Calais in June 1474, and return'd in September following. The Peace according to the ſame Author being made three Months after his Arrival in Picardy.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

Each labouring to obtain the Victory in the Expreſſions of a cordial Affection; and indeed the main Buſineſs took up leaſt part of the Time. Twelve Perſons of principal Name (t), attended on each Prince according to the Nature of the Ceremony, out-vying each other in the Curioſity and Riches of their Apparel. On the Engliſh Side the Duke of Glouceſter was abſent (u), in regard his Preſence ſhould not approve; what his Opinion and Senſe of Honour had heretofore diſallow'd. And that there might be no Fraud nor Treaſon; on the Engliſh Side were four of the French, and on the French four of the Engliſh; who watchfully obſerv'd every Word and Geſture: So much Jealouſie waits upon even the moſt friendly Meetings, and ſo ſuſpected is the Faith of Princes. 800 Men at Arms attended on the French King, on the King of England his whole Army. Which ſet in Battle-array to the beſt Advantage for the Eye, afforded a Proſpect of much Delight and Bravery to them, who at a more unfriendly Encounter would have trembled at the Sight.

The Chancellor of England's Oration at the Interview.

The (x) Chancellor of England made an Oration congratulatory for the happy Agreement, whereby ſo much Blood was preſerv'd in the Veins of both People, and ſo many Bleſſings of Peace like to enrich both Kingdoms (y). His Congratulation was intermingled with Propheſie of future Happineſs, which would grow ſtronger by length of Time; touching in that upon the Marriage of the Dauphin with the Lady Elizabeth of England. But the good Biſhop of Lincoln (z) (for in him was then the Office of Chancellor) in this ſhow'd himſelf a better Orator than Prophet. Himſelf living afterward to diſprove his own Divination.

K. Lewis invites K. Edward to Paris.

After the Oration ended, and the two Kings ſworn to the fore-mention'd Peace, K. Lewis ſomething wantonly (as who knew how to tune his Language beſt to K. Edward's Ear) invited him to take a Journey as far as Paris; where if any of the Beauties ſhould make him treſpaſs upon his Chaſtity; the Cardinal of Burbon (a gentle Ghoſtly Father) ſhould eaſily afford him Abſolution. The King in the Pleaſure of his Look approv'd the Facetiouſneſs of the Diſcourſe, and found no great Difficulty in himſelf to admit the Offer (a).

K. Lewis excepts againſt the Duke of Britain's being included in the Peace.

But K. Lewis (who never uſed Mirth but as a Preparative for ſomething ſerious) having wrought himſelf into the King's good Liking; and as he thought facilitated him to grant any Requeſt, urged that the Duke of Brittain might not remain in the Protection of the Engliſh; but that he might be left to his own Defence, againſt the Juſt Anger of the French, whom he had ſo often provoked by open Confederacies and ſecret Practices. To which the King anſwer'd reſolutely, That he never would forſake the Care of a Confederate, who had maintain'd his Faith ſo conſtantly. And afterwards being importun'd by ſome great Lords employ'd in that Negotiation by Lewis; he not only ſhew'd an apparent Diſtaſte to the Motion; but openly profeſſed, that rather than the Duke ſhould be endanger'd in his Safety, he would forget all other Amities, and paſs the Seas himſelf to his Relief. Which ſhew'd a noble Diſpoſition in the King, and an adviſed Judgment; for the Duke had been ever friendly to him in the worſt of Fortune, and in his better a moſt faithful Neighbour, and in this Enterprize on France had uſed no Diſſimulation, nor in the leaſt Carriage of Buſineſſes betray'd that Faith at firſt he promiſed. In the Protection therefore of him againſt the French, the King ſhew'd the Gratitude of his Memory; as likewiſe a politick Caution that the Crown of France might not grow too potent by warring with a weaker Prince, whoſe Ruin could not but give to it a dangerous Addition.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

K. Lewis's ſmooth Acceptance of a Denial.

But this Diſcourſe touching the Duke was in private between the Kings; for Lewis to ſhow the Authority he had over his greateſt Lords, had commanded them to retire when he entred into this Speech. And in treating this Buſineſs, which ſo nearly concern'd the Policy of his Intentions, he ſhew'd a great Art; not urging the King ſo far, as that the Denial might come off with a Diſtaſte. But ſmoothly he gave it over, when he perceiv'd him not eaſily to be remov'd; although with ſome inward Difficulty to find his Affection ſo conſtant to the Duke, of whom he had reſolv'd to make a Spoil, and to lay the firſt Stone of his mighty Building in his Deſtruction.

The happy concluſion of this Meeting of the two Kings.

He preſently therefore diverted his Diſcourſe again to Ceremony, and after ſome ſhort intercourſe of Courtſhip they both at the ſame Minute parted from the Grate, and took Horſe; publickly giving very liberal Commendations of each other. And how ever Interviews are generally eſteem'd unſafe for Princes, in regard the Advantage falling of Neceſſity on the one Part, throws a Contempt upon the other; yet this was both in Probability before and after in the Succeſs moſt Fortunate. For both Princes tho' of different Complexions had equal Preheminences, and by ſeveral Ways came to ſtand upon even Ground.

Lewis and Edward compar'd.

K. Edward had the Advantage in Youth, Perſonage and Behaviour, which win ſuddenly upon Eſtimation: Lewis in the cunning of Wit, and Authority of his Carriage, which although ſlowlier, ſink deeper in Opinion. Edward had a daring Courage ever ſeconded by a propitious Fortune: Lewis a circumſpect Judgment which order'd Buſineſſes ſo ſure, that he left ſcarce any Thing to Fortune. Edward by his Sword had brought himſelf to the preſent Greatneſs of his State: Lewis by his Policy had ſettled himſelf in his Father's Conqueſts. And indeed ſo apparent was the Equality of theſe Princes, that they both deſpaired to gain any Thing by Oppoſition, which made Lewis at any Rate deſirous to buy K. Edward's Return; and Edward willing no more to traffick with Lewis, from whom nothing was to be got in the Way of Bargain: Whatſoever the one did by Valour, the other likely to undo by Cunning.

King Edward's Policy to diſpoſe his Army for a Peace.

This Peace by all Conjecture was likely to ſuffer in Opinion at Home, where by comparing the Fortune of the preſent with that of former (t) As the Duke and Cardinal of Burbon, &c. on the French King, and the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Haſtings, the Biſhop of Lincoln, &c. on the King of England.

(u) But the Duke of Glouceſter afterwards waited on the French King at Amiens, and had Preſents from him as well as others. Com.

(x) Biſhop of Ely.

(y) Comines ſays the Biſhop began his Diſcourſe by a Propheſie (dont les Angleis ne ſont jamais deſpourveus) of which the Engliſh are never unprovided, that a great Peace was foretold, would be made at Picquigni between England and France.

(z) Thomas of Rotheram.

(a) At which the French King, ſays Comines, was not very well pleaſed, not liking to let the King of England be tempted to come thither.

Ex-

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

Expeditions, Expectation promiſed it ſelf nothing leſs than the entire Recovery of France. To prevent which, the King had happily, perhaps judiciouſly (as who foreſaw that the Succeſs might end in Agreement) brought over with him many (b) from London, for their Wealth of moſt Reputation in the City. Theſe Men whom Plenty endeared to the Love of Life, as ſoon as he had reſolv'd to decline the preſent War, he cauſed to be aſſaulted every Hour with New Fears, repreſenting to their affrighted Minds the Horror of a Battle, the many Difficulties of a Seige, and the Certainty of an untimely Death, if not by the Cannon or the Sword, yet by the Inconveniences of Lodging and the Weather, which the Winter coming on was likely to be moſt tempeſtuous: And if beyond Hope Death were eſcaped, how cruel might be an Impriſonment, and how deep the Ranſom! Then he gave Order that the Enemy ſhould be reported of far more Danger than indeed he was, and every Night falſe Alarms to be given. And for Diſtruſt already held of Burgundy and St. Paul, he let it be augmented in the Army, cauſing Rumors to be ſpread abroad, That there was Treaſon in them from the Beginning of this Enterprize, and that now they were prepared to unite their Forces with the French to the utter Deſtruction of the Engliſh.

His Judgment applauded in making the Peace.

By which Frights he ſo moulded them to his Deſires, that they writ back to their Friends, the Impoſſibility of any Succeſs in the preſent Buſineſs, and the great Judgment and Fortune of the King, if he could conclude a Peace, with Advantage of Honour. The Example of this Policy King Edward bequeath'd to Henry VII. who left none of his Predeceſſor's Arts unpractiſed that might advance either his Profit or Reputation. And ſo far this Deſire of Peace and Delight in it ſpread it ſelf, that when upon the Day of the Interview by Accident a white Pigeon lighted upon the King's Pavilion, and there pruned it ſelf after a Shower of Rain, the Sun ſhining comfortably, the Soldiers cried out it was the Holy Ghoſt, who deſcended in that Form, to ſhew how grateful the preſent Accord was to Heaven. Which Interpretation pleaſed exceedingly the preſent Humour of the King; any Superſtition being nouriſhed in the Subject, which tended to advance the Reputation of their Prince, eſpecially when his Actions are doubtful to be underſtood.

A white Pigeon interpreted to be the Holy Ghoſt.

The Night that enſued the Interview, many of the Engliſh Nobility reſorted to Amiens; the French Affability, and ſomething too of Curioſity inviting them. The Lord Howard, who was always foremoſt in his Application to King Lewis, at Supper whiſper'd him in the Ear, that he conceiv'd his Maſter might be perſwaded without much Scruple to make a Journey to Paris; where by a friendly Entertainment the new begun Amity might be perfected.

King Edward's Journey to Paris mentioned to King Lewis.

But the wary King had no Deſire to bid ſo dangerous a Gueſt to Paris, for fear the Delicacies of the Place might invite him, either to a chargeable continuance there, or to ſuch a Love of the French Air, that it might perſwade him to return hereafter thither, though unbidden. He therefore chid his own overforward ſtraining a Complement, and was forced to the Invention of an Excuſe, to take away Diſcourteſie, from Denial of what before ceremoniouſly he had offered: He anſwer'd the Lord Howard thereupon ſuddenly, and to the outward Judgment ſeriouſly, That he was extream ſorry the Neceſſity of his unſettled State, would not afford him Licence of ſo much Happineſs, being preſently to make an Expedition againſt the Duke of Burgundy, who was buſie in his Preparations againſt him, ſo that with Safety yet, he could not attend the Pleaſures of Peace. Which Anſwer gave but a half Satisfaction; but the Lord Howard was devoted to his Affairs, and that made the Reliſh of it better with the King.

K Lewis Excuſes againſt inviting K Edward to Paris.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

But that the King might neither reap all the Benefit, nor yet bear all the Blame of this Peace, there were not a few Lords great in Opinion of the State, who ſhared proportionably in the Booty. Even the ſcrupulous Duke of Glouceſter returned not Home without a large Preſent both of Plate and Horſes. For when he ſaw the whole Stream of the Army flow in to King Lewis, either out of Curioſity, or in Policy loth to particularize an Enmity upon himſelf from ſo potent a Prince, he went to him at Amiens, where he found a Reſpect anſwerable not only to the Greatneſs of his Blood, but to the Extent of his Judgment and Authority.

Duke of Glouceſter brought to engage in the Peace.

But with him King Lewis dealt with more Circumſpection, knowing it impoſſible to win Ground upon him by any Slight or Strength of Wit. The good Affection of all the other Lords he bought up, according to the ordinary Courſe in Markets; as they were worth more in the King's Eſtimation, ſo were they at a higher Price with him. The principal Men of Name who were in Penſion as we find them in Hiſtory, were the (b) Lord Haſtings, Lord Chamberlain to the King, the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheiney, Maſter of the Horſe, Sir Anthony S. Leger, and Sir Thomas Montgomery. Among theſe, beſide the preſent Gifts, he annually diſtributed 16000 Crowns, and exacted from every Man an Acquittance for the Receipt. Which no Man refuſed, but only the Lord Haſtings, denying abſolutely that ever his Hand ſhould be ſeen among the King's Accounts at Paris; but welcom'd ſtill the Penſion, which without that Formality was continued.

K. Lewis made the Lords his Friends by Annuities and Penſions.

At how high a Rate King Lewis prized his Amity with England by this profuſe Liberality, (a Quality ſo contrary to his parcimonious Diſpoſition) is eaſily to be judged. But how lawful it was in the Receivers, I will not too ſeverely cenſure: For, although in this King's Reign, as likewiſe in the Time of Henry VII. many of the great Counſellors were in Penſion to Lewis, and afterward to his Son Charles VIII. yet it is hard to judge how it could agree with the Decorum of their Dignity; it being much beneath the Honour of a noble Mind to owe any Part of their Revenue to a Prince, whoſe Safety and Advantage muſt never be in the firſt Place of their Care. In Peace it may happily not carry any Appearance of Diſloyalty, becauſe by their good Offices they may deſerve that Way of Gratitude; but in Times of Jealouſie, and eſpecially of Enmity, it can no Way be allowed. For though the Penſioner give no underhand Intelligence prejudicial to his Country, yet by a certain neceſſity of Gratitude, it ſtops the Freedom of Advice, and ſo renders him at leaſt undeſerving to the one. Rewards are given for forepaſt Merits, Penſions to retain in future: He therefore who receives a Penſion, obligeth himſelf tacitely to the Service of Two Maſters; and oftentimes the Se-

K. Lewis valued much the Peace with England; and the Engliſh Nobility very little the Glory of England.

Penſions from foreign Princes how far allowable.

(b) Taken from Comines.

(c) Rotheram, Biſhop of Lincoln, Lord Chancellor, the Maſter of the Rolls, the Marqueſs Dorſet.

cond

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

cond in his Thoughts is that Prince to whom he owes a natural Duty; An extraordinary Way of Benefit begetting an extraordinary Diligence. And hence proceeds that Maladie in the Body of a State, which inclines it so totally to one Side, that all Injuries how gross soever are connived at from one Neighbour, while from another the least Shadow of Offence begets mortal War. But if these Pensions be received with Approbation of the King, certainly as they are lawful, so likewise are they less dangerous; for then the State is armed against the Advice of such, whom they know to lean on one Side. The Crookedness of Counsel being easily discern'd, when not bolster'd up with Simulation of Integrity.

K. Lewis's Gold, what Effects it had upon the Courtiers.

And questionless, the Distribution of these Crowns, like a dangerous Poison dispersed into some principal Veins of the Body, infected the whole Court. And tho perhaps the secret Resolutions of the King and State were not betrayed to him, yet was his Intelligence larger than convenient for so cunning a Neighbour, who out of slight and trivial Occurrences, such as were but Chamber talk, could guess at the most reserv'd Counsels. Neither would those so apparent Affronts offered by him afterward, have been so patiently dissembled; (especialy the King knowing him a timerous Prince, and who trembled at the very Thought of a Return of the English into France) had not they whose Advice was most listened to, passionately excused him in every Charge the more zealous Statists laid to him.

King Edward's Return home and Reception.

But these Mischiefs the Year succeeding were guilty of; for the present, the King full of Joy and Treasure returned toward Calis; and indeed with more than ordinary Haste and Caution, for fear the Duke of Burgundy should attempt any Thing upon his Retreat. But with Safety he both came thither, and sailed to Dover (d), whence in much Pomp he directed his Journey to London. Upon Black-Heath the Lord Mayor and Aldermen in Scarlet, and Five hundred Commoners in Murrey received him; and thence with all Shew of Triumph conducted him through the City to Westminster (e). And perhaps he gave Order the Solemnity of his Return should be more glorious, to set off the Shortness of his Stay in France, and the small or no Honour purchased there. The Vulgar for the most Part valuing the Glory of Victories according to the Information of the Ballad, and the Glittering of the Pageants.

The French King, who ever affected the Substance, smiled at these huge Shadows, and never quarrell'd with King Edward, what pompous Titles soever he assumed in receiving the forementioned Sums of Money; willing that he should husband his Actions of least Worth to the greatest Advantage of Credit with his People: While he on the contrary, in all Businesses never heeded what Judgment Opinion gave; and so his Ends were effected, cared not by what sordid or humble Means; Whereupon, presently after the Departure of the English, notwithstanding the many Injuries received from the Duke of Burgundy, he came to Treaty, and suddenly to Agreement with him: In many Points unexpectedly yielding, only that he might revenge himself upon the Count St. Paul; for him he accounted the Conjurer, who by his dissembling Charms, had raised those so many and so tumultuous Spirits against the Crown of France: and till he were destroyed, King Lewis conceived it impossible to remain safe from civil or foreign War.

K. Lewis made a Peace with the Duke of Burgundy.

It was therefore agreed between these Two Princes, that what Places had been wrested away in the former Troubles, should be immediately restor'd; and which of the Two could first surprize the Count St. Paul, should within Eight Days put him to Death, or deliver him up to the Discretion of the other. By which Agreement the wretched Lord found how inevitable was his Ruin; and considering the Vanity of any Hope that might perswade him to defend himself against so potent Enemies, he entred into Discourse with his own Fears, to which he might make his Addresses with more Probability of Safety. And knowing the immoveable Resolutions of King Lewis, and how impossible it was to deceive a Prince so cunning in the Art; he resolved to make Tryal of the Duke; who disdainfully received the first Offers of his Service; but in the End, overcome by Importunity, he granted him safe Conduct: Relying on which, he posted to him, but soon found his Ruin by the want of that Faith, which himself had never observ'd.

The Agreement between K. Lewis and the Duke of Burgundy, to put St. Paul to Death.

Count St. Paul betrayed and put to Death.

For the Duke notwithstanding the safe Conduct, gave Command that he should be imprison'd, and not long after deliver'd him up to the French King, who caused Process to be made against him; certain Letters written to King Edward, and by him delivered to King Lewis, being the chief Articles of Accusation, by which he was condemn'd, and for which not long after he lost his Head. He embraced Death with much Resolution, only somewhat astonished to meet it upon a Scaffold; the manner, not the Thing it self, amazing him. But the Officiousness of the King in the Delivery of those Papers to the Condemnation of his Wife's Uncle, and a Confederate, was certainly treacherous and ignoble; and makes his Memory sound harsh in the Ear of any worthy Mind.

K. Edward blam'd for it.

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15.

And indeed, he was on the sudden become so passionate a Doater on a reconciled Enemy (f), and so passionate an Enemy of his late Friends, that when he understood the Treaty of Peace at Vervins between the French King and the Duke, he sent over Sir Thomas Montgomery, with Instructions if possible to break it off; who urged, 'That the Duke should 'not be admitted to treat of himself, but only 'as mention'd in the King his Master's Peace: 'That if the Duke refused to treat in that 'manner, and the King any way suspected his 'own Strength, his Master would the next 'Summer cross the Seas, and join his Forces 'with him; conditionally, that half the Wages 'of his Army might be defrayed by the French, 'for whose Service the War must be undertaken; and that he might be allowed Fifty 'Thousand Crowns annually in respect his Loss 'would amount to the Value, by reason the 'English Wools at Calis could during that Time 'have no Vent into the Netherlands.' To such an over officious Friendship did his new Malice to Burgundy, and the Counsel of King Lewis's great Pensioners incline him, that he voluntarily offered without Respect of Glory or Hope of Profit, to fight like a Journeyman for a Prince, whose Growth in Power could not be but most unsafe even to him, and dangerous to his Kingdom.

King Edward's Passion to the French King, but Zeal against a separate Peace with the Duke of Burgundy.

(d) Where he arrived in September.
(e) On the 28th of September.
(f) He ordered his Daughter, the Princess Elizabeth to be stiled Dauphiness.

This

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15.

K. Lewis's Civility to King Edward's Embaſſy.

This Embaſſy King Lewis received with Appearance of much Content, congratulating the Felicity of his own Arts that had brought the King to ſo obſequious a Reſpect; but he no way deſired to ſee him any more in France, eſpecially not to pay for his Preſence, whoſe Abſence he had lately bought ſo dearly. He therefore return'd many Thanks for the offered Favour, but withal ſhewed, how much too late it came, in regard the Truce was already concluded between him and the Duke, from which, being now ſworn to it, he could recede neither in Honour nor Religion. But that the World might underſtand how ſcrupulous he had been in Preſervation of the King of England's Reputation; the preſent Truce varied not in one Point from that ſworn at Picquigny, except only that the Duke was admitted to article for himſelf apart, which indeed was the main Thing the King endeavoured to have prevented; ſince by articling apart, the Duke ſhewed his Independance, and that the Engliſh by their Arms had no way advanc'd his Buſineſs.

K. Lewis's Arts to preſerve Friendſhip with King Edward.

But that this Anſwer might incur no Miſinterpretation, he liberally preſented the Ambaſſador, and ſent over with him the Two Hoſtages the Lord Howard, and Sir John Cheiney. For King Lewis continued ſtill in much Caution to offend the King, leaſt perhaps he and the Duke of Burgundy, though now aſunder, might like a Limb broken and ſet again, knit the faſter. He was therefore diligent to increaſe every Day new Diſcontents between them, and to preſerve the Engliſh in their Amity firm upon any Terms, knowing the Duke by no Policy ever to be reduc'd to a perfect Friendſhip. And ſo far had his Cunning and Penſions prevail'd, that nothing was more in the Vote of the Engliſh, than to preſerve King Lewis ſafe in his Eſtate at home, and noble in Reputation with us. But among all the Ties which kept the King ſureſt to him, the Hope of marrying the Dauphin with his Daughter, and this way at leaſt to ſettle the Crown of France in his Poſterity, moſt prevail'd. Of the Reality of which Article, the French permitted not the ſmalleſt Occaſion to be given for Suſpicion.

King Edward's Jealouſie of the Earl of Richmond revives.

This Intention of King Edward of entring into War with the Duke of Burgundy, being croſt, (the unquiet Nature of ſome Princes, ever affecting to beget Trouble to themſelves) that the King might feel no perfect Reſt, he receives the former Jealouſie concerning the Earl of Richmond. But why the reducing him into his Power, ſhould ſo much perplex the State, is beyond reach, unleſs it were a Divination of future Accidents, which inſtructed the King's Fears to expect Danger from him, who neither in point of Juſtice nor Strength was for the preſent conſiderable. For if we look upon his Faction at home, the Civil Wars had brought them ſo low, that no Perſon of Authority had any Relation to him, except the Lord Stanley (g), who being Father-in-law to him, might perhaps wiſh his Fortunes well, but bore a moſt faithful Mind to the King, in whoſe ſpecial Favour he continued to the laſt; and if we conſider him, as if his nearneſs in Blood to King Lewis might render him formidable from abroad, certainly there was no juſt Ground for Suſpicion, the French being ſo lately entred into a particular Amity with England, and never having afforded either Comfort or Countenance to the young Earl's Exile. Then for any Claim to the Crown, the King could not fear him, his Title being of ſo impure and baſe a Metal, it could no Way endure the Touch. His Mother by whom only he could pretend, Heir indeed of the Houſe of Somerſet, but not of Lancaſter, in regard the Stream of this Deſcent was poiſon'd in the very Spring: For John of Gaunt having entertain'd an Affection to Katherine, Daughter of Sir Paine de Ruit, during her Attendance on the Lady Blanch his firſt Wife: In the Life-time of his Second the Lady Conſtance, his Affection grew into a nearer Familiarity, and ſo happy was he, that his Familiarity proved not barren; his Miſtreſs (for to what a Servitude doth Luſt betray a Sinner?) making him Father of Three Sons and a Daughter, to whom he gave the Name of Beaufort, from a Caſtle he had in France, where they were born. The Duke zealous to reward any that had ſo well deſerv'd, married his Bedfellow to Sir Hugh Swinford, a Lincolnſhire Knight, and either thro' Impotency or Conſcience, afterward refrain'd her Company. Some Years paſt (ſhe having buried her Knight, and he his Dutcheſs) in Gratitude to her former Merits being now grown very old, he took her again to his Bed, with the lawful Ceremonies of the Church: And thus his ancient Concubine became his new Bride, having righted her Honour, to leave no Monument of their Sin to Poſterity, he laboured the Legitimation of the Children; and ſo far in the Time of Richard II prevail'd; that both the Sentence of the Church and Parliament pronounc'd them lawful, and enabled them to inherit the Lands of their Father, in Caſe his Iſſue by his former Wives ſhould fail. The Eldeſt Son of the Three, thus legitimated, was John created Earl of Somerſet, Father of John, Duke of Somerſet, whoſe ſole Daughter and Heir Margaret, marryed Edmond of Haddam, Earl of Richmond, whoſe Son Henry was now the Mark at which all the Arrows of the King's Suſpicion aim'd.

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15.

The Earl of Richmond's Title to the Crown diſcuſſed.

His Title cenſur'd and determin'd.

By this Pedigree, to the Eye at firſt appears ſome Dawning of a Title; but certainly it is a falſe Light, ſuch as oftentimes deceives the credulous Traveller. For the Legitimation by the Church was to take away as much of Scandal as poſſible from the Children, and a Diſpenſation only for the Benefit of the Baſtards, without Prejudice to the Right of any other. For theſe Baſtards were not of the Common Nature, ſuch as an after-Marriage may make legitimate, being not Natural but Spurious, begot in Adultery on the one Side, and conſequently incapable of any Benefit by Diſpenſation. Add to this that not being of the whole Blood (according to the Common Law of England) the Houſe of Somerſet was farther off from inheriting any Title from King Henry VI. than the moſt remote of the Line of York. Laſtly, in the very Legitimation it ſelf, the Children were only made capable to inherit the Eſtate of their Father, the Crown being never mention'd: And for the Dutchy of Lancaſter they could not pretend, that being the Inheritance of the Lady Blanch his firſt Wife, from whom they no way deſcended (h); neither were the Princes of the Houſe of Somerſet ever numbred among the Plantagenets, or ever obtain'd ſo much as to be declared Heirs apparent to the Crown, if Henry VI. and his

Duke of Somerſet more formidable to the Crown than the Earl of Richmond.

(g) He married the Counteſs of Richmond, Widow to Edmond Tudor, Father to Earl Henry.

(h) The Words of the Act are to ſucceed to enjoy all Dignities, Lands and Inheritances that might deſcend from the Duke their Father. If the Crown is not mention'd, which would have been difficult to have been obtain'd, and might have put a Stop to the paſſing the Act of Legitimation, it ſeems to be implied.

Son

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15.

Son Prince Edward ſhould extinguiſh without Iſſue; as Mortimer had got to be before in the Reign of Richard the Second, and Delapoole after, during the Uſurpation of Richard the Third. And if there were any Cauſe of Suſpicion from the Branches of that Family; then was the Duke of Buckingham, much more to be feared (i): Who was by his Mother Heir of Edmond, Duke of Somerſet, and himſelf a Prince, mighty in Deſcent other ways from the Crown, as being Heir likewiſe of Thomas, Duke of Glouceſter, younger Son to Edward the Third. Moreover in the Faction of a great Kindred, and Dependancy of a Multitude of Tenants, far more to be ſuſpected, than an exil'd Lord, who claiming by his Mother, could during her Life have no Colour of a Title.

Duke of Brittain ſolicited to deliver the Earl of Richmond to King Edward.

But the King found the Wound of this Jealouſie rankle in him, and nothing but Richmond's Apprehenſion could heal it. He therefore moſt earneſtly ſolicited the Duke of Brittain, by his Embaſſadors, of which Dr. Stillington was one, to return him into England: Their Motives were, the much good Will the Duke owed their Maſter, who never would forſake his Protection, tho' ſeveral Ways and at ſeveral Times moſt importunately provok'd. That he had in anſwer to the French Requeſts to that purpoſe proteſted; That if the Duke were any ways endanger'd by them, he would perſonally croſs the Seas, and make the Quarrel the ſame, as if his own Kingdom were invaded. Then for the Innocency of the King's Intentions towards the Earl; they affirm'd that ſo far from Malice the Deſire to have him returned into England was, that it merely tended to his preſent Safety and after Honour. In regard his Majeſty would not only reſtore him to the Poſſeſſions of his Anceſtors, but endear him in a nearer Tie, even by the Marriage of one of his his own Daughters to him, and by this bleſſed Way abſolutely root up all the ancient Rancour between the Houſes of York and Somerſet. This was the Pretenſion, which tho' the King no way intended, yet the Almighty afterwards made good; to inſtruct after Times, that the Deep Myſteries of cunning Princes are meer Illuſions compared with true Wiſdom; and the Diſpoſition of Kingdoms is the Work of Heaven.

Earl of Richmond delivered to K. Edward's Embaſſadors.

By this Diſſimulation and tender of a large Sum of Money (for the King had learnt how to traffick by Example of K. Lewis) the poor Earl of Richmond was deliver'd up to the Embaſſadors, and immediately by them convey'd to St. Malo's, the next Haven Town, where inſtant Preparations were made for his Tranſportation into England. Here Fortune, or what is leſs uncertain, the Wind took Compaſſion on his Affliction (for the very Imagination of the Ruin he was betray'd to, had thrown him into a violent Feaver) and hindred the Embaſſadors from taking Ship. Where while they remain'd joyful in the Succeſs of their Undertaking, Peter Landois Treaſurer to the Duke, in Appearence of a ceremonious Viſit, but indeed to contrive the Earl's Eſcape, moſt officiouſly came to them. For no ſooner had the Duke given up this innocent Victim to be ſacrificed, but John Chenlettes and ſome of the Court, ſenſible of the Law of Nations and their Maſter's Reputation, to himſelf related the Injury and Diſhonour of this Action. And ſo far aggravated the perpetual Infamy that would cloud his Fame by ſelling his Gueſt to whom he had promiſed Safety and Protection; that the Duke repented the Delivery of him, and adviſed Landois by ſome Art to regain him.

P. Landois, Treaſurer of the Duke of Brittain, ſent by his Maſter to recover the Earl of Richmond, which he effected.

And indeed Landois undertook the Imployment readily, willing perhaps to gain the Honour of doing one good Deed among the Multitude of his Miſchiefs; and likewiſe to revenge himſelf upon the evil Memory of the Embaſſadors, who had forgot by their Money to make him an Inſtrument in effecting this Treaſon. This Villain (for he was fitteſt for the Buſineſs) ſo order'd the Matter, that while he entertain'd the Embaſſadors in a moſt ſerious Diſcourſe, the Earl was carried into Sanctuary; and no Notice given them till he was beyond their Reach. Which when they underſtoood, finding themſelves defrauded of ſo great a Bargain, and even of the Money laid out in the Purchaſe: Indignation tranſported them into bitter Language againſt Landois. But he excuſed himſelf of the Practice, and laid the whole Fault of the Misfortune upon their Negligence; deſiring that their Careleſneſs in loſing a Prey, might not be caſt as a Crime upon that Reſpect he had ſhewed them in his Viſit. And when the Embaſſadors importun'd him by his Authority to force the Earl from the Place; he pretended Religion to the Sanctuary, which if he ſhould out of Honour to the Engliſh but offer to violate; ſo great was the Veneration the People hold it in, that they would tumultuouſly riſe to prevent ſo bold a Sacriledge. He adviſed them therefore to give over this Game loſt, and paſt play; and prepare their Excuſe as cunning as poſſible to ſatisfie their King. And for his Part, to ſhow the Zeal he bore to the Affairs of England, he would take ſuch Order (and he knew it would ſtand with the Approbation of his Maſter) that the Sanctuary ſhould be ſeverely guarded; whence if the Earl endeavour'd an Eſcape it ſhould be into ſome Place of Safety, where he ſhould be ſtrictly impriſon'd, till the King of England were pleaſed otherwiſe to diſpoſe of him. With this plauſible Diſcourſe Landois left the Embaſſadors to ſail over, whom the Wind, now too late, ſerv'd to carry back. But the King, notwithſtanding the faireſt Colours they could lay upon the Buſineſs, and Promiſe on the Duke's Part to keep the Earl ſafe from Eſcape, caſt upon them a ſower Look. Misfortune to a Miniſter of State procuring for the moſt part as much Diſgrace, as if he had been Perfidious in the Practice.

Earl of Richmond kept in Sanctuary

Fruſtrated of his Hope to gain Richmond into his Power, but yet in part freed from all Danger threatned by him, the King to give a Luſtre to that Peace he had ſettled, began to addict himſelf to a profuſe Hoſpitality: A magnificent way of Greatneſs, in which the Monarchs of this Kingdom have in all Ages exceeded all the Princes of Europe. And upon all ſolemn Times, when Ceſſation from Labour licenſeth the Vulgar to admire the glorious Out-ſide of a State, he ſhow'd a particular Bravery to the Eye; by preſenting as well martial Exerciſes in Juſts,

K. Edward addicts himſelf to a magnificent way of living.

(i) To ſhew the Weakneſs of this Argument againſt the Earl of Richmond's Title. Let us ſee what the Duke of Buckingham ſays of his own ſelf at his Conference with the Biſhop of Ely, printed in Holinſhead, pag. 746. My Mother being Eldeſt Daughter to Duke Edmond, I thought my ſelf indubitate Heir to the Houſe of Lancaſter; but accidentally travelling to Worceſter at the ſame Time that theſe Thoughts were in my Head, I met the Counteſs of Richmond the very Daughter and ſole Heir of John, Duke of Somerſet, my Grandfather's Elder Brother; ſo that ſhe and her Son the Earl of Richmond I knew were Bars to my Claim of the Sovereignty: And of the Lancaſter Line he ſays, That his Grandfather Duke Edmond was with King Henry the Sixth in the Two and Three Degrees from John, Duke of Lancaſter, lawfully begotten.

Ti-

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15.

Tiltings, Turnaments, Barriers and the like; as the ſofter Entertainments of Wit, full of an elegant Curioſity for that Time ſubject to too much Tumult and Noiſe to give Birth to the beſt Inventions. But of all Solemnities the Feaſt of St. George, Patron of the nobleſt Order of the World, was celebrated with moſt Splendor and Pomp. Of which our common Chronicles are ſo liberal in the Relation, that they ſpare my Pen the Labour.

King Edward's Indulgence of his Luſts.

Among theſe Delicacies of Peace, the King forgot not to pleaſe his Luſt (the Baſtard of an idle Security;) and indeed impoſſible almoſt it was, that his Appetite flatter'd daily with all the Curioſities of Luxury, ſhould contain it ſelf ſeverely within the Bounds of Modeſty. For as by his other Actions we may judge, how little trouble his Conſcience put him to; and therefore not eaſie to be frighted from Sin by Religion; ſo on the Part of his Body, they who familiarly knew him affirm, that never Man was framed by Nature more apt to the Exerciſe of Love, and whom amorous Courtſhip did leſs Miſ-become. But Almighty God took not his natural Proneneſs to Luſt, for an Excuſe; but ſeverely puniſh'd him in his Sons: Who were both diſpoſſeſſed of the Kingdom and their Lives by their unnatural Uncle: There being ſo much Appearance of Right in the Uſurper by their Father's Incontinency; that even an Act of Parliament was made to baſtardize them. And this ſad Judgment was provoked by the Diſorder of his Luſt; to which how can we wonder if ſo eaſily he inclin'd, ſince Majeſty ſeldom admits of any Inſtructions to a ſevere Correction of the Appetite?

A. D. 1476. Reg. 16.

Ambition to extend their Dominions, hath been ever recorded the nobleſt Vertue in Princes: Who to leſſen a Neighbour-State too mighty in the Growth of Empire, or in hope to conquer ſome Territory, to which the Conveniency, not the Juſtice makes good the Title; without Scruple hazard large Armies of their People: And confidently boaſt the Victory, tho' the War were grounded upon Injuſtice. While K. Edward lived at Home glorious in his Quiet, this Doctrine was liſtened to by Charles, Duke of Burgundy, in following which he made ſo many injurious and unfortunate Attempts. For after his Peace concluded with France, he directed his whole Power to the Deſtruction of the Duke of Lorrain. A Prince who in Favour of K. Lewis, to whoſe Fortune he had devoted his Service, defied the Duke of Burgundy, when he lay at the Siege of Nuz. And tho' this Deſign againſt Lorrain might carry with it all Probability of Succeſs; conſidering the Narrowneſs of the Dutchy: Yet as it ought in Judgment to have been weighed with the Supports of France and other Confederates in Germany, it might bear a Face of much more Difficulty. For it had not only been a perpetual Diſhonour to K. Lewis, but even a Diſadvantage to his Affairs to permit a free Spoil of ſo near an adjoyning Country to the Duke of Burgundy; whom for the preſent a blind Revenge tranſported beyond Reaſon, and made him war with all Cruelty, not only againſt Renatus, the Duke of Lorrain, where the Victory might in ſome Meaſure recompence the Coſt; but againſt the Switzers, becauſe they had ſided with Lorrain, and made ſome Irruption into the Territories of the Burgundian.

Duke of Burgundy's Ambition to conquer his neighbouring Princes.

The Switzers deſcribed.

The Switzers, a poor People, unknown to the World, confin'd to a miſerable Life among their cold and barren Mountains; only proud in the Opinion they had of their Liberty, which was rather maintain'd by the Fort une of the Country, inacceſſible almoſt to an invading Army, than by the Valour of the People. Againſt theſe he led his Forces, rejecting all thoſe ſubmiſs and deprecatory Embaſſies ſent by them, and that free Acknowledgment of their Poverty, when they proteſted all the Wealth of their Country ſum'd up to the higheſt Value, would not be able to buy the Spurs and Bridle-bits in his Camp. Fortune in the beginning of this Enterprize flatter'd him to a Continuance of the War with proſperous Succeſs, intending by that glorious Bait only to allure him to Deſtruction. For ſoon the Chance of War turn'd, and in three Battles in one Year the unfortunate Duke was overthrown: in the laſt of which fought before Nancy, he was ſlain. A Prince who by his Alliance and continual Intercourſe of Buſineſs, had much Relation to the Engliſh: Whoſe Honour, and Recovery of whoſe large Territories in France, he certainly from his Heart deſired. And when he invited K. Edward into France to that Purpoſe, and there fail'd him of his promiſed Succours, it proceeded doubtleſs nor from any under-hand Practice or Remiſneſs in the Undertaking; but only by the Miſfortune of his Army, ſomewhat broken not long before at the Siege of Nuz. He was therefore a Friend to us, if an ambitious Man can be ſaid to be a Friend to any; or rather ſo great an Enemy to Lewis of France that he loved us only in Oppoſition; and deſir'd our Proſperity, becauſe it could not grow without Ruin to the French. How juſt a Governour he was in Peace appertains little to our Knowledge, and the World had little Leiſure to conſider; he was ſo everlaſtingly in Arms: In which as he ſhewed great Courage and Judgment, ſo likewiſe did he commit much Injuſtice. And he who will examine what Licenſe War gives to Injury, and how it impoſeth almoſt Neceſſity of doing Wrong; may in ſome ſort excuſe him. But his being ever in Quarrels, (into which he enter'd and continu'd, as his Paſſion, not his Reaſon directed him) argues his Spirit daring but turbulent, and his Valour raſh and inconſiderate, and takes away all Pardon from his ſo many Errors. The two great Blemiſhes upon his Memory, are his Cruelty at Granſon in Lorrain, where in cold Blood he cauſed all the Inhabitants to be kill'd, the Town being yielded to his Diſcretion: And his Perfidiouſneſs to the Count St. Paul, whom notwithſtanding a ſafe Conduct he deliver'd up to Execution into the Hands of K. Lewis. The good Men who aſcribe Puniſhment to the Juſtice of Heaven, obſerve that after theſe two Crimes his Fortune left him, and with Diſhonour Death overtook him, when he leaſt expected it. Having at that time in his Imaginations ſo many and ſo vaſt Deſigns, that ſcarce the Age and Fortune of Man had length and Power enough to accompliſh them all.

A. D. 1476. Reg. 16.

Duke of Burgundy ſlain at Nancy

His Character.

Duke of Burgundy's Cruelty and Falſhood, and the Puniſhment of it.

The Death of this Prince, who had begot ſo much Buſineſs in his Life, diverſly affected all the neighbouring Countries. Generally according to the Cuſtom in private Familes, every State entertain'd it with ſuch a Paſſion, as the Advantage or Diſadvantage appear'd by it to themſelves. Some few out of Love to his Perſon, Hope of Marriage with his Daughter, or Compaſſion of humane Accidents, griev'd at the Report: But moſt expreſſed their Sorrow, for the Liberty King Lewis had attain'd by it, becauſe no Man living now had the Power and Will to oppoſe him, ſhould he attempt any Injury, and offer Violence to his weaker Neighbours. But King Edward was ſo infatuated

The Count of St. Paul's Death, and the Effects of it.

A. D. 1476. Reg. 16.

by his Arts, that he never ſtartled at this great Accident, nor look'd how nearly it might concern his own Safety; ſo that notwithſtanding he were daily certified of new Undertakings by King Lewis, he reſted quiet, and gave free Reins to his injurious Ambition, who, as ſoon as he underſtood the Death of Duke Charles, and perceived how open his Countries lay to an Invader, he pretended the Dutchy of Burgundy for want of Heirs-male devolv'd back to the Crown of France, and by the Arms of the Duke of Lorrain without further Diſpute took it in: In the mean time himſelf ſeizing upon all Picardie, which for many Years had remain'd in Poſſeſſion of Dukes Philip and Charles. And that he might have yet more Occaſion of Quarrel with an unſettled Lady unable to withſtand his Oppoſition, he ſummon'd the Princeſs Mary, Dutcheſs of Burgundy to come in Perſon into France to do Homage for the County of Flanders, and her other Eſtates held in chief of that Crown.

K. Lewis ſeized upon the Dutchy of Burgundy at the Duke's Death.

But ſhe knowing how unſafe it was to yield her Perſon up to a Prince, who made his Advantage of every Opportunity, delay'd the Homage, and ſtood upon her Guard as ſtrongly as in ſo diſorder'd a Country was poſſible. For though ſhe were a Lady of many opulent and mighty Provinces, able if not to offend, yet to defend themſelves againſt the World; yet were the People ſtubborn and prone to Rebellion, and who by the Weakneſs of ſome of their Princes heretofore, had purchaſed to themſelves too large Immunities. And indeed ſcarce any Town, but had or pretended to have ſuch Prerogatives, as debaſed all Authority of Government, which upon every Change in State they reviv'd, and endeavour'd if poſſible to redeem themſelves from Subjection. And this Hope, more than ever now poſſeſſed them, conſidering the Unexperience both of the Youth and Sex of her that ruled; ſo that by Appearance of their churliſh Carriage to the Dutcheſs, and ſmall Preparations againſt King Lewis, who every Day ſurpriz'd ſome Place or other, they rather deſired to be expoſed a Prey to ſome inſolent and cruel Enemy, than endure the mild Government of their lawful Princeſs. She therefore ſent Ambaſſadors to implore Aid of King Edward, and declare to him the Urgency of her preſent Neceſſities. Who ſhewed, That their Princeſs the greateſt Heireſs in the World, born to a large and rich Territory, was at preſent in a Condition beneath the pooreſt Subject that enjoyed but Liberty; being detain'd Captive by the Hands of ſuch as made Reſtraint far more unſuportable, viz. of her own inſolent Rebells. That her Deliverance concern'd the King of England in general as a Prince, and in particular as a Neighbour and an Ally. That her tumultuous Subjects, who had dared to attempt and act this Treaſon, took Courage from the French King's declar'd Enmity. An injurious Proceeding in a Prince againſt a Neighbour, which juſtly provokes all Chriſtendom to unite in her Defence, and puniſh ſo barbarous a Proceeding in him. That the ancient League obſerv'd with ſo much Religion between England and the Low Countries, particularly did require his Majeſty's preſent Aid; and a Conſideration of what might happen perhaps in his own Poſterity in the ſame Nature did invite him to do Favours, as his might challenge to receive them hereafter. That even in the politick Diſcretion of Government, it was conceiv'd, that nearly it concern'd the State of England to provide againſt ſo dangerous an Addition of Dominion to the French, conſidering King Lewis had already moſt injuriouſly wreſted away not only Peronne, Mountdidier, Tournay, and all the reſt of Picardie ſold heretofore to Duke Philip, but ſeiz'd even upon Burgundy the Inheritance of their Princeſs. And what expreſſeth the Inhumanity of the Tyrant, and the hated Malice of his Intentions, ſummons her at this preſent to do Homage perſonally for Flanders and her other Territories; which Summons if ſhe obeys, ſhe certainly betrays her ſelf to an everlaſting Captivity, or to a Neceſſity to ſurrender a large Part of her Inheritance for Redemption; and if ſhe refuſeth, ſhe endangers her whole Eſtate to the Surprize of a mercileſs Enemy, who never wanted the Pretence of Juſtice to juſtifie Spoil and Rapine. They farther urg'd, how their Princeſs was not only in her Perſon reſtrain'd by her own Subjects, but had not ſo much as any Appearance of an Army in the Field to oppoſe the Invader. The Soldier being abſolutely deſtroyed in the former unfortunate Battles fought by her Father in Lorrain; and the Faith of all the Commanders who remain'd, bought up by King Lewis, and turn'd wholly French, with Surrender of the Towns and Forts under their Government. And all Hope of any Levies at home vain and falſe, the Commons by Practice of the French King every where in Tumult, and the few who wiſh'd well to their Princeſs's Affairs, either not daring to declare themſelves, or ſuffering Death or Impriſonment for their Faith. They concluded with Intreaty, That the King would engage his Arms in ſo juſt a Quarrel; which, as it could not but be moſt honourable to his Name and no way unprofitable, ſo likewiſe would it caſt a perpetual Obligation upon their Princeſs, and devote her Power hereafter to his Service.

Dutcheſs of Burgundy refuſes to do Homage to King Lewis for Fear of his Policy.

She deſires K. Edward's Aſſiſtance againſt K. Lewis, and her Ambaſſadors urg'd it by many Arguments.

A. D. 1476. Reg. 16.

This Embaſſy carried with it every Way ſo much Juſtice, that it begot a general Approbation. For the Opinion was, that England never had ſo fair an Opportunity to win Honour to the Nation, relieve an oppreſſed Princeſs, check an inſolent and unfaithful Neighbour, and provide for its own Safety. So that in the Court no Perſon of Honour, not corrupted with the French Penſion, but paſſionately deſired the Undertaking; and thought it neceſſary in every Point to begin this defenſive War. But the King, who was in ſo deep a Lethargy that no Danger could wake him, nor Touch of Honour make him ſenſible, heard this with a fair Reſpect, and diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors with ſome faint Comfort. And tho' he could not but perceive what a Cloud it would be upon his Reputation to permit ſo foul an Injury to the young Princeſs, and ſit ſtill; yet he reſolv'd to liſten to the ſafer Counſels of Peace, and believe (how improbable ſoever) the many Proteſtations of King Lewis.

The Embaſſy of the Dutcheſs of Burgundy approv'd by the Nobles, but not by the King.

Who, as ſoon as he underſtood of theſe Addreſſes made to England, which at the very firſt he expected, diſpatch'd his Ambaſſadors to undo whatſoever had been wrought by the former Solicitation. And whereas the Dutcheſs of Burgundy perſwaded King Edward to this War by the Arguments of Honour and a generous Pity. He diſſwaded it, by menacing an abſolute Breach of the Peace ſworn at Picquigny, whereby the King ſhould be fruſtrated of his Tribute, and the ſo mighty Marriage of his Daughter. He ſhewed farther, how it was not only againſt the ſo near Amity begun and likely to continue between them and their Poſterity, but even againſt the Cuſtom of common Confederacies, to oppoſe a neighbouring Prince in League, when he only attempted the Recovery of his own Right. And if the Truth of his Actions were laid open to the World, it would appear, that the Re-aſſumption of thoſe Towns into the Power of France, (what Interpretation ſoever they might ſuffer among the ignorant or malicious,)

K. Lewis ſends an Embaſſy to K. Edward to anſwer the Arguments of the Dutcheſs of Burgundy.

was

A. D. 1476. Reg. 16.

was but an Act of Juſtice; ſince thoſe many Places in Picardie were no way of Right belonging to Duke Charles, but permitted him only to avoid the Continuance of War, which was notorious to any Man who would but call to Memory, how they were morgaged to Duke Philip. The abſolute Alienation of them from the Crown having never been either in the Will or Power of any French King. Then for the Dutchy of Burgundy, the original Grant and the common Practice in France would manifeſt, that it only was conferr'd upon the Heirs Male; which failing in the preſent Dutcheſs, implies a Return of it back to the Crown, whence it paſt at firſt by an inconſiderate Tranſaction. Laſtly, that his taking Arms was only to recover and juſtifie his Right, and reduce the Princeſs Mary to perform her Homage, which never was denied by any Earl of Flanders. And if there be any Infidelity or Tumult among her Subjects, ſhe ought either to blame the evil Diſpoſition of her People to Rebellion, or the Misfortune of her own Government.

The Engliſh deſirous to relieve the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, cauſe a ſecond Embaſſy from France.

This was the Effect of King Lewis his Anſwer at firſt, which the King was joyful to have divulg'd, becauſe it gave his Slowneſs to Action, a ſpecious Shew of Juſtice and Diſcretion. But the Relief of the oppreſſed Lady grew ſo much into the Deſire of the Commonalty, and even the better Sort of People bended ſo much to Compaſſion, that the French began to ſuſpect the King might be induced to undertake her Protection. Whereupon new Ambaſſadors came with new Inſtructions ſomething more plauſible than the former, in which they were to keep the King upon any Terms at home. Theſe offer'd to his Majeſty a full Relation of King Lewis his Proceedings hitherto, with Promiſe, 'To refer it wholly to him, if 'any Violence had been by the Licence of War 'committed. That their Maſter's Aim was ſo 'far from Injury, that he would ſubmit to in-'different Judgment all the Paſſages in this 'Quarrel, and bind himſelf to any Reſtitu-'tion the King of England ſhould order. For 'all his Deſire by theſe Arms was only the Re-'duction of his own, and Maintenance of the 'Prerogatives of the Crown of France. And ever among theſe Excuſes he mingled ſome Diſcourſe concerning the Dauphin, his ſo forward Growth, and the great Expectation of him; ſomething too of the Lady Elizabeth, and the Joy all France conceiv'd of the future Marriage. Neither was the Ceremony of paying the Tribute ever ommitted at the Day, nor the great Lords forgotten to be preſented with Penſions, and ſomething too of Addition to increaſe their Diligence.

K. Lewis his Policy to keep K. Edward from aſſiſting the Dutcheſs of Burgundy.

By theſe Arts he won Time, a Merchandize he then traffick'd for, and the Purchaſe of which ſo nearly concern'd his preſent Deſign: For it was his, and certainly a politick Courſe, to ſend often, and ſtill ſeveral Ambaſſadors; who, if in their Overtures they were contradictory, laid the Fault on their Inſtructions, and deſired reſpite, till they had ſome farther Underſtanding of their Maſter's Intentions: And when any new Thing was propoſed, they embraced it, intreating only Time to inform the State of France. But when by frequent treating, the Buſineſs was come oftentimes to Neceſſity of abſolute Reſolution, then ſuddenly was the Ambaſſador recall'd, and ſome new Perſon ſent to ſupply his Place, wholly ignorant, or at leaſt pretending to be wholly ignorant of all former Paſſages.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17.

At the length when he ſaw there was an Impoſſibility farther to diſſemble, by pretending Reſtitution of whatſoever had been wreſted away from the Dutcheſs, he diſcover'd the Treachery of his former Carriage, and made Propoſitions advantageous to the King's Profit. Offering, 'If he would paſs the Seas with a full 'Army and join in the Quarrel, to defray half 'the Expence of the War, and never forſake 'the Engliſh, untill he had ſettled them in Poſ-'ſeſſion of Flanders and Brabant, ſo that the 'Spoil might be equally divided between the 'Two Kings. In this one Overture he expreſſed the Deceit of his former Purchaſe, to make which good he tender'd ſo great a Brokage.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17.

K. Lewis offers to give K. Edward Flanders.

But the King refuſed this Propoſition, not out of Conſcience unwilling to enter upon Eſtates to which he had no Title; nor Greatneſs of Spirit, diſdaining to make Advantage of the Misfortune of a Lady oppreſſed by an overpotent Neighbour, and forſaken by an ungrateful and diſobedient People, but only out of Conſideration of the Difficulty: Since the Towns were of Strength to make Reſiſtance againſt the moſt powerful Army, that every Fort would require much Time and Charge in the Gaining; and if gain'd would prove as coſtly and difficult to keep. The People, tho' naturally prone to Innovation, and upon the ſlighteſt Grounds ready to rebel, yet by no Art to be ſo tamed as to endure the Yoak of a Stranger. And if the Conqueſt was ſtill to be made good by Garriſons of Engliſh, (the Natives being both unruly and unfaithful) it would draw much Blood and Treaſure from England, and return neither Honour nor Profit. Nevertheleſs the King offer'd immediately to declare himſelf in common League againſt the Dutcheſs, and to lead over an Army Royal into her Territories, promiſſing to ſhare in all future Danger if he might be admitted to ſhare in what was already conquer'd. But that the French denied, as loath ever to quit Poſſeſſion, yet never ſo peremptorily refuſed any Propoſition, as to leave the Engliſh, perſwaded by Deſpair, to enter into new Counſels; even in their Denials leaving ſome Way open to Expectation.

K Edward offers to join with K Lewis againſt the Dutcheſs of Burgundy.

Dutcheſs of Burgundy to engage K. Edward to her Aſſiſtance, offers a Marriage with the Duke of Clarence.

During this Time ſpun out to the utmoſt length by theſe tedious Negotiations, the French effected their Ends, and almoſt undid the afflicted Princeſs. Who left no way untried that might lead her into a perfect Friendſhip with the Engliſh, and engage their Arms to her Defence. Among the reſt ſhe tried one which being ſingular in the Event deſerves a particular Obſervation. Either by her Commiſſion or Permiſſion, a Motion was made of a Marriage between her and George, Duke of Clarence, who had lately buried his Lady. By which very Overture ſhe doubted not but the King ambitious of ſo ample a Fortune for his Brother, would run into her Quarrel. But, as ſometimes Phyſick miſapplied, it wrought a contrary Effect, and with other Circumſtances procured his Ruin. For he having by the Levity of his Actions weaken'd his Reputation with the World in general, and particularly drawn a hatred from the Queen's Kindred upon him, the King and the Duke of Glouceſter likewiſe, having him either in Contempt or Jealouſie, ſtood in a manner alone. So that the very firſt Whiſpers of this Marriage were heard with Emulation by ſome, with Scorn by others, and with Diſlike by all. Which gave Occaſion that his Deſtruction was ſuddenly plotted, and almoſt as ſuddenly executed. For the King, altho' he ow'd his Reſtitution to the Crown when he was expell'd from England, to the Duke's Revolt from Warwick; yet he remembred more perfectly the Unnaturalneſs of his firſt Rebellion: And howſoever

Duke of Clarence's Death contrived upon the Motion.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17.

he ſhowed outwardly all the Arguments of a reconcil'd Brother, yet certainly the Memory of the Injury at firſt done remain'd deeply imprinted in his Mind. So that Clarence by his after-Service never regain'd that Place in the King's Heart, which his former Diſloyalty had forfeited. This he perceiv'd and repin'd againſt, and the King underſtanding that he reſented the Truth, hated him yet the more: And ſo far grew this Hatred, that no Diſcourſe was more harſh to the King's Ear than that of Clarence's Marriage with the Heir of Burgundy; by which it was ſuſpected he being furniſhed with Power might hereafter prepare for Revenge. For according to the Diſpoſition of Man he ſaw all his Actions in a flattering Glaſs: Looking upon his Revolt from his Brother, as an Error of ſeduced Youth; and on his Return back, as on ſo great a Merit, that it lay ſcarce in the King's Power to recompence: The King enjoying by it all the Greatneſs he poſſeſſed.

Duke of Glouceſter's Policy to haſten Clarence's Fall.

Richard, Duke of Glouceſter, upon whoſe Nature and Friendſhip he built moſt, deceived him moſt. For Glouceſter, who ſtudied nothing but his own Purpoſes, and cared not by what Violence all Obſtacles of Nature and Friendſhip were remov'd, ſo the Way were plain'd to his Ambition; endeavour'd to add more Poiſon to their Diſcontent: Knowing that bad Intentions never receive Growth but from Miſchief. He therefore perſwaded him to be ſenſible of the King's Neglect, and boldly to expreſs his Reſentments: A ſilent Patience being in a Subject Loyalty, but in a King's Brother Cowardize. While on the other Side he whiſper'd in the King's Ear the Danger of Clarence's Spirit apt to receive any Diſcontent, and wanting only Power to ſeek unlawful Remedies; and whatſoever Council came from him was receiv'd by the King with more Attention and Belief, in regard of his great Judgment and Profeſſions of Love to his Brother. And indeed Glouceſter much diſdain'd the Advancement of Clarence this Way, not that he had any particular Ground for Malice, but only that he hated any Man, and eſpecially a Brother, ſhould have the Start of him in Fortune.

The Queen and her Kindred's Malice againſt Clarence.

But the Queen and her Kindred ſhallower in their Spleen, ſpoke loud againſt him; while Glouceſter deep in Miſchief was not heard to murmur. For they ſuggeſted continually to the King with what Contempt they were treated by Clarence, how all their Honours were mention'd as Mockeries: As if the King wanted Power to confer his Favours according to the Diſcretion of his own Bounty. They urged the Memory of his Rebellion at his firſt Marriage with Warwick's Daughter, and the much more Danger of his Intentions in affecting ſo much Greatneſs in the Second. And ſo far by Aggravations of every ſlight Error they wrought, that the King was willing to have his Brother ſuffer; but only wanted ſome Offence capital enough to make his Death appear an Act of Neceſſity and Juſtice, not of Plot and Malice.

The Cauſe of the Duke of Clarence's Death.

It is generally receiv'd among the Vulgar, and wants not the Approbation of ſome Chronicles, that the chief Ground of the King's Aſſent to his Death was the Miſinterpretation of a Prophecy: Which foretold that one, the firſt Letter of whoſe Name was G. ſhould uſurp the Kingdom and diſpoſſeſs K. Edward's Children. Of which there is much of Probability; however by his other Actions I ſhould not judge the King eaſie to believe in ſuch Vanities. For Credulity in that Nature, falls for the moſt part upon weak Minds, as thoſe of Women and Children; or upon the timerous, whoſe Apprehenſions are ſoften'd to receive every ſlight Impreſſion; or upon the Over-zealous, whom an evil regulated Piety bends to Superſtition. And with theſe three the King had no Participation in Humour. Yet this ſerv'd for the preſent, and carried with it a ſtrong Accuſation againſt the Duke for this Prophecy was alledged to be ſpoken by ſome of his Servants, who by Necromancy had underſtood this from the Devil: Which with other Circumſtances ſerv'd to haſten the King to this foul Miſchief.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17.

One Mr. Burdet a Dependant on the Duke of Clarence executed.

The Duke was in Ireland, the Country that gave him Birth, during the Time of theſe Contrivances, not ſuſpecting any Deſign againſt himſelf. Upon his Return to the Court he underſtood that Thomas Burdet (k) of Arrow in the County of Warwick Eſquire, who even was dependant upon him and ran his Fortune, had been in his Abſence apprehended, indited, arraign'd and executed (l) all in the Compaſs of two Days. The Crime upon which his Accuſation was principally grounded, were inconſiderate Words by which upon a Report, that the white Buck in which he much delighted was killed as the King was hunting in his Park, he wiſh'd the Head and Horns and all in the King's Belly, whereas indeed he wiſh'd it only in his Belly, who counſel'd the King to kill it. With this Accuſation were mingled many other of Poiſoning, Sorceries, and Inchantments: Crimes which every judicious Man eaſily perceiv'd, were only put in the Scale like Grains, to make his raſh Language full Weight, which otherwiſe would have been too light to deſerve the Sentence of Death. Theſe Proceedings Clarence reſented, as they were intended, and expoſtulated with the King about the Injuſtice done to his Servant, and Injury to himſelf. And according to the Cuſtom of Expoſtulations, his Words were bold and diſorderly, and having receiv'd an apparent Injury, built to much on the Right of his Cauſe, and provok'd the King too far into Indignation; ſo that ſoon after he was committed cloſe Priſoner to the Tower, where being by Act of Parliament attainted, he was ſecretly put to death. The Manner, as it is generally received, was by Thruſting his Head into a But of Malmeſey, by which he was ſtifled (m).

His Crime

Duke of Clarence impriſoned and put to Death.

In his Attainder, according to the Form, are Crimes enough to make his Death have Appearance of Juſtice, the Execution of which the King ſeem'd rather conſtrain'd to, than to have ſought. For there are reckon'd, how the Duke of Clarence to bring the preſent Government into Hatred with the People, and thereby the preſent State into Trouble; had not only in his Speeches frequently laid Injuſtice to the King's Charge in attainting Thomas Burdet falſly, convict of many notorious Treaſons, but ſuborn'd many of his Servant and divers others, corrupted with Money, to divulge the like ſeditious Diſcourſes; That he had ſpread Abroad impious Rumours that the King dealt by Necromancy, and upon Offence againſt ſuch of his Subjects, whom by Order of Law he could not

Duke of Clarence's Attainder

(k) Son to Sir Nicholas Burdet, a famous Soldier in the French Wars, and great Butler of Normandy.

(l) At Tyburn.

(m) His Body was expoſed lying on his Bed, to amuſe the People, as if he dy'd of Melancholy; but the Attainder and the King's Temper rendred that Artifice ineffectual.

de-

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17.

deſtroy, he was accuſtom'd to take away by Poyſon; That he had not reſted there, but thereby to advance himſelf to the Kingdom, and for ever to diſable the King and his Poſterity from the Crown, had contrary to Truth, Nature and Religion, Viper-like deſtroying her who gave him Life, publiſh'd that the King was a Baſtard and no way capable to Reign; That to make this his ſo monſtrous Ambition more ſucceſsful and already to begin his Uſurpation he had cauſed many of the King's Subjects to be ſworn upon the moſt bleſſed Sacrament to be true to him and his Heirs, without any Exception of their Allegiance; after which ſo ſolemn Oaths, he diſcover'd to them his Reſolution to right himſelf and his Followers, who had both ſuffered by the King's violent wreſting away their Eſtates: And in particular to revenge himſelf upon the King, who (as he moſt impiouſly and falſely ſuggeſted) had by Art-Magick contrived to conſume him, as a Candle conſumeth in burning. And, what moſt expreſſed the Treaſon of his Deſigns, that he had got out an Exemplification under the great Seal of Henry VI. late King; wherein was ſhewed how by the Parliament it was enacted, that if the ſaid Henry and Edward his Son ſhould die without Iſſue-male, the Kingdom ſhould deſcend upon the Duke of Clarence and his Heirs; whereby clearly appear'd his Intention, immediately to poſſeſs himſelf of the Crown, with Deſtruction of King Edward and his Children by Pretence of a general Election of the Commonwealth. This was the Sum of his Attainder, which we may well believe had not ſo eaſily paſt but by the King's publick declaring himſelf, the ſecret working of the Duke of Glouceſter, and the paſſionate Urging of the Queen's Kindred.

The Crimes alledged falſe.

But this Attainder had in it one Thing moſt Remarkable, that Clarence here falſly was accuſed, of laying Baſtardy to the King, to endeavour Poſſeſſion of the Crown: Which afterward was alledg'd indeed by Richard, Duke of Glouceſter, to the abſolute Diſinherit of the King's Sons. Whereby God's ſevere Judgment manifeſts, how unſafe it is in a Prince, by falſe Accuſations to condemn an innocent, or but to aggravate the Fault of one leſs Guilty, to the End that Cruelty may be reported an Act of Juſtice.

Duke of Clarence's Death every where condem'd.

The Death of this Prince being ſudden and extraordinary, begot every where an extraordinary Cenſure; the unnatural ſeverity, taking away all Excuſe, even from their Diſcourſe, who moſt favour'd the King. At Home it was generally condemn'd, both in regard of the Manner, it being prodigious to be drown'd without Water, upon dry Ground, and the Quality of the Perſon: He being the Firſt Brother to a King in this Country, that ever was attainted. And what increaſed the Murmur, a Faction appear'd at Court triumphing in his Ruin, all the Accuſations were ſtrangely wreſted, and no matter of Fact, ſcarce an Intention prov'd againſt the State. Whereupon this Puniſhment was thought to have been inflicted upon him for no new Attempt: His firſt taking Part with Warwick, being his only Crime. For which War, tho' ſomewhat againſt Nature, he had many Examples in France, Spain, and other Parts of Chriſtendom: Whereas for the Death of a younger Brother, upon bare Suſpicion, the King could borrow no Precedent nearer then the Turkiſh Government. But Clarence imagin'd the Prerogative of his Birth a ſufficient Defence againſt Danger, and omitted to fortifie himſelf with Faction; which laid him open to every Aſſault of Envy. And becauſe he had heretofore been in Oppoſition againſt the King, the Liberty in cenſuring any Defect in Government was interpreted a Deſire to be in Arms again. Every Word of Diſtaſt being held Criminal in him, from whom the King was alienated by his own Diſpoſition, open Invectives of the Queen's Kindred, and ſecret Trains of the Duke of Glouceſter; who now began to look high over all Reſpects of Nature and Religion. He was certainly ambitious beyond Proportion, which made him ſo attentive to any new Counſels, and of an eaſie Nature, which render'd him apt by Practice to be wrought to Miſchief. He was a good Maſter, but an uncertain Friend; which delivers him to us to have been, according to the Nature of weak Men, ſooner perſwaded by an obſequious Flattery, than a free Advice. We cannot judge him of any evil Nature, only buſie and Inconſtant, thinking it a Circumſtance of Greatneſs to be ſtill in Action. He was too open-breaſted for the Court, where Suſpicion looks thro' a Man, and diſcovers his Reſolutions tho' in the Dark, and lock'd up in Secrecy. But what was his Ruin, he was, whether the Houſe of York or Lancaſter prevail'd, ſtill ſecond to the Crown: So that his Eye by looking too ſtedfaſtly on the Beauty of it became unlawfully enamour'd with it; and that being obſerv'd by the King's Jealouſie, he ſuffer'd as if he actually had ſinned. He left two Children by the Earl of Warwick's Daughter, Edward, who inherited his Grandfather's Honour, and was beheaded in the Reign of Henry the Seventh, and Margaret afterwards by Henry the Eighth created Counteſs of Salisbury, who was marry'd to Richard Pool of the Welſh Family of the Pools.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17.

His Character.

While this Miſchief was ſecretly in contriving againſt Clarence, in the Court appear'd no Face, but that of Jollity and Magnificence. For at that Time was Edward eldeſt Son to the King (during Chriſtmas, to mingle the Solemnity with Liberty) inaugurated Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Cheſter; and his younger Brother Richard, created Duke of York; The Fate of their Honour and their Ruin, being ſtill the ſame. At this Creation according to the Ceremony, many young Lords and Gentlemen of principal Name were made Knights of the Bath, among whom Brian Cheif-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, and Littleton, that learned Father of the Laws, are regiſtred.

K. Edward createsbis eldeſt Son Prince of Wales and Duke of York.

A. D. 1478. Reg. 18.

Knights of the Bathmade

King Edward's Profuſeneſs put him upon Severity tohisSubjects.

But the publick Glory of theſe extraordinary Pomps, and the Wantonneſs of his private Pleaſures could not be maintain'd with the ordinary Revenue. Therefore to make good the Expence of his own Errors, the King began to look narrowly into thoſe of his Subjects; that by this Art, in a manner, he might Sin upon free Coſt. And as it hath been a certain Obſervation, that the moſt delicate and voluptuous Princes have ever been the heavieſt Oppreſſors of the People; Riot being a far more laviſh Spender of the common Treaſure, than War or Magnificence; ſo thoſe Parts of the King's Life, which were wanton'd away with variety of Delights, are noted to have been ſevereſt. But perhaps the Subjects repents not the free Gifts of the Kingdom's Subſtance, when he ſees the Return of it in Triumph; but repines if the leaſt Part of his Contribution be the Reward of Paraſites, or Perſons to whom Fortune, not Merit gives a Growth. And Hiſtorians likewiſe have more Leiſure to examine the Crimes of Princes in the Silence of Peace, than in the Noiſe of War: Or elſe Princes want

Op-

A. D. 1478. Reg. 18.

Opportunity to incloſe their Thoughts to the Study of private Gain, when the Soldier in a Manner lays the Wealth of the Kingdom open, and makes a Common of every Man's particular Treaſure. For now the King began to cauſe the Pœnal Laws to be put in Execution, and wanting higher Aims, to look downward into every ſordid Way of enriching himſelf; ſo that a general Fear poſſeſſed the People, that his after-Government would be both ſharp and heavy, conſidering the firſt Part of it was not without a foul Blemiſh in that Kind. For in the Seventh Year of his Reign, he proceeded againſt many of the wealthieſt Citizens with ſo much Severity, that it was reputed Tyranny. The chief of them were Sir Thomas Cook, Sir John Plumer, Knights, Humphrey Hewward and other Aldermen. And their Crime was, their having given Aſſiſtance to King Henry: Which, conſidering the Circumſtance of Things could hardly bear any capital Accuſation had it been clearly proved: But againſt theſe Men there was no Teſtimony but what was forc'd with Torture; and even that Teſtimony, not high enough to bring them to the Bar; yet the King commanded them to be arraign'd of High Treaſon at Guild-Hall; and withal expreſſed an earneſt Deſire, that upon any Terms they might be found guilty. Their Wealth being the principal Witneſs that gave Evidence againſt their Lives: But the Jury well directed by Sir John Marckham, Knight, chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, acquitted them of their Treaſon: Which, nevertheleſs releaſed them not, their Eſtates however were found guilty, and the greateſt Part eſcheated to the King. With the Offenders the Judge was condemn'd, and becauſe he preferr'd his Integrity before a ſevere Command, made Forfeiture of his Dignity.

K. Edward's Severity to Sir Tho. Cook, Judge Marckham and others.

Judge Markham's Juſtice.

The Memory of theſe Carriages heretofore, in a Buſineſs that concern'd the Life of a Man reputed innocent, drew the World into much Fear that he would now decline to Rigour. Neither was the King totally excuſed, although this cruel Avarice was laid to the Queen, who, having a numerous Iſſue and Kindred, by Favour raiſed up to the higheſt Titles, was almoſt neceſſitated for Supportance of their Honours, to wrack the Kingdom. And happily the univerſal Malice that waited on her and hers, ſerv'd well for the King; they being as a Screen between him and the unwholeſome Air of Envy, which otherwiſe might have endanger'd his Reputation with the People.

The Queen blam'd for the King's Severity.

From this rugged Way of Governing, he was ſoon diverted by Neceſſity to look abroad, and perhaps by the Gentleneſs of his Nature, or Repentance of his former Severity. For the Face of the World adjoyning began on the ſudden to change, and while the Kings of England and France were dividing the Territories of the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, a Third ſtep'd in, and got Poſſeſſion of her and her rich Country, Maximilian, Archduke of Auſtria, Son to the Emperor Frederick III. entertain'd heretofore politickly by Duke Charles, was now ſeriouſly invited to this Marriage. For the Lady diſpairing to receive Succours from the Engliſh, to the Affection of whom ſhe was perhaps inclined by the Neighbourhood of the Country, and Perſwaſion of the Dutcheſs Dowager, whom deſervedly ſhe much honour'd, condeſcended in the end to the Deſire of her Subjects, who ever laboured to marry her to ſome Prince of Germany, in regard of the Nearneſs in Language, and Concordance in Diſpoſitions. And although the hereditary Countries of this Prince lying far remote, were unlike to be any Support to her weakned State; yet conſidering him as Son to the Emperor, and in all Probability like to ſucceed (for in an elective Kingdom ſcarce ever is the Heir put by, if equally deſerving) he might appear neceſſary to her preſent Affairs. For he was young, of a noble Spirit, ſtrong and healthful in Conſtitution, bold in any Attempt of Honour, and what won upon the Affections of the Low-Country Men, extraordinary affable and courteous. I know both his Actions and the Hiſtories of that Time deliver him to us of no deep Judgment, and ſo negligent, that he ever left Things imperfect, oftentimes in main Buſineſs betrayed by his Credulity. But this I impute to him as an Error of the Climate under which he was born, and a certain generous Honeſty, which is above Suſpicion. The Motion of this Marriage was embraced with much Joy, to the Accompliſhment of which he inſtantly prepared. Neither could King Lewis with all his Engines batter the Reſolution of the Emperor, who, tho' a moſt paſſionate Lover of Peace, (which oftentimes he bought with Loſs) ran the Hazard of a War from France, rather than let his Son loſe the Advantage of ſo great a Country. And ſuddenly ſent him to the Dutcheſs, attended by many great Commanders, who among a People ſo oppreſſed with Arms, would be the beſt Witneſſes of a Marriage. His Preſence, altho' it did not abſolutely turn the Stream of Fortune, yet gave a Stay to the French Conqueſts: And after he appear'd in the Quarrel, Victory doubtfully inclin'd, ſometimes flattering Maximilian, at other Times King Lewis. Maximilian by his brave Valour, overtaking Lewis, who had the Start in Experience and Policy: So that frequent Truces were concluded between them, and unfaithfully obſerv'd; the firſt Opportunity of Advantage renewing the War.

Dutcheſs of Burgundy married to Maximilian the Emperor Frederick his Son.

A. D. 1479. Reg. 19.

K. Lewis endeavours to hinder the Marriage, but could not.

Lewis handled theſe Buſineſſes apart, never admitting King Edward, tho' he ever officiouſly labour'd to intereſs himſelf in them, into any Part of the War or Peace. For, as he knew the Strength of his Underſtanding ſuch, that he in Treaty could loſe nothing by the Arch-Duke; ſo he well conſider'd, that the ſafeſt Way to preſerve the Engliſh in Amity, was to keep them at home. Whereupon, he frequently entertain'd the King with Embaſſies full of Courteſie; ſuch as might appear rather the Arguments of a ſincere Friendſhip than the forc'd Expreſſions of Ceremony; and ever communicated with him his private Counſels, requiring his faithful Advice; when indeed he reſerv'd his Reſolutions of any high Nature wholly to himſelf, and always in the Conduct of Affairs, tho' he would liſten to the Opinion of King Edward, he ſtill obeyed his own. But this, with his other Arts continu'd his Reputation good with the Engliſh, and purchaſed that Quiet, he ſuſpected might by our Arms be interrupted.

K. Edward not concern'd in the Burgundian War.

And what render'd his Security the more, Troubles began between us and Scotland; which we may well believe he underhand increaſed. The Occaſion of them was, the evil Inclination and ungovern'd Spirit of James III. who diſdaining to liſten to the temperate Counſels of ſober Men, obeyed only his own Judgment, which his Paſſion threw headlong into raſh Attempts. The Freedom of Advice by the Lords of that Country uſed toward their Princes, render'd the Speaker hateful; and frequently was rewarded with Impriſonment or Exile, if not with Death. Among the Multitude of them caſt

K. Edward inſtigated to a War with Scotland by the Duke of Albany, who was baniſhed by the King of Scots.

A. D. 1479. Reg. 19. caſt out of Favour by him, Alexander, Duke of Albany, the King of Scotland's Brother, baniſh'd into France, reſented the Injury, and endeavour'd Revenge. So that as he paſt thro' England towards his Exile, being admitted to the King, by all Arguments he incenſed him to a War, which could not but prove moſt ſucceſsful, the Hatred of the Commons conſider'd, againſt ſo violent an Oppreſſor. And he proteſted, That he knew the King fallen into ſo low Eſteem even with thoſe he cheriſh'd, and into ſuch Hatred with all Mankind, that if aſſaulted by the Engliſh, he would be conſtrain'd by Submiſſion of his Crown to intreat for Safety.

War with Scotland determined, and the Duke of Glouceſter ſent General.

This Importunity of the Duke of Albany ſoon prevail'd with the King; who by many Injuries had been exaſperated, and had only waited Opportunity to make War upon Scotland. For the Borders on the Engliſh Side had been often infeſted, and upon Complaint no Redreſs, nor Reparation of Damage made. Moreover, the King having heretofore condeſcended, upon a Motion from King James, That his Second Daughter the Lady Cicily, ſhould marry James, Prince of Scotland, and upon the Agreement paid in a large Part of the Portion, had receiv'd no Satisfaction to his Expectation; the Articles of Marriage neither being performed, nor yet the Money lent upon the Bonds of the Provoſt and Merchants of Edenburgh, according to Covenants repayed. He was therefore the ſooner won to undertake the Buſineſs, which he committed to the Order of the Duke of Glouceſter, who now had no Competitor in Greatneſs both of Judgment and Power: No Prince of the Houſe of York remaining, but ſuch whom the Want of Years, or Love of Eaſe indiſpoſed to Action. For the King willing to decline Labour, waved the Expedition; and Glouceſter ambitious to gain Opinion, eſpecially with the Soldier, moſt forwardly undertook it. The King deſired to live to the beſt Advantage of his Pleaſure; Glouceſter of his Honour. And indeed, Glouceſter began now like a cunning Phyſician, to examine the State of the King's Body; which, tho' he found ſtrong and healthful, and by the ordinary reckoning of Men likely to continue many Years, yet withal he obſerv'd evil Symptoms of Death in him, being overgrown with Fat, and both in his Diet and Luſt ſubject to Diſorder: Diſorder a greater Enemy to Mankind, and which hath deſtroyed more than Age, the Sword, or Peſtilence. This Glouceſter perceiv'd, and hence drew Poiſon, which ſwell'd his Ambition higher.

A. D. 1480. Reg. 20. He therefore with much Alacrity prepared for the War, and with the Title of Lieutenant General, ſoon after ſet forward toward Scotland. The Army conſiſted of 22500, all commanded by Men of great Authority and Experience. Of the Nobility in his Retinue went Henry, Earl of Northumberland; Thomas, Lord Stanley, Lord Steward of the King's Houſe; the Lords Lovell, Graiſtock, Fitzhugh, Nevill, and Scroope of Bolton: Of Knights, Sir Edward Woodvile, Brother to the Queen; Sir William Par, Sir John Elrington, Treaſurer of the King's Houſe; Sir James Harrington, Sir John Middleton, Sir John Dichfield and others. The particular Names of whom I mention, only to ſhew how great a Shadow Glouceſter began to caſt toward the Sunſet, both of the King's Glory and Life. The Vanguard was led by the Earl of Northumberland, the Rereward by the Lord Stanley, the main Battle by the Duke himſelf; in whoſe Company was the Duke of Albany; Glouceſter willing perhaps to have him ſtill in Sight, leaſt if apart, with Sale of the Army, he might purchaſe his own Peace.

Duke of Glouceſter marches againſt Scotland with an Army.

A. D. 1480.

Their firſt Attempt was upon Berwick (ſurrendred heretofore by Queen Margaret to gain a Sanctuary for King Henry, when he was expell'd England) into which, partly by Terror of their Forces, partly by the Suddenneſs of their Approach, they enter'd without Oppoſition. The Town was ſoon at their Diſcretion; but the Caſtle, the ſtrongeſt Fort then in the North, by the Earl Bothwel, was made good againſt all Battery. Glouceſter foreſeeing by the Strength both of the Place, and the Commanders Reſolution, that this Siege would ſpend much Time, committed the Charge to the Lord Stanley, Sir John Elrington, and Sir William Par, with 4000 Soldiers; while he with the Body of the Army march'd higher into Scotland, perſwaded, as indeed it happened, that they might force the King of Scotland either to an inglorious Flight, or elſe for Safety to lock himſelf up in ſome ſtrong Hold. By which they might ſo impriſon him, that his Releaſe ſhould not be without a full Diſcharge for all Injuries both againſt England and the Duke of Albany. And according to Expectation it happen'd, the King upon the firſt Rumour of an Enemy, incloſing himſelf in the Caſtle of Edenburgh. For in his Government having not ſtudied the Safety of his People (which is the ſupream Law given to Kings) he found himſelf now forſaken by them, ſo far, that in Oppoſition to the Engliſh, againſt whom the Scots ever ſhewed a fair Reſolution, no Army now took the Field, the Country lying open to the Mercy of the Invader.

Reg. 20. Berwick gain'd by th- Engliſh.

King of Scots forſaken for his Tyranny.

Glouceſter therefore, burning many Towns by the Way to ſtrike a Terror in the Inhabitants, march'd directly to Edenborough; into which he entred, receiving ſuch Preſents as the Citizens offer'd to him; for at the Intreaty of the Duke of Albany, he ſpared the Town from Spoil. His Entry was only a Spectacle of Glory, the People applauding the Mercy of an Enemy, who preſented them with a Triumph, not a Battle; and welcom'd him as a Prince, who took Arms not for Prey or Malice, but for the Safety of a neighbouring Kingdom, diſorder'd and laid waſte more by the Licenſe of a Tyrant in Peace, than it could have been by the Hand of War. The Lords of Scotland conſidering the Danger of their State, and deſirous to prevent Ruin, ſent from Hadington to the Duke of Glouceſter to intreat a Suſpence of Arms, and to deſire a firm Peace in future. They there offer'd, if the Occaſion of beginning this War, were as it was pretended; to give the Engliſh full Satisfaction: So that he could have no Colour of continuing in Hoſtility, but only a Deſire to execute his Indignation upon a Country, already ſufficiently deſtroy'd. For concerning the Marriage, they were prepared when it ſhould pleaſe the King of England to accompliſh it; and for any other Injury offer'd to the Engliſh, they were ready to make Reſtitution. The Duke of Glouceſter return'd in Anſwer, That his coming thither was to right the Honour of his Country, often violated by the Scots, and reſtore the Duke of Albany unjuſtly commanded to Exile, to his native Soil and the Dignity of his Birth. As for the Marriage of the Prince of Scotland with the Daughter of England, he knew not how his Brother's Reſolution ſtood at the preſent: Whereupon he required Repayment of the Money lent to their King upon the firſt Agreement; and withal a delivery of the Caſtle of Berwick up into his Hands; without which he proteſted to come to no Accord.

Duke of Glouceſter's Mercy to the Scots.

A Peace concluded with Scotland.

A. D. 1480. Reg. 20.

Accord. But the Scottiſh Lords laboured by all Means to have avoided the Surrender of a Place ſo important, by pretending how anciently it ever appertain'd to their Crown, by parting with which now they ſhould appear at too dear and baſe a Price, to have purchaſed Peace. No Argument could prevail againſt Glouceſter's Reſolution; whereupon they yielded Berwick, with Covenant too by no Art hereafter to labour the Reduction of it. They likewiſe appointed a Day for Reſtitution of all thoſe Monies lent by King Edward, and promiſed upon a full Diſcuſſion, to make Satisfaction for all Damages done the Engliſh by any Inroad of the Scottiſh Borderers. And for the Duke of Albany's Proviſion, whoſe Safety in this Expedition was principally pretended; (n) a general Pardon for him and his Followers was granted, together with an Abolition of all Diſcontents: Whereby he was reinveſted in all his former Dignities and Places; and by conſent of the Nobility of Scotland proclaim'd Lieutenant of the Kingdom.

Duke of Albany reſtored.

Duke of Glouceſter engages the Duke of Albany to his Friendſhip.

With this Lord the Duke of Glouceſter endeavour'd to make a moſt entire Friendſhip, and by all Induſtry imploy'd for his Advancement in Authority, ſtudied how to make him firm to his Purpoſes, if Occaſion ſhould hereafter preſent it ſelf to require his Aid: And queſtionleſs, howſoever the Fortunes of theſe two Dukes accorded not in every Point, yet there was in their Ambitions ſome kind of Sympathy. Both being Brothers to Kings, and both the Kings by the Inſolency or Licenciouſneſs of their Actions become obnoxious to a publick Scandal. But Albany had the Advantage in a more deſerv'd and univerſal Hatred to the King his Brother, whereby he might not improbably expect to be King in Fact, however his Brother were in Title. And Glouceſter had the Start in that the King's Brother's Eaſe apparently tended to the ſhortning of his Life; and then he, remaining the only Prince of the Blood fit to govern, was not unlikely to govern as King both in Fact and Title. To the Advancement of ſuch a Deſign, a perfect Amity with Scotland, Glouceſter could not but imagine moſt neceſſary.

Duke of Glouceſter returns to London, and with great Applauſe is receiv'd.

Having therefore ſettled Buſineſſes there with all increaſe of Glory to the Engliſh Name, (and by Conſequence to his own) he return'd to Berwick; which according to the former Agreement had been yielded to the Lord Stanley. Thence in all Solemnity of Greatneſs he came towards London, to yield an Account of his proſperous Enterprize. By the Way he permitted the Honour of this Action to be divulged with the greateſt Applauſe, thereby to inſinuate his Reputation into the Opinion of the Commons; and to ſhow how much more nobly he in this Expedition againſt Scotland had managed the Peace for the Honour of the Engliſh Nation, than his Brother had in his Undertaking againſt France. Conſidering that in Lieu of a little Money, which King Edward got from King Lewis, he had taken the only Place of Strength whereby the Scots might with Safety to themſelves have endanger'd us, and brought them to what Conditions he pleaſed, forcing the King to immure himſelf, while the Engliſh at Liberty ſpoil'd the Country, and poſſeſſed themſelves of his capital Town of Edenborough. And farther by Glouceſter's Flatterers it was urged, that if their General had but had Commiſſion ample enough, he would not have return'd without Reduction of the Kingdom of Scotland to the Crown of England. Obedience to a ſuperior Command fixing ſo ſudden a Period to his Actions. And certainly in this Expedition the Duke of Glouceſter laid the Foundation of all his after-Atchievements: For here having by a free Spoil of every Town, except only Edenborough, purchaſed the Affection of the common Soldiers, whoſe Aim in War is Gain and Licenſe; and by ſober Order and great Courage, together with a brave Zeal ever to bring Honour to his Side, won Eſtimation from the Nobler Sort; he began to imagine himſelf reputed generally only unhappy in wanting a good Title to the Kingdom. The Difference between him and his Brother, was, that the one poſſeſſed, the other deſerv'd the Crown. And his Thoughts farther flatter'd him, that it could not prove hereafter Difficult, upon any handſome Occaſion to perſwade the People, who already thought him Worthy, alſo to think it fit to make him King.

Duke of Glouceſter's Ambition.

But theſe his black Intentions came not yet to Light; and indeed they were ſo monſtrous, that they would not only have manifeſted the Uglineſs of their Shape had they now appear'd; but like imperfect and deform'd Births, been buried, as ſoon as produced. Cunningly therefore by Pretences of a moſt ſerious Love to his Brother, and publickly aſcribing the whole Glory of the Action to his Direction, he declin'd Suſpicion. Being welcom'd by the King with all the Demonſtrations of Joy, who congratulated his own Felicity in having with ſo little Charge and no Loſs, tamed all the Inſolency of the Scots, and reduced Berwick. He therefore to ſhow how much he approv'd the Conditions of the Peace, went ſolemnly in Proceſſion from St. Stephen's Chappel, accompany'd with the Queen and a mighty Retinue of the greateſt Lords, into Weſtminſter-Hall; where in Preſence of the Earl of Angus, the Lord Grey, and Sir James Liddall, Embaſſadors extraordinary from Scotland, the Peace was ratified.

Duke of Glouceſter's pretended Affection to the King.

King Edward's obliging Carriage to his Subjects in the End of his Reign.

During the War with Scotland, and after the Concluſion of this Peace, the King diſcover'd to the People his natural Diſpoſition. Which being bountiful and Courteous, far from the proud State then in Practice with the Tyrants of the Eaſt; begot a general Affection, and made the Subject, comparing their Felicity with the Miſery of their Fathers, to bleſs the preſent Government. The Adminiſtration likewiſe of the Laws being orderly, without Violence or Partiality, cauſed all the former Injuſtice to be caſt either upon the Licenſe of War, or the Predominancy of ſome Faction; and the King abſolutely acquitted in Mens Opinion. And even from Luſt, which was reputed his Boſom-ſin, towards the latter end of his Life, he was ſomewhat clear: Either Conſcience reforming him, or by continual Satiety grown to a Loathing of it: For the Abſtinence could not be imputed to Age, he at his Death not exceeding Two and Forty. But what endear'd him ſo much to the Affection of the People, and eſpecially to the Citizens of London, was his being rich by his Tribute from France, and therefore not likely to lie heavy on them; as likewiſe the ſo fam'd Bounty of his Hoſpitality; Two thouſand Perſons being daily ſerv'd in his Court at Eltham, where moſt ſolemnly he celebrated the Feaſt of the Nativity. And to recompence the great Love which in both Fortunes the Londoners had ſhow'd him, to his laſt Hour he uſed towards them a particular Kind-

King Edward's magnificent Court.

A. D. 1481.

(n) The Duke of Albany deſerted the Scots, and was choſen to be their Governour, Hol.

Reg. 21.

neſs

A. D. 1481. Reg. 21.

ness: Even ſo much, that he invited the Lord Mayor (o) and Aldermen, and ſome of the principal Citizens to the Forreſt of Waltham, to give them a Friendly not a pompous Entertainment. Where in a pleaſant Lodge they were feaſted, the King himſelf ſeeing their Dinner ſerv'd in: and by thus ſtooping down to a loving Familiarity, ſunk deep into their Hearts: Ordinary ſlight Courteſies, order'd thus to the beſt Advantage, taking more often even with ſound Judgments than churliſh Benefits. And that the Sex he always affected might not be unremembred, he cauſed great plenty of Veniſon to be ſent to the Lady Mayoreſs and the Aldermen's Wives.

The Queen's Pride and Indiſcretion.

Thus was the Outward Face of the Court full of the Beauty of Delight and Majeſty; while the Inward was all rotten with Diſcord and Envy. For the Queen by how much ſhe conſider'd her ſelf more unworthy the Fortune ſhe enjoy'd, by ſo much ſhe endeavour'd in the exteriour height of Carriage to raiſe her ſelf; fooliſhly imagining Pride could ſet off the Humility of her Birth. She was likewiſe (according to the Nature of Women) Factious; as if her Greatneſs could not appear clear enough without Oppoſition. And thoſe ſhe oppoſed were the chieſeſt both in Blood and Power; the Weaker ſhe diſdaining to wraſtle with, and they fearful to conteſt with her. But what ſubjected her to an univerſal Malice, was the Rapine, which the neceſſary Proviſion of her Kindred engaged her to. For they being many and great in Title could not be ſupplied according to their Ambition, but by ſo common an Injury as made her Name odious through the Kingdom. Moreover the Lords of her Blood, by reaſon of their Nearneſs to the King's Children being inſolent, and in regard of their Youth, indiſcreet; frequently ran into thoſe Errors which betray'd them to the publick Scorn or Hatred. Againſt the Queen (for through her Kindred they aim'd at her) the Duke of Glouceſter, the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Haſtings, and others of the moſt ancient Nobility oppoſed themſelves. And to render both her and hers odious, Glouceſter laid the Death of the Duke of Clarence (which Fratricide himſelf moſt barbarouſly contriv'd) altogether upon their Malice; pretending a more than ordinary Caution for his own Safety, leaſt his Perſon might by the ſame Practices be brought in Danger. By which Calumny he both clear'd his own Reputation, and clouded the Fame of a Faction he endeavour'd ſo much to ruin. For this Side had much the Start in Opinion and Policy, over the other, who were Young, and unexperienced; and the Preſident of whoſe Council was a Woman.

The Queen's Enemies.

King Edward's Grief for the Quarrels among his Kindred.

To compoſe theſe Quarrels it begot the King much Trouble: Neither could he without extream Anxiety hear the continual Complaints of Perſons ſo conſiderable both in Power in the Kingdom, and Kindred to his Children, not knowing to how dangerous a Height this Diſcord in time might grow. But to increaſe his Diſcontent every Day his Jealouſie increaſed concerning King Lewis's Faith, who now began to unmask his Intention, and ſhow how much he had deluded the Engliſh. For having ever ſince Maximilian's Marriage with Mary, Dutcheſs of Burgundy, been upon unkind Terms with him; ſometimes at open War, other times in an unfaithful Truce, he was now growing to an abſolute Peace. And the Conditions were whiſper'd contrary to the Treaty at Picquigny, which made the King ſuſpicious they two might enter into ſome League prejudicial to the Honour of the Engliſh. For Maximilian having kept Lewis all the Life-time of his Lady, from any further incroach upon her Territories, and by his Fortune gotten into Opinion with the French, grew to be much deſired in the neareſt Friendſhip by them: And he having buried his Dutcheſs (who owed her Death to her Modeſty, in reſpect that having broke her Thigh by a Fall from a Horſe, ſhe denied to expoſe it to the Sight of Chirurgeons) was willing to ſtand upon good Terms with France. Knowing how ſlender and how unfaithful an Obedience thoſe Countries would yield to a Prince, who was to rule by Courteſie; ſince to their natural Lords, they had ever ſhewed themſelves Inſolent and Rebellious. Theſe Conſiderations prepared both Sides to Peace, and the Concluſion of it to beget a more perfect Amity was that the Lady Margaret, a Child of two Years Old, Daughter to Maximilian and the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, ſhould be affianced to the Dauphin, then upon the Age of Twelve. So that King Lewis in the Marriage of his Son, was ever moſt Diſproportionable; the Daughter of England as much too old, as this Lady too young; but indeed his End was the ſame with Charles, Duke of Burgundy and many other worldly Fathers, to match his Son for the beſt Advantage of his Profit and Convenience.

A. D. 1482. Reg. 22.

K. Lewis makes a Peace with Maximilian, D. of Burgundy.

Dauphin is affianced to his Daughter.

To confirm the uncertain Rumours of this Perjury in King Lewis, the Lord Howard return'd out of France, and made Relation, how he ſaw the Lady Margaret brought with all Pomp and Ceremony to Ambois and there married to Charles the Dauphin: And to heap yet more Injuries, not long after the Tribute hitherto ſo careſully paid was denied. The French now diſcloſing the innate Malice they bore the Engliſh, and with how little Scruple they could diſpence with the moſt ſolemn Oath, when no apparent Danger threatned the Crime: For though the Dauphin when he had attain'd to the Age of Conſent, might have broke off this Marriage; and it could have been only term'd an Act of Diſcourteſie; yet King Lewis who had ſworn to this Article with ſo much Ceremony, cannot be excuſed from a moſt foul Impiety.

K. Lewis breaks his Faith to King Edward.

Denies the Tribute.

But what Reaſon of State prevail'd with him, who heretofore awed by his Fears had condeſcended in a manner to compound for his Kingdom, thus now to ſlight the Engliſh, is not delivered in Hiſtory. And it may appear Difficult to imagine, conſidering King Edward was now; if poſſibly, more abſolute in his command at Home, his People better diſciplin'd, and no Appearance of an Enemy from Abroad. Add to that, his Coffers full, increaſt every Year by the Tribute from France, and his Reputation high by the Victory lately purchaſed againſt the Scots; a Nation though inferiour to the French in the Riches and Extent of Territory, yet in martial Courage equal; and in warring with whom, we have found more Sweat and Danger than with France. It is therefore hard to know the Cauſe of King Lewis's Proceedings in this injurious Way, if we look on our ſelves only as at Home: But if we conſider the State of Buſineſſes Abroad, we may eaſily diſcern his Policy. For now had the

The Cauſes of Lewis's Deceit.

(o) Sir Robert Chawry, he did it ſays Holinſhead, to encourage the Lord Mayor who being a great Merchant paid the King vaſt Sums for Cuſtoms, and had beſides entertain'd him very Magnificently before.

A. D. 1482. Reg. 22.

French Arts or the Change of Time quite diſſolved all our Confederacies, and left us to maintain with our own Arms our own Quarrel. St. Paul was annihilated, in whoſe Death expired all the Diſcontents of the factious Nobility in France.

Duke of Brittain mad.

The Duke of Brittain by an extream Melancholy (which ſcarce was reputed leſs than Madneſs) was become unfit for Government, much leſs for any great Attempt: And being overcharged by the Practices and Arms of the French, in a manner made Reſignation of his Dutchy to the Diſpoſition of ſome Officers eaſie to be corrupted. And Burgundy (which in the Victories of Henry the Fifth, had ſo much advanced the Engliſh Enterprizes) was by the laſt League with Maximilian wholly at the Devotion of the French. So that all they who heretofore had brought us over, were now either reduced to be unprofitable for our Aid; or elſe become Enemies, ſhould we renew our ancient Quarrel. Moreover the long Eaſe the King of England had lived in, and the Pleaſures with which he appeared altogether faſcinated, render'd him to the World nothing Formidable. And King Lewis having with ſo little Difficulty hitherto deluded him, and retain'd him in a kind of ſervile Amity, while he threw Injuries thick upon him; was now heighten'd to a Preſumption, that the Engliſh would either connive at this Affront, or that by ſome new Cunning they might be appeaſed, were the Indignity never ſo much reſented. And if the worſt ſhould happen, the French nothing fear'd the Enmity: Conſidering that King Edward alone would be unable to prevail againſt them ſeconded by the Forces of Maximilian, whom his Daughter now intereſſed in the War.

Theſe Conſiderations of Security to do Wrong according to the Nature of Wicked Princes, made King Lewis ſo boldly attempt it: And what was ſtrange in a Man ſo cunning, he left himſelf no Excuſe for the Fact, either in the Way of Honour or Conſcience: And ſcarce in human Policy. Unleſs his Expectation reach'd beyond common Reaſon, in thought that Prince Philip, Son to Maximilian, and the Dutcheſs (for ſhe was Mother only to a Son and a Daughter) might chance to die, and thus by the Lady Margaret all thoſe large Countries devolve into the Power of France. But how ſlight ſoever King Lewis's Opinion was of the Engliſh, this Breach of Faith was no ſooner related to King Edward, but he reſolv'd ſeverely to take Revenge.

K. Edward much incenſed at K. Lewis's Falſhood to him, and reſolves to revenge it upon him.

And calling together all the Council and Nobility, who for the Suddenneſs could be ſummon'd, he to this Purpoſe made a Declaration of his Wrongs, and Intentions how to right himſelf.

King Edward's Speech to his Council complaining of King Lewis's Deceit, and Reſolution to Correct it.

My Lords,

K. Lewis's Perjury.

THE Injuries I have received are divulged every where, and the Eye of the World is fix'd upon me, to obſerve with what Countenance I ſuffer. And I muſt confeſs they are of ſo ſtrange a Nature, that I remain rather amazed than enraged: Had I dealt with any Prince not civilized by Laws, or inured to Commerce; I had yet the Religion of ſo many Oaths, and the Reaſon of every Politick Circumſtance ſo clear, that I could no Way have ſuſpected this foul and fooliſh Breach of Faith, But in a Chriſtian King (and who pretends to be moſt Chriſtian) I have met with ſo horrid a Perjury, and ſo diſgraceful to our Nation; that as all Mankind muſt abhor him as barbarous, ſo in my own Particular I muſt neglect the principal Office of a Prince, if I omit to chaſtiſe him. Moſt of you (my Lords) are Witneſſes to the Solemnity of his Vows, when humbly he declined Ruin to his Kingdom: And I to avoid ſo great a Maſſacre as the War would have endanger'd, condeſcended to end all Controverſies by a Peace. My Clemency is now become my Scorn; and I reap Indignities where I ſow'd Favours. For this ungrateful Man: Prince I muſt not term him, who hath by Purjury forfeited that ſacred Title, and in Contempt of all Law both Human and Divine, denies not only the Marriage of the Dauphin to our Daughter, which would have prov'd ſo great an Honour to his Blood, and Security to his Kingdom; but even the annual Tribute of Fifty Thouſand Crowns; a ſlender Rent for ſo large a Country, as by our Permiſſion he hath hitherto enjoy'd.

A. D. 1482. Reg.

This Contumely I am reſolv'd to puniſh; and I cannot doubt Succeſs; Almighty God ſtrengthens ſtill his Arm, who undertakes a War for Juſtice. In our Expeditions heretofore againſt the French, what Proſperity waited upon the Engliſh Arms, is to the World divulged; and yet Ambition then appeared the chief Counſellor to War. Now beſide all that Right, which lid over Edward the Third our glorious Anceſtor, and Henry the Fifth our Predeceſſor, we ſeem to have a Deputation from Heaven, to execute the Office of the ſupream Judge in chaſtiſing the Impious.

King Edward's Reſolution to make War with France.

When we were laſt in France, an innate Fear in this falſe Man forced him down to a ſordid Purchaſe of Security: How low will a wicked Conſcience, (which even makes the Valiant, cowardly to tremble) bend him now? Now, when an implacable Reſolution for Revenge ſets a far ſharper Edge upon our Swords: Now when he hath no Hypocriſie left undiſcovered, nor Subterfuge for his former Perjury, nor Art to gain Belief to new Diſſimulation: Now, when our Ears ſhall be deaf to all Submiſſion, and when our Conſcience is ſo well reſolv'd for the Neceſſity of this War, that Mercy will be thought a vicious Lenity, and the moſt ſavage Cruelty but an Act of Juſtice.

K. Edward threatens a mercileſs Severity.

I need not repeat how much Age hath infirmed him (and indeed I think it was his Dotage committed this ſo fooliſh Crime): Nor yet how hated he is rendred Abroad by his unfaithful Dealings, and at Home by his ſevere Government. The Commonalty ſunk down by his heavy Impoſitions; the Nobility by his proud Neglect, exaſperated to deſire any Innovation. But we want not theſe Advantages; in the Juſtice of our Cauſe, and Valour of our People we have enough.

Lewis hated by his Subjects.

It is confeſſed our Confederacies are quite diſſolved: And I rejoice in that alone we ſhall undertake this great Buſineſs: For Experience in our laſt Attempt ſhow'd, that Princes of ſeveral Nations (however they pretend the ſame) have ſtill ſeveral Aims: And oftentimes a Confederate is a greater Enemy to the Proſperity of a War, than the Enemy himſelf: Envy begetting more Difficulty in a Camp, than any Oppoſition from the adverſe Army. Our Brother of Burgundy and Uncle of St. Paul are both dead. How little their Amity advanced us, nay how a juſt Jealouſie of their ſecret Practices hindered our Deſign then on France, you all may well remember. And how in our Return towards England, we had more Fear to have been aſſaulted by their traiterous Weapons, than by any Arms from the Enemy. But we will ſpare their Memory; they labour'd their own Safety, not our Glory. This I am ſecure, that as by Death they are render'd unprofitable to us, ſo likewiſe not dangerous. And as for Brittain, if his Weakneſs diſable him to our Aid, Confederacies miſchievous.

A. D. 1482. Reg. 22.

Aid, I am confident it will continue him a Neutral. Neither is it to be forgot, how ſecurely now we may leave England rather than heretofore: Conſidering our ſo entire Friendſhip with the Scots; whoſe Hoſtility was always ſharp upon us at Home when we attempted Victory Abroad.

But I detain you, by my Speech, to long from Action. I ſee the Clouds of due Revenge gather'd in your Brow, and the Lightning of Fury break from your Eyes: Which bodes Thunder againſt our Enemy. Let us therefore loſe no Time, but ſuddenly and ſeverely ſcurge this perjured Coward to a too late Repentance, and regain Honour to our Nation, and his Kingdom to our Crown.

War with France deſired and reſolv'd on

The Lords reſented the Affront with Indignation as high as the King's, and deſired that inſtant Preparations might be made for the War. But above all, the Duke of Glouceſter appear'd zealous in the Quarrel; expreſſing aloud his Deſire, That all his Eſtate might be ſpent, and all his Veins emptied in Revenge of this Injury. All the Court was preſently for the Deſign, and the whole Kingdom with a fierce Appetite deſired to arm: So that no Language was heard but Martial; and all the Gallantry was in new Armour, or other Conveniences for Service. The King moſt paſſionately purſued his Determination, and that very Spring reſolv'd to begin the War. But he was diverted on the ſudden from calling King Lewis to a Reckoning for this Crime; and ſummon'd by Death to give a ſtrict Account for all his own. Death arreſted him, and in the Space of not many Hours, inſtructed him in more than all the Oratory from Pulpits had done for Forty Years.

A. D. 1483. Reg. 23.

K. Edward ſuddenly ſeized with a mortal Sickneſs.

For as ſoon as he found himſelf mortally ſick, he began to conſider the Vanity of all his Victories, which with the Expence of ſo much Blood he had purchaſed, and at the Heart repented his too hard Bargin. He looked back upon the Beauty of his ſenſual Pleaſures, and now diſcern'd it was only fair in the outſide, inwardly rotten and deform'd. He caſt up the Accounts of his Tribute both at home and abroad, and all thoſe Treaſures gather'd either by Proſcription of his Enemies, or exacting from his Subjects, and found himſelf a Banckrupt. For till now, he wanted Leiſure to ſearch into that which moſt concern'd him; and being delighted too much in the Pomp and Pleaſure of the Inn where he was not to ſtay, forgot he had a Journey, and unawares was overtaken by Night, an endleſs Night which no Day ſucceeds.

His Behaviour in his Sickneſs and his laſt Advice.

Perceiving his Doom inevitable, and no Hope of the leaſt Reprive, he began to order Buſineſs as fully as the Shortneſs of the Time would licence. The great Affair of his Soul, and indeed the only that is neceſſary, he committed to the Mercy of his Redeemer; and by the Sacraments then in uſe with the Church of England, and real Contrition, he labour'd for a full Expiation of the Crimes and Errors of his Life. And as his Death is deſcrib'd to us by an excellent Author who liv'd near his Time; Almighty God ſeems to have ſtruck Water even from the Rock (as he Moſes's Wand by did for the Iſraelites) in touching this Prince to the Heart, and forcing a moſt religious Repentance, from a Soul obdurate in Sin, as we may conjecture by his Life.

A. D. 1483. Reg 23.

The Revenge of the Injury he receiv'd from K. Lewis, he referr'd to the Judgment of Heaven, whoſe Work it is to puniſh Perjury. And Lewis ſuffered for it according to his Demerit: For that Son, in marrying whom he ſo buſied his Imaginations, and ſlighted all Faith and Religion, liv'd but a ſhort Space, and died iſſueleſs. Not one Branch remaining of that great Tree, whoſe Root was in Perjury and Diſſimulation.

The ill Succeſs of perjurious Actions in Lewis of France.

K. Edward adviſes the Lords to Unity.

The Protection of the King and Kingdom he left to the Lords neareſt in Kindred to his Children, adviſing them, To Amity and Concord; by which the Nation would flouriſh in Greatneſs abroad and Safety at Home; the young King be ſecured from Flattery, and inſtructed in the beſt Diſcipline for Government; and they themſelves live in much Honour and Felicity, if united to advance the Commonwealth, and oppoſe all foreign Danger: Whereas Diſcord would beget Civil War, and that endanger Ruin So that this Chriſtian King like Chriſt himſelf, when he departed bequeath'd Peace to the World. And had this Doctrine been as zealouſly followed as it was utter'd, the ſucceeding Time had not been guilty of ſo many ſad Confuſions. But for the preſent a perfect Reconciliation appear'd, both Sides lovingly embracing, and proteſting all Amity for the future. So that with Comfort he forſook the World, and may well be ſaid to have deſerv'd a general Applauſe in this laſt Scene of his Life.

His Sorrow for the War he got the Crown by.

Among his Words of farewel at his Death, it is worthy Obſervation; That he ſolemnly proteſted his Repentance, for Obtaining the Crown with ſo much Blood, as the Neceſſity of the Quarrel ſpilt. Which certainly ſhews a moſt ſingular Piety, conſidering the indubitable Juſtice of his Title; and withal teacheth Princes a new Leſſon, That the Power of Sway, which great Men ſo ſuperſtitiouſly adore, is but the Idol of Folly and Ambition; whoſe Oracles delude the Living, but on our Death-beds we diſcern the Truth, and hate the Irreligion of our former Error.

The Cauſes of K. Edward's Death are variouſly reported, as firſt by Poiſon.

Concerning the Occaſion of his Death, there is much Variety of Opinion; for by ſeveral Authors, it is ſeverally imputed to Poiſon, grief, and Surfeit. They who aſcribe it to Poiſon, are the paſſionate Enemies of Richard, Duke of Glouceſter's Memory; who permit not Nature at that Time to have been obnoxious to Decay, but make the Death of every Prince an Act of Violence or Practice. And in regard this cruel Lord was guilty of much Blood, without any other Argument, condemn him for thoſe Crimes, from which he was however actually moſt innocent. The French affirm it to have proceeded from Grief conceiv'd upon Repudiation of his Daughter, and Detention of the Tribute. But they looking on our Affairs afar off, miſtake the Shadow for the Subſtance, deſiring perhaps that King Lewis ſhould kill a King of England by a new Weapon: And certainly Lewis did perſwade himſelf, that King Edward was ſlain this Way; and congratulated his Wit much in the Accident. But this carries not the leaſt Appearance of Probability (p). Great Sorrows kill for the moſt part ſuddenly, elſe by a languiſhing Decay of Nature; whereas King Edward died not preſently

Second, Grief.

(p) Philip de Comines writes Tout Soudainment il eſt mort & Comme par Melancholie du Marriage de Noſtre Roy, qui regne a Preſent, avec Madame Marqueſſe d' Auſtriche, & tantoſt apres qu il en eut des Nouvelles ill prit La Maladie. &c. He died on a ſudden, as one would think out of Melancholly for our King now reigning, his Marriage with the Princeſs Margaret of Auſtria; for as ſoon as he heard the News he fell ſick &c.

A. D. 1483. Reg 23.

upon the Report, nor yet grew Melancholly from this Injury, but a brave Anger fierce to ſeek Revenge. Moreover Grief hath then been obſerv'd moſt powerful over Life, when the Diſconſolate hath no Ear to which he may expreſs himſelf, and no Hope left for Remedy: Whereas King Edward breath'd forth Paſſions to his Council, and found in them a Sympathy both in the Sorrow and the Rage: And as for Revenge, certainly the State of England was never better prepar'd to exact it; the King being a valiant and fortunate Leader, the People inured heretofore to the Exerciſe of Arms, and never ſo forward to any Quarrel, as againſt the French, from whom they ever reaped Victory and Treaſure: And concerning Money, the Strength of an Army, the Exchequer was full enough, without any burdenſome Impoſition to begin the War.

Thirdly, A Surfeit the true Cauſe of his Death, and the Time of it.

It was therefore queſtionleſs a Surfeit brought this great Prince ſo ſuddenly to his end. For who obſerves well the Scope of his Pleaſure, finds it to have been placed much in Wantonneſs and Riot, the Two mighty Deſtroyers of Nature: And commonly by thoſe Exceſſes with which we ſolace Life, we ruin it. He died upon the Ninth of April 1483. (q) at his Palace of Weſtminſter, and was interr'd at Windſor. Sixtus the Fourth being Pope, Frederick the Third Emperor, Fredinand and Iſabella King and Queen of Arragon and Caſtile, John the Second, King of Portugal, James the Third, of Scotland, and Lewis Eleventh of France. Between whom and King Edward, as there was much Intercourſe in Buſineſs, ſo was there great Concurrence in Fortune. Both began and ended their Reigns in the ſame Years: Both were held in Jealouſie by the precedent Kings, Edward by King Henry, Lewis by his Father Charles the Seventh; both had Titles diſputable to the Crown. The Houſe of Lancaſter uſurping againſt Edward; the Houſe of England claiming againſt Lewis. Both were perplex'd with Civil War, and both ſucceſsful. Lewis infeſted by an inſolent Nobility; Edward by a Saint-like Competitor. Lewis victorious by Art, Edward by Courage. Both were rebell'd againſt by their own Brothers; Lewis, by Charles, Duke of Berry, Edward, by George, Duke of Clarence: And both took a ſevere Revenge, Lewis freeing himſelf from ſo boſom an Enemy, by poiſoning Charles; Edward by drowning Clarence. Both ended this Life with Appearance of much Zeal; Edward religiouſly, Lewis ſomething ſuperſtitiouſly. Both left their Sons, yet Children to inherit, who died Iſſueleſs, and left their Crown to their greateſt Enemies; Edward the Fifth to his Uncle Richard, Duke of Glouceſter, Charles, the Eighth, to his Kinſman Lewis, Duke of Orleans.

K. Edward's Parallel with K. Lewis.

But who looks upon the Lives of theſe Two Princes on the other Side, may, as in a Table which preſents ſeveral Faces, perceive as great Diſparity. But I am only to give you the Picture of King Edward without Flattery or Detraction; which is rare in Hiſtory, conſidering Authors faſhion for the moſt part Ideas in their Minds, and according to them, not to the Truth of Action form a Prince; which tho' happily it win Applauſe to the Writer, is a high Abuſe to the Reader.

A. D. 1483. Reg 23.

But this King was, if we compare his with the Lives of Princes in general, worthy to be number'd among the beſt. And whom, though not an extraordinary Vertue, yet, a ſingular Fortune made conſpicuous. He was born at Roan in Normandy, his Father at that Time Regent in France. The ſo fatal Diviſion between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter with him in a Manner having both its Birth and Growth; for as he, ſo the Faction of his Family gathered Strength. His Education was, according to the beſt Proviſion for his Honour and Safety, in Arms: A ſtrict and religious Diſcipline, in all Probability likely to have ſoftned him too much to Mercy, and a Love of Quiet.

K. Edward's Character. His Birth. Educations.

He had a great Extent of Wit, which certainly he owed to Nature: That Age bettering Men little by Learning, which howſoever he had wanted Leiſure to have receiv'd; the Trumpet ſounding ſtill too loud in his Ear, to have admitted the ſober Counſels of Philoſophy. And his Wit lay not in the Slights of Cunning and Deceit; but in a ſharp Apprehenſion, yet not too much whetted by Suſpicion.

Wit and Parts.

In Counſel he was judicious, with little Difficulty diſpatching much: His Underſtanding open to clear Doubts, not dark and cloudy and apt to create new. His Wiſdom look'd ever directly upon Truth, which appears by the Management of his Affairs both in Peace and War: In neither of which (as far as concern'd the politick Part) he committed any main Error. 'Tis true, he was over-reach'd in Peace by King Lewis, abuſed concerning the Marriage of his Daughter; in War by the Earl of Warwick, when upon Confidence of a final Agreement he was ſurpriz'd: But both theſe Misfortunes I impute to want of Faith in his Enemies, not of Judgment in him. Though to ſpeak impartially, his too great Preſumption on the Oath of a diſſembling Prince; and want of Circumſpection, a Reconciliation being but in Treaty, cannot ſcape without Reprehenſion.

His Judgment.

His Nature certainly was both noble and honeſt, which if rectified by the ſtrait Rule of Vertue, had render'd him fit for Example, whereas he is only now for Obſervation. For Proſperity raiſed him but to a Complacency in his Fortune, not to a Diſdain of others Loſſes, or a Pride of his own Acquiſitions. And when he had moſt Security in his Kingdom, and conſequently moſt Allurements to Tyranny, then ſhewed he himſelf moſt familiar and indulgent. An admirable Temper in a Prince, who ſo well knew his own Strength, and whom the Love of Riot neceſſitated to a Love of Treaſure, which commonly is ſupplied by Oppreſſion of the Subject.

His excellent Diſpoſition.

The heavy Fine laid upon Sir Thomas Cook, and his Diſplacing the Chief Juſtice Markham, blemiſheth him with Violence and Avarice. But that Severity, and the other, when he began to look into the Pœnal Laws, were but ſhort Tempeſts, or rather ſmall Overcaſtings, during the glorious Calm of his Government. And whatſoever Injury the Subject endured, was not imputed to the King, but to Tiptoft, Earl of Worceſter, and ſome under-Informers; or elſe to the Queen and her neceſſitous Kindred.

The Severity of his Reign not imputed to K. Edward.

(q) He reigned Twenty Three Years and One Month, and lived about Forty One Years.

A. D. 1483. Reg. 23.

dred. The World either judicially or elſe favourably diverting all Envy from his Memory.

His Courage and Conduct in War.

Great Judgment in leading his Armies, and Courage in fighting perſonally, ſpeaks him both a daring Soldier, and an expert Commander. And the many Battles he fought, in all which he triumph'd, make him as much to be admired for his military Diſcipline, as his happy Succeſs. Fortune not deſerving to have all his mighty Victories aſcribed to her Gift; Valour and good Conduct ſhare at the leaſt with her in the Fate of War. But as in Arms he appears moſt glorious to Poſterity, ſo likewiſe moſt unhappy: For all thoſe bloody Conqueſts he obtain'd, were againſt his own Nation; and the greateſt Adverſaries he overcame, were near in Conſanguinity to him; ſo that he may more properly be ſaid to have let himſelf Blood, than his Enemies; or rather for Preſervation of his own Body, to have cut off his principal and moſt neceſſary Limbs. For beſide thoſe many Princes of the Houſe of Somerſet, Buckingham, Exceſter, Oxford, Devonſhire, Northumberland, Weſtmerland, Shrewsbury, and finally the Tree it ſelf, and the only Branch, Henry the Sixth and his Son Prince Edward; He ſlew even the Earl of Warwick and the Marqueſs Mountague; Two Brothers, who having loſt their Father in his Quarrel, hazarded their Lives and thoſe mighty Poſſeſſions and Honours which peaceably they might have enjoyed, only to advance his Title. But this was rather his Fate than his Fault; and into this Sea of Blood he ſailed not voluntarily, but violently driven by the Tempeſts of his Fortune. And for the Cruelty laid to him in the Death of the Duke of Clarence, he was certainly wrought to it by the Practice, and the Miſinformation of an envious Faction in Court; the Horror of which Fatricide poſſeſſed him to the laſt Hour of his Life; frequently complaining againſt the unhappy Severity of his Juſtice, and againſt the hard Nature of his Counſellors, who would not interpoſe one Word to him for Mercy, whereby ſo black a Deed might have been prevented. But howſoever we may waſh away much of this Blood from his Memory, yet there continue many foul Stains upon it; ſince publick Miſchiefs ſeldom happen, but that the Prince, tho' not actually inocent, is in ſome Degree guilty.

The Cruelty to his Brother, the Duke of Clarence, a Trouble to him.

The Turk's Succeſs in Europe, his Grief.

As theſe ſo many Confuſions at Home were the Misfortune of his Time, ſo was Abroad that ſo ſcandalous Loſs of the Eaſtern Empire to the Turk. For though King Edward were not the Occaſion of ſo great Ruin to the Chriſtian Commonwealth, and this happen'd before he attain'd the Sovereignty, his Father being Head of the Faction; yet the civil Wars of England raiſed about the Quarrel which he was ſoon after to maintain, and the univerſal Diviſion among the Princes of the Weſt, gave Courage to the Infidels; and denied Succours to the miſerable Emperour oppreſſed by an over-potent Enemy. Whereby a City was prophaned, in which the Chriſtian-Faith had flouriſh'd without Interruption for a Thouſand Years. But as the Sea is ſaid to gain in another, if it loſeth in this Place: So about this Time Religion, by the ſingular Piety and Valour of Ferdinand and Iſabella, won Ground upon the Moors in Spain, whence not long after they were totally and (I hope) for ever expell'd.

His Care of Juſtice.

But when the War licenſed the King to attend his Government, we find the Adminiſtration of Laws juſt and equal; and many new Statutes enacted, wholeſome againſt Diſeaſes crept into the State; ſo that he appear'd diligent both to heal up any Wound, which the Tumults of his Reign had given the Commonwealth, and provident for the Health of future Ages. And certainly no Prince could Husband the Benefits of Peace better for the outward Magnificence; For his Glory was much in Hoſpitality, and a pompous Celebration of the principal Feaſts of our Redemption. In which Way of Bravery ſettling much of his Happineſs; he had been doubtleſs the moſt Fortunate of any King of the Norman Line, had he not fail'd in the Expectation of his Daughter's Marriage.

A. D. 1483. Reg. 23.

His Buildings.

His Buildings were few, but ſumptuous for that Time, or more properly but Reparations: Which are yet to be ſeen at the Tower of London, his Houſe of Eltham, the Caſtles of Nottingham and Dover: But above all at Windſor, where he built the new Chappel (finiſh'd after by Sir Riginald Bray a Knight of the Order) and indowed the College with mighty Revenues; which he gave not, but transferred thither; taking from King's-College in Cambridge, and Eaton-College a thouſand Pound by the Year to inrich this at Windſor.

His Children, and the Fate of his Sons Edward and Richard.

But our Buildings like our Children are obnoxious to Death; and Time ſcorns their Folly, who place a Perpetuity in either. And indeed the ſafer kind of Fate happen'd to King Edward in both theſe Felicities: His Poſterity like his Edifices, loſt in other Names. For his Two Sons, before they had ſurvived their Father, the ceremonious Time of Mourning, were themſelves inhumanely murder'd, and as obſcurely buried. His Eldeſt Daughter the Lady Elizabeth, was married to the Earl of Richmond, known by the Name of Henry the Seventh; whoſe Heir in a ſtrait Line not liable to any Doubt or Queſtion, is his moſt ſacred Majeſty, now glorious in Government of this Realm. The Younger Daughters were beſtowed, one in a Monaſtery, others upon inferior Lords. Cicily married John, Viſcount Wells: Anne, Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk: Bridget was a profeſſed Nun at Dartford: Mary was contracted to the King of Denmark, but died before Conſummation of Marriage: Margaret died an Infant: Katherine, married William Courtney, Earl of Devonſhire. But of none of theſe younger Princeſſes at this Day remains any Thing but their Memory: All dying iſſueleſs but the Lady Katherine, whoſe Poſterity failed likewiſe in the Third Deſcent. Henry her Son, Marqueſs of Exeter ſuffered by Attainder in the Reign of his Couſin German, Henry the Eighth, being not long before deſigned Heir Apparent to the Crown (an Honour fatal in England:) and his Son Edward untimely came to his Death at Padua in Italy, in the Reign of Queen Mary, by whoſe Favour he had regain'd his Father's Honours and Poſſeſſions.

His illegitimate Offſpring.

So that all the clear Stream from the Spring of York flows in the Houſe of Scotland: The troubled and impure runs in many Veins of the Engliſh Gentry. For by the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, he had an illegitimate Son, named Arthur, who by his Wife's Right was Viſcount Liſle, and dying without Iſſue-male, left to his Three Daughters and their Poſterity ſome Tincture of the Blood Royal.

His Luſts.

This Diſeaſe of his Blood was the Crime which procured both to his Government and Memory

A. D. 1483. Reg. 23.

Memory many hard Cenſures. For tho' ſome excuſe his Luſt, as a Sin, tho' black to the Eye of Heaven, yet no way generally injurious; in regard the Incontinency of one Man could not be ſo diffuſive as to wrong a Multitude: Nevertheleſs, who obſerves the Revolutions of Kingdoms, ſhall find no one Iniquity in Princes ſo puniſh'd. The Diſhonour of one Lady abuſed extending to the Diſgrace of ſeveral Families, and mighty Factions knitting together for Revenge: In the whole Stock of Injuries none being ſo cruel to human Nature, and which with leſs Patience can be diſſembled.

His Perjury.

His frequent Perjury, (a Sin, which ſtrikes like a Sword with two Edges, both againſt divine and humane Faith) was the Crime which render'd him moſt odious to the Society of Man. For impiouſly he appeared in this to brave Heaven, ſlighting all ſolemn Covenants made with God; and fooliſhly preferring before a holy Promiſe, a little Profit, or the Satisfaction of his Revenge. Which Crime, however for the preſent it might ſtand him in ſome Benefit, yet certainly it might have involv'd him in much Loſs in all after-Enterprizes, which depended upon his Faith. The Death of Wells and Dimmock, of Fauconbridge, of Somerſet, Lord Prior of St John's and others, were the Wounds Perjury gave his Soul, the Scars of which remain yet foul upon his Fame. But perhaps he thought no Faith was to be held with an Enemy, or promiſed not with Intention of Performance: An impious Equivocation; but then in Practice with his Neighbour Princes both of France and Burgundy: So that the Cuſtom may in ſome Sort ſeem to priviledge the Fault.

His Careleſneſs and Corfidence.

In his Youth he was ſo uncircumſpect, and even when he had the ſtrongeſt Arguments for Jealouſie, ſo over confident, that it engaged him to extream Difficulties, and endanger'd abſolute Ruin. But his Fortune, almoſt miraculouſly, made up all thoſe Breaches, which had been by his Careleſneſs and Preſumption laid open; and delighting ſomething wantonly to boaſt her Power and Favour to him, raiſed him then higheſt, when all the World, and almoſt his own Hopes forſook him. For preſently upon the Slaughter of his Father at the Battle of Wakefield, and the Overthrow of his great Supporter the Earl of Warwick at that of St. Albans: She inthron'd him in the Kingdom, making the Queen and all the Favourers of Lancaſter, when doubly victorious, retire as overcome; and the univerſal Acclamations of the People ſet the regal Diadem upon his Head; whoſe Father's Head at that Time, like a Traytor's was fixed upon the Walls of York, ſcorn'd with a Paper Crown. And afterward when from a mighty Prince he was become a miſerable Exile, forced by the Treaſon of his chiefeſt Counſellors and Powers of his greateſt Enemy to fly into Burgundy, where he likewiſe met with but a diſſembled Amity: She reſtored him to what at firſt ſhe gave: And whereas his Forces were ſo weak upon his Return into England, that deſpairing of more, he humbly only deſired to be inveſted in his Father's Dutchy, and vowed never to attempt the Crown: She violently forc'd it on him, proteſting, by the Mouths of the Nobility who reſorted to him at Nottingham) not to afford him Safety if he refuſed the Soveraingty; by which amorous Way of threatning, ſhe in a manner wooed him to accept, what he durſt not then hope to recover. And had the Appetite of Glory more prevail'd with him, than the Sence of Pleaſure, as far as we may conjecture of his Fortune, he might have extended his Victories over the World, which are now ſtraitned within the narrow Limits of our Iſland.

A. D. 1483. Reg. 23.

His Fortune.

The End of the Reign of King EDWARD the Fourth,

THE

THE Remarkable OCCURRENCES IN THE Reign of EDWARD the Fourth.

IN the beginning of this Government it rain'd Blood in Bedfordſhire, the red Drops appearing on ſome Linnen that was hung out to be dry'd. Hol.

Tho' it may ſeem below the Dignity of Hiſtory to take Notice of Faſhions in dreſs, yet we do not think any Thing that may entertain the Curious too trivial to be inſerted in this Place.

In the Seventh Year of the King's Reign, the People had an extravagant Way of adorning their Feet, which was thought of ſuch ill Conſequence, that a Proclamation was put forth againſt it. They wore the Beaks or Pikes of their Shooes ſo long, that it incumber'd them in their Walking, and they were forced to tie them up to their Knees; the fine Gentlemen did it with Chains of Silver, or Silver-gilt; and thoſe who could not afford to be at the Charge of them, with Silk Laces: Which ridiculous Faſhion had been in Vogue ever ſince the Year 1382, above Fourſcore Years, and now 'twas prohibited on the Forfeiture of twenty Shillings, and the Pain of Curſing by the Clergy.

This Year the King concluded a League with Henry K. of Caſtile, and John, K. of Arragon; at the Concluſion of which he allow'd that certain Cotſwold Sheep ſhould be tranſported into Spain, where the Breed ſo increaſed, and the Wool was ſo much finer than that of England, that King Edward's Complacency for the Kings of Spain has been very detrimental to his own Country.

In the Eleventh Year of his Reign, Anno 1471, William Caxton a Mercer of London, a Lover of Letters, and a good Hiſtorian for thoſe Times, Author of the Chronicle, call'd Fructus Temporum, brought the Art of Printing into England, and practiſed it firſt in Weſtminſter-Abby.

In his Seventeenth Year there was ſo dreadful a Plague, that Hiſtorians relate more People were deſtroy'd by it, than by Fifteen Years War before.

In his Nineteenth Year, Robert Bifield, Eſq; one of the Sheriffs of London, was fined Fifty Pound by the Court of Aldermen, for affronting the Lord Mayor, which it ſeems was only in kneeling too near him at Prayers in Paul's Church.

In the following Year two notorious Thieves were preſſed to Death for robbing St. Martin's Le Grand Church in London, and three others of the Gang hang'd and burnt.

In the Reigns of this King's Predeceſſors, Glory inſpired the Engliſh Nobility with Valour, and produced many Heroes: Ambition, Envy and Revenge did the ſame now. Faction made the Barons of England Enemies to one another, and Hatred and Envy animated them to ſuch daring Actions in deſtroying each other, that one would think their Courage was as Invincible as their Hate. Of theſe the moſt Famous on the Part of King Henry were,

Henry and Edmund Beaufort, Dukes of Somerſet; Henry Piercy, Earl of Northumberland; Thomas Courtney, Earl of Devonſhire; James Butler, Earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond; John, Earl of Oxford, his Son the Lord Aubrey Vere, and the Brave and Loyal Lord John, Earl of Oxford his other Son and Succeſſor; the Lord Hungerford, the Lord Roſs, the Lord Molins; John Holland, Duke of Exeter; the Lord Clifford; Ralph Nevil, Earl of Weſtmoreland; the Lord Wells; the Lord Bardolf; the Lord Fitz Walter; Sir Ralph Piercy; Sir John Nevill; Sir Henry Nevill, Son to the Lord Latimer; Sir Ralph Grey, and Sir Robert Wells, Son to the Lord Wells. Theſe all died for the Cauſe of the Houſe of Lancaſter, except the Earls of Wiltſhire and Oxford.

On King EDWARD's Part the moſt Eminent were,

John Tiptoft, Earl of Worceſter; the Earl of Rivers, and his Son Sir Anthony Woodville; William, Earl of Kent; the Lord Cobham; Henry, Lord Bourchier; the Lord Audley; the Lord Clinton; William, Lord Haſtings, his Chamberlain and Favourite; the Lord Scroop; Sir Walter Blunt; William, Lord Herbert; Sir Richard Herbert; Sir Thomas Burroughs; Sir John Howard; the Lord Say; and Sir Richard Walgrove. The greater Part of theſe loſt their Lives in the Quarrel of the Houſe of York.

The following Lords were ſometimes on the One Side, and ſometimes on the Other; but at laſt they all dy'd in Defence of the Claim of the White Roſe, as the Lancaſtrians were term'd, and the Yorkiſts the Red.

The firſt of theſe and of all the Engliſh Hero's was Richard Nevill, Earl of Warwick, ſurnam'd the King-Maker. He was a chief Inſtrument in depoſing King Henry and crowning King Edward: In expelling King Edward and reſtoring King Henry; of the ſame Principles were his Brother John, Marquis Mountacute; John, Lord Wenlock; Thomas Nevill, call'd the Baſtard of Falconbridge; and Sir William Terrell, equally Famous for their Courage and Inconſtancy.

Nicholas Kenton of Suffolk, Provincial of the Carmelites in England.

Henry Parker, a Carmelite Fryer of Lancaſter, who preach'd againſt the Pride of the Prelates, for which he was impriſon'd with one Thomas Holden.

John Gunthorpe, Dean of Wells, and Keeper of the Privy-Seal. He travell'd into Italy, where he ſtudied Rhetorick under Guarinus of Ferrara.

Dr. William Ivy, Prebend of Pauls.

Thomas Wilton, Dean of Pauls.

Juliana Bemes, a Lady who wrote ſeveral Treatiſes of Hawking and Hunting, the Laws of Arms and Heraldry.

John Stamberie, a Weſt-Country-man, Biſhop of Hereford.

John Slueleie, Provincial of the Auguſtine Fryers.

Sir John Forteſcue, Lord Chief Juſtice of England, wrote ſeveral Treatiſes of Law and Politicks.

Fryer Rochus, born in London, but ſtudied in Paris. He was a Poet.

John Phreas ſtudied under Guarinus of Ferrara, became very Eloquent, and was an eminent Phyſician and Lawyer.

Walter Hunt, a Carmelite Fryer, one of the Engliſh Deputies at the Council of Ferrara, where he diſputed with the Greeks in Defence of the Diſcipline and Ceremonies of the Roman Church.

Thomas Wigenhall, a Monk of Durham.

Dr. John Hambois, a Doctor of Muſick.

John Tiptoft, Earl of Worceſter, wrote divers Treatiſes on various Subjects; He was beheaded in the Year 1471, by Order of the Earl of Warwick for ſiding with this King.

John Milverton, a Carmelite Fryer of Briſtol, Provincial of his Order thro' England, Scotland and Ireland. He defended ſome of his Fryers who were perſecuted for writing againſt endowing the Church with Temporal Poſſeſſions; for which, being an unpardonable Crime, he was cited to Rome, impriſon'd in the Caſtle of St. Angelo, and had not his Liberty till three Years after, when he was deliver'd by Sentence of the Cardinals appointed to be his Judges.

David Morgan a Welſh Man, Treaſurer of the Church of Landaff, wrote a Diſcription of Wales and of its Antiquities.

John Shirwood, Biſhop of Durham.

Thomas Kent, an excellent Philoſopher.

Robert Huggen, a pretended Prophet of Norfolk.

Dr. John Maxfield, a learned Phyſician.

William Green, a Carmelite Fryer.

Thomas Norton of Briſtol, a Chymiſt.

Dr. Rich. Porland, a Franciſcan Fryer of Norfolk.

Dr. Thomas Milling, Biſhop of Hereford.

Mr. Scogan, a Student of Oxford, a celebrated Wit according to thoſe Times: He was ſent for to Court, and diverted the King, Queen and Courtiers with his Frolicks and Jeſts.

Thoſe that follow were Hiſtorians.

Nicholas Mountacute, A. M. of Eaton School.

Roger Albanus, a Carmelite of London.

William Caxton, a Mercer of London, whom we have elſewhere mention'd: he wrote a Hiry ſtil'd Fructus Temporum, an Appendix to Treviſa, and tranſlated ſeveral Books into Engliſh.

John Harding, Eſq; wrote a Chronicle in Engliſh Verſe: Wherein he collected all the Homages paid by the Scots Kings to the Kings of England, proving the Superiority of the Crown of England over that of Scotland.

John Rouſe of Warwickſhire, a Canon of Oſnay, who dy'd Anno 1491.

THE

E. Lutterell delin.
P. Vanderbanck Sculp.
KING EDWARD THE V.th

THE LIFE and REIGN OF K. EDWARD V. AND RICHARD III.

By Sir THO. MOOR.

An. Reg. I. 1483.

BY the Death of King Edward IV, the firſt Prince of the York Line, the Inheritance of the Crown deſcended by the Right of Succeſſion to his Eldeſt Son Edward, then Prince of Wales, who from that Day (viz. April 9. 1483.) was ſtil'd King of England, and proclaim'd ſuch by the Name of Edward V. being then about 13 Years of Age. (a) In his Father's Sickneſs, which was ſomething long, and tho' lingring was judg'd mortal, Neceſſities of State, and the Peace of the Nation had oblig'd that King to ſeparate his Nobles and Kindred from him; which gave them an Opportunity of forming new Contrivances and Schemes among themſelves to be put in Execution after his Death; which, notwithſtanding the King's Foreſight and Endeavours to prevent, prov'd fatal to his Son. The Prince of Wales himſelf was ſent down to Ludlow in Shropſhire, that by his Preſence he might Compoſe the Diſorders of the Welſh; who, tho' not in actual Rebellion, yet were grown ſo Unruly, and Diſobedient to their Governours and Superiors, that the Magiſtrates with all their Power, were not Able to ſuppreſs the Diſſentions and Diſorders, Robberies and Wrongs committed by them. The Wiſdom of this Action appear'd in the preſent Effect it had upon them: for the Welſh, who have always been very Affectionate to thoſe Princes, who have born the Title of their Principality, as being Memorials of their Ancient Liberty and Dominion, ſhewed a wonderful Reſpect to him; and tho' but a Child, were more Obedient to him, than ever they were known to their Ancient Magiſtrates. The Queen, who had a mighty Sway over the King's Affections, and never more than at this time, had ſo framed Matters, that for the Security of her Son, the Prince, as well as for their Honour and Intereſt, all her own Kindred and Relations were placed in the greateſt Offices about him; by which Contrivance ſhe thought to ſecure his Right and their Power, againſt all her and their Enemies: for the Queen's Brother Anthony Woodvile Lord Rivers, a Wiſe and Valiant Man, was appointed his Governour; and Richard Lord Grey, the Queen's Son by her former Husband, with others of her Friends and Kin, had other Offices about him; and that London the Regal Seat might be kept to her Son's Intereſts, in his Abſence, Thomas Grey her Eldeſt Son, being created Marqueſs Dorſet, was made Governour of the Tower, and not only the Arms of that Magazine, but the King's Treaſure put into his Hands. Theſe things the Ancient Nobility of the Nation, of whom Henry Stafford Duke of Buckingham, and William Lord Haſtings, Chamberlain to King Edward, were the Chief, bore with much Indignation, as knowing, that if the Queen, and her Kindred were ſo inſolent and imperious when they had a King over them, who, tho' too willing to yield to their Humours and Deſires for the Queen's Sake, yet kept them within ſome Bounds of Modeſty and Subjection, they would grow moſt intolerable when they had a Young Prince under their Command, and might abuſe his Power as they pleas'd, to fulfil their Wills, and ſo they ſhould be in greater Danger and Contempt under the New King, than they had been under the Old; tho' even by him few of them were truſted, or regarded. Theſe Preſages of Unhappy Times, made them entertain the Thoughts and Reſolutions of getting the Prince into their Power, if the King ſhould Die, and to put him under the Government of the Duke of Glouceſter, who might juſtly Claim that Place, as the next Prince of the Blood, and their Uncle by Father's Side, and would certainly put 1483.

His Succeſſion, and Age.

State of Affairs at his Father's Death.

The Ancient Nobility's reſentments of her Actions.

The Queen's Contrivance for her Security and Succeſſion.

(a) This Unfortunate Prince was Born in Sept. 1470. His Mother, Queen Elizabeth, was Delivered of him in Sanctuary; whither ſhe was eſcap'd from the Earl of Warwick, who had driven her Husband King Edward out of England. The Abbot and Prior of Weſtminſter were his Godfathers, the Lady Scroop his Godmother, and the whole Ceremony of his Chriſtning as mean as a Poor Man's Child.

1483. the Affairs of the Nation into the Right Current, by Honouring and Entrusting the Ancient Nobility more. But whether they had Communicated their Designs to the Duke of Glouceſter or no, is uncertain, becauſe he was then at York, being lately return'd from his Expedition to the Borders of Scotland, whither he had been ſent by his Brother to repreſs the ſudden Invaſions of thoſe People, who, upon the Breach with Lewis XI. the French King, were grown very troubleſom Neighbours to the Engliſh. This Duke remaing here unimploy'd, began to caſt his Thoughts upon the Succeſſion to the Crown, and to conſider, how many things made for his Title, tho' his Brother's Children ſtood between it and him, in the Eye of the World: which yet ought to be no Hindrance to his Claim, if Juſtice and Right were on his Side. And firſt, He call'd to Mind, that in the Attainder of his Brother George Duke of Clarence, it was alledg'd againſt him, "That to advance himſelf to the "Kingdom, and for ever to diſable the King, "and his Poſterity from inheriting the Crown, "he had contrary to Truth, Nature, and Religion, Viper-like deſtroying her who gave him "Life, publiſh'd, that King Edward was a Baſtard, and ſo no Way capable to Reign; and "that he himſelf therefore was true Heir of "the Kingdom, and the Royalty and Crown "belong'd to him and his Heirs. As alſo that "there was a Report grounded upon vehement "Preſumptions, that the Duke of Clarence himſelf was a Baſtard. Which Malicious Calumnies, tho' he did not believe, and was more loath to Alledge againſt his Mother as true, yet he thought they might be thus far ſerviceable to him, that ſince both his Brothers were now Dead, or Dying, he was the Only Legitimate Iſſue of Richard Duke of York; and ſo unqueſtionably the Right Heir to the Crown, if the Iſſue of his Brothers were either thereby, or any other Ways made incapable of it. And as to the Children of the Duke of Clarence, they were render'd uncapable of the Crown by the Attainder of their Father, and need not that Baſtardy be pleaded againſt them. The only Bar of his Title was then the Children of his Brother King Edward, by the Lady Elizabeth Grey; the Marriage with whom having at firſt begotten a great Conteſt, and being violently Oppoſed by his Mother the Dutcheſs of York upon this Ground, becauſe he was before married to the Lady Eleanour Butler, Widow of Thomas Lord Butler, Baron of Sudeſley, and Daughter of John Lord Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury; he reſolv'd to ſearch narrowly into the Truth of it, not only to Vindicate his own Right, but to keep the Royal Line from the foul Blot of an Illegitimate Succeſſion. This Inquiry he made by Men both Diligent and Faithful, by whoſe labour he got the Depoſitions of ſeveral Perſons concerning it; and among others. (as Philip de Comines relates) the Teſtimony of Dr. Thomas Stillington, Biſhop of Bath, to this Effect, according to the Words of the Author; "Le "Eveſque de Bath (lequel avoit eſte Counſeiller "du Roy Edward) diſoit, que le dit Roy avoit "promis Foy de Marriage à une Dame de Angleterre, & que il avoit nomme Dame Eleanor "Talbot, & que le Roy avoit fait la Promiſe "entre les Mains du dict Eveſque, & dit auſſi "c'eſt Eveſque, qu'avoit apres Eſpouſe, & n'y "avoit, que luy, & ceux deux. Which is thus Engliſh'd: The Biſhop of Bath, a Privy Councellor of King Edward, ſaid, That the ſaid King had Plighted his Faith to Marry a Lady of England, whom the Biſhop named the Lady Eleanour Talbot, and that this Contract was made between the Hands of the ſaid Biſhop, who ſaid that afterwards he Married them, no Perſons being preſent but they two, and he the King charging him ſtrictly not to reveal it. Theſe Proofs the Duke caused to be drawn up into an Authentick Form, and conſulted the moſt Eminent Doctors and Proctors of the Civil Law, who unanimouſly gave their Judgments, that King Edward's Children were Baſtards, the King having another Wife before their Mother; and conſequently that Richard Duke of Glouceſter was the only undoubted Heir to the Lord Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, who was adjudged to be the true Heir to the Crown of this Realm by Authority of Parliament. And thus the Duke of Glouceſter having cleared up his Title to the Crown kept it ſecret, till he ſhould have a fair Opportunity after his Brother's Death to vindicate his own Right, with as little Diſturbance to the Peace of the Nation, and Diſhonour to his Nephews, as was poſſible; tho' it is probable, that one Potter of Redcroſs-ſtreet without Cripple-gate, a Servant of the Duke's, who was Privy to the Buſineſs, unwarily diſcover'd it, by telling one Miſtlebronke, who brought him the News of King Edward's Death; Then, ſays he, will my Maſter the Duke of Glouceſter be King: which Words tho' ſtartling to him, yet the Grounds of them not being known, made little Noiſe, till the Duke of Glouceſter was on the Throne.

1483.

D. of Glouceſter's Title to the Crown after K. Edward's Death.

Anno 17. Edw. 4.

In vitâ Lud. XI. c. 112. and 122.

The Civilians conſulted about King Edward's Iſſue.

Theſe Foundations of Diſcord being laid, tho' privately, in the Life of the Father, receiv'd a Perfection immediately after his Death, and began with the Reign of the Son; tho' to ſatisfie the King on his Death-Bed the two Parties had ſhaken hands as Friends, and promis'd to forget all former Injuries. For the Queen, as if ſhe had been conſcious that her Pride had been too great to be forgiven, preſently after her Husband's Death, writes down to her Brother the Earl of Rivers to raiſe ſuch a Body of Men, as might be ſufficient to defend him againſt the Lords, and bring her Son up to London to be crown'd, that it might not be in the Power of her Enemies to keep him from the actual Poſſeſſion of the Throne; which Order the ſaid Earl as carefully obey'd. On the Other-ſide, the Duke of Buckingham, as Zealous to carry on the Deſign of himſelf and his Party, to take the King out of the hands of his Mother's Kindred, ſent a Truſty Servant of his, named Purſival, to the City of York, to propound their Deſign to the Duke of Glouceſter, and to offer him, if need requir'd, a Thouſand ſtout Fellows to aſſiſt him in the Effecting of it. The Duke of Glouceſter looking upon this Tender, as the firſt Step to his greater Deſign, willingly comply'd with the Propoſal, and ſending the Meſſenger back with many Thanks to his Maſter, and other private Inſtructions, contrived a Meeting ſoon after about Northampton; where the two Dukes, with all the Lords and Gentlemen their Friends, and 900 Men in their Retinue, came at the time agreed on. Here they entred into a Conſultation immediately upon their Arrival, and the Duke of Glouceſter, who was the Chief Man in the Action, communicated the Neceſſity and Reaſonableneſs of the Undertaking, to all the Lords and Gentlemen aſſembled, in words to this Effect: "That "it was neither reaſonable, nor tolerable, to "leave the Young King their Maſter in the "Hands and Cuſtody of his Mother's Kindred; "who to engroſs all Honour to themſelves, would "exclude, the Reſt of the Nobility from their "Attendance on him, tho' all of them were as "ready and willing to perform all the Services

The Actions of different Parties.

The Lords conſpire to take the King: And Glouceſter's Speech to encourage them to it.

"of

1483. " of a good Subject to him, as themſelves, and " many of them a far more honourable Part of " his Kindred, than thoſe of his Mother's Side, " whoſe Blood, (ſaving that it was the King's " Pleaſure to have it ſo) was very unfit to be " match'd with his. But granting it allowable " for the King to do as he pleaſed; yet that " all the Ancient Nobility ſhould be remov'd " from the King's Preſence, and only the leaſt " Noble left about him, is neither honourable " to his Majeſty, nor to Us, and muſt in the " iſſue be both dangerous to the Nation in ge- " neral, and unſafe to his Majeſty; for will not " this Strangeneſs make the King's moſt Potent " Friends either turn his utter Enemies, or be- " come very indifferent to his Service, when " they ſee their Inferiors both in Birth and " Power in greateſt Authority and Credit with " him, and themſelves likely to live in Diſ- " grace for ever, becauſe the King, being in his " Youth framed to theLove and Liking of them, " and to a Diſtaſte of others, will very hardly " in his Riper Years alter his Affections. They " could not but remember, that the late King " Edward himſelf, altho' he was a Man of Age " and Diſcretion, yet was often ſo over-ruled " by his Wife and her Friends, that he did ma- " ny things inconſiſtent with his own Honour, " our Safety, and the Nation's Welfare, merely " to advance them and eſtabliſh their Power. " And if the Friendſhip of ſome Perſons had " not prevail'd more with the King, ſometimes, " than the Suits of his Kindred, they had be- " fore this brought ſome of us to Ruin, as they " did ſome of as great Degree as any of us. " And tho' indeed thoſe Dangers are now paſt, " yet as great are growing, if we ſuffer the " Young King, ſtill to remain in their Hands, " who, we ſee, value not the Deſtruction of any " that ſtand in the Way of their Deſigns, or " the Road to their Greatneſs. Will they not en- " groſs all Honours,and Places of Truſt to them- " ſelves,and whenever they have occaſion,abuſe " his Name and Authority to any of our De- " ſtructions? Can we imagin, that their old " Reſentments are ſo quite bury'd, that they will " not remember to revenge them upon the leaſt " Diſguſt, and, now their Pride is arm'd with " Authority, become implacable to moſt of us, " to whom they have ever had malice enough " to ruin us, and wanted nothing but what they " have now, Authority to vent it upon us? " That theſe things conſider'd, it was their " greateſt Wiſdom to take the Young King out " of their Enemies Hands, and not ſuffer things " to continue in the Poſture they are now in " any longer: for tho' indeed there appears an " outward Friendſhip for the Preſent, which " was and is the Effect more of the King's de- " ſire than their own; yet we ſhall find, that " their old Enmity will revive with their Power, " and their long accuſtom'd Malice will be " ſtrengthen'd with their Authority, in which " if we endure them once to be ſettled, it will " not be in all our Powers to oppoſe them " effectually; and therefore now's the Time to " prevent all Miſchiefs by taking away theCauſe " of them. Theſe Words and Perſwaſions mo- ved all preſent to engage heartily in the Buſi- neſs; and the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Haſtings, who were Men both of great Power and Intereſt, ſhew'd ſuch a Forwardneſs in the Attempt, that all the reſt were encourag'd by their Example to be Aſſiſtants and Followers of them; and many, which were not preſent, were drawn in by the Duke of Glouceſter's Letters to promiſe their help in the ſame Affair, if there were further Occaſion.

Queen's Kindred accuſed.

While the Lords were thus conſulting, and contriving to get the King into their Hands, without the Knowledge or Privity of the Queen and her Friends, the Duke of Glouceſter receiv'd the News, that the Lord Rivers had gather'd a ſtrong Body of armed Men, and with them was ready to bring up the King to London to his Coronation; which unexpected report ſurprized them much, becauſe it broke all their Meaſures at once, it being impoſſible for them, tho' they had a good Number of Attendants, to effect their Deſign, if he were brought to London under a ſtrong Guard; eſpecially conſidering, that as on the one hand the Earl of Rivers was a Valiant and Experienc'd Soldier, ſo if they ſhould gain the King by Force, beſides the danger of the King's Perſon, it would look like an Open Rebellion: Whereupon the Duke of Glouceſter, and his Friends, rather choſe to overturn Force by Policy, and to that end privately order'd ſome of his Friends, who were about the Queen, to repreſent to her, " That as it was no ways ne- " ceſſary to bring the King to London with an " Army of Attendants, as tho' he were to paſs " thro' an Enemy's and not his own Country, " ſo it would be dangerous to the King's Per- " ſon and Government; for whereas now all " the Lords ſeem'd to be perfect Friends, and " to ſtudy nothing but the Honour of the King, " and the Triumph of his Coronation, if they " ſee the Lords about his Royal Perſon, whom " ſo lately they thought their Enemies, to gather " great Numbers of Men armed about them in " the King's Name, they will immediately ſu- " ſpect and fear, that thoſe Men are intended " not ſo much for the King's Safety as their " Deſtruction, and ſo they would take them- " ſelves obliged for their own Defence to raiſe " an equal Force, and fill the Nation with Up- " roar and Confuſion, to the Danger of the " King and Breach of the Peace; and therefore " ſuch Methods of Action ought carefully to be " avoided, eſpecially ſince her Son was a Child, " and in the Beginning of his Reign. Theſe Reaſons ſeem'd plauſible to the Queen, who was not ſuſpicious of the Evil deſigned, and very willing to ſubmit to any thing for the Good of her Son, and his quiet Settlement on the Throne; and therefore without delay wrote Letters to her Brother the Lord Rivers, ordering him to diſmiſs all her Son's extraordinary Attendants and Guards, and haſten to London with only his own Houſhold Servants and uſual Retinue. The Duke of Glouceſter alſo, much about the ſame time, ſent Letters to the Lord Rivers, with full Aſſurances of Duty and Subjection to the King his Nephew, and Love and Friendſhip to himſelf; ſo that he ſeeing all things Calm and Peaceable, concurred readily with the Queen's Deſires, and leaving his armed Men behind him, came up with no greater Number of Followers, than was neceſſary to ſhew the King's Honour and Greatneſs. In their Way about Northampton, the Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, with their Retinues, had layn ſome Days, and hearing of the King's Arrival met him at Northampton; but becauſe that Town was not big enough to hold both their Companies, they adviſed, that the King ſhould go forward to Stony-Stratford to lodge there, and they would ſtay at Northampton, inviting the Lord Rivers to lodge with them, that they might enjoy his Company that Evening. The Lord Rivers, hoping to improve his Friendſhip with them by Compliance, diſmiſſed his Company, and took his Lodgings with the Dukes, who feaſted him that Night with all Demonſtrations of Joy, and Signs of Friend-1483.

The Duke of Glouceſter diſ- ſwades the Q. from bringing the King to London with a Guard.

Queen ſubmits to his Ad- vice.

1483. ſhip, till they parted with him to his Lodgings. But as ſoon as he was gone, the two Dukes with a Select number of their Friends enter'd into a Conſultation, and ſpent the greateſt part of the Night in it: what their Reſolutions were, the next Day's Actions ſhew. In the Morning they got up very early, and by private Orders had all their Servants ready to Attend them, before the Lord Rivers or his Servants were ſtirring. The Keys of the Inn, wherein they all were, they took into their own Cuſtody; and pretending that they themſelves would be the firſt in the Morning, who ſhould be at Stony-Stratford to Attend the King, they ſent a certain Number of their Retinue to Line the Way, and ſuffer none to enter that Town- till they ſhould arrive to wait on his Majeſty; for the Dukes were reſolv'd (as it was given out) to be the firſt that Morning who ſhould go to the King from Northampton. All this was done without Lord Rivers Knowledge or Advice, who therefore when he came to hear it, was very much ſurpriz'd at the thing, and ſo much the more, becauſe neither himſelf, nor Servants were permitted to go out of the Inn. His Thoughts were in a great hurry, and what the Reaſon ſhould be, he could not conjecture. He eaſily ſaw thro' their weak Pretences, and began to fear, that his laſt Night's Cheer might prove a bait to Falſhood and Treachery: Ply he could not if he were Guilty, but not being conſcious of any Wrong done them, which might provoke them to Revenge, he reſolv'd to go to the Dukes, and demand of them the Reaſon and Cauſe of this Action, which he accordingly did: But inſtead of giving him an Anſwer, they quarrell'd with him, and told him with great Paſſion, "That "he was one of them, who had labour'd all he "could to alienate the King's Mind from them. "and ſtir up a Diſſenſion between the King and "his Nobles, that he might bring them and "their Families to Confuſion: but now they "would take Care that it ſhould not lye in his "Power. The Lord Rivers was an Eloquent and well-ſpoken Man, and began to make his Defence calmly and coolly; but they would hear no Excuſes, nor ſuffer him to make Anſwer, and committing him to the Cuſtody of ſome of their Servants, till they ſhould give further Orders concerning him, they mounted their Horſes, and rode in haſte to the King at Stony-Stratford. When they were come into the Royal Preſence, (the King being ready to Mount to leave Room for their Companies) they alighted from their Horſes with all their Attendants, and ſaluted the King upon their Knees, who received them freely and favourably, not miſtruſting in the leaſt what had been done. They pretended that they came only to wait on his Majeſty in his Journy, and to that end the Duke of Buckingham call'd aloud to the Gentlemen and Yeomen to keep their Places, and march forward. But before the King was out of the Town they pick'd a Quarrel with the Lord Richard Gray, the Queen's Son and the King's half Brother, charging him in the King's Preſence, "That he and the Marqueſs "Dorſet, with his Uncle the Lord Rivers, had "conſpir'd together to rule the King and Realm "while the King was in his Minority; and to "that end had ſtirr'd up Diviſions among the "Nobles, that by ſubduing ſome of them, they "might deſtroy the reſt: And for the more "effectual Accompliſhment of this their De-"ſign, the Lord Marqueſs had entred into the "Tower of London, and had taken from thence "all the King's Treaſure, and ſent ſeveral Ships "to Sea with it, that none might be able to "oppoſe him. The King, who not only was Young, and unexperienc'd in State-Affairs, but having been abſent ſometime, was ignorant of ſuch Matters of Fact as his Brother was charged with, yet gave a very Judicious Anſwer to the Accuſation, That he could not tell what his Brother the Marqueſs had done; but in good faith, he ſaid, he dare well Anſwer for his Uncle Rivers, and his Brother Richard, that they were both Innocent of any ſuch Matter, having been continually with him. The Duke of Buckingham reply'd, That they had kept the knowledge of their Actions from his good Grace, and forthwith they Arreſted the ſaid Lord Grey, with Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Howſe in the King's Preſence; and then inſtead of going forward, return'd back again with the King to Northampton; where they diſplaced all ſuch Perſons, who had any Offices about the King, as they could not confide in, and entred into ſerious Conſultation about their farther Proceedings. The King was much troubled at theſe Dealings, and wept becauſe he had not Power to defend Himſelf or his Friends, but the Lords had now obtain'd their Deſigns, and valu'd not who took, what they did, well or ill: yet they gave the King all the reſpect of good Subjects; and promis'd the Queen's Kindred that all ſhould be well; but when they left Northampton, they ſent them to divers Priſons in the North for a time, and at length, tho' they pretended they ſhould have a fair Tryal to anſwer to ſeveral Miſdemeanours which they had to lay to their Charge, they were all brought to Pomfract Caſtle in order to their Execution. 1483

The Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham arreſt the Earl of Rivers, and Lord Grey, and get the King into their Power.

The Duke of Gloucester and Buckingham quarrel with the Ld. Grey, and arreſt him.

Theſe Actions of the Lords being done under a ſhew of Friendſhip, and carrying in them ſomething of Violence and Treachery, begat a great Amazement in all Places where they were known, and few Men conſtrued them, as the Lords wiſh'd, but look'd upon them as the Prologues to the King's Deſtruction. The Queen, who was particularly certify'd of the ſame Night, that the Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, and others of their Party, whom ſhe look'd upon as her implacable Enemies, had taken her Son the King, and impriſon'd her Brother Rivers, and Son Richard Grey, with other of her Friends, in Places Remote and Unknown, fell into a bitter Paſſion of Grief, and bewailed the Deſtruction of her Child, and other Friends, Curſing the Hour in which ſhe credulouſly harken'd to the Perſwaſions of her falſe Friends, and by ordering her Son's Guards to be diſmiſs'd, had expos'd him and her Kindred to the Malice and baſe Deſigns of her Enemies. But ſince to indulge herſelf in her juſt Grief, and neglect a Proviſion for her own, and thoſe Childrens Safety which ſhe had with her, would make her Caſe worſe than it was at preſent; therefore ſhe reſolv'd to lay aſide her Sorrow for the preſent, and get herſelf, the Duke of York her 2d Son, and her five Daughters, with what Goods were Neceſſary for her Uſe into the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter; and thereupon at Midnight order'd her Servants, and what help could be had, to remove them with all ſpeed thither; where being receiv'd into the Abbot's Lodgings, ſhe and her Children and all her Company were immediately Regiſtred for Sanctuary Perſons, and ſo look'd upon themſelves, as in an inviolable Fortreſs againſt their Enemies Power or Malice. The Lord Haſtings, who was Chamberlain, was at the ſame time at Court, and tho' a Conſpirator with the Lords, yet made a quite different Interpretation of the Lords Actions; becauſe he being truly Loyal, and heartily deſiring the Welfare of

The Q. and her Children fly to Sanctuary at W. ſtminſter.

Lord Haſting's Loyalty.

the

1483. the King, believed, that they had no further Intent, then to take him out of the Government of the Queen's Kindred, whoſe Inſolencies were intolerable, and from whom he himſelf in the late Reign was often in danger of his Life: He was therefore much pleas'd to ſee the Queen and her Friends in ſuch a Fright, and not doubting but the Nation would be much better govern'd than before, and the King much happier in the Hands of the Ancient Nobility, rejoyced to ſee the Downfall of the Queen, and her Relations, whoſe Pride they had felt long enough in the late King's Reign; but that he might give the Nobility about the Court a true Information of the Lords Action, he diſpatch'd a Meſſenger the ſame night to Dr. Rotherham (a) Archbiſhop of York, and then Lord Chancellor, who liv'd in York-Place by Weſtminſter, to aſſure him, "That the Lords Intentions were honou"rable, and for the Nations Welfare: and tho'
"the Impriſonment of the Queen's Kindred, and
"the Queen's Fears, who was flying in great
"haſte and confuſion into Sanctuary, had no
"good Aſpect; yet he ſhould find that all things
"would in the end prove well. The Archbiſhop, who was awaked out of his firſt Sleep by his Servants, and ſomething amazed at the ſuddenneſs of the News, reply'd, Say'ſt thou, that all ſhall be well? I can't ſee what good can be expected from ſuch Demeanour. Pray tell him, That be it as well as it will, it will never be ſo well as we have ſeen it: and ſo he ſent the Meſſenger back again to his Maſter. But the Archbiſhop was in too great a Diſturbance to return to his Reſt; and therefore immediately roſe, and calling up all his Servants, went with them arm'd to the Queen at her Palace, and carried the Great Seal along with him. He found all things there in a Tumult, the Servants removing Trunks and Houſholdſtuff to carry them into the Sanctuary: The Queen he ſaw ſitting upon the Floor on Matts, lamenting her own and her Childrens Miſeries and Misfortunes. The Archbiſhop, who was no ways engaged in the Conſpiracy againſt her, much compaſſionated her Caſe and Grief; and endeavouring to comfort her, told her the Meſſage which he had received from the Lord Haſtings not an Hour before, by which he was aſſured, that Matters were nothing ſo bad as ſhe imagin'd, that the King was in ſafe Hands, and doubted not but all would be well. The Queen, who had an invincible Odium to Haſtings, as ſoon as ſhe heard his Name, reply'd,
"That nothing was to be believ'd that came "from him, being one of them that ſought
"the Deſtruction of herſelf and her Blood. The Archbiſhop ſeeing her not thus to be comforted, aſſur'd her for himſelf, That he would be Conſtant to her; and if the Lords ſhould deal ill with the Prince, and crown any other Perſon King beſides her Son, he would on the Morrow crown his Brother the Duke of York, whom ſhe had then in Sanctuary with her And; that, Madam, (ſays he) you may be certain of my Integrity, Lo! here I leave with you the Grate Seal of England, the Badge of Regal Power, without which nothing of Moment in State Affairs can be done. His Father your Husband gave it me, and I here return it to you to keep it for his Children, and ſecure their Right; and if I could give you any greater Teſtimony of my Loyalty, I would do it: and ſo he departed to his own Houſe in the dawning of the Morning, not conſidering what he had done in reſigning the Seal. The next day the City of London was in an Uproar, and divers Lords and Gentlemen took Arms, and aſſembled great Companies of Citizens and others for their own Defence, till they ſhould ſee what the Lords intended; for the general Report was, that what was done to the Lord Rivers, and the others with him, was but a Blind to the People: the real Deſign of the Nobility was to keep the King from his Coronation, and deprive him of his Right; and this they were the more confirm'd in, becauſe great Numbers of the Duke of Glouceſter's Servants and Friends were about the City and on the Thames, who examin'd all that paſſed, and kept any Perſons from taking Sanctuary. In theſe Tumults Archbiſhop Rotherham, fearing leaſt there ſhould be a juſt Occaſion to ſhew his Authority, and troubled that he had deliver'd up the Great Seal to the Queen, to whom it did not belong, without the King's Order, ſent privately for the Seal again and obtain'd it. In the mean time, the Lord Chamberlain Haſtings, whoſe Loyalty was not queſtion'd, and who was ſuppos'd not to be ignorant of the Lords Intentions, went into the City to appeaſe the Tumults, and calling the Lords and Gentlemen together who headed the Commonalty, told them, That tho' the Suddenneſs of the Lords Actions was ſurprizing, becauſe the Reaſons were not generally known; yet he could aſſure them, that the Duke of Glouceſter was true and faithful to his Prince, of which he had given many undeniable Proofs in his Brother's Reign, and would continue the ſame to his Son: That the Lords Rivers and Grey, and the Knights apprehended with them, were impriſon'd for certain Conſpiracies plotted againſt the Life of the Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, as would appear evidently at their Trials, which was deſign'd ſhortly to be had before all the Lords of his Majeſty's Council: That their taking Arms in ſuch a Riotous and Seditious manner would prove of very dangerous Conſequence to themſelves, if they did not ſpeedily lay them down, as they had without juſt Reaſon or Cauſe taken them up; and therefore he adviſed them to depart to their Dwellings, and not pretend to Judge or Cenſure the Actions of their Superiors, who meant nothing but the Common good, till they knew the Truth of their Deſigns, leaſt they themſelves ſhould be the only Damages to the Publick, and hinder the King's Coronation, which the Lords were coming up to London to effect with all convenient ſpeed. With theſe words the Chamberlain ſo pacify'd the Diſcontents of the Citizens, that all things were for the preſent at quiet.

By this time the Lords, who ſeem'd as Zealous for the King's Coronation as his Uncle had been, and behaved themſelves with ſuch wonderful Reverence and Reſpect to the King, even from the time that he came into their Hands, that he ſuſpected no ill Deſigns in them, were upon their march to London, which caus'd the People to be the more Eaſie, ſince they thought that now they ſhould ſoon diſcern their Intentions. By the Way as they paſs'd, the Duke of Glouceſter aſſum'd nothing upon the Account of his Birth or Greatneſs, but demean'd himſelf as a Dutiful Subject; and that he might give a Demonſtration to the People of the treacherous and cruel Deſigns of the Lord Rivers, and the Queen's Friends, againſt himſelf and the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke's Servants ſhew'd the Barrels of Harneſs which they had privily convey'd in their Carriages to Murther them;

1483.

Archbiſhop Rotherham ſends for the Seal again.

Lord Haſtings appeaſes the Tumults.

The King brought to London.

Archbiſhop Rotherham comforts the Queen.

He leaves the Great Seal with the Queen.

(a) His Name was Thomas Scot, he was call'd Rotherham from the Place of his Birth in Yorkſhire.

and

1483. and tho' indeed ſome laugh'd at the Weakneſs of the Suggeſtion, becauſe if they really intended to have ſo uſed them, their Harneſs had better been on their Backs than in Barrels; yet they pretended they were ſeized before the Plot was come fully to Execution, and ſo aggravated Matters, that the common People believ'd the truth of it, and cry'd out, That it would be a great Charity to the Nation to hang them. When the King and Dukes drew near the City of London, Edmund Shaw Goldſmith, then Mayor, and William White and John Matthews Sheriffs, with all their Brethren the Aldermen in Scarlet, and 500 Commoners on Horſeback in Purple-colour'd Gowns met them at Harnſey-Park, and with great Honour and Reverence conducted him thro' their City to the Biſhop of London's Palace, near St. Paul's Church, on the 4th of May.

The King met by the Mayor, &c

In this Solemn Cavalcade the Behaviour of the Duke of Glouceſter to the King was very remarkable, for he rode bare-headed before him, and often with a loud Voice ſaid to the People, Behold your Prince and Soveraign; giving them on all Occaſions ſuch an Example of Reverence and Duty as might teach them how to honour and reſpect their Prince; by which Actions he ſo won upon all the Spectators, that they look'd on the late Miſrepreſentations of him as the Effects of his Enemies Malice, and he was on all hands accounted the Beſt, as he was the firſt Subject in the Kingdom. At the Biſhop's Palace he did the King Homage, and invited all the Nobility to do the ſame; by which he put his Loyalty out of diſpute with the Nobles, as he had done before with the Commons. Within a few days after, a Great Council of the Nobility met to ſettle the Government, and chooſe a Protector according to the uſual Cuſtom in the Minority of their Kings, and the Duke of Glouceſter was without the leaſt Contradiction appointed to Manage that Honourable Station, not only as the King's Uncle, and the next Prince of the Blood, and a Perſon fit for that Truſt, as of eminent Judgment and Courage; but as one that was moſt Loyal and Loving to the King, and likely to prove the moſt Faithful in that Station. By this Council was the Archbiſhop of York much blamed for delivering the Great Seal to the Queen, and being deprived of his Councellorſhip, the Seal was given in the beginning of June to Dr. John Ruſſel Biſhop of Lincoln, a Wiſe and good Man, and of very great Experience in State-Affairs. Several other Inferior Officers of the Court were diſplaced, and others more fit put in their Room. The Lord Chamberlain Haſtings was continu'd in his Office, with ſome others whom the Protector and Council had no great Objections againſt; and ſo the Council being diſſolved, the Protector betook himſelf to his Double Care: 1. Of the King to Content and Pleaſe him, as well as Educate him and Crown him. 2. Of the State and People, to rule ſo well as might be for the King's Honour and general Good and Welfare of the Nation.

Duke of Glouceſter's Loyalty ſhewed.

The D. of Glouceſter choſen Protector.

King Edward, who was now under the ſole Care and Government of his Uncle Richard Duke of Glouceſter, made Protector by the Nobility, and general Approbation of the People, being diſpleaſed at the Violent Actions of the Lords towards his Mother's Relations, whom not only continual Converſe, but Nature had endear'd to him, and ſeeing his Mother and Brother in Sanctuary, as if ſhe had fear'd the ſame hard Uſage, if not worſe, was not contented with the preſent Diſpoſition of Affairs; and tho' he being Young could not help what was done, yet he could not willingly ſubmit to it. The Protector, who was a very Sagacious Perſon, and ſhew'd all Readineſs to ſatisfie the King's Will, and diſcharge his Station well, ſoon diſcern'd the Cauſes of the King's Uneaſineſs, and conſidering how much the Reaſons of the King's Grief reflected upon his Reputation, as well as hinder'd his Deſigns in bringing the King to his Coronation, (for why ſhould the Queen with her Children continue in Sanctuary, unleſs it were that ſhe was Jealous of ſome Wrong and Injury from him, who having the Supream Power now in his hands could only hurt her? And what a lame Ceremony would the Coronation be, if the Queen and the King's only Brother bore not a Part in it, but inſtead of that were deterred from it) he reſolv'd to remove theſe Rubs in the way of his Government and Deſigns; and to that end calling a Council, he deliver'd himſelf to this Purpoſe: (a) "Let me periſh for "ever if it be not my greateſt, my continual "Care to promote the Happineſs and Welfare "of the King my Nephew, and all my Brother's Family; being ſenſible, that not only "the Nation's, but my own Ruin is the unavoidable Conſequence of their Misfortunes: and "therefore ſince it hath pleaſed you, who are "the Nobles of the Land, and to whom it belongs chiefly to Provide for the good Government of it in the Minority of the King, to "confer that weighty Employment of Ruling "all upon my ſelf, as I ſhall always look upon "my ſelf only as the King's and your Deputy, "ſo I ſhall, in all difficult Matters of State, look "upon you as my Helpers and Aſſiſtants, and "not dare to move one Step without your "Council and Advice, that ſo I may have your "Approbation in all I do, that it is for the "Good of the King and Welfare of all. In the "Management of the Station you have placed "me in, I do find, that the Queen's Continuance "in the Sanctuary with her Children, is ſuch an "invincible Impediment in the Execution of my "Place, that I cannot but propound the manifeſt Inconveniencies of it; and ſo much the "rather, becauſe I expected, that ſo good a Settlement as your Lordſhips had made in the laſt Council would have remov'd her Womaniſh Fears, and ſhe would have return'd to "Court to the Contentment of his Majeſty and "us all: but ſince ſhe perſiſts in her Miſchievous "Purpoſes, it is evident, that if Fear drove her "into the Sanctuary, 'tis nothing but Malice "that keeps her there; for ſhe, who is no impolitick Woman, ſees ſeveral unavoidable "Miſchiefs redounding to the Publik, and to "his Majeſty by this her Action, which had ſhe "not ſome ill Deſigns ſhe would carefully avoid. "And firſt, what greater Affront can be offer'd "to you of his Majeſty's Council, than for the "Queen and Children to remain in Sanctuary? "Will not the People upon ſo unexpected a "Reſolution make theſe Inferences from it, that "doubtleſs they are in very great Danger, and "that you who are in Power are her implacable Enemies, ſince neither her Son's Authority, "nor her own and Children's Greatneſs, are ſufficient to Secure them, but they are forc'd "to ſeek Protection from the Church, which is "the Aſylum of the greateſt Criminals? And 1483.

His Arguments to take him from Sanctuary for that end uſed in Council.

The Protector deſires the Duke of York to be brought to the King.

(a) This Speech did not begin with a Curſe, according to the Copy in Holinſhead, nor is it entirely the ſame as in Holinſhead, Pag. 717.

"what

1483. "what an intolerable Injury is this to you? But "if you ſhall think fit to paſs this Wrong over, "yet his Majeſty's Diſcontents are not to be "over-look'd, who wanting the Company of his "Brother, with whom chiefly he uſes to Re-"create himſelf, leads a melancholy and diſ-"contented Life, which doubtleſs if not timely "prevented may endanger his Health; for the "good State of the Body does not long laſt uſu-"ally, when the Mind is diſturb'd. Sorrow of "Mind drieth up the Bones, eſpecially in Youth, "and want of moderate Recreation and ſuitable "Company begets a Dulneſs and Penſiveneſs, "which brings Diſeaſes and Diſtempers on the "Body, which proves fatal. Wherefore ſince "even Kings themſelves muſt have ſome Com-"pany, and they are too great for their Sub-"jects generally, it ſeems Neceſſary that his "Brother, who comes neareſt an Equality with "him, ſhould be ſent for to him, that he may "refreſh himſelf with him. And thus we may "hope that the King will not only be ſatisfy'd "and pleas'd, but we ſhall be freed from the ill "Opinion which certainly all foreign Princes "have of us; for as long as he continues in "Sanctuary, they will either cenſure us as "cruel or tyrannical, or deride us as impo-"tent or weak. But beſides, the Coronation "of the King being the main thing now in Agi-"tation, how can we proceed in it with any heart "or earneſtneſs, while the Queen and Duke of "York are in Sanctuary? What ſort of Men ſhall "we be thought, who at the ſame time we "crown one Brother, ſo terrifie the other, that "he is forc'd to abide at the Altar of the ſame "Church for his Safety. Who can with Satis-"faction officiate at this great Ceremony, while "the Duke of York, whoſe Place is next to the "King, is abſent from it. It is therefore my "Opinion, theſe Reaſons and Conſiderations be-"ing well weighed, that ſome Honourable and "Truſty Perſon, who cannot be doubted to "tender the King's Wealth, and Reputation of "the Council, and is in Credit with the Queen, "be ſent to her to demand the Releaſe of the "Duke of York: And for this Office, I think "no Perſon better qualify'd than the moſt Re-"verend Father my Lord Cardinal, (a) the "Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who may be the "moſt prevailing Mediator in this Matter, if "he pleaſes to take the Trouble upon him, "which of his great Goodneſs, I do believe he will "not refuſe for the King's Sake and ours, and "the Wealth of the Young Duke himſelf, the "King's moſt honourable Brother, and for the "Comfort of my Soveraign Lord himſelf, my "moſt Deareſt Nephew, conſidering that it will "be a certain means to ſtop the Mouths of our "Enemies abroad, and prevent the Ill-conſtru-"ctions of cenſorious Perſons at home, and a-"void the ill Conſequences which ariſe from it, "both to his Majeſty, and the whole Realm. "And tho' the Cardinal may go no further "in treating with the Queen, than to preſwade "her by the beſt Arguments of Reaſon and "Neceſſity to yield to our Deſires, which his "Wiſdom knows beſt how to Uſe and Apply; "yet if ſhe prove ſo obſtinate and wilful, and "will yield to no Advice and Counſel which he "can give; then 'tis my Opinion that we fetch "the Duke of York out of that Priſon by force, "and bring him into the King's Company and "Preſence; in which we will take ſuch Care of 1483. "him, and give him ſuch honourable Treatment, "that all the World ſhall perceive, to our Ho-"nour and her Reproach, that it was nothing "but her Frowardneſs and groundleſs Suſpicion, "that firſt carried, and then kept him there. "This is my Judgment in this Affair; but if any "of you, my Lords, are of contrary Sentiments, "and find me miſtaken, I never was, nor by "God's Grace ever ſhall be ſo wedded to my "own Opinion, but I ſhall be ready to change "it upon better Reaſons and Grounds.

The Council aſſents to his Propoſal, but the Archbiſhop objects againſt taking the Duke from Sanctuary by force.

When the Protector had thus deliver'd his Mind to the Council, they all approv'd of his Motion, as a thing good and reaſonable in it ſelf, and honourable both to the King, and the Duke his Brother, agreeing with him, that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was the fitteſt Perſon, in all reſpects, to be a Mediator between the Queen and them; not doubting, but by his Candour and Wiſdom this Buſineſs might eaſily be effected, and the Queen without more a-doe perſwaded to deliver him. Nor did the Archbiſhop at all refuſe the Office, which much became his Station, being to Compoſe a growing Difference among Perſons of the Greateſt Quality: but he with the Lords Spiritual preſent told the Council with Submiſſion, (b) That as "he conſented to the Motion that the Duke of "York ſhould be brought to the King's Preſence "out of the Sanctuary by Perſwaſions, and would "himſelf do his Beſt to effect it, ſince they had "pleas'd to impoſe that task upon him; yet he "could not by any means conſent to that Pro-"poſition, That if the Queen refus'd to deliver "him, he ſhould be taken out of Sanctuary by "force; becauſe it would be a thing not only "Ungrateful to the whole Nation, but highly "diſpleaſing to Almighty God to have the Pri-"vilege of Sanctuary broken, in that Church, "which, being at firſt conſecrated by S. Peter, "who came down above 500 Years ago in "Perſon accompany'd with many Angels by "Night to do it, has ſince been adorn'd with "the Privilege of a Sanctuary by many Popes "and Kings; and therefore as no Biſhop ever "dare attempt the Conſecration of that Church, "ſo no Prince has ever yet been ſo fierce and "indevout as to violate the Privilege of it: "And God forbid, that any Man whatſoever "ſhall at this time, or hereafter, upon any world-"ly Advantages or Reaſons, attempt to infringe "the Immunities of that moſt Holy Place, that "hath been the Defence and Safety of ſo many "Good-mens Lives. However, he ſaid, he hop'd "they ſhould not be driven to uſe ſuch Extre-"mities, and doubted not, when the Queen, "who was a Perſon of known Judgment and Un-"derſtanding, once heard their Reaſons, ſhe "would for her Son's ſake, the King, readily "yield to their Deſires; and if it otherwiſe "ſhould happen, he would ſo perform his Part, "that they ſhould be convinc'd, that there want-"ed no good Will, or Endeavour in himſelf, but "the Queen Dread, and Womaniſh fear was "the only Cauſe of it. The Duke of Buckingham, The Duke of Buckingham's Reply to the Archbiſhop. who impatiently heard the Archbiſhop's Objection againſt taking the Duke out of Sanctuary by force, immediately reſumes the Diſcourſe, and in a Paſſion replies with an Oath; "Womaniſh "Fear, ſay you my Lord? Nay, Womaniſh Fro-"wardneſs; for I dare take it upon my Soul,

(a) Cardinal Thomas Bourchier deſcended of the Noble Family of the Bourchiers Earls of Eſſex.

(b) In Sir Thomas Moor's Hiſtory as Printed in Holinſhead, p. 717. 'tis as that the Archbiſhop of York made this Speech; and for a Proof of St. Peter's deſcending from Heaven to Conſecrate the Church of Weſtminſter, the good Prelate affirm'd St. Peter's Cope was ſtill to be ſeen in the Abbey.

"that 1483. " that ſhe knows ſhe has no juſt Occaſion to fear

" any Danger to her Son or her ſelf. But as to " herſelf, here is no Man that will contend with " Women, and I would to God ſome of her Kin-
" dred were ſo too, and then ſhould the Con-
" teſt be ſoon at an end with them. Yet I dare
" be bold to ſay, that none of her Kindred are
" the Leſs belov'd for the Relation they have " to her, but becauſe of their own Demerits,
" and for joyning with her in her Malicious De" ſigns. However let it be granted, that we " love neither her nor her Kindred; yet there " can be no juſt Ground to infer from thence
" that we hate the King's Brother, who tho'
" her Son, yet is alſo a-kin to us; and if ſhe
" deſir'd his Honour, as we do, and had not more
" regard to her own Will, than her Son's Wel" fare, ſhe would not be ſo obſtinate, but would " be as unwilling to keep him from the King's " Preſence, as any of us are. Some of whom
" at leaſt ſhe muſt acknowledge to have as much
" Wit as her ſelf, and can't doubt of their Fi" delity and Love to the Duke, who they would " be as loath ſhould come to any harm as ſhe
" her ſelf can be, and yet they would have him
" from her to continue with the King, if ſhe
" will tarry there; but if ſhe pleaſes to come
" out her ſelf with him, and her other Children,
" and take up her Habitation in ſuch a Place
" where they may be with Honour to her ſelf
" and them, every Man of us ſhall be better con" tent than if ſhe ſends him alone. Now if upon
" theſe Grounds ſhe refuſes to deliver him, de" nying to follow the Wiſdom of them, of whoſe
" ripe Judgment and Fidelity ſhe hath had good " Experience, it is eaſie to diſcern that it is " her Frowardneſs, and not her Fear, that is the " Cauſe of it. But we will ſuppoſe that her
" Diſtruſts are invincible, thro' the greatneſs of " her Fears, (as what can hinder her from fear-
" ing her own Shadow, if ſhe will ſo much in" dulge her Paſſions) we have the greater rea-
" ſon to take heed, how we leave the Duke in " her Hands: for if ſhe cauſeleſly fear his hurt
" out of Sanctuary, ſhe may alſo fear that he " may be fetch'd from thence; (for 'tis eaſie for " her to imagin, that if we be reſolv'd to have " him from her, we will not value the Sacred-
" neſs of the Place ſhe is in; as indeed I think
" Good Men without Sin might ſomewhat leſs
" regard them than they do) and ſo for grea" ter Security convey him out of the Realm,
" which if ſhe ſhould be ſo lucky as to effect,
" (and without any great Difficulty it may be " done) all the World will ſcorn and deride
" us, ſaying, That we are a wiſe ſort of Coun-
" ſellors about the King, to ſuffer his Brother
" to be caſt away under our Noſes. And there" fore I aſſure you, for my part, I am for fetch-
" ing him away againſt her Will, rather than by " humouring her Fears and Peeviſhneſs, give " her an Opportunity of conveying him away.
The Uſe and Abuſe of Sanctuaries. " And yet I ſhall be bold to aſſert, that I do " not break any Privilege of Sanctuary, but " rather rectify one of the Abuſes of it: for " tho' indeed Sanctuaries, as they were appoint" ed and uſed under the Jewiſh Law, were, and
" ſtill may be of very good Uſe in ſeveral Caſes,
" as to be a Refuge for ſuch Men as the Chance
" of Sea, or their evil Debtors have brought to " Poverty, to protect them from the Cruelty of " their Creditors; and becauſe the Title to the " Crown of theſe Realms had often come in
" Queſtion, in which Conteſts each Side counts
" the other Traitors, and the Conquering Side,
" tho' ſometimes the worſt Rebels, treats the " adverſe Party as ſuch, it is Neceſſary there
" ſhould be a Refuge in this Caſe to the Unfor" tunate: but as for Thieves and Murderers,
" whereof theſe Places are full, and who ſel-
" dom leave their Trade when they have once
" begun, it is an horrid Shame that any San" ctuary ſhould ſave them; and eſpecially wil-
" ful Murderers, whom God himſelf commands
" to be taken from the Altar, and put to Death.
" Yet if we look into our Sanctuaries, as now " they are managed, how few are there whom
" Neceſſity of their own Defence, or their Mis-
" fortunes have driven to take Shelter there?
" But on the other ſide, what numbers are there
" in them of Thieves, Murderers, and malicious
" and heinous Traitors, and eſpecially in the " two chief Ones in this City, the one at the " Elbow, and the other in the very Midſt of it?
" Inſomuch that if the Good they do were bal-
" lanc'd with the Evil, we ſhall find 'twere bet" ter for us to be without them, unleſs ſuch as
" are in Power would effectually correct their " Abuſes, and amend them. And indeed, 'tis
" a groſs Shame not to be endur'd, to ſee St. Pe- " ter made a Patron of Thieves, Prodigals, Knaves
" and Whores! Surely neither God, nor that " Apoſtle can approve of theſe Abuſes; and " therefore they may be reformed with thanks
" of Both. Let Sanctuaries then continue in God's " Name in their full force, as far as Religion
" and Reaſon will permit, and I am ſure no
" lawful Privilege granted to them can hinder
" us from fetching the Duke of York from thence,
" where he neither is, nor can be a Sanctuary-
" Perſon. A Sanctuary ſerveth to defend the " Body of Man, who is in danger from not on" ly ſome great, but unlawful hurt? and what " Danger is that Duke in? Is not the King his " Brother, and all we his Special Friends? As " he has never done any Man an Injury, ſo
" no Man deſigns him any Wrong, and then
" what Grounds can there be for him to be " left in Sanctuary? Beſides, Men come not to " a Sanctuary, as to Baptiſm by Godfathers, but " they muſt ask it themſelves if they will have
" it; for none but ſuch as can alledge there juſt
" Fears and Dangers ought to be admitted thi-
" ther. And how can the Duke of York be juſt-
" ly entertain'd or kept there, who cannot thro'
" his Infancy require it; and if he were ſenſible
" of the Place he is in, would rather deſire
" to be releaſed from it: So that I think
" with the Clergy's Leave, 'tis no Breach of " Privilege, if he and many others be taken by " Force out of it. And to convince them of it
" more fully, let me ask them a few Queſtions.
" If a Man go into Sanctuary with another Man's " Goods, may not the King, leaving his Body
" at Liberty, take them out of Sanctuary, and " reſtore them to the right Owner? can either
" Pope or King privilege a Man from paying " Debts that is able to pay them? Several of the Clergy preſent agreed, that by the Laws of God and the Church, a Sanctuary-Man may be deliver'd up to pay his Debts, or reſtore ſtoln Goods, his Liberty being allow'd him to get his Living by his Labour. Then the Duke ſaid, " There's the ſame Reaſon to do it, if a " Man's Wife ran from him to Sanctuary, or a " Child take Sanctuary becauſe he will not go to " School, and many like Caſes. And therefore I " conclude, that ſince he can be no Sanctuary-
" Man who hath no Diſcretion to deſire it, (for
" I never yet heard of Sanctuary-Children) nor
" Malice to deſerve it, whoſe Life and Liberty
" can in no wiſe be in Danger, he that taketh ſuch
" an one out of Sanctuary to do him good, breaks
" no Privilege of that Holy Place.

1483.

When

1483. When the Duke had finish'd this long Discourse, it was generally Agreed by all the Lords, both Spiritual and Temporal, (a) That if the Queen would not Deliver up the Duke by Perswasions, he should be forced from her by the King's Authority: But it being judg'd convenient that all fair Means should be first try'd, the Cardinal, with several Lords to accompany him, was sent into the Sanctuary to the Queen; the Protector, and the rest of the Council going into the Star-Chamber at Westminster to expect the Event. When the Cardinal was come into the Queen's Presence, after all Dutiful Salutations, he Deliver'd to her the Cause of his Coming, Saying, "That he was with those other Lords, "sent by the Protector, and the Privy Council "to her Majesty, to let her know, how much "her Detaining of the Duke of York in that "Place was Scandalous to the Publick, and dis-"lik'd by the King his Brother; it being an "Action that must needs produce ill Effects: "That the King himself was much grieved at "it, and the Council offended, because it look'd "as if one Brother was in Danger from the "other, and could not be Preserved by the o-"ther's Life: That it would be a very great "Comfort to his Majesty to have his Natural "Brother in Company with him; nor would it "be of Less Advantage to the Young Duke "himself, because it would Confirm and Streng-"then their Loves to be brought up together, "as well at their Books, as Sports: That in the "King's Court the Duke could only Live an-"swerable to his State and Condition: That it "would much Please the Protector and Council "to send him to the King's Presence, and in "Effect might prove of no Small Advantage "to her Friends, that were in Prison. Upon "which Accounts, as he was sent by his Majesty "and Council to demand the Duke of her, to be "brought to his Brother; so he could not but "earnestly entreat her to comply with a thing "so very Reasonable, and every way Convenient.

The Archbishop sent to the Queen, and his Speech to her.

The Queen's Reply.

The Queen, who was of a sharp Wit and graceful Speech, answer'd the Cardinal; and said, "My Lord, I cannot deny, but it is very con-"venient that my Son, the Duke, should be in the "Company of his Brother the King as well for "Society, as Love's-sake; but since they are "both so Young, as that it is the most suita-"ble for them to be under the Government of "their Mother; It is better for the King to be "with me here, than that I should send the "Duke to him: Tho' was it really otherwise, "that Duty obliged the Duke to go to him, "yet Necessity in this Case creates a Dispensa-"tion, because he hath been of late so sorely "afflicted with Diseases, and being not perfect-"ly recover'd is in so great a Danger of a Re-"lapse (which generally Physicians say is more "fatal than the first Sickness) that I dare trust "no Earthly Person as yet with the Care of "him: For tho' I doubt not, but that he might "have such about him as would do their Best "to Preserve his Health, yet since I have or-"dered him all along, and am his Mother, it "must be allow'd by all Men, that as I am the "most Able, so I shall be the most Affectionately "Careful and Tender of him. And for these "Reasons, I hope both the King and his Coun-"cil will dispense with his Absence a-while, "till he is perfectly Recovered, and in Health; "and before that, I can't endure to hear of "Parting with him.

1483. The Cardinal's Answer.

"The Cardinal hearing this Reply, answer'd; "No Man, Good Madam, doth deny but that "your Majesty is the fittest Person to take Care "of all your Children, and I am sure the Coun-"cil will be very Glad to hear that it is your "Pleasure so to do; yea, they would beg it of "you, Provided you would be contented to do "it in such a Place as is consistent with their, "and your own Honour; Whereas, if you re-"solve to tarry in this Place, then they judge "it more convenient, that the Duke should be "with the King at Liberty, to the Comfort and "Satisfaction of them both, tho' with some "small Danger to his Health; than to remain "in Sanctuary, to the Dishonour of the King, "Duke himself, and the whole Council: for "it is not always so Necessary that the Child "should be with the Mother, but there may be "Reasons sometimes of taking him from her, "and that for the Best, as your Majesty knows "there was, when your Eldest Son, then Prince "of Wales, and now King, was sent to keep his "Court at Ludlow for his own Honour and the "Good Order of the Country, of which your "Majesty was so well convinced, that you seem'd "Contented with it.

The Queen's Return.

The Queen grew a little Warm, and smartly retorted, "Not so very well Contented neither "at that Separation; tho' the Case is much dif-"ferent now: For the Prince was in good "Health, the Duke is now Sick; for tho' the "height of the Distemper is past, yet he is "Weak, and not so fully recovered, but that "without great Care he may fall into a Relapse; "in which Condition, while he remains, I won-"der that the Protector and Council should be "so Earnest to have him from me, since if the "Child should grow Sick again and Miscarry, "they would incur the Censures of some Ill-"dealings with him. And whereas you say that "it is Dishonourable to my Child, and to them, "that he remain in this Place, I think the Con-"trary; for certainly 'tis most for their Ho-"nour to let him Abide, where no Man can "doubt but he will remain Safest, and that is "here so long as I continue here: and I do not "intend to leave this Place and endanger my "Life with my Friends, who, I would to God "were rather in Safety here with me, than I "were in Hazard with them. Why, Madam, (saith the Lord Howard) "Do you know any "Reason, that they are in Danger? No truly, (said she roundly) "Nor why they should be in "Prison neither, as they now be: but I have "great Cause to fear, least those, who have not "scrupled to put them in Prison without Cause, "will as little value to Destroy them without "Law or Right. Upon these Words, the Car-dinal wink'd upon the Lord to put an End to that Discourse; and then added himself, "That he "did not doubt, but that those Lords, who be-"ing of her Kindred remained under Arrest, "would upon a due Examination of Matters, "discharge themselves well enough of any Ac-"cusation alledged against them: And as to her "own Royal Person, there neither was, nor "could be any kind of Danger. How shall I be "certain of that (said the Queen)? Is it, that I am "Innocent? It doth not appear that they are "Guilty. Is it, that I am better beloved of their "Enemies? No; but rather, they are hated "for my Sake. Is it, that I am so nearly rela-"ted to the King? They are not much further "off: and therefore since it seems to me, that as Lord Howard's Answer.

Queen's Reply.

Cardinal's Answer.

The Queen's Reply.

(a) Several of the Bishops were against fetching him out by Force.

1483. " I am in the ſame Cauſe, ſo I am in like Danger; " I do not intend to depart out of this Place " And as for my Son, the Duke of York, I pro- " poſe to keep him with me till I ſee how Buſi- " neſſeſs will go; for the more greedy and ear- " neſt ſome Men are to have him into their " Hands without any ſubſtantial Cauſe, the more " Fearful and Scrupulous am I to deliver him

The Cardinal's Anſwer.

" And the more Suſpicious you are, Madam, (anſwer'd the Cardinal) " the more Jealous are " others of you, leaſt under a cauſeleſs Pretence " of Danger, you ſhould convey him out of the " Nation; and ſo if they permit him to remain " with you now, it ſhall not be in their Power " to have him for the Future. Wherefore it is " the Opinion of many of the Council, that " there is a Neceſſity of taking the Duke of York " immediately into their Care and Government, " and ſince he can enjoy no Privilege by Sanctu- " ary, who has neither Will to Require it, nor " Malice or Offence to need it, they judge it no " Breach of Sanctuary, if you finally refuſe to " deliver him by fair means, to fetch him out " of it: And I aſſure you, Madam, that the " Protector, who bears a moſt tender Love to " his Nephews; and the Council, who have an " equal Care and Reſpect for your Children, will " certainly ſet him at Liberty, unleſs you reſign " him to us, leaſt you ſhould ſend him away.

Queen's Reply.

Ay, (ſays the Queen) " hath the Protector his Uncle " ſuch a Love for him, that he fears nothing " more than that he ſhould Eſcape his Hands? " I unfeignedly declare, that it never ſo much " as entred into my Thoughts to ſend him out " of this Place into any Foreign Parts, partly " becauſe his Health will not bear any Journeys, " and partly becauſe, tho' I ſhould not ſcruple " to ſend him into any Part of the World, " where I knew him out of all Danger, yet I do " not think any Place more ſecure than this " Sanctuary, which there never was any Ty- " rant ſo deviliſh, who dare Violate; and I truſt " that the Almighty God will ſo aw the Minds " of his, and my Enemies, as to Reſtrain them " from offering Violence to this Holy Place. But Queen's Argument for Privileges of Sanctuary.

" you tell me, That the Lord Protector and " the Council are of Opinion that my Son can't " deſerve a Sanctuary, and therefore may not " be allow'd the Privileges of it: He hath found " out a goodly Gloſs, as if that Place which can " Protect a Thief, or Wicked Perſon, is not of " greater Force to Defend the Innocent, becauſe " he is in no Danger, and therefore can have no " need of it; which is an Opinion as Erroneous " as Helliſh. But the Child, you ſay, can't re- " quire the Privilege of a Sanctuary, and there- " fore ſince he has no Will to Chooſe it he ought " not to have it: Who told the Protector ſo? " Ask him, and you ſhall here him Require it. " But ſuppoſe it were really ſo that he could " not ask it, or if he could, would not, but " would rather chooſe to go out; I think it is " ſufficient that I do Require it, and am Regi- " ſtred a Sanctuary-Perſon, to make any Man " guilty of breaking Sanctuary to take my Son " out of it by Force and againſt my Will: For " is not the Sanctuary a Protection in that Caſe " as well for my Goods as my Self? No Man " can lawfully take my Horſe from me, if I Stole " him not, or Owe nothing; and ſurely much " leſs my Child. Beſides by Law, as my Lear- " ned Council ſheweth me, he is my Ward, be- " cauſe he hath no Lands by Deſcent holden by " Knights Service, but only by Soccage, and then " I being the Guardian of my Son by Law, no " Man can take him by force from me without " Injuſtice in any Place, and without Sacrilege " from hence. And upon this Right I do inſiſt, " and Require the Privilege of Sanctuary for " him, as my Pupil and Infant, to whom alone " by Law the Care of him belongs: and if this " triple Cord may be broken, I mean, the Right " which I have to keep him with me by the " Law of Man, as his Guardian; by the Law of " Nature, as his Mother; and by the Law of " God, as being in Sanctuary with him; If all " this be not enough to ſecure him from any " Human Force, I think nothing under Heaven " can: But I do not deſpair of Safety where I " have always found ſo much. Here was I brought " to Bed of my Son who is now King, and tho' " his Enemy Reigned, and might have uſed the " ſame or like Pretences to have taken us both " from Sanctuary, yet he did not; and I hope " no Man will have the Boldneſs to act contra- " ry to all former Precedents, but the Place " that protected one Son, will be as great a " Security to the other: For to be plain with " you, My Lord, I fear to put him into the " Protector's Hands, becauſe he hath his " Brother already, and ſince he pretends to be " the next Heir to the Crown after them, not- " withſtanding his Siſters, if they any ways " miſcarry, his Way to the Throne lies Plain " and Eaſy to him. Now this is ſo juſt a Cauſe " of Fear, that even the Laws of the Land teach " me it, which as Learned Men tell me, forbids " every Man the Guardianſhip of them, by " whoſe Death they become Heirs to their In- " heritance; and if the Law is ſo careful of " ſuch as have the leaſt Inheritance, how much " more ought I to be fearful that my Children " come not into his Power, who by their Death " will have the Kingdom for his Inheritance. " By theſe Reaſons I am confirmed in my Reſo- " lutions of keeping my Son in Sanctuary with " me, and my Right ſo to do, and think them ſo " far to Out-ballance the Protector's frivolous " Reaſons of keeping his Brother company, and " being Diſhonourable to him, that I cannot al- " ter my Mind: For I have reaſon to think that " whoever he proves a Protector to, he will " prove a Deſtroyer to them, if they be once in " his Hands and Power. I know the Protector " and Council have Power enough, if they have " Will, to take him and me from this Place; " but whoſoever he be that ſhall dare to do it, " I pray God ſend him ſhortly Need of a Sanctu- " ary, but no Poſſibility to come to it.

1483.

Her Suſpition of the Duke of Glouceſter.

The Cardinal ſeeing the Q. grow more and more Paſſionate by Diſcourſing, and to reflect ſharply upon the Protector, which he was unwilling to hear, becauſe he believed them inconſiderate Effects of Paſſion, thought it time to break off Arguing with her, and therefore to bring all things to a Concluſion, ſaid unto her; " Madam, I will " not Diſpute the Matter longer with you: It is " equal to me, whether you deliver him, or not. " I am with theſe Lords, but the Meſſenger to " know your Reſolution, and beg you will but " tell us plainly, whether you will, or will not " deliver him to us? For tho' if you reſign him " to us, I durſt Pawn my own Body and Soul " to you for his Safety; yet if you Deny it, I " will immediately Depart and finiſh my Truſt, " reſolving never to engage in the Matter again, " ſince I ſee you ſo Reſolute in your own Judg- " ment, as if you thought both me, and all " others lack'd either Wit or Honeſty; Wit, " in that we, not perceiving the Protector's Ill " Deſigns, were made the Tools of his Wicked " Craft; Honeſty, in that knowing his Inten- " tions we have labour'd to bring your Son in- " to the Protector's Hands to Deſtroy him; an Cardinal's Anſwer.

" Execra-

1483. " Execrable Treaſon, which as our ſelves abhor, " ſo we dare boldy ſay was far from the Pro- " tector's Thoughts, and cannot be imputed to " any in this Caſe, but you muſt brand the whole " Council with Short-ſighted Advice and Diſ- " loyalty to their Prince

Theſe Words of the Cardinal's being Peremptory and Short, much amuſed the Queen, being put to it on a ſudden to reſolve whether ſhe would ſend him, or no. The Cardinal ſhe ſaw ready to depart, and the Protector and Council were near ſhe knew; what to do ſhe could not tell: ſhe fear'd that by Delivering him, ſhe caſt him into the Mouth of Ruin; and by Keeping him, ſhe did but provoke the Protector and Council to be more Rough and Severe with them both. She ſaw there was no way to ſave him from the Protector's Hands, but by Conveying him out of his Knowledge or Power; which tho' ſhe Wiſh'd, yet ſhe had no Way to effect it: Wherefore ſhe reſolv'd to make the beſt uſe of Neceſſity, and ſince the Protector muſt have him, take the beſt Way to Secure him in his Hands. She conſider'd, that her Fears were but grounded on vehement Preſumptions, and therefore hop'd Things might not prove ſo Bad as ſhe imagin'd She could not doubt of the Cardinal's Sincerity and Loyalty to her Son, and tho' ſhe indeed fear'd he might be deceived, yet ſhe did not believe either he, or the Lords preſent, would be any ways Acceſſory to his Deſtruction: and for theſe Reaſons ſhe thought it better to deliver him to them, who were ready to Pawn their Honour and Lives for his Security, and would therefore look upon themſelves engaged for his Safety, than ſuffer him to be taken from her; and thereupon taking her Son, the Duke of York, in her Hand, ſhe led him to the Cardinal and Lords, and with great Earneſtneſs ſaid to them, " My " Lord Cardinal, and you my Lords, I am not " ſo opinionated of my ſelf, or ill-adviſed concerning you, as to Miſtruſt either your Wiſdom or Fidelity, as I ſhall prove to you by repoſing ſuch Truſt in you, as, if either of them be wanting in you, will Redound to my Inexpreſſible Grief, the Damage of the whole Realm, and your eternal Shame and Diſgrace: For Lo! Here is my Son, the Perſon whom you deſire; and tho' I doubt not but that I could keep him Safe in this Sanctuary from all Violence; yet here I reſign him into your Hands. I am ſenſible that I run great Hazards in ſo doing, no whit leſs than my Fears ſuggeſt; for I have ſome ſo great Enemies to my Blood, that if they knew where any of it lay in their own Veins, they would preſently let it out; and much more in others, and the nearer to me the more Zealouſly. Experience alſo convinces us all, that the Deſire of a Kingdom knows no Kindred. The Brother in that Caſe hath been the Deſtruction of the Brother, and the Son of his Father; and have we any Cauſe to think the Uncle will be more tender of his Nephews? Each of theſe Children are the other's Defence while they are aſunder; if one be ſafe they are both ſecure; but being both together they are in great Danger: and therefore as a Wiſe Merchant will never adventure all his Goods in one Ship, ſo it looks not ſo Politickly in me to put them both under the ſame Hazards. But notwithſtanding all this, (whether rightly foreſeen or no, I leave you to think on, and prevent.) I do here Deliver him, and his Brother in him to your Keeping, of whom I ſhall ask him again at all times before God and the World. I am Confident of your Fidelity, and

The Queen's Speech at the Delivery of the Duke of York to the Lords.

" and have no reaſon to diſtruſt your Wiſdom, 1483. " Power, or Ability to keep him, if you will " make uſe of your Reſolution when it is re- " quired; and if you are unwilling to do that, " then I pray you leave him ſtill here with me: " and that you may not meet with more than " you did expect, let me beg of you, for " the Truſt which his Father ever repoſed " in you, and for the Confidence I now put in " you, that as you think I fear too much, ſo " you would be cautious that in this weighty " Caſe you fear not too little; becauſe your " Credulity here may make an irrecoverable " Miſtake. Having thus ſpoken, ſhe turn'd to the Child, and ſaid to him, " Farewel, mine own " ſweet Son, The Almighty be thy Protector: Let " me Kiſs thee once more before we part, for " God knows when we ſhall Kiſs again; and then having kiſſed him, ſhe Bleſſed him, and turn'd from him and wept, and ſo went her way, leaving the Child with the Lords weeping alſo for her Departure.

The Duke of York brought to the Protector.

The Cardinal and Lords having obtain'd their Deſire thus, and gotten the Duke of York from his Mother, immediately led him to the Star-Chamber, where the Protector and Lords of the Council ſtaid in Expectation of him. The Protector receiv'd him with all the ſeeming Kindneſs and Reſpect that was due to him, as the King's Brother and his Nephew; and taking him in his Arms kiſſed him, and ſaid, Now Welcom my Lord with all my very Heart: and the ſame Day carried him to the King his Brother, who was at the Biſhop of London's Palace near S. Paul's Church. Here he left them a few Days together; and becauſe all Things were in a great forwardneſs for the Coronation, which he was Zealous to Promote, he cauſed the King and the Duke his Brother to be remov'd to the Tower, the uſual Place from whence that Solemnity began, with much Pomp and State. But now the Protector was at a ſtand how to Proceed: He look'd upon himſelf, as the Lawful King of theſe Realms, by the Judgment of ſuch as were beſt Able to determine ſuch Doubts; but yet ſince his Brother's Children were generally preſumed the True Heirs, and their Illegitimacy not underſtood, or Diſregarded, he was Afraid to Claim his Right againſt the Common Opinion, and yet as loath to throw it up himſelf, as he muſt do by Crowning his Brother's Son. There was almoſt a Neceſſity the Coronation ſhould go forward; it had proceeded ſo far, that the Nation would grumble extreamly at the Expence if it were now laid aſide; and on the other ſide, if his Nephew were crown'd he muſt give up his Right, and not only deprive himſelf but his Children: Wherefore he reſolv'd with himſelf to ſeem as Earneſt as ever in carrying it on, and to that end, appointed a Council of ſuch Lords as he knew to be moſt Faithful to the King his Nephew, of whom the Lord Haſtings the Chamberlain, and Lord Stanley were the Chief, to Aſſemble De die in diem at Baynard's-Caſtle to conſult and contrive the Ways and Ceremonies for the Coronation of his Nephew; but in the mean Seaſon he contriv'd ſecretly to make known his own Title to certain Perſons that he could Confide in, and by delaying the Coronation try how far his own Intereſts might be Advanced, that he might obtain his Right Peaceably and Quietly; but being Senſible how great Prejudices he was to Encounter with on all Hands, he knew he muſt proceed very warily in it. The Duke of Buckingham in all his Motions hitherto had been his chief Friend and Aſſiſtant. He in a manner had made him Pro-

A Council appointed to carry on the Coronation.

1483. tector, and it would be ſuch a Diſobligation if he ſhould not make uſe of him in his Councils, that he certainly would turn his Enemy, and being of ſuch mighty Intereſt would pull him down, as he had ſet him up. And yet he could hardly hope for any Encouragement from him; becauſe tho' the Duke was a Male-content in the Days of the late King, yet he ſeem'd very Loyal to his Son, as if he had Buried the Enmity to his Father in his Grave. But the Protector knew old Enmity is eaſily Reviv'd, and to prepare the Duke of Buckingham for his Deſigns, he Suborn'd certain Perſons about the Duke to repreſent to him the King's Diſpleaſure for impriſoning his Mother's Kindred, and into what a miſerable Dilemma, he had run himſelf by that Action; for if they were Releaſed they'd bear him an Immortal Grudge, and if they were put to Death, he was ſure to incur the King's Anger ſo much, that he could hope for nothing, but Misfortunes on all Hands; for the King did not Refrain from ſuch Expreſſions as ſhew'd, that whenever he had Power he would Revenge it upon him to the Utmoſt. Theſe Relations ſtruck him with a Fear of Danger, and prediſpos'd him to lay hold upon any Opportunity of Securing himſelf; which the Duke of Glouceſter, who laid the Train, ſoon offer'd him; for a little after inviting him to a Conference, he deſired him to Aſſiſt him in taking upon him the Crown of England as his Right, ſhewing him the Judgment of the Civil Lawyers concerning the Illegitimacy of his Brother's Children, and promiſing, as the Reward of his Faithful Services to him, that his Son ſhould Marry the Duke's Daughter; that he would give him the Earldom of Hereford with all the Appurtenances, which tho' his Inheritance, yet had been Unjuſtly kept from him by his Brother; And laſtly, That he would Allow him a large Share of K. Edward's Treaſure, and ſo much of the Wardrobe as ſhould furniſh his Houſe, and ſettle upon him and his Poſterity the Office of the High-Conſtable of England, which his Anceſtors by Deſcent for many Generations had enjoy'd.

Duke of Buckingham engages with the Protector in taking the Crown.

The Duke of Buckingham was not hard to be won to engage in ſuch an Action as ſecur'd him from his preſent Fears, and afforded a Proſpect of ſo much Gain and Advantage, and ſo became a Zealous Actor for the Protector in making him King; for he ſoon brought many of his Friends into the ſame Deſign, and with the Protector conſtituted a Council, which ſat at Croſbye's Place, the Protector's Manſion Houſe, to contrive the moſt Artificial and Politick Ways to Settle the Crown upon his Head: but they were to meet very Secretly and Privately.

The Protector's Private Council ſuſpected by the other.

This Council had not ſat long, but both their Perſons and their Actions were Diſcerned: for Cardinal Bourchier Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Rotheram Archbiſhop of York, John Morton Biſhop of Ely, the Lord Stanley, Lord Haſtings, and other Perſons of Quality, who were buſie to order the Coronation, perceiv'd that, notwithſtanding their Endeavours, Matters mov'd ſlowly, and they ſaw Cauſe to ſuſpect contrary Motions.

The Common People began to Murmur at the Delays of the Coronation, and talk'd as tho' there were ſome bad Deſigns on foot, tho' no Man could gueſs at what was really intended; but it was generally look'd upon as a bad Omen that the Protector took upon him a State and Magnificence above his Place, and would endure none but his own Servants about the King, who gave an unkind Welcom to all Perſons, that either deſir'd to ſee the King out of Curioſity, or wait on him out of Duty; as tho' 1483. they would tell Men that they muſt ſeek the King elſewhere, viz. at their Maſter's Palace, which was ſoon ſo well underſtood by ſuch as expected any Honours and Preferments at Court, that the Protector was Flatter'd and Careſs'd as King, while his Nephew was little regarded, and bore only an inſignificant Name.

Theſe Actions increaſed the Jealouſie of the Lords who ſat at Baynard's-Caſtle to Direct the Coronation; and the Lord Stanley, who was a Wiſe and Sagacious Man, began to declare openly to his Brethren, "That he much diſlik'd "theſe Doings, and could not believe that two "different Councils could Produce any good "Effects: We are conſcious of the Loyalty and "Integrity of our Actions; but who knows "what the Cabal at Crosbye's-Place Talk of, and "Contrive? I fear, what we are Building, they "are Plucking down; and unleſs we could U-"nite, or know their Councils, ours will be in "Vain. Peace, My Lord, ſaid the Lord Ha- Lord Haſtings ap-peaſes their Diſ-truſts. "ſtings, never fear or miſdoubt any thing; I "durſt aſſure you upon my Life All's well, or "at leaſt nothing Ill is intended againſt Us: "For while One Man is there, who is never "Abſent, I am ſure there can be nothing pro-"pounded which ſhall ſound Ill to me, but it "will be in my Ears as ſoon as it is out of "their Mouths almoſt. This the Lord Haſtings meant of one Catesby a Lawyer, who was his ſpecial Confident, and being put into a Conſiderable Truſt in the Counties of Leiceſter and Northampton, where this Lord's Intereſt and Power lay, merely by his Means, was reputed by him ſo Faithful and Grateful, that he would neither do, nor ſuffer to be done any things Injurious to his Patron: which indeed he had great reaſon to have done, but he much deceiv'd him, as will after appear, and ſo was the Chief Inſtrument of Working the Protector's Will and Aims; for the Lords generally ſaw ſo many Signs of Diſtruſt, that had they not rely'd entirely upon the Lord Haſtings's Word, whom they knew Firm and Loyal, they had all departed every Man to his own Country and provided for their own Safety, which had certainly broken all the Protector's Meaſures; for they were Men of great Power and Intereſt with the People, and could eaſily have kept Matters in the Right Current had they been at Home; but Catesby carrying all fair to Haſtings, and he perſwading them that nothing could be done amiſs till he ſhould know it and advertiſe them of it, they truſted to him, and denying their own Senſes almoſt to conſtrue all things for the beſt, laid themſelves open to Ruin, and made way to the Protector's Deſigns, which both himſelf and his Council were vigilant to improve.

Haſtings Careſſed, and ſounded by his Confident Catesby.

The former Jealouſies of the Council at Baynard's-Caſtle were ſoon known to the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham, and tho' they would not ſeem to be ſenſible of it, yet they took up Reſolutions with themſelves either to win them over to their Side, or if not to ſecure them from being their Enemies, and to this end they ſhew'd great Favour to the Lord Haſtings, who much influenc'd the Actions of all the Reſt, and kept him much in their Company, hoping by Familiarity and friendly Endearments to diſpoſe him to a Compliance with their Deſigns, which they not long after caus'd Catesby his familiar Acquaintance to Propound to him, but at ſome diſtance, leaſt his Refuſal ſhould betray all; for if they could gain him, they were ſure of the greater part of the Reſt. Catesby, who now had forgotten all former Obligations, and 1483. and was courting greater Favours, readily undertook the Employment, and coming to the Lord Haſtings, who had not yet the leaſt Miſtruſt of him, after much other Diſcourſe about the ~~preſent~~ Circumſtances of Affairs, asks his Opinion about the Title and Claim that the Protector had to the Crown; inſinuating, that if it might Lawfully be done, it would be better that an Experienc'd Perſon and a Brave Commander ſhould Rule than a Child. The Lord Haſtings, who was firmly Loyal to K. Edward's Children, preſuming upon Catesbye's Fidelity, freely open'd his Mind to him without any Circumlocutions, and having ſhew'd him what Jealouſies the Council had of the Protector's Actions, with Indignation expreſſed his utter Diſlike of it in Words to this Effect: "That he had rather ſee the "Death and Deſtruction of the Protector and "D. of Buckingham, than the Young King depri-"ved of the Crown; and that if he diſcern'd any "Deſigns that Way in any Perſons whatſoever, "he would engage his utmoſt Power and Ability "againſt them. Theſe Words, which 'tis believed the Lord Haſtings would never have ſpoke, had he ſuſpected (a) either the Miſſion, or Treachery of Catesby, were carried to the Protector immediately, and repreſented to him not with the mollifying Terms of a Friend, but Aggravations of an Enemy, becauſe he hop'd by his Death and the Protector's Favour, which for this ill Office alone he had reaſon not to doubt of, to obtain moſt of the Rule and Truſt, which that Lord had in his Country, and ſo his Ruin would be his own Making.

Catesby's Treachery.

The Protector received the Account of Haſtings's Averſion to his Deſigns with much Trouble and Regret, not for the Diſappointment only, but becauſe he had a great Love for him, who had always been his Friend, and had done him many Kindneſſes in his Brother's Days, and therefore engaged Catesby to win him, if poſſible: but Catesby willing to ſee his Downfall, repreſented him ſo irreconcilable to his Proceedings, that he chang'd the Protector's Love into Hatred to him, and made him lay hold upon any ſlight Pretences to take away his Life, without which he ſaw he muſt meet with a great Impediment in the Road of his Ambition, and ſo the Way was Agreed upon in this Manner.

Haſtings Death contriv'd.

The Protector call'd a Great Council at the Tower on Friday the 13th of June, on pretence of concluding all Things for the Coronation, which drew on apace, the Pageants being making Day and Night at Weſtminſter, and Victuals killed ready for it. The Lords of this Council aſſembled Early in the Morning, and ſat Cloſe to their Buſineſs to ſettle every Thing for that Solemnity.

The Protector came about Nine a Clock to them, and having Saluted all the Lords very courteouſly, excus'd himſelf for coming to them ſo late, ſaying Merrily, That he had play'd the Sluggard this Morning. Then he ſat down and diſcourſed a-while with them about the Buſineſs in hand, and was very Pleaſant and Jocoſe in all his Speeches. Among other things more Serious he by the Bye ſaid to the Biſhop of Ely, My Lord, You have very good Strawberries in your Garden at Holborn, I deſire you to let us have a Diſh to Dinner. Gladly, my Lord, will I do that, (quoth the Biſhop) I wiſh I had ſome better Thing as ready for your Service as they; and thereupon ſent his Servant in all haſte for a Diſh of Strawberries. A little after this, the Protector obliging them to go on in their Councils, requeſted them to diſpenſe with his Abſence a-while, and ſo departed. 1483.

In the ſpace of little more than an Hour he return'd again, but with ſuch an angry Countenance, knitting his Brows, frowning and biting his Lips, that the whole Council were amaz'd at the ſudden Change. Being ſet down, he ſaid nothing for a good while, but at length ſpoke with great Concern, and ask'd them this Queſtion, What Puniſhment do they deſerve who had Plotted his Death, who was ſo near in Blood to the King, and by Office the Protector of the King's Perſon and Realm? This Queſtion he had raiſed out of Catesby's Account of the Lord Haſtings's Words and Diſcourſe, which he ſo repreſented to him, as if he had Wiſh'd and Contriv'd his Death. The Lords of the Council were much ſtartled at it, and thinking with themſelves of whom he meant it, return'd no Anſwer. The Lord Haſtings who was always familiar with him, and thought this general Silence not reſpectful, reply'd, That they deſerv'd to be puniſh'd as heinous Traitors, whoſoever they were. Then ſaid the Protector, And that hath that Sorcereſs my Brother's Wife, (meaning the Queen, but diſdaining to call her ſo) with others her Accomplices endeavour'd to do. Theſe Words begat freſh Fears and Diſturbances among them; becauſe they moſt of them favour'd the Queen: but Haſtings was well enough Content that the Crime was not laid upon any that he lov'd better, tho' he lik'd not that the Protector had not communicated it to him, as he had done his Deſigns to put the Queen's Kindred to Death: (which was by his Advice and Approbation to be done that Day at Pomfret-Caſtle.) The Protector ſtill went on in his Complaints, and ſaid, "See, in what a miſerable manner that Sorce-"reſs, and Shore's Wife, with others their Aſſo-"ciates have by their Sorcery and Witchcraft "miſerably deſtroy'd my Body: And therewith Unbuttoning his Left Sleeve, ſhew'd them his Arm fleſhleſs, dry and wither'd, Saying, "Thus "would they by degrees have deſtroy'd my "whole Body, if they had not been Diſcover'd "and Prevented, in a ſhort time. This Proof, which the Protector thought to give of his Accuſation, convinc'd the Council that he had only a Mind to Quarrel with them, for they all knew that his Arm was never otherwiſe, and that as the Queen was too nice to engage in any ſuch Fooliſh Enterprize, ſo if ſhe had done it, ſhe would not have made Shore's Wife, whom of all Women ſhe moſt hated, becauſe ſhe was her Husband's beſt-beloved Concubine, one of her Council. 1483.

The Q. accuſed of Witchcraft.

Lord Haſtings kept Shore's Wife. He is Arreſted.

The Lord Haſtings, who from King Edward's Death had kept Shore's Wife (for whom he had a great Kindneſs in the King's Life, but in Reverence to him forbore her) was inwardly troubled to hear her, whom he lov'd, and knew [illegible] be Innocent of any ſuch thing, ſo highly and u[illegible] juſtly Accuſed, and becauſe he had made the firſt Anſwer to the Duke's Queſtion, he took himſelf obliged to return as Modeſt an Anſwer as he could to his Accuſation; and therefore ſaid, "Certainly my Lord, if they have indeed done "any ſuch Thing, they deſerve to be both Se-"verely puniſh'd: But this Anſwer diſcover'd the Lord Haſtings's Opinion ſo much, that he thought the Accuſation falſe and forged, that (a) Sir Thomas Moor makes it a Doubt whether he ſpoke the Words, or not; or indeed, whether Catesby try'd him, or not.

the 1483. the Protector in Anger catch'd hold of his Words, and ſaid, Do you Anſwer me with If's and And's as if I charg'd them falſely? I tell you, they have done it, and thou haſt joyn'd with them in this Villainy; and therewith clapped his Fiſt down hard upon the Board, at which Sign ſeveral Men in Arms ruſh'd into the Room, crying, Treaſon, Treaſon. The Protector ſeeing them come in, ſaid to the Lord Haſtings, I Arreſt thee, Traitor. What me, My Lord, ſaid Haſtings? Yea, thou Traitor, ſaid the Protector. Whereupon he was taken into their Cuſtody. In this Buſtle, which was all before contriv'd, a certain Perſon ſtruck at the Lord Stanley with a Pole-Ax, and had certainly cleft him down, had not he been aware of the Blow and ſunk under the Table: yet he was wounded ſo on the Head that the Blood ran about his Ears.

The Archbiſhop of York, and other Biſhops impriſon'd.

Then was the Archbiſhop of York, Biſhop of Ely, and Lord Stanley, with divers other Lords who were thought averſe to his Deſigns, Impriſon'd in ſeveral Places in the Tower; and the Lord Haſtings order'd forthwith to Confeſs and Prepare himſelf for his Death, for the Protector had Sworn by St. Paul that he would not Dine till his Head was off.

It was in vain to complain of Severity, or demand Juſtice, the Protector's Oath muſt not be broken: ſo he was forc'd to take the next Prieſt that came, and make a ſhort Confeſſion, for the Common Form was too long for the Protector's Stomach to wait on, and being immediately hurried to the Green by the Chappel within the Tower, his Head was laid on a Timber-logg which was provided for Repairing the Chappel, and there ſtricken off. His Body and Head were carried to Windſor, and there buried by his Maſter King Edward IV. late deceaſed, it being very Convenient that he ſhould have a Place next him at his Death, who had loſt his Life for his Unmovable Loyalty to his Children.

Omens of Haſtings's Death.

The Death of this Great Lord, as it was ſudden and unſuſpected, ſo it may ſeem to have been particularly regarded by Heaven, from whence he had many Omens of it given him either to avoid it or prepare for it, if he had had but Wiſdom to take a due Notice of them; which are worth a particular Relation, that we may ſee the Care Providence has of Men in imminent Dangers.

The Night before his Death the Lord Stanley had a fearful Dream, in which he thought that a Wild Boar with his Tuſhes had ſo wounded his own and the Lord Chamberlain's Head, that the Blood ran about both their Shoulders. This Dream had more than an uſual Impreſſion upon him, and becauſe he interpreted the Dream of the Protector, who gave the Boar for his Arms, and the Wounds and Blood from their Heads of ſome imminent Danger of their Lives, he reſolv'd no longer to tarry within reach of his Power, but ordering Horſes to be got ready, ſent his Chamberlain to the Lord Haſtings at Midnight to acquaint him with his Dream, and encourage him to take Horſe as faſt as he could, and with him ſecure himſelf, for with ſwift Horſes they could get near their Friends by Morning, Lord Stanley from his Dream adviſes him to fly.

The Lord Haſtings, tho' awaked out of his Sleep, yet being naturally a Man neither Melancholy nor Superſtitious, receiv'd the Meſſage with a Smile; And ſaid to him, Doth my Lord, your Maſter, give ſo much Credit to ſuch Trifles as Dreams, which are uſually the Effect of our Fears or Cares? Pray tell him, That it is plain Witchcraft to believe in ſuch Dreams, which if they may be allowed Foretellers of Things to come, yet are ſo Uncertain, that we may do our ſelves more Harm than Good in following them: for who could aſſure him, that if there is any real Danger to be feared from the Boar, we ſhall not fall into it rather by ~~Flying~~ than Tarrying? For if we ſhould be taken and brought back, (as might very well happen) we ſhould give the Boar juſt Occaſion to Goar us; for our Flight would be ſuch an Argument of ſome Guilt, that we could hardly avoid it, and to alledge a Dream as the Cauſe, would make us ridiculous to all Men: Wherefore if there were Danger, as indeed there is none unleſs in his cauſleſs Fears, it is rather in Flying than Tarrying; and if we muſt fall into it one way or other, I had rather that Men ſhould ſee it to be from others Falſhood, than my Guilt or Cowardice: And therefore go to thy Maſter, and commend me to him, and bid him be merry and fear nothing: for I can aſſure him, that there is as little Danger from the Man he means as from my own right Hand. God grant it may be ſo (ſays the Meſſenger) and ſo departed. The Gentleman brought the Meſſage to his Lord, and made him forget his Reſolution; tho' with what Miſchief to himſelf the Event proved.

Other Ominous Preſages he had of his Death that Morning, which his Security would not ſuffer him to take Notice of. Before he was up from his Bed, (where he had lain all Night with Shore's Wife) there came to him Sir Thomas Howard, Son of the Lord Howard, to call him as he pretended, and to Accompany him to the Council; but he was really ſent by the Protector to perſwade him to come if he ſhould not intend it, or if he deſign'd it to haſten him; which tho' he manag'd artificially enough, yet being of the Protector's Cabinet Council he was ſuſpicious, and in the Way as they paſſed along, he gave the Lord Haſtings ſuch an Odd Interruption, in his Diſcourſe with a Prieſt which he met by the Way, by telling him, tho' merrily, That he wonder'd he would Talk ſo long with a Prieſt, he had no Occaſion for one, as yet; that he might eaſily have ſuſpected he knew that he ſhould have need of one Soon: but he was a looſe and careleſs Man, and regarded it not.

Sir Tho. Howard's Words.

His Horſe's ſtumbling.

In the Way alſo as he paſſed from his Houſe to the Tower, his Horſe that he was accuſtom'd to Ride, ſtumbled with him twice or thrice ſo dangerouſly that he had almoſt faln; which thing, tho' it happens almoſt daily to Perſons who fall into no Miſchance, yet of old it was accounted a certain Preſage of ſome Misfortune. Alſo when he came to the Tower-Wharf, within a Stone's caſt of the Place where his Head was cut off a few Hours after, he met with a Purſevant of his own Name call'd Haſtings, who having met him in the ſame Place, when he lay under King Edward's Diſpleaſure thro' the Accuſation of the Lord Rivers the Queen's Brother, and was in great Danger of his Life, put him in Mind of his former Danger, and thereupon he fell into a Diſcourſe with him about it and ſaid, Ah Haſtings! Doſt thou remember, when I once met thee in this Place before with an heavy Heart? Yea, my Lord (ſaid he) very well, and Thanks be to God, your Enemies got no good and you no harm by it. You would ſay ſo indeed (ſaid the Lord Haſtings) if you knew as much as I do now, or as you will ſhortly. I was never ſo afraid of my Life, as I was then; but now Matters are well mended with me: Mine Enemies are now in as great Danger as I was then (This he ſaid, becauſe he knew that the Protector by his and others Advice had given

His Diſcourſe with one Haſtings.

1483. given Order for the Execution of the Lord Rivers, Lord Grey, and Sir Thomas Vaughan at Pomfret) and I was never Merrier nor more Secure in all my Life. With these Words he parted and went into the Tower, whence he never came out again. Oh the uncertain Confidence and short-sighted Knowledge of Man! When this Lord was most afraid, he was most secure; and when he was secure, Danger was over his Head. By him we may see the Truth of David's Advice, Oh put not your trust in Princes! and learn to leave all to God's Providence who delivers us in Dangers, and never leaves us but when we grow Self-confident; of which this great Man was a sad Example, and ought to be a Warning to us in the like Case.

Hastings's Death murmured at and justified.

The Protector having thus far proceeded to open himself a plain Way to the Crown by removing all that appear'd in Opposition to it, Hastings being Dead, and the Lords of his Party in Prison, was yet at a Plunge, how to justify to the Nation the Severity of these Proceedings against him. For the Lord Hastings, tho' in himself no good Man, as his Publick keeping of Shore's Wife for his Concubine declared, yet was had in great Esteem by the King's Friends, as a Person of approved Loyalty and good Affection to King Edward's Line, and by the People as a Lover of the Common Good, and he was sensible that the News of his Death, which would fly into all Parts from the City apace, would cause great Discontents in all Parts of the Nation: Whereupon he thought it his wisest Course to send for the Lord Mayor and Chief Citizens to him into the Tower, and give them a full Account of the Justice of the Lord Hastings's Sufferings; that so the Murmurs of the City being appeased, the Nation might have no cause to repine.

This Contrivance he put in Execution immediately after Dinner the same Day, and having put on Old rusty Armour, which lay neglected in the Tower, and commanded the Duke of Buckingham to do the same, as if their sudden Danger had caused them to take any thing that lay next for their Defence, he and the Duke stood ready to receive them.

When they were come, the Protector told them, "That the Lord Hastings, and several "other Persons, had conspired and contrived "together suddenly to Kill him and the Duke "of Buckingham that Day in Council, for what "Cause, or for what Design he could not guess, "and had not yet time to search it out, be-"cause he had no certain Knowledge of the "intended Treason before Ten a-Clock of the "same Day, so that he had enough to do to "stand upon his own Guard, and provide for "his own Defence; which tho' they had both "done in an Undecent manner, by putting "on such filthy Armour, yet Necessity o-"bliging them to it, they were forc'd to take "what was next Hand: That God had won-"derfully protected them from the Danger "he hoped, now the Lord Hastings was dead, "against whom, tho' there might seem to be "something of Cruelty us'd in so sudden an "Execution without any Legal Tryal and Hear-"ing, yet there appearing to the King and the "Lords of his Council many Reasons to be-"lieve, that if he had been kept in Prison, his "Complices would have made a formidable In-"surrection in the Country to Rescue him, and "his Guilt being very Evident, they judg'd it "best to inflict the deserved Punishment of his "Crimes upon him immediately, that the Peace "of the Nation might not be in Danger. This "is the real Truth of the Business, and we "have therefore call'd you hither to inform 1483. "you of it that you may, as you see Cause, "satisfie the People of the Justice of the Lord "Hastings's Sufferings, which tho' we were no "ways oblig'd to do, yet out of our Care to "please them, we have condescended to it, and "we require you thus to Report it. They all answer'd fair, and declar'd their Readiness to Obey, as if they really believed him, tho' in themselves they look'd upon his Harangue as a plausible Pretence for a foul Fact, and so taking their Leaves of him departed. But upon more Mature Deliberation this was not thought sufficient to appease the People's Minds; and therefore soon after the Mayor and Citizens were gone, an Herald of Arms was sent into the City to Publish a Proclamation in all Parts of it, to this Effect:

A Proclamation Publish'd to justifie Hastings's Death.

"That the Lord Hastings with divers other "wicked Conspirators, had Traiterously con-"trived the same Day to have Slain the Pro-"tector and Duke of Buckingham Sitting in "Council, with a Purpose and Design to take "upon him the Government of the King and "Kingdom, and rule all Things at his Pleasure, "hoping that when they were Dead, they should "meet no Opposition in their Designs. And "in how miserable a Condition this Nation "had been, if God had left them in his Hands, "appear'd from the former Actions of the said "Lord, who being so Ill a Man, could not make "a good Governour. For he it was, that by his "ill Advice enticed the King's Father to ma-"ny Things much redounding to his Dishonour "and to the Universal Damage and Detriment "of the Realm, leading him into Debauchery "by his Examplary Wickedness, and procuring "Lewd and Ungracious Persons to gratifie his "Lusts, and particularly Shore's Wife, who was "one of his Secret Council in this Treason, by "which lewd Living, the said King not only "shortned his Days, but also was forced to "Oppress and Tax his People, that he might "have sufficient to gratify his Expences. And "since the Death of the said K. he hath lived in "a continual Incontinency with the said Shore's "Wife, and lay Nightly with her, and parti-"cularly the very Night before his Death; so "that it was no marvel if his Ungracious Life "brought him to as Unhappy a Death, which "he was put to by the Special Command of the "King's Highness, and of his Honourable and "Faithful Council, both for his own Demerits, "being so openly taken in his intended Trea-"son, and also least any Delay of his Execution "might have encourag'd other Mischievous Per-"sons, who were engaged in the Conspiracy with "him, to make an Insurrection for his Delive-"rance, which being wisely foreseen, and as "effectually prevented, was the only means un-"der God's Providence to preserve the whole "Realm in Peace and Quietness.

The Proclamation not regarded.

This Proclamation, which was very well Indited (as was thought by Catesby, who was a Chief Actor in this Tragedy) and as fairly written on Parchment, tho' the Expedition of the Publishing of it was look'd upon as Politick and Wise to prevent the Discontents of the People, yet it did very little Good: for when Men came to compare Things, and consider'd, That the Proclamation was very Elegantly composed, very fairly written, and being very long was yet Publish'd within two Hours after the Death of the Lord Hastings, they began to suspect that that Lord had foul Dealings, and that his Ruin being determin'd, it was composed and written before his Death; for the Time after 1483. was not ſufficient, either to Compoſe or Write it in. And hence it was, that ſome ſpared not to Reflect upon it. The School-maſter of Paul's, ſharply ſaid,

Here's a very goodly Caſt,
Foully Caſt away for Haſte.

And a Merchant that ſtood by him, Anſwer'd him, It was Written by Prophecy. Thus did the Protector endeavour to Palliate his Wickedneſs, in Deſtroying the Lord Haſtings, but all was in vain; this Action was too foul to receive any tolerable Plea, which would paſs with Men of any Thought at all.

The Protector proceeds a gainſt Shore's Wife.

The Protector having done as much as cou'd be done, to excuſe his Cruelty to the Lord Haſtings, took himſelf oblig'd to proceed againſt Shore's Wife, whom he had accus'd of the ſame Treaſon; leaſt if he ſhou'd let her eſcape, he ſhou'd betray his Plot: for if ſhe were not Guilty, no more was the Lord Haſtings; and if he deſerved Death, ſo did ſhe. For this Reaſon, he ſent Sir Thomas Howard to her Houſe, with an Order of Council to Apprehend her Perſon, and Seize her Goods, as forfeited to the King by her Treaſon; which were both accordingly done; and her Goods, to the value of Two or Three Thouſand Marks being taken from her, ſhe was carry'd to Priſon into the Tower: Within a few Days after, ſhe was brought to her Examination before the King's Council, and the Protector laid to her Charge, "That ſhe had "endeavour'd his Ruin and Deſtruction ſeveral "ways; and particulary, by Witchcraft had "decay'd his Body, and with the Lord Haſtings "had contriv'd to Aſſaſſinate him. But ſhe made ſo good a Defence for her ſelf, as that there appear'd not the leaſt Likelihood of her being Guilty: Whereupon they, by the Protector's Order, fell upon her for her open and ſcandalous Whoredom, which every Body knowing ſhe cou'd not Deny. And becauſe they wou'd do ſomething to her to Satisfy him, they deliver'd her over to the Biſhop of London, to do Publick Penance for her Sin in St. Paul's Church, which ſhe accordingly perform'd the next Sunday-Morning, after this Manner: Mrs. Shore being deprived of all her Ornaments, and Cloath'd with a white Sheet, was brought by way of Proceſſion, with the Croſs carried before her, and a Wax Taper in her Hand, to the Church of St. Paul's from the Biſhop's Palace adjoyning, through great Crowds of People gather'd together to behold her; and there Standing before the Preacher, acknowledg'd in a ſet Form, her open Wickedneſs, and declared her Repentance for it: In all this Action, ſhe behav'd her ſelf with ſo much Modeſty and Decency, that ſuch as reſpected her Beauty more than her Fault, never were in greater Admiration of her, than now: for ſhe being a Beautiful and Handſome Woman, wanting nothing in her Face but a little Bluſh, this ſhameful Act ſupply'd that ſo well, that ſhe appear'd more lovely for it; and as to ſuch, as were glad to ſee Sin Corrected, yet they pitty'd her, becauſe they knew, that the Protector did it more out of Hatred to her Perſon, than Sin; more out of Malice, than a love to Virtue.

Shore's Wife does Penance.

Mrs. Sh's Character.

This Woman was Born in London, virtuouſly Educated, and Well Married to a Subſtantial and Honeſt Citizen; but being drawn to the Match, rather by Intereſt than Affection, by her Parents Judgment, than her own Inclination, ſhe never had that Fondneſs for him, that joyns a Wife inviolably to her Husband's Bed. This Looſeneſs to her Husband, with that natural Ambition, and Affectation of Gay Cloathing and Greatneſs, which is uſually in Women much above their Fortunes, though almoſt never ſo Great, diſpos'd her to accept of the King's Kindneſs, when offer'd; who, beſides that he was a very Handſom and Lovely Perſon, cou'd eaſily gratify her Deſires, and by fulfilling his Luſts, ſhe knew ſhe had Maſtery of his Gifts and Treaſure; and for theſe Reaſons, ſhe became his Concubine. Her Husband (tho' made Unhappy by her Lewdneſs) yet carried his Reſentments evenly; and after the King had Abus'd her, never wou'd have any thing to do with her, whether out of Reverence to the King's Perſon, or out of a Principle of Conſcience, it is not eaſy to determine, tho' both might concur. She lived many Years in King Edward's Court, and tho' that King had many Concubines, and ſome of them of much greater Quality than her ſelf, yet he loved her beſt for her merry and ingenious Behaviour. In this Great, tho' Bad Station, ſhe Demean'd her ſelf with admirable Prudence, and was not Exalted by the King's Favour, but always us'd it with as much Benefit to others as to her ſelf; for ſhe never abus'd the King's Kindneſs to any Man's Hurt, but always us'd it to their Comfort and Advantage: Where the King took Diſpleaſure againſt any Man, ſhe would mitigate his Anger and Appeale his Mind; and ſuch as were out of Favour, ſhe would Reconcile. For many heinous Offenders ſhe obtain'd Pardon, and got a Relaxation, and ſometimes a total Remiſſion of large Fines: and tho' ſhe was the only effectual Suitor almoſt at Court for ſuch as wanted Places and Preferments, yet ſhe made little Advantage to her ſelf by it; expecting none or very ſmall Reward, and that rather Gay than Rich; either becauſe ſhe was content with doing of a Kindneſs, or delighted to be Sought to; for Wanton Women and Wealthy, be not always Covetous. In fine, her Lewdneſs was her only Fault; and tho' that was great enough, yet to have a King for their Bedfellow is ſuch a mighty Temptation, that if no Woman would Condemn her before they have the like Trials, it's to be fear'd, ſhe'd have few to caſt a Stone at her. She was Affable and Obliging, Generous and Charitable; and tho', indeed, ſhe was after reduc'd to a miſerable Poverty in her Old Age, a juſt Puniſhment for her Sin, yet it was a Reproach to many Thouſands, that ſhe was ſo, whom ſhe kept from Beggary; and if they had been Grateful to Requite her for thoſe Kindneſſes in her Want, which ſhe ſcornd to Sell in her Proſperity, ſhe might have Liv'd to her Death, in a Condition great enough for her Brith and Degree.

Shore's Wife's Goodneſs.

Her Lewdneſs her only fault

While the Protector was thus buſied at London, in making his way to the Crown, and excuſing himſelf for the Death of the Lord Haſtings, his bloody Order given for the Execution of the Queen's Kindred, the Lord Rivers and Richard Lord Grey, with Richard Hauſe and Sir Thomas Vaughan at Pomfract, was punctually executed by Sir Richard Ratcliffe, a great Favourite of the Protector's, who was a Man of a deſperate Courage, and forward to promote all his Deſigns. It is thought, they ſuffer'd Death at the ſame time the Lord Haſtings was Beheaded in the Tower; who being a principal Adviſer in their Deaths, may be a Warning to us all, how we concur in the undeſerved Sufferings of innocent Perſons: For God often, and that juſtly, brings the Evil we

The Earl of Rivers, &c. Executed at Pomfract.

1483. we do to others upon our own Heads. The Lord Haſtings, by adviſing the Protector to Deſtroy the Queen's Kindred cauſleſly, ſhew'd him the way to do the like to himſelf. The manner of their Execution was as barbarous as unjuſt. Great and Heavy Accuſations were laid againſt them, but none prov'd. They had not ſo much as the formality of a Tryal, but were brought to the Scaffold on the Day appointed; and being branded, in general, with the Name of Traitors, were Beheaded. The Lord Rivers wou'd fain have declar'd his Innocency to the People, but Ratcliffe wou'd not ſuffer him, leaſt his Words ſhou'd lay open the Protector's Cruelty too much, and make both him and his Party odious to the People; and ſo he died in ſilence. Sir Thomas Vaughan wou'd not endure his Mouth to be ſtopp'd, but as he was going to the Block he ſaid aloud, A Miſchief take them that Expounded the Propheey, which foretold that G ſhould Deſtroy King Edward's Children, for George Duke of Clarence, who for that Suſpicion is now Dead; for there ſtill remain'd Richard G. i. e. Duke of Glouceſter, who now I ſee is he that ſhall, and will, accompliſh the Propheey, and Deſtroy King Edward's Children, and all his Allies and Friends, as appeareth by us this Day; againſt whom I Appeal to the High Tribunal of God, for this wrongful Murther, and our real Innocency. Sir Richard Ratcliffe heard this with Regret, and putting it off, ſaid to him in ſcorn, You have made a goodly Appeal, lay down your Head. Yea, ſaith Sir Thomas, but I Die in the Right, take heed that you Die not in the Wrong: and having this ſaid, he was Beheaded. He, with the other three, were Buried Naked in the Monaſtery of St. John the Evangeliſt at Pomfract.

Sir Richard Ratcliffe wouldnot let them Speak to the People.

Then the Conſpirators held Councel among themſelves, how they might bring about their Wicked Purpoſes. Their chief Difficulty, was to engage the City; and having Gain'd the Lord Mayor, Sir Edmund Shaw his Brother, Dr. John Shaw a Prieſt, and Frier Pinker Provincial of the Auguſtine Friers, to their Intereſt, they determin'd, That Doctor Shaw ſhould firſt break the Matter in a Sermon he was to Preach at Paul's Croſs, and the main Argument he was to uſe for the Depoſing of King Edward and the Advancement of his Unkle Richard, was reſolv'd among them to be the Baſtardy of the Two Princes, Sons to Edward the Fourth; which diſabled them to Inherit the Imperial Crown of this Realm. Tho' this Charge would bring the Scandal of Adultery on the Queen, yet Richard and the Conſpirators did not conſider much, that the whole Royal Family wou'd be Defam'd by it, in the higheſt degree: On the contrary, (rather than fail of the Sovereignty to which he aſpir'd) the Duke of Glouceſter, and his Emiſſaries, intended to give out, That King Edward the Fourth was Himſelf a Baſtard, tho' His Mother was the Parent of the Protector, and in calling Her an Adultreſs, he prophaned the Honour of the very Perſon that brought him into the World. This Accuſation he would have at firſt only hinted, and ſpoken myſteriouſly, that if the People, in abhorrence of ſuch an unnatural Slander, ſhou'd have been ſet againſt the Publiſher of it, there might be room to put ſome other Conſtruction on the Words. Shaw was order'd to declare to his Auditory, That King Edward had promis'd Marriage to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, by whom he had a Child; and that the Dutcheſs of York had told him, He was her Husband before God, to prevent His Marrying the Lady Elizabeth Grey, whoſe Children, by King Edward, were conſequently Baſtards. He was not to mention any thing of that King's Illegitimacy, unleſs he found his Reflection on the Queen's Children wou'd not take. The Doctor was a famous Preacher, and a vaſt Number of Perſons, of all Qualities us'd to flock to hear him: So they thought they had gone a great way in accompliſhing their Deſigns, when they had got him to their Side. Shaw was not only ready to ſpeak what the Conſpirators would have him, but turn'd his whole Diſcourſe againſt the Legitimacy of the Young King and his Brother: He began his Sermon with this Expreſſion, Spurea Vitilamina non agent Radices altas, Baſtard Slips, ſhall never take deep Root. He ſhew'd the Bleſſings that God beſtow'd on the Fruits of the Marriage-Bed, and the Unhappineſs of thoſe Children who were born out of Wedlock. Several Examples of both kinds he us'd to prove the Truth of his Aſſertion. He took occaſion from what he had ſaid, to ſhew the Reaſon they had to fear, that the Reign of the preſent King wou'd be Unfortunate; and inlarg'd very much on the Great things that they might hope for, from the Government of a Prince of the Duke of York's illuſtrious Qualities, the Father of King Edward the Fourth, or rather, of the Lord Protector, who was the only Lawful begotten Son of the late Duke of York, who was Kill'd at the Battel of Wakefield. He then declared, That King Edward was never Legally Married to the Queen, being Husband, before God, to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy: beſides, neither He, nor the Duke of Clarence were thought Legitimate by thoſe of the Duke of York's Family, who were moſt acquainted with the Dutcheſs of York's Intrigues with ſeveral Perſons of Her Husband's Court, whom they Reſembled in the Face: But my Lord Protector, that very Noble Prince, the Pattern of all Heroick Deeds, repreſented the very Face and Mind of the Great Duke his Father: He (ſays the Falſe Preacher) is the perfect Image of his Father; his Features are the ſame, and the very expreſs Likeneſs of that Noble Duke. At theſe Words, 'twas deſign'd the Protector ſhould have enter'd, as if it had been by chance; and the Conſpirators hoped, that the Multitude taking the Doctor's Words, as coming from the immediate Inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, wou'd have been induc'd to have Cry'd out, God Save King Richard. Which Artifice was prevented, either by the Doctor's making too much haſte to come to that part of his Sermon, or the Lord Protector's Negligence to come in at the Inſtant when he was ſaying it; for it was over before he came, and the Prieſt was enter'd on ſome other Matter when the Duke appear'd, which, however he left, and Repeated again, abruptly, The Lord Protector, that very Noble Prince, the Pattern of all Heroick Deeds, Repreſents the very face and Mind of the Great Duke his Father; his Features are the ſame, and the plain expreſs Likeneſs of that Noble Duke. The Protector, Accompanied by the Duke of Buckingham, paſt thro' the Multitude, as the Prieſt ſaid this: but the People were ſo far from Saluting him King, that they were Diſapſtruck with Indignation at the Preacher's Baſe Flattery and Treaſon; who, when he had clos'd his Sermon, went Home, Hid himſelf for Shame, and never after durſt ſhew his Face in the World. Being inform'd how Odious he was become for what he had done, he fell, out of Grief and Remorſe, into a Conſumption, of which he died in a ſhort time. He Preached this Nota-

Dr Shaw's Sermon againſt the Queen's Children.

The Charge of Baſtardy laid to the Princes.

Richard accuſes his Mother of Adultery.

His Device to Move the Aſſembly.

Diſappointed.

1483. ble Diſcourſe, on a Sunday which was to be Preparatory to the Duke of Buckingham's Oration, on the Tueſday following, to the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Council of the City of London, aſſembled for that purpoſe in the Guild-Hall; where that Duke mounting the Huſtings, and Silence being commanded in the Lord Protector's Name, ſpoke to this effect, ſeveral Lords, who were privy to the Secret, attending him;

The D. of Buckingham's Oration to the Citizens.

"Gentlemen, out of the Zeal and Sincere "Affection we have for your Perſons and In- "tereſts, we are come to acquaint you with "a Matter of High Importance, equally plea- "ſing to God, and profitable to the Common- "wealth, and to none more, than to you the "Citizens of this Famous and Honourable "City. For the very Thing, which we be- "lieve you have a long while wanted and "wiſh'd for, what you wou'd have Purchas'd "at any Rate, and gone far to fetch, we are "come hither to bring, without any Labour, "Trouble, Coſt, or Peril to you: And what "can this be, but your own Safety, the Peace "of your Wives and Daughters, the Securi- "ty of your Goods and Eſtates, which were "all in Danger till now? Who, of you, "cou'd call what he had his own, there were ſo "many Snares laid to Deceive you? So ma- "ny Fines and Forfeitures, Taxes and Impo- "ſitions, of which there was no End, and of- "ten no Neceſſity; or if there was, it was "occaſion'd by Riots and Unreaſonable Waſte, "rather than a Juſt and Lawful Charge, for "the Defence or Honour of the State. Your "beſt Citizens were Plunder'd, and their Wealth "ſquander'd by Profuſe Favourites: Fifteenths, "and the uſual Subſidies wou'd not do, but "under the plauſible Name of Benevolence, "your Goods were taken from you by the "Commiſſioners much againſt your Will, as if "by that Name, was underſtood, That every "Man ſhou'd pay, not what he pleas'd, but "what the King wou'd have him; who never "was moderate in his Demands, always Exor- "bitant, turning Forfeitures into Fines, Fines "into Ranſoms; Small Offences into Miſpri- "ſon of Treaſon, and Miſpriſon into Treaſon it "ſelf. We need not give you Examples of "it, Burdet's Caſe will never be forgot; who "for a Word ſpoken in haſte, was cruelly Be- "headed. Did not Judge Markham Reſign "his Office, rather than Joyn with his Bre- "thren, in Paſſing that Illegal Sentence on "that Honeſt Man? Were you not all Wit- "neſſes of the Barbarous Treatment one of "your own Body, the Worſhipful Aldermen "Cook, met with? And your own ſelves know, "too well, how many Inſtances of this kind I "might name among you. King Edward gain- "ing the Crown by Conqueſt, all that were "any ways Related to thoſe that were his E- "nemies, lay under the Charge of Treaſon: "Thus half of the Kingdom became at once "Traytors; for half of the Kingdom were ei- "ther Friends to King Henry, or Relations "or Friends to ſome that were ſo. Tho' O- "pen War with Invaders, is Terrible and De- "ſtructive to a Nation, yet Civil Diſſentions "are much more fatal, and to be dreaded; "with which His Reign was more diſturb'd, "than the Reigns of all his Predeceſſors: "but he is Dead and Gone, and God Forgive "his Soul. It coſt the People more Blood "and Treaſure to get the Crown for This, "than it had done to Conquer France Twice: "Half of the Nobility of the Realm loſt their Hol writes he was Hang'd at Tyburn.

"Lives or Eſtates in his Quarrel; and when 1483.
"the Diſpute was over, the Peace that fol-
"low'd was not much ſafer than the War:
"Every Rich and Landed Man was in danger;
"for whom cou'd he Truſt that Diſtruſted his "own Brother? whom Spare, that Kill'd his "own Brother? or who cou'd perfectly Love
"him, whom his own Brother cou'd not Love?
"We ſhall, in Honour to the Memory of One "that was our Sovereign, forbear to Menti"on, who were the Perſons on which he was
"ſo laviſh of his Favours; only 'tis well known,
"that thoſe that deſerved them moſt, had leaſt
"of them. Was not Shore's Wife his Chief
"Miniſter? Was not there more Court made
"to her than to all the Lords in England;
"except thoſe that were the Strumpet's Favou"rites? Who, poor Woman, was her ſelf Chaſte
"and of Good Reputation, till he deluded her
"to his Luſt, and tempted her from her Huſ-
"band, an Honeſt Subſtantial Young Man, whom "you all know. Indeed I am aſhamed to "ſay it, the King's Appetite in that Point was "inſatiable and intolerable: no Woman cou'd
"eſcape him, Young or Old, Rich or Poor,
"Wife or Virgin, all fell Victims to his Luſt;
"by which Means, the moſt Honourable Houſes
"were Defil'd, and the moſt Honeſt Families
"were Corrupted. You of this Renown'd Ci"ty ſuffer'd moſt: You who deſerv'd moſt from "him for your readineſs to Serve the Houſe
"of York with your lives and Fortunes, which
"tho' he Ill Requited, there is of that Houſe,
"who, by God's Grace ſhall Reward you bet"ter. I ſhall not enlarge on this Subject, you "have heard it from One, whom you will
"hearken to more, as you ought to do;
"for I am not ſo vain as to think, what I "can ſay, will have ſo great Authority with "you, as the Words of a Preacher; a Man
"ſo Wiſe and ſo Pious, that he wou'd not "utter a Thing, in the Pulpit eſpecially,
"which he did not firmly believe 'twas his "Duty to Declare. You remember, I doubt "not, how he ſet forth the laſt Sunday, the "Right of the moſt Excellent Prince Richard,
"Duke of Glouceſter, unto the Crown of this "Realm: For, as he prov'd to you, the Chil"dren of King Edward the Fourth were ne"ver Lawfully Begotten, the King leaving his "Lawful Wife, the Lady Lucy, to contract an "Illegal Marriage with the Queen: My No"ble Lord the Protector's Reverence to the "Dutcheſs his Mother, will not permit me to
"ſay any thing further concerning what the "worthy Doctor alledg'd of her Familiarity with "Others beſides her own Husband, for fear
"of Offending the Duke of Glouceſter her Son:
"Tho' for theſe Cauſes, the Crown of England
"is devolv'd to the moſt Excellent Prince, the "Lord Protector, as the only Lawfully Begot-
"ten Son of the Right Noble Duke of York.
"This, and the Conſideration of his many High "Qualities, has prevail'd with the Lords and "Commons of England, of the Northern Coun"ties eſpecially, who have declared they will "not have a Baſtard Reign over them, to Pe"tition that High and Mighty Prince, to take "on him the Sovereign Power for the Good "of the Realm, to which he has ſo Righteful
"and Lawful a Title: We have reaſon to "fear he will not grant our Requeſt, being a "Prince whoſe Wiſdom foreſees the Labour
"both of Mind and Body that attends the "Supreme Dignity: Which Office is not a "Place for a Child? as that Wiſe Man ob-
"ſerv'd, who ſaid Væ Regno cujus Rex Puer eſt,

"Wo

1483. " Wo is that Realm that has a Child to their " King! Wherefore we have reaſon to bleſs " God that the Prince whoſe Right it is to reign " over us is of ſo ripe Age, ſo great Wiſdom " and Experience, who tho' he is unwilling " to take the Government upon himſelf, yet " the Petition of the Lords and Gentlemen " will meet with the more favourable Acce- " ptance, if you the Worſhipful Citizens of the " Metropolis of the Kingdom will joyn with us " in our Requeſt; which for your own Wel- " fare we doubt not but you will. However, I " heartily entreat you to do it for the Common " Good of the People of England, whom you " will oblige by Chooſing them ſo good a King, " and His Majeſty by ſhewing early your ready " Diſpoſition to his Election. In which my moſt " dear Friends, I require you in the Name of " my Self and theſe Lords, to ſhew us plainly " your Minds and Intentions. The Duke ſtop'd here, expecting the Aſſembly would have cry'd out, God ſave King Richard: but all were huſh'd and Silent, as if the Auditory was confounded with the Extravagance of the Propoſal; at which the Duke was extreamly ſurpriz'd, and taking aſide the Mayor, with ſome others of the Conſpirators, ſaid to them ſoftly, How comes it the People are ſo ſtill? Sir, ſays the Mayor, It may be they don't underſtand you well. The Duke to help the Matter repeated his Speech with a little Variation, and with ſuch Grace and Eloquence, that Never ſo ill a Subject was handled with ſo much Oratory. However the Aſſembly continu'd Silent. Then the Mayor told the Duke, " The " Citizens had not been accuſtom'd to hear a- " ny one but the Recorder, and perhaps they " wou'd take the Thing better from him who " is the Mouth of the City. Upon which the Recorder Fitz-Williams, much againſt his Will ſpoke to the ſame Purpoſe at the Mayor's Command; and yet he manag'd his Speech ſo well as to be underſtood to ſpeak the Duke's Senſe, and not his own. The People being ſtill as before, the Duke mutter'd to the Lord Mayor, ſaying, " They are wonderfully Obſtinate in " their Silence: And turning to the Aſſembly, he ſaid, " Dear Friends, We came to acquaint " you with a Thing which we needed not have " done, had it not been for the Affection we " bear you. The Lords and Commons could have " determin'd the Matter without you, but would " gladly have you joyn with us, which is for " your Honour and Profit, tho' you do not ſee " it nor conſider it: We require you therefore " to give your Anſwer one way or another, " Whether you are willing, as the Lords are, " to have the moſt Excellent Prince the Lord " Protector to be your King or not? The Aſſembly then began to murmur, and at laſt ſome of the Protector's and the Duke's Servants, ſome of the City Apprentices, and the Rabble that had crouded into the Hall, cry'd out, King Richard, King Richard? and threw up their Hats in token of Joy. The Duke perceiv'd eaſily enough who they were that made the Noiſe; yet, as if the Acclamation had been General, he took hold of it; Saying, " 'Tis a Goodly and a Joyful Cry to hear every " Man with one Voice agree to it, and no body " ſay No; Since therefore, Dear Friends, we " ſee you are all as one Man inclin'd to have " this Noble Prince to be your King, we ſhall Re- " port the Matter ſo effectually to him, that we " doubt not 'twill be much for your Advantage. " We require you to Attend us to Morrow with " our joynt Petition to his Grace; as has been " already Agreed on between us. Then the Duke and the Lords came down from the Huſtings and the Aſſembly broke up, the moſt part of them with Weeping Eyes and Aching Hearts; tho' they were forc'd to hide their Tears and their Sorrows as much as poſſible for fear of giving Offence, which had been Dangerous.

Richard Choſen King by the Rabble.

1483.

The next Day the Lord Mayor, the Aldermen, and the Chief of the Common-Council reſorted to Baynard's-Caſtle, where the Protector then lay; and the Duke of Buckingham, Attended by ſeveral Lords and Gentlemen, came thither alſo. The Duke ſent Word to the Protector that a great Company attended to move a Buſineſs of the Higheſt Importance to him, and deſir'd Audience of his Grace. The Duke of Glouceſter made ſome Difficulty of coming forth, as if he was jealous whether their Errand was good or not.

The Duke of Buckingham took this Occaſion to ſhew the Lord Mayor and Citizens how little the Protector was Conſcious of their Deſign; and then he ſent another Meſſenger with ſo Humble and ſo Earneſt a Requeſt to be Heard, that his Grace came forth; yet with ſo much affected Diffidence, that he ſeem'd unwilling to draw near them till he knew their Buſineſs. Then the Duke of Buckingham very ſubmiſſively beg'd Pardon for Himſelf and his Company, and Liberty to propoſe to him what they had to offer, without which they durſt not proceed; tho' 'twas for his Grace's Honour and the Good of the Realm. The Protector gave them Leave to propoſe what they would, Saying, " He be- " liev'd None of 'em ment him any Harm. The Duke then ſet forth Elegantly and Pathetically " the Grievances of the People, and " pray'd him to Redreſs them by Aſſuming the " Sovereign Authority, which of Right belong'd " to him, and which the whole Kingdom with " unuſual Unanimity deſired he would take to " himſelf for the benefit of the Commonwealth, " as much as for his Grace's Honour. The Protector ſeemed mightily ſurpriz'd; and Anſwer'd, " That tho' he knew the Things he al- " ledg'd to be true, yet he lov'd King Edward " and his Children above any Crown whatſo- " ever, and therefore cou'd not Grant their " Requeſt. However he pardon'd their Peti- " tion, and thank'd them for their Love, but " deſir'd them to be Obedient to the Prince " under whom Himſelf and they liv'd at that " Time, and whom he would Adviſe to the " beſt of his Capacity, as he had already done " to the Satisfaction of all Parties. The Duke of Buckingham murmur'd at this Reply, and after having ask'd and obtain'd Pardon a ſecond time for what he was about to ſay, He declar'd aloud to the Protector, " That they " were all Agreed not to have any of King Edward's Line to Reign over them: That they " were gone too far to go back; for which " Reaſon if his Grace wou'd be pleas'd to take " the Crown upon him, they humbly beſeech " him to do it: Or if he he would give them " a reſolute Anſwer to the Contrary, which " they ſhould be loath to Hear; They muſt " and wou'd Look out for ſome Worthy Per- " ſon that wou'd Accept of their Propoſal. At theſe Words, the Protector began to comply a little, and at laſt he Spoke thus to them; " Since we perceive that the whole Realm is " bent upon it not to have King Edward's " Children to Govern them, of which we are " Sorry, and knowing that the Crown can be- " long to no Man ſo juſtly as to our Self, the " Right Heir, lawfully begotten of the Body " of our moſt Dear Father Richard late Duke " of York; to which Title is now joyn'd your Buckingham's Speech to him.

His Anſwer.

He accepts of the Crown.

1483. " Election the Nobles and Commons of this " Realm, which we, of all Titles Possible, take " for the most Effectual; we are content and " agree favourably to receive your Petition " and Requeſt, and according to the ſame take " upon us the Royal Eſtate, Preheminence and " Kingdoms of the Two Noble Realms Eng- " land and France; The One from this day for- " ward by us and our Heirs, to Rule, Govern " and Defend; The Other by God's Grace, and " your good Help to get again, Subdue, and Eſta- " bliſh for ever in due Obedience unto this Realm " of England; and we ask of God to Live no 148
" longer than we intend to Procure its Ad- " vancement. At the Cloſe of his Speech there was a great Shout of God ſave King Richard. The Lords went up to the King, and the People departed every Man talking for or againſt the Revolution, as he was inclin'd by Humour or Intereſt. 'Twas eaſie to perceive that however the thing appear'd Strange to King Richard, 'twas acted by concert with him, and what was done, was only to preſerve Decency and Order.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF RICHARD III.

His Diſſimulation.

THE next Day he went to Weſtminſter, Sat himſelf Down in the Court of King's-Bench, made a very Gracious Speech to the Aſſembly there preſent, and promis'd them Halcyon days from the Beginning of his Reign.

To ſhew his Forgiving Temper, he order'd one Hog whom he hated, and who was fled to Sanctuary for fear of him, to be brought before him, took him by the Hand and ſpoke favourably to him, which the Multitude thought was a Token of his Clemency, and the Wiſemen of his Vanity. In his return Home, he ſaluted every one he met.

He is Crown'd.

From this Mock Election in June he commenc'd his Reign, and was crown'd in July with the ſame Proviſion that was made for the Coronation of his Nephew. But to be ſure of his Enemies he ſent for 5000 Men out of the North, who came up to Town ill Cloath'd and worſe Harneſs'd, their Horſes poor and their Arms ruſty; who being muſter'd in Finsbury-Fields were the Contempt of the Spectators. The Apppearance of theſe Rude Fellows in Arms, gave Cauſe to the People to ſuſpect, that as he was conſcious of his Guilt, he was apprehenſive of its Puniſhment.

On the 4th of July he came to the Tower by Water, with his Wife Ann Daughter to Richard Earl of Warwick; and the next Day he created Thomas Lord Howard Duke of Norfolk, Sir Thomas Howard his Son Earl of Surrey, William Lord Berkly Earl of Nottingham, Francis Lord Lovell Viſcount Lovell, and Lord Chamberlain of the Houſhold, and the Lord Stanley was ſet at Liberty and made Lord Steward of the Houſhold: The King being afraid of the Lord Strange who was raiſing Men in Lincolnſhire, as was reported The Archbiſhop of York was releas'd from his Impriſonment, and Biſhop Morton deliver'd to the Charge of the Duke of Buckingham, who engag'd to keep him in Safe Cuſtody at his Manour of Brecknock. King Richard alſo created Seventeen Knights of the Bath, and his Son Edward Prince of Wales. The ſame Day he and his Queen rode through the City of London to Weſtminſter, and the next Day they were both crown'd in the Abby-Church with extraordinary Pomp. What is moſt Obſervable in the Proceſſion is, That the Counteſs of Richmond, Mother to King Henry the Seventh, bore up the Queen's Train. After the Ceremony was over, the King diſmiſs'd all the Lords who attended his Coronation except the Lord Stanley, whom he retain'd till he heard that the Lord Strange, his Son, was Quiet in the Country. He gave the Lords a ſtrict Charge to ſee their ſeveral Counties were well Govern'd and none of his Subjects Wrong'd. He liberally rewarded his Northern Men, who valu'd themſelves ſo much on the King's Favour, that preſuming to commit many acts of Injuſtice and Oppreſſion upon it, he was forc'd to take a Journey into the North to reclaim them. What is ill got is never well kept; which King Richard ſoon ſhew'd by the Murther of his two Innocent Nephews, the Young King and his Tender Brother; whoſe Death has however been much doubted of ſince, whether 'twas in his Time or not; Perkin Warbeck, thro' the Malice of ſome and the Folly of others, having a long time abus'd the World, and impos'd himſelf upon Princes as well as People, for the Younger of King Edward the Fourth's Sons. King Richard contriv'd the Deſtruction of the two Young Princeſs in a Progreſs he made to Glouceſter, to Honour the Town, which gave him the Title of Duke, with a Viſit: He imagin'd that while his Nephews liv'd, his Right to the Crown wou'd be call'd in queſtion: wherefore he reſolv'd to rid himſelf of them, and to that end ſent John Green, a Creature of his, to Sir Robert Brackenbury, Conſtable of the Tower with a Letter, deſiring him one How or other to make away with the two Children whom he had in Keeping.

His Son created Prince of Wales.

He contrives the Deſtruction of the two Young Princes.

E. Lauderill delin.
P. Vanderbanck Sculp.
KING RICHARD THE III.rd

1483. Keeping. Brackenbury refus'd to do it, and Green return'd to King Richard, who then lay at Warwick, with the Conſtable's Anſwer; at which the King was ſo diſpleas'd, that he ſaid to a Page of his the ſame Night, Alas! Who is there that a Man can truſt? Thoſe that I have brought up my ſelf, thoſe that I thought wou'd be moſt ready to ſerve me, even thoſe fail me, and will not do what I command them. The Page reply'd, Sir, There lyes a Man on the Pallat in the Outer Chamber, who I am ſure will think Nothing too hard that you ſhall Require him to do. Meaning Sir James Tyrrell, a brave handſom Man, who deſerv'd a better Maſter, and wou'd have merited the Eſteem of all Men had his Virtue been as great as his Valour. He was Ambitious, and with regret ſaw Sir Richard Ratcliff ſoar above him in his Maſter's Favour. The King knowing how aſpiring he was, imagin'd the Page had hit upon the Perſon who was for his Purpoſe, believing Tyrrell wou'd do any thing in hopes of further Preferment; So he went out into the Chamber where he found Sir James and Sir Thomas Tyrrell his Brother on a Pallat Bed, to whom he ſaid merrily, What are you a Bed ſo ſoon Gentlemen? And calling Sir James to him, told him his Mind and what he wanted of him; whom he found ready to do whatever he commanded him. The next Day therefore he ſent him with a Letter to Sir Robert Brackenbury, requiring him to deliver Sir James the Keys of the Tower, to the end that he might accompliſh the King's Pleaſure in certain things he had given him Commandment about. Sir Robert having reſtor'd the Keys to this Aſſaſſin, he reſolv'd to murder the two Princes in the enſuing Night. When the Elder, who was call'd King Edward the Fifth, was told that his Uncle was crown'd King; He ſigh'd and ſaid, Ah! wou'd my Uncle let me have my Life, he might take my Kingdom. The Perſon that told him ſo, comforted him as well as he could, and for a little while the King and his Brother were well us'd; but afterwards they were ſhut up Cloſe, and one Servant only allow'd to Attend them. Then the Young King apprehended what would be his Fate, gave himſelf over to Sorrow and Deſpair; and the Prince his Brother was the Companion of his Grief as well as of his Misfortune. Sir James Tyrrell contriv'd to have them murder'd in their Beds, and appointed one Miles Forreſt, a noted Ruffian, and John Dighton his Groom a luſty Fellow, to ſee Execution done. Thoſe that waited near the Prince's Lodging's were Removed, and Way made for Forreſt and Dighton, to enter their Chamber, unperceiv'd of any one, at Midnight. The poor Youths were Aſleep in their Beds, whom the two Aſſaſſins wrap'd up in the Blankets and Coverlaid of the Bed, clapt the Feather-bed and Pillows upon them, ſtopt their Mouths and Smother'd them to Death. When the Ruffians perceiv'd by their Struggling that they were Dying, and afterwards by their Lying ſtill that they were Dead, they laid their Bodies out Naked upon the Bed, and fetch'd Sir James Tyrrell to ſee them, who ordered the Murderers to Bury them at the Stair-foot deep in the Ground under a Heap of Stones. Then Tyrrell Rode to the King, and gave him a full Account of the Murder, with which he was ſo well pleaſed, that 'tis ſaid, he Knighted him at that time; tho' he ſeem'd not to approve of their being Buried in ſo vile a Corner, they being the Sons of a King: Upon which, Sir Robert Brackenbury's Chaplain took their Bodies up, and Buried them privately in a Place, that, by occaſion of his Death, never came to light. Sir James Tyrrell, when he was afterwards in the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, committed to the Tower for Treaſon, confeſs'd the Murder in the manner we have related it: So did Dighton, and both the Maſter and the Man, and Forreſt the Warder came to miſerable Ends, thro' the Juſt Judgment of God, the Avenger of Innocent Blood. Dighton and Forreſt, tho' they were not Executed by the Hangman, died in a moſt Horrible manner, rotting away by degrees. Sir James Tyrrell was Beheaded, and King Richard himſelf, Slain by his Enemies, and his Body ignominiouſly uſed by the Rabble. He could never after be at reſt; his Guilt haunted him like a Spectre; He was afraid of his own Shadow when he went abroad, his Eyes rowl'd in his Head; his Limbs trembled, and his Hand was always on his Dagger; His ſleep was ever diſturb'd by frightful Dreams; he would ſuddenly Start up, Leap out of his Bed and Run about the Chamber. Nor did he long Enjoy the Fruits of his Bloody Policy; for tho' the Princes were Remov'd, New Enemies aroſe from time to time, that kept him in continual Fear thro' the Courſe of his ſhort Reign. The Firſt that Conſpired againſt him, was the very Perſon who had been moſt inſtrumental in his Advancement, the D. of Buckingham, whoſe intimacy with him, commenced from the Death of K. Edward the Fourth.

1483.

The Murderers come to Ill Ends.

King Richard's Terrors of Conſcience.

Sir James Tyrrell undertakes to murder them.

They are murder'd between two Feather-beds.

We muſt look a little backward into the beginning of their Confederacy, the better to clear the Hiſtory of this Duke's Misfortunes. On the Death of King Edward he ſent a truſty Servant of his to the Duke of Glouceſter, to offer him his Service, and that he wou'd Attend him with a Thouſand Men, whenever he pleas'd to command him. The Duke of Glouceſter return'd him Thanks, and inform'd the Duke of Buckingham with his Secret Deſigns. At Northampton, Buckingham met the Duke of Glouceſter, at the Head of Three Hundred Horſe, and joyn'd with him in all his Undertakings; He accompanied him to London, and ſtayed with him till after the Coronation: He went with him to Glouceſter, and there he took his Leave of him to return Home; where he was no ſooner arrived, than he began to Repent of what he had done; and to think he had not been ſufficiently Rewarded for it by the Uſurper. The Reaſon of his Firſt Diſcontent, is ſaid to be this: Some time before the Uſurper was Crown'd, 'twas agreed between him and the Duke of Buckingham, that the latter ſhould have all the Lands belonging to the Duke of Hereford, to which he pretended to have a Title, by his Deſcent from the Houſe of Lancaſter; his Mother being the Daughter of Edmund Beaufort, Duke of Somerſet, Brother to John Duke of Somerſet, Father to Margaret Counteſs of Richmond, Mother to King Henry VII. But this Title having ſome Relation to that of the Crown, the Uſurper would not hear of Reſtoring him to the Duke of Hereford's Eſtate, and rejected his Petition with Indignation and Threats, when he was in poſſeſſion of the Soveraignity; which the Duke of Buckingham ſo highly reſented, that from that time forward he contrived how he might Pull him Down from the Throne upon which he had Set him. We are told he feign'd himſelf Sick, and excuſed his Attendance at the Coronation, and that King Richard ſhould ſend him word, If he would not come and Ride he would make him be Carried.

The Duke of Buckingham falls out with him.

This Circumſtance of the Duke of Buckingham's Diſcontent is not given Credit to, by thoſe who conſider the Natures of the Uſurper and of the Duke, being both of them the greateſt 1483. greateſt Diſſemblers in the World: The one would not ſo raſhly have provok'd a powerful Enemy, nor the other have given a Jealous Tyrant occaſion to ſuſpect his Fidelity: The Truth is, the Duke of Buckingham was a high Spirited Man, and envied the Glory of another ſo much, that when he ſaw the Crown ſet upon King Richard's Head, he cou'd not endure the Sight, but turn'd his Head away. Others Write, that they continu'd good Friends till after his return Home, and that the Uſurper diſmiſs'd him at Glouceſter with Rich Gifts and Extraordinary Marks of his Favour and Affection: When he came to Brecknock, he convers'd much with Dr. Moreton, Biſhop of Ely, whom he had there in Keeping. This Prelate was a very Wiſe Politick Perſon, a Man of Learning and of a Winning Behaviour. He had been always Faithful to King Henry; and when he fell in with the Party of King Edward, on King Henry's Death, he Serv'd him as faithfully, and was one of the Lords whom the Uſurper Seiz'd at the Council in the Tower. The Biſhop perceiving the Duke of Buckingham was pleas'd with his Company and Diſcourſe, thought he might improve the Favour he had obtain'd of him to the Advantage of the Common-wealth, by getting him to Joyn in a Conſpiracy againſt King Richard, towards whom, he found, he was not very well inclin'd; yet he manag'd the Matter ſo warily, that he rather ſeem'd to Follow than to Lead him, and brought him by degrees to open his whole Mind to him, and to engage in Proſecuting a Deſign which he had form'd, to bring about a Match between Henry Earl of Richmond, and the Lady Elizabeth, Eldeſt Daughter to King Edward, by which Marriage, the Two Houſes of York and Lancaſter wou'd be United, and an End put to the Long and Bloody Diſputes between the Two Factions. He durſt not come to the Point preſently, but advanced to it ſtep by ſtep, as he ſaw the Duke of Buckingham prepared to hearken to it.

His Diſcourſe with the Bp. of Ely.

When that Lord came to Brecknock firſt, he Prais'd the King, and boaſted what Great Things the Nation might expect from ſuch a Prince: The Biſhop reply'd; "My Lord, "'Twould be Folly in me to Lye, and if I "ſhould Swear the contrary, your Lordſhip "wou'd not, I ſuppoſe, believe me; had Things "gone as I would have had them, King Hen"ry's Son had been King, and not King Ed"ward. But when by God's Providence, he "was deprived of the Crown, and King Ed"ward advanced to the Throne, I was not ſo "mad, as to bring a Dead Man in competi"tion with a Living One: So I became K. "Edward's Faithful Chaplain, and ſhould have "been glad that his Son had Succeeded him: "However, ſince God has otherwiſe order'd "it, I ſhall not kick againſt the Pricks, nor "labour to Set up whom the Almighty has "pull'd Down: As for the late Protector, the "King that now is-----. Here he ſtopt ſhort, as if he had ſaid too much already, to heighten the Duke's Curioſity to know what he had to ſay more. The Duke earneſtly deſired him to proceed, promiſing him, upon his Honour, "That never any Hurt ſhould come of it; and "perhaps, it might produce more Good than he "was aware of; Saying, he intended to con"ſult him, and to be govern'd by his Advice; "for which cauſe only, he had procured of the "King to have him in his Cuſtody, where he "might reckon himſelf at Home; otherwiſe, "he had been deliver'd to thoſe that would not "have been ſo kind to him. The Biſhop humbly thank'd him, and ſaid, "Indeed, my Lord, "I don't care to talk much of Princes, as a "thing which is dangerous, tho' the Words "may be innocent; for if they be not taken "in Good part, they may be fatal to him that "ſpeaks them, the Prince, putting what Con"ſtruction he pleaſes upon them: I often think "of the Fable in Eſop, when the Lyon Proclaim'd "That no Horn'd Beaſt ſhould ſtay in the Wood, on "pain of Death; One that had a Bunch of Fleſh in "his Forehead, fled away in haſte: the Fox meet"ing him, ask'd him, Whither ſo faſt? The Beaſt "anſwer'd, Troth I don't know nor don't care, pro"vided I was out of the Wood, as the Proclamation "commands all Horned Beaſts to be gone. You Fool, ſays "the Fox, thou mayeſt ſtay, the Lyon does not mean "thee; it is not a Horn that grows in thy Head; No, "quoth the Beaſt, I know that well enough, but what "if he ſhould call it a Horn, where am I then? The Duke Laugh'd at the Tale, and anſwered, "I "warrant you, my Lord, neither the Lyon nor "the Boar, ſhall reſent any Thing that is ſaid "here, it ſhall never go any further I aſſure "you. The Biſhop reply'd, "If it did, were "the Thing that I was about to ſay, underſtood "as I meant it, I ſhould deſerve Thanks; but "taken as I ſuppoſe it wou'd be, it might per"haps turn to your Prejudice and mine. This raiſed the Duke's Curioſity ſtill higher; upon which the Biſhop proceeded thus: "As for "the late Protector, ſince he is now King, I "don't intend to diſpute his Title; however, "for the good of the Realm he Governs (of "which I am a poor Member) I was about "to wiſh, that to the Good Qualities he poſ"ſeſſes, it had pleaſed God to have added "ſome of thoſe Excellent Virtues, requiſite "for the Governing a Kingdom, which are "ſo conſpicuous in the Perſon of your Grace.

The End of Sir Tho' Moor's Hiſtory.

Here Ends Sir Thomas Moor. What follows, is taken from Hall and Hollinſhead's Chronicles.

The Duke wondering why the Biſhop made ſuch frequent Pauſes, was the more eager to have him ſpeak his Mind freely, and reply'd; "I cannot but take notice of your Stopping ſo "often in the midſt of your Diſcourſe, which "hinders my making any Judgment of your "Opinion of the King, or your Good Will "towards me. As for any good Qualities in "me, I pretend to none, and expect no Praiſe "on account of my Merit. I plainly perceive you "have ſome hidden Meaning which you reſerve "from me, either out of Fear or Shame. You "may be bold and free with me who am your "Friend; I aſſure you on my Honour, that "I will be as Secret in this Caſe, as the Deaf "and Dumb Perſon is to the Singer, or the "Tree to the Hunter.

The Biſhop grew Bolder on the Duke's Promiſe of Secrecy, in which he was encouraged, by the Diſcoveries he made of Buckingham's Hatred to the King, he reſolv'd therefore to come to the Point, and to propoſe to the Duke, That either out of Ambition, or his Love to his Country, he ſhould attempt to Deſtroy the Tyrant.

To this End, he reſumed his former Converſation in this manner: "My ſingular Good "Lord; Since I have been your Grace's Pri"ſoner, I have not known what it is to be "de-1483. "deprived of Liberty; and to avoid Idleneſs, "the Mother and Nurſe of Vice, I have ſpent "my Time in Reading. I have Read in ſome "of my Books, That no Man was Born for "himſelf only: He owes a Duty to his Pa- "rents that Begat him; to his Relations and "Friends for Proximity of Blood and Good "Offices; but above all to the Country, "whoſe Air he firſt breath'd; and this Duty "is never to be forgotten: For which Rea- "ſon, I conſider the Preſent State of this "Realm, wherein I was Born, and in theſe "Conſiderations, I cannot help making Re- "flections on what a Governor we now have, "and what a Ruler me might have. In the "preſent Circumſtances of Affairs, the King- "dom muſt ſoon decay: Confuſion and De- "ſtruction will certainly be the ſudden end of "Diſorder and Miſ-rule. All my Hope is in your "Grace: When I reflect on your Valour, your "Juſtice, Impartiality, your Zeal for the Pub- "lick Welfare, your Learning, your Senſe and "Eloquence, I rejoyce at the Happineſs of Eng- "land, that poſſeſſes ſo Good and ſo Great a "Prince, worthy the Higheſt Dignities: But "when I on the other ſide conſider the Good "Qualities of the late Protector (now call'd "King) how they are violated and ſubverted "by Tyranny, eclipſed by Blind and Inſatiate "Ambition, and changed from Mild and Hu- "man, to Cruel and Bloody; I cannot forbear "declaring openly to you, That he is neither "fit to be King of ſo Noble a Realm, nor ſo "Noble a Realm fit to be Govern'd by ſuch a "Tyrant, whoſe Kingdom, were it larger than "it is, could not long continue: God will over- "throw thoſe that are thirſty of Blood; he will "bring horrible Slaughter upon them: How "many Brave and Virtuous Perſons were Mur- "der'd to make way for him to the Throne? "did he not accuſe his own Mother, an Ho- "nourable and Religious Princeſs, of Adultery? "Which, if it had been true, a Dutiful Child "would have paſt it over in ſilence. Did he "not declare his two Brothers and his two Ne- "phews Baſtards? And what is ſtill more bar- "barous, did he not cauſe thoſe two poor Inno- "cent Princes, whoſe Blood cries aloud for "Vengeance, to be cruelly Murdered? My Heart "melts when I think of their Untimely Fate; "and my Soul, with Horror, remembers this "Bloody Butcher, this Inhumane Monſter. What "Man can be ſure of his own Life, under the "Dominion of a Prince, who ſpared not his own "Blood? Eſpecially, if at any time he is ſuſpi- "cious of his Fidelity to him, and that he is "carrying on Ill Deſigns againſt him, as every "thing will be term'd, that tends to the Good "of the Publick: all will be reckon'd Guilty by "him, that are great and Rich. 'Tis enough "for Perſons to have large Poſſeſſions to pro- "voke his Wrath. Now, my Lord, to conclude "this Diſcourſe with what I have to ſay to your "Grace; I Conjure you by your Love to God, "your Illuſtrious Line, and your Native Coun- "try, to take the Imperial Crown of this Realm "upon you, to reſtore this Kingdom to its an- "cient Splendour, and deliver it from the Vio- "lence of the Oppreſſor. I dare affirm, if the "Turk ſtood in Competition with this Bloody "Tyrant, This Killer of Infants, the People of "England would Prefer him to Richard, who "now ſits in the Throne. How much more "then would they Rejoyce to live under the Go- "vernment of ſo Excellent a Prince as your "Grace? Deſpiſe not, neither loſe ſo fair an "Occaſion of Saving your Self and your Dear "Country: But if you will not your ſelf accept 1483.

"of the Sovereignty of this Kingdom; if the "Toils and Hazards of a Crown, prevail over "you more than the Charms of Power, I Intreat "you, by the Faith you owe to God, and your "Oath to St. George, Patron of the Honourable "Garter, (of which Order you are a Compani- "on) by your Affection to the Place that gave "you Birth, and to the Engliſh Nation; that "you will in your High and Princely Wiſdom, "think of ſome Means of advancing ſuch a "Good Governour, as you ſhall appoint to Rule "and Govern them. All the Hopes of the Peo- "ple of England are in you, and to you only "can they fly for Succour. If you could Set "up the Houſe of Lancaſter once more, or Mar- "ry the Eldeſt Daughter of King Edward to "ſome Great and Potent Prince, the New King "would not long Enjoy his Uſurp'd Empire: "All Civil War would ceaſe, Domeſtick Diſ- "cord would ſleep, and univerſal Peace and "Profit would be the Bleſſings of this Noble "Realm.

When the Biſhop had done ſpeaking, the Duke continued Silent for ſome time: The Biſhop chang'd Colour, and was very much Concern'd at it, expecting his Propoſal would have been receiv'd with Joy and Greedineſs.

The Duke perceiving the Fright he was in, ſaid, "Fear nothing, my Lord, I will keep my "Word with you; to Morrow we'll Talk more "of the Matter, let us now go to Supper.

The Duke the next Day ſent for the Biſhop, who had not all that while been very Eaſy, for fear how his laſt Converſation would be taken. Buckingham repeated almoſt all the Biſhop of Ely had ſaid to him, and when he had done, he pull'd off his Hat and made this ſort of a Prayer, "O Lord God! Creator of all things; how "much is thy Kingdom of England and the Engliſh Nation indebted to thy Goodneſs? Tho "we are now Oppreſs'd by an Evil Governour, "yet I hope e're long, by Thy Help, to pro- "vide ſuch a Ruler, as ſhall be to Thy Pleaſure "and the Security of the Common-wealth. He then put on his Hat, and apply'd himſelf thus to the Biſhop; "My Lord of Ely, I have always "found you Faithful and Affectionate to me, "and eſpecially in your laſt Free Confidence in "me: I acknowledge you to be a Sure Friend, "a Truſty Counſellor, a Vigilant States-Man, "and a True Lover of your Country; for "which I return you hearty Thanks now, and "ſhall Recompence you more effectually, if Life "and Power ſerve. Since, when we were laſt "together, you open'd your Mind freely, touch- "ing the Duke of Glouceſter, who has Uſurp'd "the Crown; and hinted a little, the Advance- "ment of the Two Noble Families of York and "Lancaſter; I ſhall alſo, with as much freedom, "Communicate to you what I have done, and "what I intend to do. I declare therefore, "that when King Edward Died, to whom I "thought I was very little obliged, (tho' he "and I had Married two Siſters) becauſe he nei- "ther Promoted nor Prefer'd me as I thought I "deſerv'd, by my Birth, and the Relation I "had to him. I did not much value his Chil- "dren's Intereſt, having their Father's Hard U- "ſage ſtill in my Mind. I call'd an Old Proverb "to remembrance, which ſays, Wo be to that "Kingdom where Children Rule and Women Govern. "I thought it of very Ill Conſequence to the Peo- "ple of England, to ſuffer the Young King to "Govern, or the Queen his Mother to be Re- "gent; conſidering that her Brothers and her "Children by her Firſt Husband, tho' of Biſhop Moreton ſpeaks openly againſt K. Richard.

He propoſes to the Duke to ſet up for the Crown.

The D. of Buckingham's Anſwer to the Biſhop of Ely.

no

1483. " no High Deſcent, wou'd be at the Head " of all Affairs by their Favour with the " Queen, and have more Share in the Govern- " ment than the King's Relations, or any Per- " ſon of the Higheſt Quality in the Kingdom. " For this Reaſon I thought it to be for the " Publick Welfare and my Private Advantage " to Side with the Duke of Glouceſter, whom I " took to be as ſincere and Merciful as I now " find it to be Falſe and Cruel. By my means, " as you, my Lord, know well, he was made Pro- " tector of the King and Kingdom. After which, " partly by fair Words and partly by Threats, " he perſwaded me and other Lords, as well Spi- " ritual as Temporal, to conſent that he " might aſſume the Crown till the young King " was Four and Twenty Years of Age. I ſtuck " at it at firſt, and he produced Inſtruments wit- " neſs'd by Doctors, Proctors, and Notaries, " whoſe Depoſitions I then thought to be true, " Teſtifying that King Edward's Children were " Baſtards. When theſe Teſtimonials were read " before us, he ſtood up Bare-headed and ſaid, Well, My Lords, Even as I find you (Sage and Diſ- " creet Councellors) wou'd that my Nephew ſhou'd have " no Wrong, ſo I pray you to do me nothing but Right, " Theſe Depoſitions being true, I am the Undoubted Heir " to Lord Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, who " by Act of Parliament was adjudged the true Heir to " the Crown of this Realm.

" Upon which, my ſelf and others took him " really for our Rightful Prince and Soveraign " Lord; the Duke of Clarence's Son by reaſon of " his Father's Attainder cou'd not Inherit. The " Duke was alſo ſuſpected to be a Baſtard. " Thus by my Aſſiſtance and Friendſhip he was " made King: At which time he promis'd me at " Baynard's-Caſtle, laying his Hand on mine, that " the two young Princes ſhou'd Live and ſhou'd be " Provided for to Mine and every One's Satis- " faction: How he perform'd his Promiſes, we " all know to our Sorrow. When he was in " Poſſeſſion of the Throne, he forgot his Friends " and the Aſſurances he had given them: He " deny'd to grant my Petition for Part of the " Earl of Hereford's Lands, which his Brother " wrongfully detain'd from me: He refuſed me " in ſuch a manner as made the Affront much " more Intolerable. I have born his Ingrati- " tude hitherto with Patience; I have conceal'd " my Reſentments I had with him afterwards, " carry'd it outwardly fair, tho' I inwardly re- " pented that I had been acceſſory to his Ad- " vancement. But when I was certainly inform'd " of the Death of the two Innocent Princes; " to which (God be my Judge) I never con- " ſented; My Blood curdled at his Treaſon " and Barbarity, I abhorr'd the Sight of him, " and his Company much more; and pretending " an Excuſe to leave the Court retir'd to " Brecknock. In my Way, home, I meditated " how I might Dethrone this Unnatural Uncle. " I thought if I wou'd take the Soveraignty on " my ſelf, Now was the Time. The Temporal " Lords I ſaw hated the Tyrant: he was odious " alike to the Gentlemen and People of Eng- " land; and had I aſſum'd the Supream Power, " I thought there was no body ſo likely to " carry it as my ſelf. Flattering my Ambi- " tion with thoſe Vain Imaginations, I ſtaid " two Days at Tewkſbury. As I travell'd fur- " ther Homewards, I conſider'd that to Pretend " to Seat my ſelf on the Throne as a Conqueror " would not do; which wou'd be to ſubject " the whole Conſtitution of the Government, " and entitle the Conqueror to all the No- " blemens Poſſeſſions, which wou'd ruin my De- " ſign: At laſt I remember'd that Edmund Duke 1483.
" of Somerſet my Grandfather, was with King " Henry the Sixth in two or three Degrees from " John Duke of Lancaſter lawfully Begotten; " my Mother being Duke Edmund's Eldeſt " Daughter, I look'd on my ſelf as the next " Heir to Henry the Sixth of the Houſe of Lan- " caſter: But as I travel'd Homewards, between " Worceſter and Bridgenorth I met the Lady Mar- " garet Counteſs of Richmond, at preſent Wife to " the Lord Stanley, who is the Rightful and Sole " Heir of John Duke of Somerſet, my Grandfa- " ther's Elder Brother, whoſe Title I had forgot " till I ſaw her in my Way, and then I remem- " ber'd that both her Claim and her Son the " Earl of Richmond's were Bars to mine, and " forbad my Pretending to the Imperial Crown " of England.

" I had ſome Diſcourſe with her about her " Son, and then we parted, ſhe for Worceſter and " I for Shrewsbury. As I proceeded in my Jour- " ney, I conſider'd with my ſelf, whether ſince " I cou'd not pretend to the Crown by Deſcent, " I might not have recourſe to the Election of " the Lords and Gentry of the Realm, the " Uſurper being generally hated by them: But " then I began to reflect on the Dangers and " Difficulties of the Enterprize: That the late " King's Daughters and Friends, and the Earl " of Richmond's Relations, whoſe Intereſt is ve- " ry conſiderable, wou'd certainly oppoſe me " to the Utmoſt: And if the Houſes of Lan- " caſter and York ſhou'd joyn againſt me, I ſhou'd " ſoon loſe the Vain Power I might obtain: " wherefore I reſolv'd to flatter my ſelf no " more with Chimæra's of my Imaginary Right " to the Royal Diadem, but only to revenge " Mine and the People's Wrongs on the Com- " mon Enemy.

" The Counteſs of Richmond propos'd in the " Converſation we had on the Road, That her " Son might marry One of King Edward's " Daughters; and ſhe conjur'd me by the Me- " mory of Duke Humphrey my Grandfather, that " I wou'd procure the King's Favour for her " Son, and get him to Conſent to the Match. " I took no notice of her Propoſal then; which " then I weigh'd in my Mind, I found of ſo " great Advantage to the Commonwealth, that " I thought it was an Inſpiration of the Holy " Spirit for the Benefit of the Kingdom; and I " came to a Reſolution in my ſelf to Spend my " Life and Fortune in endeavouring to accom- " pliſh ſo Glorious a Deſign, to Marry the Prin- " ceſs Elizabeth to the Earl of Richmond, the " Heir of the Houſe of Lancaſter, in whoſe Quar- " rel my Father and Grandfather loſt their Lives " in Battel. If the Mothers of the Princeſs and " the Earl can come to an Agreement concern- " ing the Marriage, I doubt not but the Proud " Boar, whoſe Tuſks have goar'd ſo many In- " nocent Perſons, ſhall ſoon be brought to Con- " fuſion. The rightful and Indubitate Heir ſhall " enjoy the Crown and Peace be reſtor'd to " this diſtracted Kingdom.

The Biſhop rejoyced extreamly at this Free Declaration of the Duke: and that he might not ſlacken his Zeal in ſo Righteous a Cauſe, he en- deavour'd to Fire him the more, and haſten him to the Execution of his Deſigns; My Lord, ſays the Biſhop, Since by the Providence of God and The Biſhop's Anſwer. your Grace's incomparable Wiſdom this Happy Alliance is ſet on foot, 'tis Convenient or rather Neceſſary that we ſhou'd Conſult whom to truſt in ſo Important and Perilous an Undertaking. To whom ſhall we firſt apply towards effecting it? To whom, reply'd The Duke replies. the Duke, but to the Counteſs of Richmond; who knows 1483. knows where her Son is, and how to Send to him. The Biſhop anſwer'd, If you begin there, I have an Old Friend in her Service one Reginald Bray, a Man of Probity and Judgment, for whom I will ſend to attend your Grace and receive your Commands, if you think Proper ſo to do. The Duke conſenting to it, the Biſhop wrote to Mr. Bray to come to him to Brecknock; which he did immediately, believing there was ſomething to be done for his Lady's and her Son's Service. The Duke told him what he intended to attempt in favour of the Earl of Richmond, no leſs than to Seat him in the Royal Throne of England, if he Swore to marry the Lady Elizabeth; and by that Alliance put an End to the long and bloody Diſpute between the White Roſe and the Red.

In order to this, He ſaid, the Counteſs muſt manage the Buſineſs with the Queen Dowager and the Princeſs her Daughter, and when they were engaged, ſend to her Son in Britain, and get him to Swear he wou'd Perform the Articles, agreed on between his Mother and the Princeſs Elizabeth in both their Names. Bray gladly undertook to carry this Meſſage to his Miſtreſs, And now they were Embark'd in ſo great an Affair, the Biſhop who long'd to be at Liberty, deſir'd the Duke to let him go to Ely, where the Number of his Friends wou'd ſecure him againſt all the Force King Richard cou'd ſend to deſtroy him. The Duke being loath to loſe ſo Able and Experienced a Counſellor, excus'd his detaining him a little longer; ſaying, he ſhould go in a few Days, and ſo well accompanied that he need fear no Enemy.

The Bp. leaves the Duke.

The Biſhop impatient of Confinement, ſtole away from Brecknock to Ely in Diſguiſe, rais'd Money there, and paſs'd over into Flanders. The good Prelate thought he had done enough in ſetting the Duke at Work on ſo Hazardous a Buſineſs, in which it ſeems he did not care to venture further. Whether he thought he could be more Servicable to the Earl of Richmond Abroad, or was afraid of his Perſon at Home; or whatever reaſon he had to leave the Duke of Buckingham, he does not appear to be Excuſeable in Hiſtory: For knowing the Duke was too apt to Open his Mind freely, he might have imagin'd that his Indiſcretion wou'd ruin him, and 'twas to Sacrifice a Perſon of his High Quality, to put him upon an Enterprize he was not fit to Manage, and then forſake him in the Execution of it; at which the Duke was very much concern'd.

In the mean time Reginald Bray return'd to his Miſtreſs, inform'd her of what had been concerted between the Duke and the Biſhop, for the Advancement of her Son; and the Counteſs with great Joy intended to play her Part as ſoon as poſſible. The firſt thing ſhe was to do, was to engage the Queen Dowager and the Princeſs; To which purpoſe ſhe diſpatch'd one Lewis a Welſhman who was her Phyſician, with Inſtructions to Attend the Queen at Weſtminſter, and break the Matter to her. Lewis's Meſſage was not in the leaſt ſuſpected, becauſe he came as a Doctor, to Adviſe her about her Health. When he was admitted into her Preſence, and every body withdrawn, he gave her to underſtand what Errand he was ſent upon: He ſet forth the Wrongs She, her Children, and the whole Nation had ſuffered by the Tyranny of Richard, what Miſeries had befaln the Kingdom by the Civil War between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter, and what Advantages wou'd accrue to her, her Children, and the Commonwealth, by the Uniting the Two Houſes in marrying her Daughter Elizabeth, the only true Heir of the Houſe of York, to his Miſtreſs's Son the Only true Heir of the Houſe of Lancaſter. 1483.

The Counteſs of Richmond ſends to the Q. Dowager.

The Queen heard him with Attention, agreed to the Propoſals, and bad him tell his Lady, That all King Edward's Friends and Dependants ſhould joyn with her for the Earl of Richmond, on Condition he took his Corporal Oath to marry the Lady Elizabeth her Eldeſt Daughter, or in caſe ſhe were not living, the Lady Cecilia, her Second Daughter. Dr. Lewis cary'd this pleaſing Anſwer to his Miſtreſs; from whom he went frequently to the Queen as a Phyſician, and from her to the Counteſs, till Matters were fully concluded between them. While theſe Things were tranſacting by the two Princeſſes, Reginald Bray was employ'd to engage as many Perſons of Quality as he could in the Earl's Intereſt; accordingly he procur'd Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir John Cheyney, Richard Guilford and Thomas Rame Eſquires, and others, to promiſe their utmoſt Aſſiſtance, taking an Oath of Secrecy and Fidelity of all of them. The Queen Dowager on her Part made the Earl many Friends, and the Buſineſs in a ſhort time was ſo ripe, that 'twas thought proper to ſend an Account of it to the Earl, and give him Notice to prepare for his Return to England. Chriſtopher Urſewick her Chaplain, was firſt ſent, and ſoon after follow'd by Hugh Conway Eſq; with Money to Provide Men and other Neceſſaries for his Voyage, and a full Account of the Diſpoſition the Nobility and Commonalty were in to recive him favourably. She adviſ'd him to Land in Wales, that Principality being moſt Inclin'd to him, as well for his Deſcent being Welſh, as for the great Eſtate ſhe had there. For fear Mr. Conway ſhould miſcarry in his Voyage, Mr. Rame was diſpatch'd away with the ſame Inſtructions: The former ſail'd from Plimouth, the latter from Kent; and tho' they took different Routes they arriv'd at the Duke of Britain's Court both within an Hour of each other. They communicated the Subject of their Commiſſion to him. For which he render'd Thanks to the Almighty, being ſuch Joyful News as he wou'd not have given light Credit to; but it came ſo circumſtantiated, and by ſuch truſty Meſſengers, that he did not doubt of the Truth of it. He imparted the Secret to the Duke of Bretagne, informing him what a fair Proſpect he had of obtaining the Crown of England, deſiring him to Aſſiſt him, and Promiſing to return all his Acts of Generoſity and Friendſhip as ſoon as it was in his Power. The Duke gave him hopes of Aſſiſtance, and accordingly he Lent him Money and Troops for his intended Expedition; tho' Thomas Hutton, King Richard's Ambaſſador, offer'd large Sums, and earneſtly ſollicited the Duke and his Miniſters to put the Earl's Perſon in Safe Cuſtody. The Earl having receiv'd ſo good Incouragement in Bretagne, ſent Mr. Conway and Mr. Rame back again to give his Friends an account of his Intentions and Preparations, and to deſire them to Provide every thing neceſſary for his Reception.

The Q. Dowager approves of the Earl of Richmond's marrying her Daughter the Princeſs Elizabeth.

Meſſengers ſent to the E. of Richmond.

The Meſſengers returning, ſatisfy'd the Queen Dowager by Dr. Lewis of the Earl's Readineſs to comply with the Terms ſhe propos'd, and inform'd the Conſpirators of the Duke of Bretagne's Promiſing to lend him Men and Money: Upon which they all repair'd to their ſeveral Poſts to make Proviſion for joyning him with ſufficient Strength to accompliſh their Deſigns when he Arriv'd. With theſe, all ſuch as had any Grudge againſt, or Quarrel with King Richard, fell in, by which means the Party encreaſed daily, and ſo many Perſons could not act zealouſly in ſuch an Affair without giv-

The Conſpiracy againſt K. Richard encreaſes.

1483. ing Umbrage of their Intentions to the Uſurper.

King Richard endeavour'd by his Spies to find out the bottom of their Conſpiracies, but he had to deal with Men of Equal Cunning and Secrecy, and he cou'd not fix the Matter on any one, tho' he did not doubt but there was a Plot carrying on to Dethrone him and Advance the Earl of Richmond. The Duke of Buckingham's avoiding the Court, made him Jealous that he was in it; and to get him into his Power he made uſe of his Diſſimulation, a Quality that had been very ſerviceable to him in his Uſurpation, and wrote him very Kind obliging Letters to come to London; but the Duke pretending Indiſpoſition excus'd himſelf. The King enrag'd to find his Artifices unſucceſsful, ſent him a Letter in a rougher Stile commanding him on his Allegiance to Attend him. The Duke anſwer'd as roughly, That he wou'd not Expoſe himſelf to his Mortal Enemy whom he neither Lov'd nor wou'd Serve: He knew this Anſwer was a Declaration of War, and to loſe no time took Arms. The ſame did Thomas Marqueſs of Dorſet, who had eſcap'd out of Sanctuary, in Yorkſhire. Sir Edward Courtney and Peter Biſhop of Exeter his Brother in Devonſhire and Cornwall; and Others in other Places. The King hearing of theſe Inſurrections was not at all diſhearten'd, but muſtring all his Forces march'd againſt the Duke of Buckingham, the Head and Heart of the Conſpirators; whom if he ſuppreſs'd he ſuppos'd the Others wou'd fall of Courſe, or if not, he might eaſily reduce them. The Duke rather by the Influence he had over the Welſhmen who were his Tenants, than out of an Inclination they had to follow him, got a great Multitude of them together, with whom he march'd through the Forreſt of Dean towards Glouceſter, intending to paſs the Severn there, and thence to proceed into the Weſt to joyn the Courtneys; which if he cou'd have effected, King Richard's Reign had not been ſo long as it was by a Year. But it happen'd that the River Severn was ſo ſwoln by a continual Rain for 10 Days together, that it Over-flow'd all the Neighbouring Country, did abundance of Damage, and 'twas ſo Remarkable, that for a Hundred Years after, that Inundation was call'd, The Great Water, or Buckingham's Water, by the Inhabitants of thoſe Parts. Theſe Floods as it hinder'd the Duke's paſſing the Severn to joyn his Friends in Devonſhire; ſo it prevented his Friends on the other Side of the River paſſing over to him: In which Extremity the Welſhmen deſerted by Degrees, till at laſt the Duke had none left about him but his Domeſtick Servants. Nor Prayers nor Threats cou'd keep them together, ſo he was forc'd to fly with the reſt, and in Deſpair fled to the Houſe of one Humphrey Baniſter near Shrewsbury, deſigning to hide himſelf there till he cou'd raiſe more Forces, or eſcape thence to the Earl of Richmond in Bretagne. He truſted this Baniſter as a Man who had ſo many Obligations to him, that he did not think it cou'd be almoſt poſſible for Humane Nature to be ſo Ungrateful, as to betray a Maſter who had been ſo Kind to a Servant as the Duke had been to Baniſter; having bred him up, provided for him honourably, and put entire Confidence in him on many Occaſions. Yet upon King Richard's Proclamation to Apprehend the Duke, with the Promiſe of a Thouſand Pounds Reward to the Man that ſhould Diſcover him, this faithleſs Wretch betray'd his Maſter to John Milton Eſq; Sheriff of Shropſhire, who ſurrounded his Houſe with a Party of the County Militia, ſeiz'd the Duke, and carried him to the King, who then kept his Court at Salisbury. Baniſter and his whole Family were deſtroy'd by the Surprizing Judgments of the Almighty. The Uſurper refus'd to Pay him the Thouſand Pounds promis'd in the Proclamation; Saying, He that wou'd betray ſo good a Maſter, wou'd be falſe to any other. The Duke earneſtly deſir'd to be admitted to the King's Preſence, but whether he was or not, we cannot determine. Some Writers affirm he was, and that he attempted to Stab him with a Dagger. 'Tis certain he confeſs'd the whole Conſpiracy, and without any further Tryal was Beheaded in the Market-Place at Salisbury, on the 2d of November. Such was the Fate of Henry Stafford, whom moſt Authors call Edward Duke of Buckingham: He married Katharine the Daughter of Richard Woodville, Siſter to Queen Elizabeth Wife to Edward IV. by whom he had Edward Duke of Buckingham, Henry Earl of Wiltſhire, and two Daughters; The one married George Lord Haſtings, and the other Richard Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-Waters. The Duke of Bucks was Hereditary Conſtable of England, and his Eſtate and Revenues were ſo great, that King Richard had reaſon to be Jealous of him; for no Subject in England was ſo Powerful either in the Number of his Tenants and Dependants, or in his vaſt Riches.

1483.

By the diſperſing of the Welſhmen the Weſtern Army was ſo diſcouraged, that every Man ſhifted for himſelf. Some fled to Sanctuary, others took Shipping and ſail'd to Bretagne to the Earl of Richmond. Among theſe were Peter Courtney Biſhop of Exeter, Sir Edward Courtney his Brother, afterwards created Earl of Devonſhire by Henry the Seventh, Thomas Marqueſs Dorſet, John Lord Welles, Sir John Bourchier, Sir Edward Woodville the Queen Dowager's Brother, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir John Cheyney and his two Brothers, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir William Berkley, Sir William Branden, Thomas Branden Eſq; his Brother, Sir Richard Edgecomb, John Hallowell Eſq; and Capt. Edward Poynings, a famous Soldier, whom Henry VII. highly preferr'd. King Richard did all that a Wiſe Prince cou'd think of to prevent their getting off. Knowing what an Addition to the Earl's Power, the Preſence of ſo many Perſons of Quality wou'd make, he ſet Guards on moſt of the Ports of England; but thoſe in the Weſt being in the Hands of the Malecontents, they eſcap'd the Cruel Vengeance which was prepar'd for them. The Uſurper fitted out a Fleet to Cruiſe off the Coaſts of Bretagne, and prevent the Earl of Richmond's Landing any Forces in England; but the Earl not hearing of the Duke's Misfortune, ſet Sail the 12th of October with a Fleet of Forty Ships having 5000 Bretons aboard. They had not been long at Sea before they met with a Storm that ſcatter'd their Fleet. The Ship in which was the Earl in Perſon was driven on the Coaſt of England to the Mouth of the Haven of Pool in Dorſetſhire; where finding the Shore was crouded with Troops to oppoſe his Deſcent, he forbad any of his Men to land till the whole Navy came up. However, he ſent out his Boat with ſome Officers to demand of the Men, who ſtood on the Shoar, Whether they were Friends or Enemies? Theſe Traytors inſtructed by King Richard anſwer'd, They were Friends poſted there by the Duke of Bucks, to receive the Earl of Richmond. The Earl ſuſpecting the Deceit, and perceiving he was alone, the reſt of his Fleet not appearing, weigh'd Anchor and return'd to France. He landed in Normandy, where he refreſh'd himſelf and his Men two or three days, and then ſent a Gentleman to Charles the Eighth, the

French

The King Summons the Duke of Buckingham to Court.

The Duke will not come.

He and the Conſpirators take Arms.

A great Flood the cauſe of the Duke's Overthrow.

Buckingham betray'd by his Servant.

Beheaded at Salisbury.

The Conſpirators fly to Bretagne to the Earl of Richmond.

Who Sails to England.

Returns to France.

1483. French King deſiring Paſsports thro' his Territories into Bretagne; which was readily granted by Charles. However the Earl did not ſtay for the return of his Courier, but truſting to the French King's Generoſity continu'd his Journey thro' Normandy to Vannes, where the Duke of Bretagne reſided. When he arriv'd there he heard of the Duke of Buckingham's Death, and found the Marqueſs Dorſet, and the other Engliſh Gentlemen who had made their Eſcape. They all ſwore Allegiance to him, and he took his Corporal Oath, on the ſame Day the 25th of December, that he would marry the Princeſs Elizabeth when he had ſuppreſs'd the Uſurper Richard, and was in Poſſeſſion of the Crown.

Some of the Conſpirators executed.

The Zeal which theſe Gentlemen ſhewed in his Cauſe, and the Conſideration of the great Intereſt they had in England, leſſen'd the Earl's Sorrow for the Misfortune of his Friends in their firſt Attempts againſt the Tyrant, and encouraged him to refit his Fleet and prepare for a New Voyage to England, where many of his Friends were Seiz'd and Executed; as Sir George Brown and Sir Roger Clifford who were Beheaded at London; and Sir Thomas St. Leger, who had married the King's own Siſter the Dutcheſs of Exeter, Thomas Rame Eſq; and ſeveral of his own Servants; the two former were executed at Exon; the latter, whom he condemn'd on bare Suſpicion, at London, and other places. The Uſurper made a Progreſs to Devonſhire and Cornwal to ſettle the Peace of thoſe Counties, where the Earl's Party was very Numerous. The Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of Exeter preſented him with a Purſe of Gold to obtain his Favour: He receiv'd it graciouſly, lay in the City one Night, and the next Day went about it to take a View of it: When he came to the Caſtle, and was inform'd 'twas call'd Rugemont, he ſeem'd very Melancholy, and ſaid, I find, I ſhall not Live long. He thought that Name was Foretold by an Old Prophecy which he had heard relating to him, That his End wou'd be nigh when he came to Richmond: Which Prediction was fulfill'd at the Battle of Boſworth. In his Weſtern Journey, he found the Gentlemen of thoſe Parts were almoſt all concern'd in the Conſpiracy to depoſe him and raiſe the Earl of Richmond to the Throne. All that had made their Eſcape were Out-law'd, and thoſe that fell into his Hands were put to Death; for he knew not what Mercy and Humanity meant.

1484. In the Beginning of the following Year he Summon'd a Parliament, in which the Earl of Richmond and his Followers were attainted, and the People burthen'd with ſevere Taxes and Impoſitions. The Money ſo collected was waſted on his Creatures, or ſquander'd away Prodigally on ſuch as knew any thing of his Guilt in the Death of his Nephews, to ſtop their Mouths. He obliged the Lord Stanley to confine his Wife the Counteſs of Richmond, ſo that ſhe ſhou'd have no means of holding Correſpondence with any one to his Prejudice. He order'd William Collingburne of Lydiard in Wiltſhire to be Hang'd, Drawn and Quarter'd, for Aiding and Aſſiſting the Earl of Richmond and his Followers, and Writing a Satyrical Dyſtich upon him and his Favourites, the Lord Viſcount Lovel, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby.

The Earl of Richmond attainted.

The Cat, the Rat, and Lovell the Dog,
Rule all England under a Hog.

Alluding by the Hog to the Uſurper's Arms, one of his Supporters being a Wild-Boar. Yet theſe Executions did not eaſe him of his Fears: He heard by his Emiſſaries abroad, that Dr. Moreton Biſhop of Ely, and Urſewich, the Counteſs of Richmond's Chaplain, who liv'd in Flanders, had carried on a cloſe Correſpondence with many of the Chief Perſons in his Kingdom; and that the Duke of Bretagne ſtill continu'd to Protect and Support the Earl Henry. He ſaw the Storm that had lately been gathering over him was not diſpers'd by the Duke of Buckingham's Death, and the Flight of the Courtneys; the Clouds grew Darker ſtill, and the Tempeſt that threatned him was ſuch as requir'd all his Arts and all his Power to Provide againſt. He ſecur'd his Dominions on the Side of Scotland, by entring into an Alliance with the Scots King, to whoſe Eldeſt Son the Duke of Rothſay he married the Lady Anne de la Pool, Daughter to John Duke of Suffolk, by Anne the Uſurper's beſt belov'd Siſter. Her Son John he proclaim'd Heir Apparent to the Crown, without having regard to King Edward the Fourth's Daughters: Yet all his Negotiations and Succeſſes Abroad and at Home were Ineffectual, and he perceiv'd that nothing would entirely ſecure him againſt the Earl and his Friends Contrivances, unleſs he cou'd get his Perſon into his Power. To this Purpoſe he ſent over other Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Bretagne, with Inſtructions to apply themſelves to Peter Landeiſe the Duke's Chief Miniſter and Favourite, and by Immenſe Sums of Money to endeavour to tempt him to betray the Earl. They were to offer him for the Duke his Maſter the Clear Profits of all the Earl's Eſtate in England, and for himſelf whatever he cou'd ask of them. The Treacherous Breton hearken'd to the Propoſals made by Richard's Ambaſſadors, and promis'd to deliver the Earl of Richmond to them. But the Biſhop of Ely who had Intelligence in King Richard and the Duke of Bretagne's Courts, underſtood what Deſigns were forming againſt Earl Henry, of which he ſent him Notice by Urſewich; and the Earl giving Credit to his Information, eſcap'd in Diſguiſe with his Principal Officers into the French King's Dominions. Landeiſe intended a Day or two after to have ſeiz'd him, and when he miſs'd him ſent Couriers into all Parts of the Dutchy in Search of him. He was ſcarce got into the French Territories when one of the Parties that was ſent out after him came within an Hour's Riding of him, but he had prevented Landeiſe his Treachery, who acted without his Maſter's Privity. The Duke of Bretagne being at that time dangerouſly Ill, and leaving all things to his Management. The Engliſh Refugees that remain'd in Bretagne expected all to be deliver'd up to the Fury of King Richard, when they heard of the Earl's Eſcape, and the Reaſons of it: And had not the Duke of Bretagne recover'd and took on him the Adminiſtration of Affairs, the Traytor Landeiſe wou'd have ſeiz'd them, and yielded them up to the Uſurper's Ambaſſadors. The Duke inquiring into the Cauſes of the Earl's Flight into France, was very much diſpleas'd with Landeiſe, and ſent for Sir Edward Woodvill and Capt. Poynings, to whom he excus'd the Treachery of his Miniſter, diſowning the Knowledge of it, and gave them a conſiderable Sum of Money to conduct them and all the Engliſhmen who were at Vannes, thro' Bretagne into France to their Maſter the Earl of Richmond: For which generous Act the Earl ſent him Thanks by a Meſſenger on purpoſe. Himſelf went to Loinges on the Loire, where Charles the Eighth, the French King, kept his Court, and from thence accompanied him to Montargis. Charles entertain'd him and his Followers very Magnificently, but was not 1484.

John Earl of Lincoln Proclaimed Heir apparent.

The Earl of Richmond in Danger in Bretagne.

He Eſcapes into France.

His Reception there.

1484. very forward to lend him any Aſſiſtance.

While the Earl was in the French Court, John Earl of Oxford repair'd to him with James Blunt Captain of the Caſtle of Haumes, in which the Lord Oxford had been confin'd ſeveral Years, and had engag'd the Governour in the Intereſt of the Earl of Richmond; with them came Sir John Forteſcue, Porter of the Town of Calais. James Blunt had reinforc'd his Garriſon, ſupply'd it with all ſorts of Proviſions for a vigorous Defence, and left a Truſty Officer to Command there in his Abſence. The Arrivial of the Earl of Oxford, and the Revolt of the Garriſon of Haumes, animated afreſh Earl Henry and his Friends, whoſe Spirits began to ſink, ſeeing the little Hopes they had of Help in France. Their Company encreas'd after this daily: Moſt of the Engliſh Gentlemen who were Students in the Univerſity of Paris did Homage to the Earl, among whom was Mr. Richard Fox, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter; and as their Numbers grew greater Abroad, their Intereſt at Home was conſequently enlarged.

The Uſurper, who by his ſpies had a full Account of all their Proceedings, knew that the Hopes of the Party were founded on the Earl's Promiſe to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth, which he reſolv'd by ſome Means or other to prevent; and to that end he did his Utmoſt to ingratiate himſelf with her Mother Queen Elizabeth. He ſent ſeveral Flattering Meſſages to her in Sanctuary, Promiſed to advance the Marqueſs Dorſet and all her Relations, and won upon her ſo much by his fair Speeches, that forgetting the many Affronts he had caſt on the Memory of her Husband, on her own Honour and the Legitimacy of her Children, and even the Murder of her dear Sons, ſhe comply'd with him, and promis'd to bring over her Son, and all the late King's Friends from the Party of the Earl of Richmond. She went ſo far, as to deliver up her Five Daughters into his Hands; whom as ſoon as King Richard had got in his Cuſtody, he reſolv'd to order the Matter ſo, that he might be in a Condition to take the Eldeſt of them to be his Wife; which was a ſure Way of defeating the Earl of Richmond's Purpoſes. Queen Elizabeth was ſo charm'd by his falſe Promiſes, that ſhe wrote to her Son the Marqueſs Dorſet to leave Earl Henry and haſten to England, where ſhe had procur'd him a Pardon, and provided all ſorts of Honours for him. What Succeſs her Letters had, we ſhall ſee in the Courſe of this Hiſtory.

King Richard perſwades the Queen Dowager to Leave Sanctuary.

And deliver up her Daughters into his Hands.

He reſolves to maray the Eldeſt.

We have already obſerv'd, that King Richard had caſt his Eyes upon his Brother Edward the Fourth's Daughter, the Princeſs Elizabeth: He had been guilty of Treaſon and Murder, and almoſt all the Crimes that are to be found in the Infernal Rolls: Inceſt ſeem'd only wanting to make him a compleat Monſter of Mankind, the Horror of his People, and the Shame of the whole World. As he was Maſter of the Art of Diſſimulation, and had lately put on the Mask of Piety, ſo he was a little at a loſs how to remove his Wife out of the way, to make room for his Niece in his Bed. He began his Lewd Deſign, by ſhewing an Averſion to his Wife's Company and Embraces. He complain'd to ſeveral Lords of the Council, of her Barrenneſs; eſpecially to Thomas Rotherham, Archbiſhop of York, whom he had lately Releaſed out of Priſon. He told him of ſome Private Defects in the Queen, which had render'd her Perſon diſagreeable to him, and hoped the Biſhop would tell her of it, who being a Woman of a meek Temper, he thought would take it ſo much to Heart, that ſhe would not Live long after it. Dr. Rotherham ſaid to ſome of his moſt intimate Friends, The Queen's Days are but few; for he perceiv'd by the Uſurper's Diſcourſe, that he was weary of her and wanted another Wife, and he knew him ſo well, that he could not ſuppoſe he would ſcruple to add one Murder more to the many bloody Cruelties he had been guilty of to ſatisfy his Luſt and Ambition. To prepare the Way for her Death, he order'd a Report to be ſpread among the People, that ſhe was Dead: Which he did with an Intention, that the Rumour coming to her Ears, it might allarm her with fear of her ſudden Fate, and thoſe Fears throw her into a Diſeaſe which might carry her off. The Queen no ſooner heard of what was reported againſt her, but ſhe believ'd it came originally from her Husband; and thence concluding, that her Hour was drawing nigh, ſhe ran to him in a moſt Sorrowful and Deplorable Condition, and demanded of him What ſhe had done to deſerve Death? The Tyrant anſwer'd her with Fair Words and Falſe Smiles, bidding her be of Good Chear, for to his knowledge ſhe had no other cauſe. But whether her Grief, as he deſign'd it ſhou'd, ſtruck ſo to her Heart, that it broke with the Mortal Wound, or he haſten'd her End, as was generally ſuſpected, by Poiſon, ſhe Died in a few Days afterwards. She was Daughter to the famous Earl of Warwick; and when Richard married her, Widow to Prince Edward, Heir to Henry VI. The Uſurper affected to ſhew an extraordinary Sorrow at her Death, and was at the Expence of a Pompous Funeral for her. Notwithſtanding all his pretended Mourning, before ſhe was ſcarce cold in her Grave, he made his Addreſſes to the Princeſs Elizabeth, who had his Love in abhorrence, and the whole Kingdom appear'd averſe to ſo Unnatural a Marriage. His Affairs were in ſuch an Ill Poſture, that he durſt not provoke the Queen and the People further, by putting a Violence on the Princeſs's Inclinations; ſo he deferr'd his Courtſhip till he was better Settled in the Throne. The Nobility daily paſt over into France: The Gentry and Commonalty every where, ſhew'd an Affection to the Earl of Richmond, as far as they durſt do it, without bringing themſelves under the Laſh of the Tyrant's Laws. He was moſt Jealous of Thomas Lord Stanley, his Brother Sir William Stanley, and Gilbert Talbot. He obliged the Lord Stanley to leave his Son George Stanley, Lord Strange, at Court, as an Hoſtage of his own Fidelity. He commanded the Governour of Calais to Attack the Caſtle of Haumes: 1485.
The Earl of Oxford and Captain Blunt immediately haſten'd to the Relief of it, but before they could arrive near it, the Garriſon was reduced to the laſt Extremity, and the Beſiegers, on the report of the Earl of Oxford's Approach, offering them to March out with Bag and Baggage, they Surrender'd the Fort, and Joyn'd the Earl, who led them to Paris, where they were Entertain'd by the Earl of Richmond. The Reduction of Haumes, and the ſmall Hopes of Aſſiſtance which Earl Henry had in the French Court, made the Uſurper ſo ſecure, that he recall'd the Squadron of Men of War, which he had order'd to Cruiſe in the Channel and prevent the Earl's making a Deſcent in England, and contented himſelf with commanding the Lords and Gentlemen, who liv'd near the Coaſts, to be on their Guard to Defend them.

And ſhe Died ſoon after it.

Grows weary of his Wife.

In the mean time the Earl of Richmond continued his Negotiations in the Court of France for Succours; but Charles VIII. being in his Minority, he was forced to apply to the Regents, 1485. or Miniſters of State, who being Divided among themſelves, had no Inclination to Unite in his Favour. The chiefeſt of them was Lewis Duke of Orleance, who afterwards was King: But by their Civil Diſſentions, the Affair of his Supplies was ſpun on to ſo great a length, that the Uſurper flatter'd himſelf 'twould never take effect: For this Reaſon he grew more Pleaſant than before, his Joy increas'd as his Care leſſen'd, and lull'd him at laſt into a Fatal Security.

The Q. Dowager perſwades her Son, the Marqueſs of Dorſet to leave the E. of Richmond.

The Queen Dowager, to oblige the King, who lately appear'd very ready to Serve her and her Daughters, continued to Write to her Son the Marqueſs of Dorſet, to leave Earl Henry. The Marquis fearing the Earl wou'd not ſucceed in his Enterprize, gave way to his Mother's Perſwaſions, and King Richard's Flattering Promiſes, left the Earl, and ſtole away from Paris by Night, intending to Eſcape to Flanders: But as ſoon as the Earl had Notice of his Flight, he apply'd to the French Court, for leave to Apprehend him in any Part of his Dominions; for both Himſelf and his Followers were afraid of his Diſcovering all their Deſigns, to their utter Deſtruction if he got to England. Having obtain'd Licence to Seize him, the Earl ſent Meſſengers every way in ſearch of him, and among the reſt, Humphrey Cheyney, Eſq; who overtook him near Champaigne, and by Arguments and Fair Promiſes prevail'd with him to return. By the Marqueſs's Diſpoſition to leave him, the Earl began to doubt, that if he delay'd his Expedition to England longer, many more of his Friends might grow cool in their Zeal for him; ſo he earneſtly Sollicited the French Court for Aid, deſiring ſo ſmall a Supply of Men and Money, that Charles cou'd not in Honour refuſe him; yet for what he Lent him, he would have Hoſtages, that Satisfaction ſhould be made. The Earl made no Scruple of that, ſo leaving the Lord Marqueſs Dorſet (whom he ſtill miſtruſted) and Sir John Bourchier as his Pledges at Paris, he departed for Roan, where the few Men that the French King had lent him, and all the Engliſh that follow'd his Fortunes Rendezvous'd.

The Earl ſtops him.

When he arriv'd there, he was inform'd of the Uſurper's Intentions to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth himſelf, and her Siſter, the Princeſs Cecilia, to a Man of Mean Condition. This was Mortifying News to him, for he imagin'd if his Alliance with the Houſe of York was by that Means broken, their Friends would all fall off from him: However he reſolv'd to puſh for the Crown, as Heir to the Houſe of Lancaſter, but then it was neceſſary for him to encreaſe his Strength and Intereſt; wherefore he diſpatch'd away a Meſſenger to Sir Walter Herbert, a Man of Great Power in Wales, to get him to eſpouſe his Quarrel, by an Offer of Marrying his Siſter, a Beautiful Young Lady. The Earl of Northumberland had Married another of Sir Walter's Siſters, and the Earl of Richmond's Agent had Inſtructions to Addreſs himſelf alſo to him, and perſwade him to forward the Marriage. The Meſſenger found the Ways ſo narrowly watch'd, that he cou'd not proceed on his Journey; and 'twas well for the Earl that he did no more in it; for had any ſuch Treaty been propoſed and known, his Friends, who were ſo on the Princeſs Elizabeth's account, had all forſaken him. The Meſſenger being thus diſappointed, the Earl receiv'd One out of England, Morgan Kidwellie, Eſq; a Lawyer, who brought him Advice, That Sir Rice ap Thomas, a Gentleman who was as powerful in Wales as Sir Walter Herbert, and Capt. John Savage, a famous Soldier, had made Great Preparations to Aſſiſt him; that Reginald Bray had collected large Sums of Money to Pay his Troops, and earneſtly Entreated him to haſten his Voyage and direct his Courſe to Wales. The Earl rejoycing at this Good News, order'd all his Forces to Embark and Sail from Harfleet in Normandy in Auguſt, with about Two Thouſand Men, in a few Ships, juſt enough to Tranſport them. After Seven Days Sail, he arriv'd in the Haven of Milford, and Landed at a Place call'd Dalle, from whence he March'd the next Day to Haverford Weſt, where he was Receiv'd with Joy by the Townſmen. Having Refreſh'd his Men, and ſent Notice, by Truſty Meſſengers, to his Mother, the Lord Stanley, and Sigilbert Talbot, that he intended to direct his March towards London, deſiring them to meet him on the Way with their Powers, he advanced to Shrewsbury, where Sir Gilbert Talbot Joyn'd him with the E. of Shrewsbury's Tenants, as Sir Rice ap Thomas and Richard Griffith Eſq; had done before, with a Body of Welſh-Men; by which his Army became ſo ſtrong, that he eaſily Reduced all the Towns to which he came in his March. Sir Rice ap Thomas wou'd not come unto him, till he had promiſed to make him Governour of Wales, in caſe he got the Crown; which the Earl agreed to and perform'd as ſoon as 'twas in his power, Sir Rice having been very Faithful and Serviceable to him.

K. Richard deſigns to Marry the Princeſs Elizabeth.

1485.

The Earl of Richmond Lands in Wales.

His Power increaſes.

In the mean while, the Lord Stanley and his Brother Sir Willian Stanley rais'd Men, but did not declare whom they would ſide with; Sir William advanced with his Army into Staffordſhire, and waited on the Earl of Richmond at Stafford, attended only by Twenty or Thirty Perſons. The Lord Stanley lay at Litchfield with 5000 Men; yet neither he nor his Brother Joyn'd the Earl. Sir William having had a Short Conference with him, return'd to his Forces; and when the Earl approach'd near Litchfield, the Lord Stanley return'd to Atherſtone, to prevent King Richard's having any Suſpicion of him; being afraid that the Tyrant would murder his Son the Lord Strange, whom he had in his Cuſtody, if he ſided openly with the Earl of Richmond.

King Richard's Proceedings upon it.

The Uſurper at firſt deſpiſed the Earl's Attempt, hearing he had brought ſo few Men with him, he did not doubt but Sir Walter Herbert would eaſily Suppreſs him with the Militia of Wales, which he order'd him to raiſe, but when he heard that Sir Walter had ſuffered him to paſs, and ſo many Gentlemen had Joyn'd him with their Friends and Dependants, that his Army would be as numerous as his own, if the Lancaſhire Men, under the Stanley's, declar'd for him, he reſolved to Oppoſe him in Perſon, He commanded Henry Earl of Northumberland, Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford, and other Gentlemen whoſe Loyalty he ſuſpected, to attended him in Arms, and ſent for the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey, Sir Robert Brackenbury, Lieutenant of the Tower, and others, to bring their whole Strength with them, to enable him to give the Earl Battle before he receiv'd further Aſſiſtance. When all his Troops were arrived at Nottingham, where he kept his Court, he put himſelf at their Head, and led them to Leiceſter. Sir Thomas Boucrhier, Sir Walter Hungerford and ſeveral others, found means to Deſert to the Earl; which tho' it was a great Diſcouragement to Richard, yet it did eaſe Earl Henry of his Diſcontent, for that the Lord Stanley had not Joyn'd him. His Army proceeded from Litchfield to Tamworth, Himſelf bringing up the Rear with about Twenty Horſe.

As

1485. The Earl of Richmond loſes his Way.

As he was muſing on the Difficulties of his Enterprize, he lagg'd behind his Company, and it growing Dark, they march'd on and entred Tamworth before they miſt him. His Care was increaſed, by a Report, that King Richard was at hand; whoſe coming up before the Lord Stanley had Joyn'd him, threatned his whole Army with Deſtruction; yet his Men were not diſcourag'd, they truſted in their own Valour and the Goodneſs of their Cauſe, and proceeded with Great Reſolution.

The Earl having inſenſibly loſt his Companions, and the High-way to Tamworth, turn'd aſide to a Little Village Three Miles from Tamworth, where he ſtay'd all Night, not daring to diſcover himſelf, or ask a Guide to the Town. His Followers were much ſurprized at his Abſence, and afraid what was become of him. He was alſo apprehenſive of the ill Effects of their miſſing him, and not a little fearful of falling into the Hands of ſome of the Uſurper's Parties. Early in the Morning he left the Village, and happily arriv'd at the Town, to the unſpeakable Joy of his Army: He excus'd his Abſence by pretending he had been to conſult with ſome private Friends of his who durſt not yet appear for him. He was unwilling his Companions ſhou'd think him Guilty of ſuch a Blunder as to loſe his Way, when he had ſo many Guides about him, and made that a piece of Policy, which was indeed downright Ignorance: So eaſie 'tis for Princes to impoſe upon their People who are ready to judge favourably of all their Actions.

He juſt ſhew'd himſelf to his Soldiers, and then left them again to go to Atherſtone, where he firſt ſaw and ſaluted the Lord Stanley, his Father in Law; He held a Conference with him and Sir William Stanley in a little Field, where they conſulted how they ſhould give the Tyrant Battle to the beſt Advantage. In the Evening Sir John Savage, Sir Bryan Sanford, and Sir Simon Digby, came unto him with all their Friends and Followers from King Richard, who was advanc'd to Leiceſter, and his Army encamp'd not far off, on a Hill call'd Arme Beame, in Boſworth Pariſh. The next Day after King Richard arriv'd at Leiceſter, he went to the Camp and drew up his Men in order of Battle on the Plain. He plac'd his Archers in Front under the Command of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Surrey his Son; Himſelf led the Main Body, with two Wings of Cavalry on each Flank. The Earl leaving the Lord Stanley return'd to his Army, and march'd them out of Tamworth towards the Enemy, reſolving to fight King Richard. The Lord Stanley alſo march'd from Atherſtone, and halted in a place between the two Armies. The Earl ſent to him to come and help to ſet his Men in Order of Battle; but the Lord Stanley even now was ſo cautious, that he excus'd his appearing among the Earl's Followers: He bad him Draw up his Soldiers, He wou'd do the ſame by his, and Joyn him at Supper time. Tho' this Anſwer vext the Earl of Richmond inwardly, he ſeem'd as well ſatisfy'd as if he had come, and Chearfully put his Men in Order: His Front was thin, and conſiſted of Archers, commanded by John Earl of Oxford; Sir Gilbert Talbot led the Right Wing, and Sir John Savage the Left, attended by a Troop of Young Fellows well arm'd, Clad in white Coats and Hoods, who made a gallant Figure, terrible to the Enemy. The Earl of Richmond accompanied by the Earl of Pembroke led the Main Body; his whole Strength did not amount to Six Thouſand Men, Stanley's Forces which were Seven or Eight Thouſand ſtrong excepted: And King Richard had twice that Number. In the Order we have mention'd, the two Armies advanced towards each other; the Lord Stanley moving aſide off as the Earl of Richmond mov'd; and when the Uſurper was come farther into the Plain where he expected the Earl's Approach, he made a Speech to his Army to this Purpoſe.

King Richard encamps at Boſworth.

The Earl marches to Fight him.

1485. The Lord Stanley's warineſs

King Richard's Speech to his Army.

My Friends and Fellow-Soldiers,

"BY your Valour and Conduct I got and have enjoy'd the Crown in ſpite of all the Wicked Deſigns of your and my Enemies. I have govern'd this Nation as a good Prince ought to do for the Benefit of my Subjects, and done nothing without the Advice and Conſent of my Counſellors, whoſe Fidelity and Wiſdom I have often prov'd; and your Loyalty to me makes me believe that you have an Opinion of me as I have of my Self, that I am your Rightful and Lawful King. Tho' at my Acceſſion to the Throne I was Guilty of a Wicked Deteſted Crime, yet my Repentance of it has been ſo Severe and ſo Sincere that I hope you will forget it, as I ſhall never ceaſe to Deplore and Lament it. Conſidering the Danger we are in at this Time, what a gracious Prince I have been to you, and what good Subjects you have been to me, we are bound by the ſtricteſt Bonds of Obligation and Duty mutually to defend one another in ſo great Peril. To keep what we have got is as glorious as to get it: And as by your Aſſiſtance I was advanced to the Throne, ſo I hope by the ſame Help to continue in it. I doubt not you have heard of the Traiterous Devices of an Obſcure Welſhman (whoſe Father I never knew, and whom I never ſaw) againſt our Crown and Dignity. You hear who they are that he depends upon, a Company of Traytors, Thieves, Outlaws and Fugitives; mean Beggarly Bretons, and Cowardly Frenchmen: whoſe Aim is the Deſtruction of you, your Wives and Children, as 'tis their Leaders to Diſpoſſeſs me of the Imperial Crown of this Realm. Let us therefore joyn heartily in our common Defence, Fight like Lions, and fear not to dye like Men: Indeed there is Nothing for you to be afraid of. The Hare never fled faſter from before the Hound, nor the Lark from the Kite, nor the Sheep from the Woolf, than theſe Boaſting Adverſaries of ours ſhall quit the Field at the Sight of ſuch brave Soldiers. Nor do I Promiſe you Victory without Reaſon: For let us think a little who it is that we have to deal with. And firſt for the Earl of Richmond, Captain of the Rebels, a Welſh Boy, of little Courage and leſs Experience in War; Bred up in the Duke of Brittain's Court like a Bird in a Cage, who never ſaw an Army, and conſequently is not Capable to Lead one. The Soldier's Succeſs is owing in a great meaſure to the Captain's Conduct and Valour. What can his Men hope from him? What from Themſelves? a Crew of Vagabonds and Rebels, who will Tremble when they ſee us advancing with Banners diſplay'd to chaſtize them. They will either fly before us, or Conſcious of Divine Vengeance, for the breach of many Oaths of Allegiance they have Sworn to us, throw down their Arms, and at our Feet implore our Royal Mercy. As for the Frenchmen and Bretons, our Noble Anceſtors have often triumph'd over them. What are They? Boaſters, Drunkards, Raviſhers, Cowards, the moſt Effeminate and Lewd Wretches that ever offer'd themſelves in Front of Battle. Since ſuch are the Enemies we are to Fight with, Come on, My 1485. "Friends and Fellow Soldiers, and dauntleſs try "if they dare diſpute this Matter with us by "dint of Sword. Come on my Captains and "Champions, in whoſe Wiſdom and Courage I "truſt for Me and My People. What is a "Handful to a whole Nation? Let me Conjure "you all by your Love to your Country, your "Duty to your King, and your Affection to your "Families, to behave your ſelves like good Sub-"jects and good Soldiers this Day, when I reſolve "to be Victorious or crown my Death with Im-"mortal Fame. Remember, that as I Promiſe "thoſe who do Well Riches and Honours; ſo "I ſhall ſeverely Puniſh ſuch as deſerve it by "their Cowardice or Treachery. And now in "the Name of St. George, let us meet our Ene-"mies.

" Friends

Hollins-head. Whether this Speech was made By him or for him, we cannot decide; the Author from whom we took it ſays it was his own, and that it had not ſo good an Effect on the Minds of his Soldiers as he intended it ſhould have. He had many Gentlemen, and others in his Army, who follow'd him more out of Fear than Affection; and wiſh'd well to his Adverſary. The Earl of Richmond receiving by his Scouts, That the Uſurper's Army was drawn up in Battalia a little diſtance off on the Plain, rode from Rank to Rank and Wing to Wing to encourage his Men. He was arm'd at all Points, (his Helmet excepted) and got up on an Eminence to be the better ſeen by his Soldiers: For tho' he was handſom and well-proportion'd, yet he was ſhort. Having kept Silence ſome time to conſider of what he was about to ſay to them, He began his Speech thus:

The Earl of Richmond's Speech to his Army "IF ever God appear'd in a Juſt Cauſe, and "gave a Bleſſing to their Arms who warr'd "for the good of their Country: If ever he "aided ſuch as ventur'd their Lives for the "Relief of the Innocent, and to Suppreſs Male-"factors and Publick Criminals; we may now, "My Friends and Fellow Soldiers, be ſure of Vi-"ctory over our Proud and Inſolent Enemies. "Juſt and Righteous is our Cauſe, and we can-"not be ſo Wicked as to imagin God will "leave us, to aſſiſt thoſe that fear neither him "nor his Laws, nor have any regard to Ho-"neſty or Juſtice. We have the Laws Divine "and Civil on our Side; we fight againſt a Parri-"cide ſtain'd with his own Blood, a Deſtroyer "of the Nobility, and an Oppreſſor of the Poor "Commons of this Realm; and againſt a Horrid "Band of Murderers, Aſſaſſins, Rebels and Uſur-"pers: For he that Stiles himſelf King wears "the Crown which of Right only belongs to "me. His Favourites and Followers ſeize your "Eſtates, cut down your Woods, ruin and lay "waſte your Mannours and Manſions, and turn "your Wives and Children to Wander in the "wide World without Succour and Relief: The "Cauſe of all theſe Miſchiefs, the Cruel Tyrant "Richard, reſt aſſur'd that God will this Day "give into our Hands to be puniſh'd according "to his Demerits. His Followers wounded by "the Stings of their Guilty Conſciences, will not "dare to look Juſtice in the Face: And believe "not that yon numerous Army are your Ad-"verſaries; many of them, if not the moſt "part of that Multitude, are forc'd into the Ty-"rant's Service, have his Crimes in Abhorrence, "and wait only for an Opportunity to joyn us. "You have often heard from the Pulpit, That "'tis the greateſt of Virtues to bring down the "Oppreſſor, and to help thoſe who are in Diſ-"treſs. Is not the Uſurper, Richard Duke of 1485. "Glouceſter, a Violater of God's Laws and Man's? "Who can have the leaſt good Thought of one "that ſo injur'd his own Brother's Memory, and "murder'd his Nephews? Who can hope for "Mercy from him who Delights in Blood? Who "truſt in him who Miſtruſts all Men. Tarquin "the Proud, ſo Infamous in Hiſtory, whom the "Romans baniſh'd their City for ever, was leſs "Guilty than this Uſurper. Nero, who ſlew his "own Mother, and open'd the Womb that bare "him to ſee the place of his Conception, was "not more a Monſter of Mankind than Richard. "In him you have at once a Tarquin and a Nero. "behold there, a Tyrant worſe than even him "that murder'd his Mother, and ſet his Impe-"rial City in a Flame. One, who has not only "ſlain his own Nephew, his King and Sovereign "Lord, baſtardiz'd his Noble Brothers, affron-"ted his Mother's Honour, but try'd all the Arts "his and his Creatures Cunning cou'd invent to "defile his own Niece, under the ſpecious Pre-"tence of a Marriage, a Princeſs I have ſworn "to marry, as you all know and believe. If "this Cauſe is not Juſt, let God the Giver of "all Victory Judge and determine. We have "(Thanks be to Jeſus our Saviour) eſcap'd "the Treaſons form'd in Bretagne, and the "Snares laid by our Subtle Adverſaries to de-"ſtroy us; we have paſs'd the Seas, travers'd a "ſpacious Country in Safety to ſearch for the "Boar, whom we have at laſt found. Let us "not therefore fear to begin the bloody Chace. "Let us put our Confidence in the Almighty, "and verily believe that this is the Hour we "have long'd and pray'd for, which will put "an end to the many Miſeries whe have hither-"to endur'd. Think what a glorious Prize is "before us. The Wealth and Spoil of the "Tyrant and his Followers is yours if we "Conquer, and Conquer we muſt or Dye; for "we are now come ſo far that there is no Re-"treat left us. Let us One and All reſolve to "end our Labours now by Death or Victory. "Let Courage ſupply want of Number, and "as for me, I purpoſe to Live with Glory here-"after, or Periſh with Glory here. Come on "then, Let us meet theſe Traytors, Murderers, "Uſurpers; Let us be Bold and we ſhall Tri-"umph: We are utterly deſtroy'd if we fly; "if we are Victorious there's an end of all our "Perils and Dangers. In the Name of God, "and St. George, Come on and Proſper.

Theſe Words ſo encourag'd his Men, that they demanded to be led immediately againſt the Enemy. There was a Moraſs between the two Armies, the Earl left it on his Right hand, by which he not only hinder'd King Richard's attacking him on that Side, but had the Sun in his Back, and it ſhone full in the Faces of his Enemies. The Uſurper ſeeing his Army was approaching, order'd his Trumpets to ſound and the Archers to let fly their Arrows: The Earl's Bowmen return'd their Shot, and when that Dreadful Storm was over, the Foot joyn'd and came to cloſe Fight. 'Twas then that the Lord Stanley came in to the Earl's Aſſiſtance. The Earl of Oxford fearing his men might be ſurrounded by the Multitude of the Enemy, commanded none ſhou'd ſtir above Ten Foot from the Standard: The Soldiers preſently clos'd their Ranks and ceas'd the Combat, expecting further Orders. King Richard's Troops being Jealous of ſome Stratagem, ſtood ſtill to obſerve them; and indeed they did not fight with a very good Will at all. The Earl of Oxford led his Men again

The Battel of Boſworth.

to

1485. to the Charge. The Duke of Norfolk, the Uſurper's faſt Friend, chang'd the Order of his Battle, widen'd his Firſt Line, but clos'd and enlarg'd his Second; and then renew'd the Combat. King Richard hearing the Earl of Richmond was not far off, attended with a few of his Guards only, ſought him amidſt his Enemies, and having ſpy'd him, ſet Spurs to his Horſe and ran towards him; The Earl perceived him, and prepar'd to receive him as a Man ſhou'd his mortal Foe. The King meeting with Sir William Branden the Earl's Standard Bearer in his way, overthrew and ſlew him. This Knight was Father of Charles Branden Duke of Suffolk, Famous in the Reign of Henry VIII. Richard then fought Sir John Cheyney, diſmounted him, and forc'd his Way up to the Earl; who kept him off at Swords Point till Aſſiſtance came in, and he was reliev'd by his Followers. At the inſtant Sir William Stanley, who had been as wary as the Lord Stanley his Brother, joyn'd the Earl with Three Thouſand choſen Men, upon which King Richard's Soldiers turn'd their Backs and fled; himſelf fighting manfully in the midſt of his Enemies was Slain. The E. of Oxford made a terrible Slaughter in the Van of the Uſurper's Army. The Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Ferrars of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brackenbury dy'd on the Spot, together with about a Thouſand of their Men. The greateſt part of thoſe in the main Body of Richard's Army watching their Opportunity, while the Van was hotly engag'd with the Earl's, left the Field and departed every Man to his Home; having been by Force taken from their Habitations to fight for a Prince whoſe Government was Odious to them. The Duke of Norfolk was warn'd, by a Dyſtich in the Meeter of thoſe Times which was fix'd on the Gate of the Houſe where he Lodg'd, not to venture farther in the Tyrant's Quarrel; for he was betray'd, and all thoſe that engag'd with him wou'd be ruin'd. The Rhimes were theſe:

King Richard ſeeks the Earl of Richmond.

Richard's Bravery.

He is ſlain and his Army routed.

> Jack of Norfolk, be not too Bold;
> For Dicken, thy Maſter, is Bought and Sold.

But as John Howard Duke of Norfolk owed his Advancement to the Uſurper, who made him a Duke, he thought his own Title to the Honours he held wou'd be Precarious, if Richard cou'd not defend his Crown; ſo he follow'd his Fortune, and fell a Victim to his Ambition. Sir William Catesby a Judge, who had been a main Inſtrument of the Uſurper's Tyranny, and ſeveral other Offenders were Taken, and two Days after Beheaded at Leiceſter. The Lord Viſcount Lovell, Humphrey Stafford Eſq; and Thomas Stafford his Brother, made their Eſcapes. Many Gentlemen and Private Soldiers threw down their Arms, ſubmitted to the Earl, and were graciouſly receiv'd. Among thoſe was Henry Earl of Northumberland, who did not engage in the late Battle, He and his Men ſtanding Neuter; for which he was immediately taken into the Earl of Richmond's Favour and Sworn of his Privy-Council. Thomas Earl of Surrey was ſent to the Tower, as having been more zealous than the reſt in the Tyrant's Cauſe: However he was releas'd ſoon after, and preferr'd to Places of the greateſt Truſt and Honour. Earl Henry had ſcarce a Hundred Men Kill'd on his Part, and no Perſon of Quality beſides Sir William Branden. The Engagement laſted in all about two Hours, and happen'd on the 22d day of Auguſt. The Uſurper there finiſh'd his Evil Courſe after he had reign'd two Years, two Months and one Day, reckoning from the Time of his Coronation, which was the Day after his Election. Had he liv'd with as much Glory as he dy'd, his Character wou'd have ſhone bright in the Engliſh Annals. But tho' he wanted not Perſonal Bravery, yet that Quality as ſhining as it is, was ſully'd and obſcur'd by his Cruelty, and Thirſt of Blood. He might have ſav'd his Life had not Deſpair hurried him on to Death. In the Beginning of the Battle, he perceiv'd, by his Mens fighting with an ill-will and others leaving him, that the Day was loſt. Some of his Creatures adviſed him to Fly, and brought him a ſwift Horſe to carry him off; but knowing how generally he was hated by the whole Kingdom, and that his Crimes were ſuch as deny'd him all hopes of Pardon, he thought the longer he liv'd his Miſery wou'd be the longer, and that at laſt he ſhou'd dye with Infamy; wherefore he ruſh'd deſperately into the thickeſt of the Enemy, and met a more glorious Fate than he deſerved. 1485.

After the Battle was over and the Victory entirely gain'd, the Earl of Richmond fell down on his Knees in the Open Field, thank'd the Almighty for the Bleſſing he had given to his Arms, Pray'd for the Catholick Church, and his Subjects which now he had the Charge of. He then rode up to an Eminence, and from thence gave his Soldiers Thanks for behaving themſelves ſo well in the late Fight, promiſing them all Rewards anſwerable to their Deſerts. The Army ſhouting Clapt their Hands and ſaluted him King, crying out with one Voice, King Henry, King Henry! And the Lord Stanley taking King Richard's Crown, which was found among the Spoils of the Field, put it on the Earl's Head, who from that Time aſſum'd the Title and Power of King. We muſt not omit to inform the Reader of the Lord Strange's Eſcape. King Richard hearing his Father had raiſed Five Thouſand men and was Advancing towards the Earl of Richmond ſent to him to Joyn him, and Swore by God's Death, if he refus'd it, he wou'd order his Son's Head to be cut off before he died. The Lord Stanley anſwer'd, He had more Sons, and cou'd not Promiſe to come to him at that Time. The Tyrant as he Swore to do, order'd the Lord Strange to be Beheaded at the Inſtant when the two Armies were to Engage: But ſome of his Council abhorring that the Innocent young Gentleman ſhould ſuffer for his Father's Offence, told the Uſurper, Now was a Time to Fight, and not to Execute; adviſing him to keep him Priſoner till the Battle was over; The Tyrant hearken'd to their Advice, broke his Oath, and commanded the Keepers of his Tents to take him into Cuſtody, till he return'd from the Combat. By this Means the Lord Strange eſcaped the King's Revenge, equally Bloody and Unjuſt. The Keepers of his Tents deliver'd him to his Father the Lord Stanley after the Fight; and for ſaving him, were taken into the New King's Favour, and preferr'd. In the Evening King Henry march'd to Leiceſter. Where King Richard's Body ſtript ſtark Naked was brought in a ſhameful manner to be Buried. Blanch Sanglier, a Purſuivant at Arms threw it upon a Horſe, like a Calf; His Head and Arms hanging on one Side and his Legs on the other, his whole Carcaſs beſmear'd with Dirt and Blood. The Purſuivant rode with it to the Grey-Fryers Church at Leiceſter, where it was expos'd a Filthy Spectacle to the View of the People, who us'd it Ignominiouſly, and afterwards 'twas Buried in that Abbey-Church; where King Henry in reſpect to his Family,

The Earl of Richmond ſaluted King by his Army.

The Lord Stanley puts the Crown on his Head in the Field.

King Richard's Body Ignominiouſly us'd.

1485. Family, order'd a Tomb to be erected over his Grave. We ſhall not trouble the Reader with a long Account of his Perſon and Manners: He has doubtleſs by this time ſeen enough of him, and the Picture ſhewn at a nearer View wou'd rather Frighten than Divert him. He was ſhort and little, Crooked or Hump-back'd, one Shoulder higher than the other: His Face was little: He had a Cruel Look; and what confeſs'd the Malice and Deceit of his Heart, He often mus'd, and muſing bit his nether Lip: He wore a Dagger always about him, and frequently would draw it up and down the Scabbard: He was Cunning and Falſe, Proud and Valiant; and in a word, by the Hiſtory Sir Thomas Moore has left us of him, the greateſt Tyrant that ever Sat on the Britiſh Throne; where no Tyrant did ever Sit long. 1485.

A ſhort Character of King Richard.

The Reigns of King Edward V. and his Succeſſor Richard III. were ſo ſhort, that there were few Remarkable Occurrences in their Times: And the moſt Illuſtrious Perſons, both in War and the Arts and Sciences, will more Properly come under that of Henry the VIIth.

IN the Firſt Part of Richard the IIId's Reign, There happen'd ſuch a Flood in Glouceſterſhire, that all the Country was Overflow'd by the Severn, ſeveral Perſons were Drown'd in their Beds, Children in Cradles ſwam about the Fields, and Beaſts were Drown'd even on the Hills: The Waters did not Abate in Ten Days; which hinder'd the Duke of Buckingham's Paſſing that River into Wales to joyn the Welſhmen who were riſen againſt King Richard, and occaſion'd his Misfortune and Death. Hol. 743.

Baniſter, who betray'd the Duke of Buckingham his Maſter, was ſorely afflicted with God's Secret Judgments: His Eldeſt Son went Mad, and died raving in a Hog-ſty. His Eldeſt Daughter, who was very Beautiful, was ſuddenly ſtricken with a foul Leproſy. His Second Son was taken Lame in his Limbs. His Younger Son was Suffocated in a Puddle of Filthy Water; and himſelf in an extreme Old Age found Guilty of Murther, but ſav'd by his Clergy. Hol. 744.

John Duke of Norfolk,
Sir Robert Brackenbury, Lieutenant of the Tower,
The Lord Ferrars, and Sir Richard Ratcliff, loſt their Lives fighting Valiantly for King Richard at Boſworth Battle.
Sir William Branden, and Sir John Cheyney, Signaliz'd themſelves in the ſame Fight, on the Side of the Earl of Richmond.

Of Men of Learning, there were ſome in the Reign of Richard III. of Note: As,

John Penketh an Auguſtine Frier, of Warrington in Lancaſhire, one of Scotus's Followers; he Preach'd an Infamous Sermon in Favour of King Richard: The ſame did Dr. Shaw, an Eminent Preacher, Sir Edmund Shaw's Brother, an Alderman of London.
John Kent, or Caileie, Born in South-Wales, Rhetorician.
George Ripley, a Carmelite Frier of Boſton, a Great Mathematician and Poet.
Dr. John Spine, a Carmelite Frier of Briſtol, &c.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF RICHARD III.

In Five BOOKS.

By GEO. BUCK, Eſquire.

The ARGUMENT and CONTENTS of BOOK I.

The Linage, Family, Birth, Education, and Tyrociny of King RICHARD the Third.

The Royal Houſe of Plantageneſt, and the beginning of that Name. What Sobriquets were. The Antiquity of Sirnames. Richard is created Duke of Glouceſter, his Marriage and his Iſſue: His martial Imployments: His Journey into Scotland and Recovery of Berwick: The Death of King Edward the Fourth. The Duke of Glouceſter made Lord Protector, and ſoon after King of England, by importunate Suit of his Barons and of the People, as the next true and lawful Heir. Henry Teudor Earl of Richmond practiſeth againſt the King: He is conveyed into France. The Noble Linage of Sir William Herbert, his Imployment: He is made Earl of Pembroke. King Edward the Fourth firſt, and after King Richard, ſollicit the Duke of Brittain, and treat with him for the Delivery of the Young Earl of Richmond his Priſoner. The Succeſs of that Buſineſs. The Quality and Title of the Beauforts or Somerſets. The Linage and Family of the Earl of Richmond. The ſolemn Coronations of King Richard, and of the Queen his Wife; his firſt at Weſtminſter, the ſecond at York. Nobles, Knights and Officers made by him. Prince Edward his Son inveſted in the Principality of Wales, and the Oath of Allegiance made to him. King Richard demandeth the Tribute of France. His Progreſs to York. His careful Charge given to the Judges and Magiſtrates. He holdeth a Parliament, wherein the Marriage of the King his Brother with the Lady Grey is declared and adjudged unlawful, their Children to be Illegitimate and not capable of the Crown. The Earl of Richmond and divers others Attainted of Treaſon. Many good Laws made. The King declared and approved by Parliament to be the only true and lawful Heir of the Crown. The King and Queen Dowager are reconciled. He hath ſecret Advertiſements of Innovations and Practices againſt him: Createth a Vice-Conſtable of England. His ſundry Treaties with Foreign Princes. Dr. Morton corrupteth the Duke of Buckingham, who becometh diſcontent, demanding the Earldom of Hereford, with the Great Conſtableſhip of England: He taketh Arms, is defeated and put to Death by Marſhal Law.

The Houſe and Title of York,

RICHARD Plantagenet, Duke of Glouceſter, and King of England and of France, and Lord of Ireland, the Third of that Name, was the Younger Son of Sir Richard Plantagenet, the (a) fourth Duke of York of that Royal Family, and King of England, deſignate by King Henry the Sixth, and by the moſt Noble Senate, and Univerſal Synod of this Kingdom, the High Court of Parliament. The Mother of this Richard Duke of Glouceſter, was the Lady Cecily Daughter of Sir Ralph de Nevill, Earl of Weſtmorland, by his Wife Joan de Beaufort, the Natural Daughter of John Plantagenet (alias) de Gaunt, Duke of Guiene and Lancaſter, King of Caſtile and Leon, third Son of King Edward the Third; for in that Order

(a) He was not the fourth Duke of that Family. The firſt was Edmund of Langley. The ſecond was Edward his Son, whoſe Brother Richard, Earl of Cambridge, was Beheaded for Treaſon before Duke Edward dy'd. He left this Richard, who cou'd not be the fourth Duke of York, his Father having never born that Title; But his Uncle Edward being Slain at the Battle of Agincourt, and dying without Iſſue, King Henry the VIth. created this Richard Duke of York: So he was the third Duke of that Title of this Family.

this

this Duke is best accounted, because William of Hatfield, the second Son of King Edward the Third died in his Infancy, and this Duke of York and King designate, was propagated from two younger Sons of the same King Edward the Third, whereby he had both Paternal and Maternal Title to the Crown of England and France: But his better and nearer Title was the Maternal Title, or that which came to him by his Mother the Lady Anne de Mortimer, the Daughter and Heir of Philippa Plantagenet, who was the sole Daughter and Heir of Lyonel Plantagenet Duke of Clarence, and second Son (b) of King Edward the Third, according to the Account and Order aforesaid.

And this Lady Philippa was the Wife of Sir Edmond de Mortimer, the great and famous Earl of March, and that Duke Richard, King designate, by his Father Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York (Sirnam'd also de Conningsborrough) issued directly and in a Masculine Line from Edmond Plantagenet, alias de Langley, the first Duke of York, and the fifth Son of King Edward the Third; who was the most renowned and glorious Progenitor to those Princes of York and Lancaster, and the first King in a Lineal Descent from that great Henry Sirnam'd Plantagenet, famous for his great Prowess and many Victories, King of England in the Right of his Mother the Empress Matilda or Maud, Daughter and Heir of King Henry the First, and stil'd Anglorum Domina, sometime Wife of the Emperor Henry the Fifth, by which he was also Sirnam'd Filius Imperatricis: The French men call'd him Henry du Court Manteau, or Court Mantle, because he wore a Cloak shorter than the Fashion was in those Times. By his Father Galfride, or Geoffry Plantagenet, he was Earl or Duke of Anjou (for then Dux & Comes, and Ducatus & Comitatus, were Synonomies and Promiscuous words) he was also Earl of Maine of Torraine, and Hereditary Seneschal, or High Steward of France, and by his Marriage of Elianor Queen of France Repudiate, Daughter and Heir of William Duke of Gascoigne and of Guiene, and Earl of Poictou, he was Duke and Earl of those Principalities and Signiories; also by the Empress his Mother Duke of Normandy: He was Lord of Ireland by Conqueſt, and confirm'd by Pope Adrian. But these were not all his Seigniories and Dominions; for after he was King of England, he extended his Empire and Principate in the South to the Pyrenean Mountains, (The Confines of Spain and France) in the North to the Isles of Orkney, and in the East and West with the Ocean, as Giraldus Cambrensis, Gul. Neubrigensis, & Joannes Sarisburiensis, grave and credible Authors affirm, who stiled him, Regum Britanniæ maximus; and doubtless he was the greatest King of Britain since King Arthur.

The Lineage of Edw. III.

The Empire of K. Henry II.

Girald. in Topog. Hiberniæ, Sarisbur. in Pol. Newbrig. Lib. 2.

But it is controverted amongst the Antiquaries and Heralds, which Earl of Anjou first bare the Sirname and † Sobriquet of Plantageneſt, or Plantagenet after the vulgar Orthodox, by what occasion, and from what cause it was taken and born, and from what Time and Age it had beginning: Some would have the forenamed Geoffry Plantagenet, Father of this Henry, the first Earl of Anjou, which bare it. But we shall find stronger Reasons to derive it from a much more ancient Earl of Anjou, and better Causes than can be found in him, if we step but a little back to their Stories, and compare the Men and their Times. Geoffry Plantagenet being a Man of a Gallant and Active Fire, dispos'd to the Courts of Princes, to Justs, Turnaments, &c. and to the Courtship of fair Ladies those of the Higheſt Rank, and had so Amorous a Star, That Philippe le Grosse, King of France, suspected him for too familiar Commerce with his Bed. But it was of better Influence when he atchieved and married the Empress Matilda, by which we may very well calculate, he neither had nor would be intent or at leisure for such a mortified and perilous Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. But if we would know the Man, let us look upon the first Fulke, Earl of Anjou, who liv'd about an Hundred Years before the Norman Conqueſt of England, and was Son of Godefray, or Geoffry Grisegonell the first Earl of Anjou (according to du Haillon) Ancestor and Progenitor to the foresaid Geoffry Plantagenet, some seven or eight Degrees in the ascending Line, as Paradin accounteth, a Man raised upon the Foundation of a great Courage and Strength (two of the best Principles when they have good Seconds, and make too a glorious Man, where they serve his Vertues, not Affections, as in this Prince they did) whose Disposition on the other side being let out into as vast an Ambition and Covetousness, ne'er look'd upon the Unlawfulness of his Desires, how horrid soever (which amongst the many rest) run him upon the shelves of wilful Perjury and Murder; the one for defrauding and spoiling a Church of certain Rights, and the other for contriving the Tragedy of his young Nephew, Drogo, Earl of Britain, to make himself Lord of his Country and Principality. The secret Check and Scourge of those Crimes had a long time to work upon his Conscience, and of a great Sinner made a great Penitent; being Old and having much solitary Time and many heavy Thoughts (which naturally attend Old Age, and suggest better Considerations of our former and youthful Sins) he opens the Horror of them, and his afflicted Mind to his Confessor, (as great Constantine to Ægyppus) who enjoyn'd him to make the same Confession before the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem; which Pilgrimage the Earl perform'd in all lowly and contemptible manner, passing as a Private and Unworthy Person, without Train or Followers, save two of his meanest (which he took rather for Witnesses than) Servants, whose Service was, when they came near Jerusalem, the one with a Cord (such as is us'd for the Strangling of Criminals) thrown about his Master's Neck, to draw or lead him to the Holy Sepulcher, whilst the other did accoustre and strip him as a condemn'd Person, and with extremity Scourge him until he was prostrate before the Sacred Monument, where he gave Evidence of his unfeign'd Contrition and Sorrow. Amongst other devout Expressions, uttering this, Mon dieu & Signeur recoy a Pardon le perjure & homicide & miserable Foulque; And after this Pilgrimage he liv'd many Years of Prosperity in his Country, honoured of all Men. To justifie this, there be many Examples of other Princes and Noble Persons who liv'd about the Year of our Lord One Thousand, and somewhat before, and in Three or Four Ages after, who underwent the like Pilgrimages imposed under Base and Mechanick Nick-names and Persons, as of a Carpenter, a Smith, a Fisherman, a Mariner, a Shepheard, a Wood-man, a Broom-man, &c. In my Inquiry after that of Plantagenet, I met with an Ancient Manuscript, that afforded me a large Fulke Earl of Anjou.

Accoustre in crimi- nall & condemne Paradin.

From this Example Henry II. submitted his Body to be scourged by the Monks of Canterbury for the Death of Tho. Becket.

† or Nick-name.

(b) Lyonel Duke of Clarence, was his Third Son: The Eldest was Edward the Black Prince, the Second William of Hatfield, and the Third Lyonel, &c.

Catalogue of many ſuch, by the French call'd Sobriquets; from whence I have tranſcribed theſe few for a Taſte.

SOBRIQUETS.

Berger, Shepherd.
Griſegonnelle, Gray-coat.
Taſte de Eſtoupe, Head of Tow.
Arbuſte, a Shurb.
Martoll, a Hammer.
Grandebœuf, Ox-face.
La Zouch, Branch upon a Stem.
Houlette, a Sheep-Hook.
Hapkin, Hatchet.
Chapelle, Hood.
Sans-terre, Lackland.
Malduit, Ill taught.
Geffard, Jeuvencas, or Heyfer.
Filz de Fleau, Son of a Flail.
Plantageneſt, the Plant or Stalk of a Broom.

After this manner & long after, King Hen. II. the Heir and Succeſſor of this Earl Fulko, was injoyn'd by the Pope to go to the Holy-Land and to fight againſt the Infidels, Hoveud. Rival. &c.

And under the Name and Habit of a Broom-man, our Pilgrim perform'd this Penance, and took the Sobriquet of Plantageneſt from wearing a Stalk of Broom, or Plant of Geneſt; this is generally receiv'd, but the Time and Reaſon neither ſet down nor rendred by any of our Heralds and Antiquaries, French or Engliſh; for the time when he performed this, I obſerve 'twas about the Year of our Lord One Thouſand certainly. But for the particular Reaſon this Count had to chuſe the Geneſt Plant, or Broom-ſtalk, before any other Vigetable or Thing, I ſhall lay down that Opinion which is my own, noting for a Circumſtance by the way, that the Broom in Hieroglyphical Learning is the Symbol of Humility; and the Poets, particularly Virgil the beſt of Poets, gives it the Epithet of humilis, humiles Geniſta; and the Etymologiſts derive it from Genu the Knee, the Part moſt apply'd, and as it were dedicate to the chief Act of Reverence, Kneeling; to which the Natural Philoſophers ſay, there is ſo Mutual a Correſpondency, and ſo Natural a Sympathy between Genu and Geniſta, that of all other Plants or Vegetables, it is moſt comfortable and Medicinable to the Pains and Diſeaſes of the Knees. Pliny a great Maſter amongſt them ſaith, Geniſta tuſcæ, cum, &c. Genua dolentia ſanat.

Leon. Fuſchius.

Pliu. lib. 24. cap. 9.

But the moſt conſiderable Reaſon is, as I conceive it, from the uſe he was conſtrain'd to make of the Twigs of Broom when he came to be ſcourged at Jeruſalem, the Place neceſſitating the uſe of them to that purpoſe, being (as Strabo relates) a Stony, Sandy and Barren Soil, only natural and grateful to the Geneſt, as the Watry and Moiſt to the Birch, Willow and Withy, of which there cou'd be none there for that reaſon. And from hence it muſt moſt conjecturally take the beginning of that Honour, which afterward his Princely and Noble Poſterities continued for their Sirname, who became Dukes and Princes in ſundry places, and ſome of them Kings of England, France, Scotland, and Ireland; and (as the People of that Age verily believ'd by their obſervation) were the more Proſperous and Happy for his ſake.

Strabo, lib. 16.

Du Haillon.

For the continuance of the Name, ſome (who pretend to ſee further and better in the Dark than others as clear ſighted) would have it taken of late time, and not uſed by the Kings and Princes of England, of the Angeume Race. But there are many Proofs to be adduced againſt them: Let us look into Mr. Brook's Genealogies of England, we ſhall find nothing more obvious and frequent in the Deductions of thoſe Princes of the Houſe of Anjou, than the Addition and Sirname of Plantagenet, Edm. Plantagenet, Geo. Plantagenet, John Plantagenet, Edw. Plantagenet, Lyonell Plantagenet, Humphrey Plantagenet, &c. In the French Hiſtorians and Antiquaries, Ion de Tillet, Girard du Haillon, Claude Paradio, & Iean Baron de la Hay, we ſhall often meet with Geoffry Plantagenet, Arthur Plantagenet, Richard Plantagenet, and diverſe the like, all of the firſt Age, when the Angeume Princes firſt became Engliſh, and ſome before. Mr. Cambden alſo in his Immortal Britannia, mentioneth ſome very ancient; as Richard Plantagenet, John Plantagenet, &c. And witneſſeth, that the forenamed Geoffry Plantagenet uſed to wear a Broom-ſtalk in his Bonnet, as many Nobles of the Houſe of Anjou did, and took it for their chief Sirname. It might be added, that theſe Earls of Anjou were deſcended out of the Great Houſe of Saxony in Germany, which hath brought forth many Kings, Emperors and Dukes; and that they were of Kindred and Alliance to the ancient Kings of France, and ſundry other Princes. But I will cloſe here for the High Nobility of King Richard, as the good old Poet did for another Heroical Perſon,

In his Catalogue of Honour.

——Deus eſt utroque Parente. Ovid.

Deus i. Rex a King.

By either Parent Born a God.

and come to the other Matters of his Private Story; And firſt for his Birth and Native Place, which was in the Caſtle of Forthringay, or as ſome write, rhe Caſtle of Birkhamſteed, both Caſtles and Honours of the Duke his Father, about the Year of our Lord 1450, which I diſcover by the Calculation of the Birth, Reign, and Death of King Edward his Brother, who was Born about 1441, or 1442. and Reigned Two and Twenty Years, Died at the Age of One and Forty, Anno 1483. The Dutcheſs of York, their Mother, had Five Children betwxt them, ſo that Richard could not be leſs than Seven or Eight Years younger than King Edward, and he ſurviv'd him not fully Three Years.

This Richard Plantagenet, and the other Children of Richard Duke of York, were Brought up in Yorkſhire and Northamptonſhire, but lived for the moſt part in the Caſtle of Midelham in Yorkſhire, until the Duke their Father, and his Son Edmond Plantagenet, Earl of Rutland, were Slain in the Battle of Wakefield. Ann. (c) Dom. 1461, upon which the Dutcheſs of York, their Mother, (having cauſe to fear the Faction of Lancaſter, which was now grown very exalting and ſtrong, and of a Mortal Enmity to the Houſe of York) ſecretly convey'd her Two younger Sons, George and Richard Plantagenet (who was then about ſome Ten Years old) into the Low-Countries, to their Aunt the Lady Magaret Dutcheſs of Burgundy, Wife of Charles Duke of Burgundy and Brabant and Earl of Flanders. They continued at Utrich, the Chief City then in Holland, where they had Princely and Liberal Education, until Edward Earl of March their Eldeſt Brother had reveng'd his Father's Death, and taken the Kingdom and Crown (as his Right) from Henry VI.

(c) He was Slain the 30th of December, 1460, as by Thins Hiſtory of Protectors is to be ſeen in Holinſhead, pag. 1080.

when

when he call'd Home his Two Brothers, and enters them into the Practice of Arms, to ſeaſon their Forwardneſs, and Honour of Knighthood, which he had beſtowe'd upon them; and ſoon after inveſts George in the Dutchy of Clarence and Earldom of Richmond, which Earldom he the rather beſtow'd upon him, to darken the young Earl of Richmond Henry Tudor. Richard had the Dukedom of Glouceſter and Earldom of Carliſle, as I have read in an old Manuſcript Story, which Creation the Heralds don't allow: But whether he was Comes thereof after the ancient Roman underſtanding, that is Governour; or Comes, or Count, after the common taking it by us Engliſh, or others, that is, for a ſpecial Titular Lord, I will not take upon me to determine, but affirm I have read him Comes Carliolenſis.

Lib. Manuſ. in quarto apud D. Rob. Cotton. Comes, i. Præſes.

And after the Great Earl of Warwick and Salisbury, Rechard de Neville, was reconciled to the King's Favour, (d) George Duke of Clarence was married to the Lady Iſabel, or Elzabeth, the Eldeſt Daughter of that Earl, and Richard Duke of Glouceſter to the Lady Anne; which Ladies, by their Mother the Lady Anne de Beauchamp, Daughter and Heir of Sir Richard de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, were Heirs of that Earldom. But Anne, altho' the yoanger Siſter, was the better Woman, having been a little before married to Edward Plantagenet Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwal, only Son of King Henry the Sixth, and was now his Princeſs and Dowager, by whom Duke Richard had a Son call'd Edward, created Prince of Wales when his Father came to the Crown.

The Employment of this Duke was for the moſt part in the North, as the Country of his Birth, ſo more naturally affected by him; according to the Poet.

—— Natale ſolum dulcedine cunctos Mulcet. Ovid

Sooth'd with Sweet Charms, all love their Native Soil.

And there lay his Appanage and Patrimony, with a Great Eſtate of the Dutcheſs his Wife, of which the Seigniory of Penrith, vulgò Perith, in Cumberland was part where he much reſided, and Built or Repair'd moſt of the Caſtles, all that Northern Side generally honouring and affecting his Deportment, being Magnificent (to apply Sir Thomas Moore) ſomething above his Ability, which he expreſt moſt in his Hoſpitality. And ſurely, if Men are taken to the life beſt from their Actions, we ſhall find him in the Circle of a Character (not ſo commaculate and mix'd, as Paſſionate and Purblind Pens have daſh'd it) whilſt we ſquint not at thoſe Virtues in him, which make up other Princes abſolute: His Wiſdom and Courage had not then their Nicknames and Calumny as now, but drew the Eyes and Acknowledgment of the whole Kingdom towards him; and his Brother had a ſound Experience of his Fidelity and Conſtancy in divers Hazardous Congreſſes and Battles, through which he had faithfully follow'd his Fortune, and return'd all his Undertakings ſucceſsful: As Cambden in Cumberland.

Sir Will. Haward.

Purblind Quaſi Partblind.

at Barnet, where he entred ſo far and boldly into the Enemies Army, that Two of his Eſquires, Thomas Parr and John Milwater being neareſt to him were ſlain; yet by his own Valour he quit himſelf, and put moſt part of the Enemies to flight, the reſt to the Sword. With the like Valour he behaved himſelf at the Battel of Exon, Doncaſter, St. Albans, Blore-heath, Northampton, Mortimer's Croſs, and Tewkesbury. And it was then confeſt a very conſiderable Service to the State, his taking of the Famous Pirate Thomas Nevill, alias Faulconbridge, Earl of Kent, (e) with whom comply'd Sir Richard de Nevill Earl of Warwick, a near Kinſman to the Earl of Kent his Natural Father, which held him up in the better Eſteem, and whetted him to any Attempt. For this haughty Earl, who had drawn him from the Houſe of York (to which he had done Valiant Service not long before) to the Party of Henry the Sixth and his Lancaſtrian Faction; and fearing what Forces and Aid King Edward might have from beyond Sea, provides a warlike Fleet for the Narrow Seas, of which this Faulconbridge was appointed Admiral, with Commiſſion to Take or Sink all Ships he met, either of the King's Friends or Subjects, who did not underact it, but made many Depredations on the Coaſt, and put many to the Sword becoming an Enemy the more conſiderable, King Edward finding (as the Caſe ſtood then with him) his Attempts by Sea wou'd be of too weak a proof to ſurprize him, which the Duke of Glouceſter contrived by an Advertiſement he had of his Private ſtealth into ſeveral of the Parts, ſometimes where he had recourſe to ſome Abetters of that Faction, and coming to Shore at Southampton, by a ready Ambuſh ſeiz'd and apprehended him, from whence he was convey'd to London, ſo to Middleham Caſtle, and after he had told ſome Tales, put to Death (f). And while he continued in the Northern Parts, he Govern'd thoſe Countries with great Wiſdom and Juſtice; preſerving the Concord and Amity between the Scots and Engliſh, tho' the Breaches were not to be made up with any Strength and Continuance, the Borders living out of the Mutal Spoiles and Common Rapines, ever prompt for any Cauſe that might beget Brauls and Feuds. And in the laſt Year of the Reign of the King his Brother, the Quarrels grew ſo outragious and hoſtile, that nothing cou'd compoſe them, but the Sword and Open War, ariſing from an unjuſt detaining the Tribute, as Polidore writeth.

1482.

The Baſtard Faulconbridge.

An Army ſent into Scotland under the Duke of Glouceſter.

King Edward took it very ill at the Hands of James IV. King of Scotland, that he refuſed to pay the Tribute whereunto he was bound by Covenant; and therefore reſolv'd by Arms to compel him to it: But King Edward being diſtracted with a Jealous Care and Watching of France, neglected that Buſineſs of Scotland, and in the mean time Alexander Duke of Albany, Brother to King James, pretending earneſt Buſineſs in France, makes England in his way, and inſtigates King Edward to put on Arms againſt his Brother, promiſing to return ſhortly out of France, and raiſe a Power in Scotland for his Aid: Here-1482.

(d) This is ſo erroneous, that the Earl of Warwick was at Open Variance with the King, and had prevailed on the Duke of Clarence, who was Poor, by Offers of this Match to forſake King Edward's Intereſt, and joyn with the Earl againſt his own Brother; upon which the Duke went over with him to Calais, married his Daughter, returned with him to England and expell'd his Brother the Kingdom. Habington's Edward IV. p. 48.

(e) This Thomas was never Earl of Kent, but Baſtard Son of William Nevill Earl of Kent, who was Lord Faulconbridge before King Edw. IV. created him Earl of Kent.

(f) This Story is told quite another way by Habington. Faulconbridge came to London with his Forces, Attacked the City, was forc'd to retire, got into Sandwich with 900 Men, fortify'd the Town, and yielded it at laſt on Terms of Pardon, brought by this Duke of Glouceſter, which were violated, and Nevill being apprehended at Southampton, was Executed, tho' he pleaded That his Name was particularly inſerted in the Sandwhich Pardon. The Duke of Glouceſter did not apprehend him. Hab. 109.

upon

1482. upon the King reſolv'd it, and ſent the Duke of Glouceſter with a good Army into Scotland, who march'd Maſter of the Field near to Berwick, having a little before ſent Sir Thomas Stanley to Beſiege it, and ſoon after took it himſelf. But the Duke of Albany failed him, and had underhand ſtruck up a Peace with his Brother of Scotland; yet Richard of Glouceſter accompliſh'd the Expedition very honourably and happily: Thus Polidore.

Anno 24. Edw. 4.

But to Enlarge what he reporteth deſertively, and abridgeth; King Edward, notwithſtanding that Negligence (noted by him) levied Strong Forces (the King of Scotland being as vigilant in that Buſineſs) and made the Duke of Glouceſter his General, under whom went Sir Henry Piercy Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Stanley, after Earl of Derby, the Lord Lovell, the Lord Grey of Greſtock, the Lord Scroope of Bolton, the Lord Fitzhugh, Sir William Parr of Roſe, a Noble and Valiant Gentleman, Father of the Lord Parr of Roſe, Kendal and Fitzhugh, and Grandfather to Sir William Parr Earl of Eſſex and Marqueſs of Northampton, Sir Edward Woodville Lord Rivers Brother to the Queen Elizabeth, with many other of Eminency and Noble Quality.

The Duke march'd firſt with his Army to the Borders and Frontiers of Scotland, giving the Overthrow to ſuch as reſiſted; then made up to the Strong Town of Berwick, which at that Inſtant the King of Scotland poſſeſs'd by the Surrender of Henry VI. and had the like Succeſs with thoſe Troops of the Enemies he met and found about the Town. After a ſhort Siege, the Beſieged upon Summons and Parley, finding themſelves too weak to make good the Oppoſition, were eaſily perſwaded to be quiet, and ſafely rendring the Town and Caſtle upon very ſlender Conditions, as is recorded in the Chronicle of Croyland. Having placed a Governour and Garriſon in the Town, he continued his March towards Edenborough, with a Purpoſe to Beſiege and Sack it, but was met in the Half way by Ambaſſadors from thence, who, after a Favourable Audience and Acceſs craved, in the Name of their King and Nation implore a League, or at leaſt a Truce between the Kingdoms, offering ſo Fair Conditions for it, that the General, after a Deliberate Conſultation, granted to Suſpend or Intermit all Hoſtile Proceedings, with a Fair Entertainment to their Perſons, and a Publick Edict throughout the Army, That no Engliſh ſhould offer any Violence or Offence to any Scot or their Goods; and by this Provident Truce, that Ruddy Storm, which ſeem'd terrible to impend, was diverted and made a Calm Preface to the Famous League, afterwards concluded by him when he was King and James the Fourth of Scotland. But whilſt theſe Employments ſtaid him there, News arriv'd of King Edward's Death, and was mutter'd very doubtfully by ſome who had confidence and ground to ſuppoſe it haſten'd by Treachery. The Nobles at London, and in the South Parts ſpeedily call the Duke Home by their Private Letters and Free Approbation, to aſſume the Protection of the Kingdom, and Two Princes committed unto him by the King. Rex Edwardus IV. Filios ſuos Richardo Duci Gloceſtriæ, in tutelam moriens tradidit: as Polidore teſtifieth.

Chron. Croy.

1483.

The doubtful Death of King Edw. 4.

vid. lib. 4. The Duke of Glouceſter made Ld. Protector.

The Army and Affairs of thoſe Parts diſpos'd, he came to York, where he made a few Days ſtay to pay ſome religious Offices and Ceremonies to the Manes and Exequies of the Deceaſed King, ſo haſten'd to London, having in his Train (beſides his own ordinary Retinue) Six Hundred Voluntary Gentlemen of the North Parts, brave Horſemen and gallantly mounted; upon the Way he diſpatch'd certain Segual Meſſengers to the Young King (who was then at Ludlow-Caſtle in Wales) to provide for his Honourable Conduct to London, where he arriv'd not long after the Lord Protector, and was Magnificently Receiv'd and Lodg'd at the Biſhop's Palace: His Brother the Duke of York was then with the Queen Mother in the Palace at Weſtminſter, who out of a pretended Motherly Care (rather indeed her Policy) would not let him ſtir from her to ſee the King, who had deſired his Company, but inſtantly takes Sanctuary with him in the Abby. The Lord Protector ſollicites her by ſome Noblemen to ſend or bring him to the King; which ſhe peremptorily ſtood againſt, until Cardinal Bourchier Archbiſhop of Canterbury was made the Meſſenger; who ſo gravely and effectually perſwaded with her, that ſhe delivered him the Duke: After ſome Days reſpite in London-Houſe, the King, according to Ancient Cuſtom, was to remove Court to the Tower of London, the Caſtle Royal and Chief Houſe of Safety in the Kingdom, until the more weighty Affairs of the State, and ſuch Troubles (if any happen'd) as often intercedes the alterations of Reigns, were well diſpatch'd and compoſed (ſome threatning Evils of that kind being diſcover'd and extinguiſh'd before the Protector came to London); and until all things proper to his Coronation were in Preparation and Readineſs, the Lord Protector ſtill being near unto him with all Duty and Care, and did him Homage, as Honourable Philippe de Comines, le Duc de Glouceſter avoit fait homage à ſon Nepheu Comme à ſon Roy & ſouverain Seigneur; but this Teſtimy, being avouch'd by one who loved not the Protector, may leave more credit; who ſays, When the Young King approach'd towards London, the Lord Protector, his Uncle, rode bare-headed before him; and in paſſing along, ſaid with a Loud Voice to the People, Behold your Prince and Sovereign; to which the Prior of Croyland, who lived in thoſe Days, reporteth Richardus, Protector nihil reverentiæ, quod capite nudato, genu Flecto aliove quolibet corporis habitu in ſubdito exegit, Regi Nepoti ſuo facere diſtulit aut recuſavit: And why ſhould theſe Services and his Conſtancy be judg'd leſs real to the Son than to the Father, his Care and Providence looking pregnantly through all Turns that concern'd him and his State; and therefore timely removed ſuch of Danger as were vehemently ſuſpected for their Ambition and Inſolent Aſſuming Power and Authority not proper to them, and ſo ſtood Ill Affected to their Prince, and Turbulent Maligners of the Government. And thus his Strict Juſtice to ſome, begat the Envy of others, as it fell out in the time of King Edward between thoſe of the Blood Royal (with whom the ancient Barons ſided) and the Regiſts, who being ſtubborn, haughty, and incompatible of the others Nearneſs to the King, ſtir'd up Competitions and Turbulencies among the Nobles, and became ſo inſolent and publick in their Pride and Outrages towards the People, that they forc'd their Murmurs at length to bring forth Mutiny againſt them: But finding the King's Inclination gentle on that ſide, they ſo temper'd it, as they durſt extend their Malice to the Prince of the Blood and Chief Nobility; many times by Slanders and Falſe Suggeſtions, privately incenſing the King againſt them, who ſuffer'd their Inſinuations too far, whilſt his Credulity ſtood abuſed, and his Favour 1483.

Phil. de Comines in Lud 11.

Sir Thomas Moore.

Chronic. Abbat. Croy.

The Inſolency of the Queen's Kindred.

1483. vour often alienated from thoſe, whoſe Innocence could underſtand no cauſe for it. The Engines of thoſe Intruſions and Supplantations were the Greys, the Woodvills, and their Kinſmen, who held a Strong Belief, to have better'd their Power with the Young King their Kinſman, and then they might have acted their Rodomontades and Injuries in a higher ſtrain, remov'd the Prince of the Blood, and ſet up what Limits they pleas'd to their Faction and Power during the Minority of the King, and after too, whilſt the Queen Mother could Uſurp or hold any Superintendency upon the Sovereignty, or her Son. Theſe things, and the Miſchiefs that ſeem'd to ſuperimpend the State, equally pois'd and conſulted by the Lord Protector, and others of the Principal Nobility, it was reſolv'd, to give a timely Remedy or Period to them; all which Sir Thomas Moor acknowledgeth, and confeſſeth the Nobles of the Kingdom had reaſon to ſuſpect and fear the Queen's Kindred would put their Power more forward when their Kinſman came to be King, than in his Father's time, altho' then their Inſolencies were intolerable. And this Author further acknowledgeth, there had been a long Grudge and Heart-burning between the King and Queen's Kindred in the time of K. Edward; which the King, altho' he were partial for the Queen's Faction, was earneſt to reconcile, but could not: And after he was dead, the Lord Grey, Marqueſs Dorſet, the Lord Richard Grey, and the Lord Rivers, made full account to ſway the Young King: and having learn'd it was beſt Fiſhing in a Troubled Stream, threw all occaſions of Diſſentions amonſt the Great Men of this Kingdom, that ſo, whilſt the other Nobles were buſie in their own Quarrels, they might take an opportunity to Aſſault and Supplant where they hated. And for proviſion towards the Deſign, the Marqueſs had ſecretly gain'd a Great quantity of the King's Treaſure out of the Tower, and the Woodvilles made Good Preparations of Arms; of which ſome were met with by the Way, as they were convey'd cloſe pack'd in Carts. It was therefore high time for the Protector and Ancient Nobility to look circumſpectly about them, and faſten on all occaſions that might prevent ſuch growing Treacheries, which could be no way but by taking off their Heads. Which being reſolv'd, the Marqueſs of Dorſet, the Lord Richard Grey their Uncle, Sir Anthony Woodville Lord Rivers, and ſome other of that Kindred and Faction were Apprehended, and at Pomfract Executed: (only the Marqueſs, by ſome Private Notice given him, fled and took Sanctuary). At the ſame time the Lord Haſtings (who much favour'd the Queen and her Party, eſpecially the Marqueſs, therefore the more to be ſuſpected dangerous) was Arreſted for High Treaſon, and in the Tower upon the Green had his Head chopt off; an Act of more ſtrange and ſevere Appearance than the other, having the eſteem of a Good Subject, and generally ſuppos'd much Affectionate to the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham. And Sir Thomas Moor reported, that the Protector was moſt unwilling to have loſt him, but that he ſaw him joyning with their Enemies, and ſo his life had ill requited Them and their Purpoſe: this was a Dilemma; but what that Purpoſe was, and what they had in Agitation at that inſtant, is not diſertly ſaid, only from other Places of the Story. And thoſe which follow Sir Thomas Moor, it may be conceiv'd, they doubted him for his Affectation of the Sovereignity, and ſome Practice againſt the King and his Brother, for thoſe be the Charges they preſs upon him, altho' tis neither Said nor Sir Thomas Moor, in Edward 5. Richard 3.

Lord Haſtings.

Sir Thomas Moor.

Made Good by any Direct and Juſt Proof. But admit he was now grown Jealous of him, and ſent Sir William Catesby, a Man in great credit with the Lord Haſtings, to ſound what Opinion he held of that Title and Claim he might lay to the Crown, who (preſuming upon Catesby's Gratitude and Truſt that had been advanced by him) without Circumſtance, and even with Indignation expreſs'd an utter Miſlike thereof, and engag'd Himſelf, his Uttermoſt Power and Ability againſt it, peremptorily adding, "He had ra- "ther ſee the Death and Deſtruction of the Pro- "tector and Duke of Buckingham, than the Young "King depriv'd of the Crown: Which Reply, Catesby (being more juſt to his Employment than honour to his Point) returns the Protector, who laid hold upon the next Occaſion to ſeize his Head, which is the greateſt and bloodieſt Crime that brings any Proof againſt him; and yet not ſo clear, but that there may be ſome other State Myſtery or Fraud ſuſpected in it. Let us leave it upon that account, and but conſider how much more we forgive the Fames of H. I. E. III. H. IV. E. IV. H. VII. becauſe they had their Happy Stars and Succeſs; and then, Proſperum ſcelus virtus vocatur, there is Applauſe goes with the Act and Actor. Julius Cæſar, was, and ever will be reputed a Wiſe and a Great Captain, altho' his Emulation coſt an infinite quantity of Excellent Humane Blood, and his Nephew Oct. Auguſtus never ceas'd Proſcribing, Baniſhing and Maſſacring, until he had diſpatch'd all his Proud Emulators: Julius Cæſar thought it, Crimen ſacrum vel crimen Regale; or, Crimen ſacrum Ambitio: Whoſe Rule was,

Cic. lib. 3. de Offic. & Suet. in vitâ Julii Cæſaris.

Si violandum eſt juſt, regnandi gratia
Violandum eſt, aliis rebus pietatem colas.

If Right for ought may e'er be violate,
It muſt be only for a Sovereign State.

Drawing it from that Rule (tho' Apocrypha) in Euripides,

Eurip. in Phœniſſ.

Εἴπερ γὰρ ἀδικεῖν χρὴ τυράννιδος πέρι
Κάλλιστον ἀδικεῖν τ' ἄλλα δ' εὐσεβεῖν χρεών.

Si injuſte agere oportet, pro tyrannide (aut Regno) pulcherrimum eſt injuſte agere, in altis pietatem colere expedit.

And Antonius Caracalla, alledged the Text to juſtifie the Killing of his Brother Geta his Collegue in the Empire. Polynices, the Brother of Eteocles, was of the ſame Religion, and ſaid, A Kingdom could not be bought at too high a Rate, put in Friends, Kindred, Wife and Riches: Via ad potentiam eſt tollere Æmulos & premere Adverſaries, which the great Maſter of Axioms allowed, hath been countenanced by many great Examples of State-reaſon, and Policy in all times, even ſince the Ogygian Age. For an old Obſervation, and general in all foreign Countries ſaith, Axiom Pol. lit.

———— Regnum furto
Et fraude ademptum antiquum eſt ſpecimen imperii.

Senec. in Trag.

By Fraud or Theft to ſeize a Crown,
Is the old Game, long ſince to Princes known.

So King Atreus, by his own Experience could ſay;

——Us

1483. ——— Ut nemo doceat fraudis & sceleris vias, Regnum docebit.

Dominion teaches every Wicked Art.

But what those Ages call'd Valour, Wisdom and Policy, in those great Scholars of State, who with Credit practised their Artes Imperii, and Rules of Empire, comes not under the License or Warrant of our Christian Times; yet we may speak thus much for Richard (to those who cry him so deep an Homicide) that he had either more Conscience or less Cruelty than they attribute to him, that by the same Act of Power could not secure himself of others he had as Just cause to fear; especially Jasper Earl of Pembroke, his Nephew Richmond, and the subtle Doctor Morton, who was extreamly his Enemy, and the Chief Instrument that secretly mov'd against him. And altho' the King had no certain notice which way his Engins wrought, yet he knew enough to suspect him for, and to remove him from the Council-table unto the Custody of the Duke of Buckingham, the Man he had reason to suppose nearest to his Trust, though his Expectation leaned on a broken Reed there; for the Duke was now secretly in his Heart defected from the King, and become Male-content: Morton but touch'd his Pulse, and knew how the Distemper lay, which he irritated into such Sparklings as gave him Notice where his Constitution was most apt and prepared; yea, so subtilly mastered it, that he had leave to steal from Brecknock Castle to Ely, so for good store of Coin found safe passage into France, whither his desires vehemently carried him, in hopes to fashion the Earl of Richmond to his Plot; and under pretence of a Lancastrian Title, to stir him to take up Arms and invade England, with the Assurance of many mighty Friends here, which would make the Design of an easie and quick dispatch; nor forgot he how much Artificial and Eloquent Perswasions add to the Blaze of Ambition, knowing the Earl's Temper like other Mens in that, and observing him with a kind of pleasure listen, he gave such a studied glosse and superlation to the Text, that the Earl was now so full of Encouragement and Hope for the Invasion, that their purposes spread as well into England as in France. The Protector having also certain Intelligence of some particular Designs, disposed himself in his Actions more closely, and knew what Friends and Confederates had engag'd themselves to Richmond, who yet kept a Face of Love and Fidelity towards him, as did the Duke of Buckingham and the Countess of Richmond, who appear'd in this Instant an earnest Suitor to reconcile her Son into favour; and that the King would be pleased to bestow on him any of King Edward the Fourth's Daughters. But this took not the Vigilancy of his Eye from him and his Party, the Cause being of Greater Danger and Apprehension now, than in King Edward's time; for the Earl had drawn unto him many of the English Nobility and Gentry; and some Foreign Princes had in favour to him promised their Aids. But in the time of King Edward, his Title and He was so little understood by his Blood of Lancaster, and the better judging-sort of the English Nobility and Gentry, King Lewis the Eleventh of France, Francis the Second Duke of Brittain, and other Foreign Princes look'd very slightly upon it. And yet, as John Harding observ'd, the King might be Jealous of him, being given out for and Heir of the House of Lancaster, and Nephew to Henry the Sixth: With this he consider'd, that some Foreign Princes stood not well-affected to him; or that some at home, envying his House and Posterity, would catch at any Spark to trouble his Peace and kindle a Sedition; therefore he had good reason to think, that as his Liberty might make these Beginnings more popular, so their Ends more dangerous and ingreatful (the Vulgar tasting all things by the Ear, and judging by the Noise) which he sought early to prevent.

Artes imperii.

1483.

For Philip Comines reports, When he first came to know this Earl, he was then a Prisoner in Brittain, and told him, He had been either in Prison, or under Strict Command from Five Years old, which is not unlikely; for I find him but young when he was committed to the Custody of Sir William Herbert, Lord of Ragland-Castle in Monmouthshire, where he continued not long; for Jasper Earl of Pembrook, who was Uncle unto him (being then in France, whither he had fled after the Overthrow of the Lancastrians at Tewksbury) (as John Stow) having advertisement that his Nephew was under Sir William Herbert's Custody, with whom he had Alliance and Friendship, came secretly out of France into Wales, and at Ragland-Castle found only the Lady Herbert, her Husband being with the King; in whose Absence, the Earl practised so cunningly with her, that he got his Nephew from thence, and convey'd him to his own Castle of Pembrook, (the Young Earl's Native Place) presuming upon the Strength of it, and the Peoples Affection, but over-wean'd in his Opinion and Hope: For so soon as the King receiv'd notice of the Escape, Sir William Herbert was commanded to levy Forces and make towards them, a Man of a Wise and Valiant Disposition, descended from Herbertus, who was Chamberlain and Treasurer of the Kings, William Rufus and Henry Beauclerk, and was created Earl of Pembrook afterward: From this Noble Herbertus are descended the Herberts, Earls of Pembrook and Montgomery, and many other Welsh Gentlemen of that Sirname and Family.

The flight of Richmond with his Uncle Pembrook.

The Earl of Richmond born in Pembrook-Castle.

The Two Earls being inform'd of his Approaches and Strength, distrusting their own, fled by Night, and posted to the Port of Timby, where they kept close until a fit Opportunity offer'd them Transportation for France, intending to see the Court there, where the Earl of Pembrook had not long before receiv'd a very favourable Entertainment. But a violent Storm diverted their Course, and run them upon the Coasts of Little Brittain, which fell out as a Sad Disaster, and Cross to them and their Design for a long time after, the Duke of Brittain being no Friend to it; but at the Port of St. Maloes they must Land. What Success they met with in this Flight (and other Noble Englishmen which follow'd the Unlucky Party of Henry VI. being constrain'd when he was overthrown by Edward IV. to fly) will fall into our Discourse hereafter: There is this Memorial in the Stories of Brittain.

This Flight of theirs was in An. 11 Ed. IV. John Stow.

Plusieurs du Seigneurs d' Angleterre qui tenoyent la partie du Roy H. VI. sen fairent par mer hors du Royaulme & entr' autres le Conte du Pembrook faisant sauuè un jeune Prince de Angleterre nommé Henry Conte du Richmond.

Whilst these Earls made some stay in St. Maloe to refresh themselves, Francis the Second Duke of Brittain had notice of their Landing, who sent as speedily a Command to the Governour to Arrest them both into Safe Custody; an Act, as it appear'd, both Strange and injurious, being Subjects to a Prince with whom the Duke had League. But for a better Gloss, he had found a considerable Earl of Richmond Prisoner in Brittain.

1485 rable Clause to detain the Earl of Richmond until he had receiv'd Satisfaction of him for Usurping and Holding the Title and Estate of Richmond, belonging to the ancient Dukes of Brittain, (whose Heir and Successor he was) though dissei'sed by the space of Thirty Years, now he wou'd expect either Restitution or Compensation for it; and the better to assure himself, he conveys them with a good Guard to the Castle of Vanes, where himself often resided, continuing a more cautious and strict Eye upon the Earl of Richmond, as Nephew to Henry VI. and he that laid Claim to the Title and Crown of England by the Blood of Lancaster: For which he made their Imprisonment more honourable, as Philip Comines saith, Le Duc les traitté doucement pour Prisonniers. And Jean Froisard calls it, Prison Courtoise; for the Duke had well considered what Expectation and Use he might raise by them, and knew the News cou'd not be distasteful to the King of England, whose Throne had been threatned so much by the Earl of Richmond's Liberty; and therefore, from hence he hop'd an answerable Benefit, and to contract the King in a Firm Amity and Acknowledgment unto him; nay, which is further, (if we may believe Jac. Nyerus) he thought by this occasion to bear the Reins so hard upon King Edward, as that he shou'd not dare to make any Breach with him, propter Henricum Richmondiæ Comitem non audebat Anglus ab amicitia Brittani discedere.

The last D. of Brittain, who was Earl of Richmond, and possessed of the Earldom, was John de Mountfort, who flourished Anno Dom. 1440. and had Sons but not Earls of Richmond, as Robert Glou. writeth, and now this Francis I. renew'd the Claim which was about 30 Years after John de Montfort Duke of Brittain.

Jac. Nyerus in Annal Bland. lib. 17.

Nor was this Author much mistaken, for the King would have accorded to any reasonable thing to purchase the Earl into his Hands; and it was no little Perplexity to him when he heard of their Flight, but was the better calm'd when he understood where they were, the Duke of Brittain being his Friend and Allie, in whom he supposed so near an Interest (set off by some other Conditions) that he saw a Fair Encouragement to demand and gain them both; whereas, had they fal'n into France, he must have expected the greatest Disadvantage cou'd have been contrived out of such an occasion. For Lewis, tho' he were then in Truce and League with him, was meerly a Politician, and studied only his own Ends, yet fears him as a King famous for his Prowess and Victories, and as ably supply'd in his Coffers for all Undertakings: But (which did equally quicken the Hate, as well as Fear of France) had threatned to enter it with Fire and Sword, for the Re-conquest of the Dutchy of Normandy and Aquitaine, the Counties of Poictou and Turain; wherefore we may believe that bears the credit of an Oracle, which good Ennius said:

King Edward treatech for the delivery of Richmond.

Ennius apud Cic. in Offic.

——— Quem metuunt oderunt,
Quem oderunt, periisse expetunt.
——— Whom Men Fear they Hate,
And whom they Hate they seek to Ruin.

And doubtless in his Heart he was favourable to any Chance that might have Ruin'd or Infested England, and cou'd have wish'd the Earl of Richmond and his Title under his Protection. King Edward seasonably prevented this, that such Attempts, tho' at first they appear'd but like the Prophet's Cloud, might not spread after into a Spacious Storm. And to prevent all underhand Contracts with the Duke of Brittain, dispatch'd Letters unto him, further interpreted by a Rich Present, and Richer Promises. The Duke receives both with as Honourable Complement, protesting none cou'd be more ready to do the King of England's Commands than he. But where he treated for the Delivery of the Earls, he hop'd to be lawfully excused, being an Act would cast a Strain and Scandal, not only upon his Credit and Honour, but upon all Princely and Hospitable Privileges; and cou'd appear no less than a mere Impiety, to thrust such distressed Persons as fled to their Protection, into the Arms of their Enemies; and it was his Opinion, if any Malice or Violence shou'd be acted upon them, the Guilt must reflect on him. But that the King might believe he was forward to come as near his Desires, as in honour cou'd be, he engag'd himself to keep so careful and vigilant a Watch upon 'em, that they shou'd have no more Power to Endanger him, than if they were in strict Prison. This being return'd, tho' not agreeable to the King's Hope and Wishes, yet bearing such a Caution of Honour and Wisdom, he remain'd satisfied; and so it paused for the space of Eight Years, (as I conjecture) for the King made this Demand in the Twelfth Year of his Reign. 1472. all which time he was very intent to preserve the League with good Sums of Money and costly Presents. In the Twentieth of his Reign, 1480, he receiv'd Intelligence, that the Earl of Richmond had stirr'd up Fresh Embers and New Friends in the French Court to blow them; and that the French King had dealt, by the Sollicitation of the Earl of Pembrook, and others, privately to get the Earl of Richmond, and offer'd Great Sums to the Duke of Brittain. This gave new Disturbance, and the King must now, by the best means he cou'd, renew his former Sute to the Duke of Brittain; for which Employment he intrusts Doctor Stillington Bishop of Bath, his Secretary, a Man of a Wise, Learned and Eloquent Endeavour, of good Acquaintance and Credit with the Duke of Brittain, who gave him an Honourable and Respective Entertainment. The Bishop (after he had prepared him by the Earnest of a very Rich Present) tenders the Sum of his Employment, not forgetting what he was now to Act and what to Promise on the King's Part: And (for a more glorious Insinuation) tells him how the King had elected him into the Noble Society of St. George's Order (as the most honourable Intimation he cou'd give of his Love) to qualify all Exceptions too and Jealousies, assures him, the King had no Intent to the Earl of Richmond, but what was answerable to his own Worth, and Quality of the King's Kinsman; having declared a Propensity and Purpose to bestow one of his Daughters upon him. The Duke well mollified and perswaded, deliver'd the Earl by a strong Guard to the Bishop at St. Maloes Port: a Change of much Passion and Amazement to him, whose Sufferings took hold upon the affable Disposition of the Noble Peir de Landois Treasurer to the Duke, who had the Earl in Charge and Conduct, to St. Malo. He urges the Cause from him of his so altered and present Condition, with Protestation of all the Aid he could. The Earl thus fairly and happily provok'd (and perceiving the sparkles of his Sorrow had hapt into a tender Bosom) freely exposed himself, and with such an overcoming Countenance of Tears and Sighs, fram'd his own Story, and press'd Landois, that it so wrought upon his Temper he perswaded the Earl to put on clearer hopes, assures him there should some means be found to shift the Tempest; thereupon writes a sad Relation to the Duke, to move his Compassion and Favour, and knowing the Baron Chandais, (a Great Man in credit with him) well affected to the Earl by a long and reciprocal Affection, he repair'd to his House near St. Moloe, and prevail'd with him to use his 1483.

Hist. de Brit.

Dr. Stillington sent for Richmond.

King Edw. IV. sends for Richmond.

1483. Power with the Duke for returning the Earl; who posted to Vanes, where the Court was then, and took the Duke at such an Advantage, by suggesting his Credulity abused, and cunningly drawn into this Contract by the King, that there was a Post dispatch'd to stay the Earl. In that interim, Landois had not been idle, to find a way to let the Earl Escape into the Abby Church of St. Malo, where he claim'd the Benefit of the Holy Asyle, which was easily contriv'd, by Corrupting his Keepers. But the Duke to stand clear of the King's Suspicion, sent over Maurice Brumell to satisfie him, that the Earl according to promise was sent to St. Malo, there deliver'd to his Servants deputed, whose negligence let him escape; and that he had demanded him of the Convent, who deny'd to render him without Security and Caution; and that he should be continued a Prisoner in Vanes with as much Courtesy as formerly. Now being it was fall'n into those Strict and Peremptory Terms, and within the Contumacy of such Lawless Persons, where he could not use Power, he yet faithfully protested no suit from the French King, or any other, should draw him from his former Promise: All which he religiously perform'd, whilst King Edward liv'd, the space of Twelve Years, (after Philip de Comines) in which circle of time, it may with admiration be observ'd, thro' what Changes and Interchanges of Hazards, Dangers and Difficulties he was preserv'd. Soon after King Edward's Decease, King Richard renew'd and continu'd the Treaty by Sir Thomas Hutton of Yorkshire, receiving the same Satisfaction in answer, but was fail'd in the performance, and so dishonourably, that it then appear'd the Duke had kept in with Edward, more for Fear than for Love or Honour (the Name of Edward and the Earl of March, being, indeed, accounted terrible, where his Victorious Sword was drawn) which Breach of the Duke was not left unpunish'd (at least as that Age then gues's'd) by a Divine Revenge; for having married Margaret, Daughter and Co-heir of Francis de Mountford Duke of Brittain, she dying without Issue, he married Margaret Daughter of Gaston de Foix King of Navarre, by whom he had One Daughter Anne, married to the French King Charles VIII. Thus Duke Francis died without Issue Male, and the Dutchy being swallow'd up and drown'd in the Lillies or Crapands of France, and with his Family of Brittain irrecoverably lost and absorped. Thus much for the Jealousie and Fears of these Two Kings †.

1483.

K. Rich. reneweth suit to the Duke of Brittain for the E. of Richm.

E. IV. Fulmen belli, ut Seleuc. Rex inde κεραυνὸς, i. fulmen dictus. Claud. Paradin.

But

† The Stile, Condition and Authority of Duke Richard, while he was only Protector, and his acknowledged Obedience to his Nephew King Edward V. will appear by this Letter taken out of the Original Journal Book. And the formal Manner of his taking the Kingdom from his said Nephew, will be plainly seen by some Instructions given to certain Commissioners sent to the Lord Dynham Lord Deputy of Calais, from the same Journal. The Duke's Letter was as followeth.

" Richard Duc of Gloucester, Brother and Uncle of Kinges, Protectour and Defensour, gret Chambreleyn, Constable " and Admiral of England: To our right wellbeloved Robert Pemberton Squier, Greting. And on the King our So- " verayn Lords behalve, we charge you that Incontinent, upon the sight hereof, yee do entre into the Lordshipps of " Wennyngton, and all other the Lands and Tenements to the same appertenyng, within the Countees of Bedford and " Northampton; of which we by these presents graunt and committe unto you the Rule and Keeping, and the Resseit of " the said Lordships, Lands and Tenements, during Our pleasseur: And wol therefore that ye so take upon you, and " see that al the Goods and Cattalles now being within the same, be put in suerte in our Behoove; and to make unto us " a true Inventory of the same in goodely hast: Discharging, in the Kinges Name and ours, al th' Officers of the same: " And that this be not failed, as ye wol have oure good Lordship. Yeven under oure Signet at the Cittee of London, " the XIX day of May, Anno primo Regis Edwardi Quinti.

The Instructions are as follow.

These be the Articles of Instructions geven to the L. Mountjoie, Maister John Cook Archdekyn of Lincoln, and Sir Tho. Thwaytes Kt. aunswering to the Lettre of the Lord Dynham, late direct unto the Kinges Grace, as then Protectour of England. Which Lettre resteth in four principal Poyntes.

" The first Article remembred the Othe which they of Calais, perteynyng to any of the thre Jurisdictons; that In- " continent upon the knawlege of the Death of King Edward IIII. (whom God assoil) comen unto them, made holy toge- " dre upon a Book, to be true unto King Edward V. his Son, as to their Liege Lord, and to kepe the Town, Castell and " Marches of Calais trusty to him: And to suffer no Man with Power to entre into the same, except the Kinges Persone, " or the Hastings then being the Kinges Lieutenant, and not without due Payment to be made to the Souldiers and " other Officers of al that to them shal be found due, for the save keeping of the said Town and Marches.

" As to that Article, it shal move beside, that howbeit suche othe of Ligeaunce was made sone upon the Deth of the " said King Edward IIII. to his Sone, not only at Calais, but also in divers places in England by many gret Astates and " Persones, being than ignorant of the verraye sure and true Title, which oure Soverayn Lord that now is King Rich- " ard the III. hath and had the same tyme to the Crowne of England; that Othe notwithstanding now every good " true English man is bound, upon knowlage had of the said verraye true Title, to depart from the first Othe so igno- " rantly given to him, to whom it apperteyneth not, and thereupon to make his Othe of newe, and owe his Service " and Fidelite to him, that good Lawe, Reason, and the concorde assent of the Lordes and Commons of the Royalme " have ordeigned to reigne upon the People, which is our said Soverayn Lord Kinge Richard III. brother to the said Kinge " Edward IIII. late deceassed, whom God Pardon: Whose sure and true Title is evidently shewed and declared in a Bil " of Petition, which the Lordes Spirituels and Temporells, and the Commons of the Land solempnely porrected unto " the Kinges Highness at London the XXVI day of Juyn. Whereupon the Kinges said Highnes notably assisted by wel " nere al the Lords Spirituel and Temporell of this Royalme, went the same day unto the Palais at Westminster, and " ther in such Roial Honourable apparrelled within the gret Hal ther toke Possession, and declared his Mind, that the same day " he wold begin to reygne upon his People. And from thence rode solempnly to the Cathedral Churche of London; " and was received ther with Procession, with gret Congratulacion and acclamacion of al the People in every place, and " by the weye that the King was in that day. The Copie of the which Bil the King wil to be sent unto Calais, and ther " to be redd and understanded rogredre with these presentes; Desiring right effectuously al maner persones of the said " three Jurisdictions, what astate, degre or condition they be of; and also them of Guysnes and Hammes, to make ther " Feithes and Othes to him, as to thair Soverayn Lorde; like as the Lordes Spirituels and Temporells, and many other " Noblemen in gret numbre, being in England, frely and of goode hert, have done, for ther partes: And that the said " Towne of Calais, al Castells and Fortresses, being within the said Marches, they wil saufly kepe unto the behoove of our " said Lord King Richard the III. and them not deliver to any Persone, but by his Commandement onely, &c. J. S.

These Resolutions of dethroning K. Edward V. and of making Richard King were very suddenly taken, or else the Players of this Game carryed on their Business very secretly to amuse the People. For the Day of Edward's Coronation was set, which was to be the 21st Day of June. And all solemn Preparation was making for that Purpose, til near the said Day King Edward with the Advice and Order of his Uncle Richard the Protector, appoints and summoneth the Gentlemen that were to be knighted at his Coronation, sending to each of them a Letter to this Tenor, viz.

" To Otes Gilbert Esq; Trusty and Welbeloved, We Grete you well. And by the Advice of our deares Unkle, " the Duke of Gloucester Protector of this Our Royalme during our young Age, and the Lords of our Councel, we " write unto you at this time, Willing and ne the less charging you, to prepare and furnish your self to receive the " Noble Order of Knighthood at our Coronation: Which by Gods Grace we intend shall be Solempniz'd the one and " twentieth Day of this present Month at our Palace of Westminster; Commanding you to be here at our Tower of Lon- " don four Days afore our said Coronation, to have Communication with our Commissioners concerning the Matter: not " failing hereof in any Wise, as ye intend to please us, and as ye will answer. Yeven the 5 Day of June.

Semblable

1483. Semblable Letters were writ to John Speke, ——— Beaumont, Edward Courtney, Will. Carraunt, Tho. Arundel, Will. Bolney, Alex. Creſſenger, John Clopton, Hen. Haydon, John Wynkfeld, Chriſtoph. Willoughby, Ph. Colthorp, ——— Beddyngfeld, Tho. Lewknor, Will Barkley, John Stanley, ——— Grevyle, Will. Birmygham, Tho. Butteler, of Beawſey, John Beron, Will. Trowtbeck, ——— Mylbourn, the Lord Dormund, the Lord Stourton, ——— Cornwal Lord of Burford, Nevyle, Son and Heir of the Lord Bergaveny, John Breny of Stamford, the Lord Grey of Ruthyn, John Gefford, Will. Cheney of Shepey, Rob Whyte of South-Warneborow, Gervace Cliſton of Oddiſake, Nic. Lile, Will. Barkely of Beverſton, Henry Vernon, Nic. Mountgomery, and twelve more, one whereof was Henry Solet Alderman of London. J. S. 1483.

But now to the Progreſs of our Story, where the Barons and Commons with one General Diſlike, and an Univerſal Negative Voice, refuſed the Sons of King Edward, not for any Ill Will or Malice, but for their Diſabilities and Incapacities; the Opinions of thoſe Times too held them not Legitimate, and the Queen Elizabeth Gray, or Woodvill, no lawful Wife, nor yet a Woman worthy to be the King's Wife, by reaſon of her extream unequal Quality. For theſe and other Cauſes, the Barons and Prelates unanimouſly caſt their Election upon the Protector, as the moſt worthieſt, and neareſt, by the experience of his own Deſervings, and the ſtrength of his Alliance, importuning the Duke of Buckingham to become their Speaker, who accompanied with many of the Chief Lords, and other Grave and Learned Perſons, having Audience granted in the Great Chamber at Baynard's Caſtle, (then York-Houſe) thus addreſs'd him to the Lord Protector:

Bp. Morton, Sir T. Moor, Hollingſhead, Grafton, Stow, Hall. Virgil, &c. Parliam.

The Duke of Buckingham to the Protector in the behalf of the 3 Eſtates.

"SIR, May it pleaſe your Grace to be inform'd, that after much Grave Conſultation amongſt the Noble Barons; and other Worthy Perſons of this Realm, it ſtands concluded and reſolv'd, That the Sons of King Edward ſhall not reign; for who is not ſenſible, how Miſerable a Fortune, and Dangerous Eſtate that Kingdom muſt be in, where a Child is King, according to the Wiſe Man, Væ tibi terra cujus Rex eſt Puer. But here, Sir, there is Exception of further conſequence againſt them, That they were not born in lawful Marriage, the King having then another Wife living, Dame Elizabeth Butler: Beſides the great Diſhonour and Reproach he receiv'd by diſparaging his Royal Blood, with a Woman ſo far unmeet for his Bed. Theſe Conſiderations have reſolutely turn'd all their Eyes and Election towards your Grace, as only worthy of it, by your ſingular Virtues, and that Intereſt in the Crowns of England and of France, with the Rights and Titles, by the High Authority of Parliament, entail'd to the Royal Blood and Iſſue of Richard Duke of York, whoſe lawful begotten Son and Heir you are; which, by a Juſt Courſe of Inheritance and the Common Laws of this Land, is divolv'd and come to you. And unwilling that any Inferiour Blood ſhou'd have the Dominion of this Land, are fully determin'd to make your Grace King; to which, with all Willingneſs and Alacrity, the Lords and People of the Northern Parts concur. And the Mayor, Aldermen and Commons of the City of London, have all allow'd, and gladly embraced this general Choice of your Grace; and are come hither to beſeech you to accept their Juſt Election, of which they have choſen me their unworthy Advocate and Speaker. I muſt therefore again crave leave, in the behalf of all, to deſire your Grace will be pleaſed, in your Noble and Gracious Zeal to the Good of this Realm, to caſt your Eyes upon the growing Diſtreſſes and Decay of our Eſtate, and to ſet your happy Hand to the redreſs thereof; for which, we can conceive no Abler Remedy, than by your undertaking the Crown and Government, which we doubt not ſhall accrew to the Laud of God, the Profit of this Land, and your Grace's Happineſs.

The common publiſh'd Stories have Eliz. Lucy, but that is falſe.

This Speech of the Duke is recorded by Dr. Morton, Sir Thomas Moor, and other Chronicles and Hiſtorians, to which the Protector gave this Reply:

The Anſwer of the Lord Protector to the 3 Eſtates.

"MY moſt Noble Lords, and my moſt Loving Friends, and Dear Country-men, Albeit I muſt confeſs, your Requeſt moſt reſpective and favourable, and the Points and Neceſſities alledg'd and urg'd true and certain, yet for the Entire Love and Reverend Reſpect I owe to my Brother deceaſed and to his Children, my Princely Couſins, you muſt give me leave, more to regard mine Honour and Fame in other Realms; for where the Truth and Certain Proceedings herein are not known, it may be thought an Ambition in me to ſeek what you voluntarily proffer, which would charge ſo deep a Reproach and Stain upon my Honour and Sincerity, that I wou'd not bear for the World's Diadem: Beſides, you muſt not think me ignorant (for I have well obſerv'd it) there is more difficulty in the Government of a Kingdom, than Pleaſure; eſpecially to that Prince who wou'd uſe his Authority and Office as he ought. I muſt therefore deſire, that this (and my unfeigned Proteſtations) may aſſure you, the Crown was never my Aim, nor ſuits my Deſire with yours, in this; yet I ſhall think my ſelf much beholding unto you all in this Election of me, and that Hearty Love I find you bear me, and here proteſt, that for your ſakes it ſhall be all one, whether I be your King or no; for I will ſerve my Nephew faithfully and carefully, with my beſt Counſels and Endeavours, to defend and preſerve him and his Kingdom; nor ſhall there want readineſs in me, to attempt the Recovery of that Hereditary Right in France, which belongs to the King's of England, tho' of late negligently and unhappily loſt.

There the Protector became ſilent and thought it not ſafe in his Diſcretion or Policy, to open all the Diſguſts he had of the Sovereignity, for that wou'd have been Matter of Exprobration of the Barons, and touch'd too near the Quick, tho' he had well obſerv'd, by ſundry Experiences of the Leading Times, and Modern too, the inconſtant ebbing and flowing of their Diſpoſitions, how variable and apt they were to take up any occaſion of Change, purſuing their Kings (if once ſtirr'd) ſo implacably, that many times they never left without Death or Depoſing. Examples he had in the Reigns of King Edward his Brother, and Henry VI. not long before that in the time of Richard II. and his Grandfather Edward II. more anciently the Extream Troubles and Diſtreſs of King John, and Henry III. all by the Barons, being dreadful Warnings and inſolent Monuments of their Haughtineſs and 1483. Levity; and this was Alta mente repoſtum with the Wiſe Prince.

But the Duke of Buckingham, thinking the Protector ſet too ſlight a Conſideration upon ſo Great a Concernment, and the Affection tender'd by himſelf and the Nobility (and overhearing ſomething he privately ſpake to the Lord Mayor and Recorder, tending to his miſlike) for an Epilogue or Cloſe to his former Oration, he thus freely adds.

The bold and round Concluſion of the Duke of Buckingh.

" SIR, I muſt now, by the Priviledge of this " Employment, and in the Behalf of thoſe " and my Country, add ſo much Freedom unto " my Duty, as to tell your Grace, It is immoveably reſolv'd by the Barons and People, That " the Children of King Edward ſhall not Reign " over them. Your Grace hath heard ſome " Cauſes; nor need I intimate, how theſe E- " ſtates have entred and proceeded ſo offenſively " to other Men, and ſo dangerouſly to themſelves, as is now too late to recal or retire. " And therefore, they have fixt this Election " upon you, whom they think moſt able and " careful for their Safety: But, if neither the " General Good, the Earneſt Petitions of the " Nobility and Commonalty, can move you, " we moſt humbly deſire your Anſwer and " Leave to Elect ſome other that may be worthy " of the Imperial Charge; in which (we hope) " we ſhall not incur your Diſpleaſure, conſidering the Deſperate Neceſſity of our Welfare " and Kingdom urges it. And this is our laſt " Suit and Petition to your Grace.

The Protector touch'd by this round and braving Farewel, which made him very ſenſible: For (as Sir Thomas Moor diſertly confeſſeth) the Protector was ſo much moved with theſe Words, that otherwiſe of likelihood he wou'd never have inclined to their Suit: And ſaith, That when he ſaw there was no remedy, but that he muſt either at that Inſtant take the Crown, or both he and his Heirs irrecoverably let it paſs to another; peradventure, one that might prove an Enemy to him and his, eſpecially if Richmond ſtept in; betwixt whom and this Prince, the Hatred was equally extream: Therefore it behoved the Protector to collect himſelf; and fixing his Conſideration upon the effect of that Neceſſity they laſt urged, gave this Reply:

The Protector's Reply to the Duke's laſt Suit.

" MY moſt Noble good Lords, and moſt " loving and faithful Friends, the better " ſenſe of your Loves and moſt Eminent Inconveniences inſinuated by your Noble Speaker, " hath made me more ſerious to apprehend the " Benefit of your Proffer and Election. And " I muſt confeſs, in the Meditation thereof, I " find an Alteration in my ſelf, not without " ſome Diſtraction when I conſider all the Realm " ſo bent againſt the Sons of King Edward. And " therefore being certain, there is no Man to " whom the Crown by Juſt Title can be ſo due " as to our ſelf, the rightful Son and Heir of " our moſt Dear and Princely Father, Richard " Duke of York: to which Title of Blood and " Nature, your Favours have joyn'd this of E- " lection, wherein we hold our ſelf to be moſt " ſtrong and ſafe: And having the lawful " Power of both, why ſhou'd I endure my pro- " ſeſs'd Enemy to Uſurp my Right, and become " a Vaſſal to my Envious Subject? The neceſſi- " ty of theſe Cauſes (as admitting no other " Remedy) urges me to accept your Offer; and " according to your Requeſt, and our own Right, " we here aſſume the Regal Preheminence of the " Two Kingdoms, England and France, from this " Day forward, by us and our Heirs, to Govern " and Defend the one, and by God's Grace and " your Good Aids, to Recover and Eſtabliſh the " other to the ancient Allegiance of England; " deſiring of God to live no longer than we in- " tend and endeavour the Advancement and " flouriſhing Eſtate of this Kingdom. 1483.

At which they all cry'd, God ſave King Richard: And thus he became King. But yet his Detractors ſtick not to Slander and Accuſe all that was ſaid or done in theſe Proceedings of State for mere Diſſimulation; by which Juſtice, they may as well cenſure (At ſit Reverentiâ dictum) all the Barons, worthy and Grave Commons, which had their Votes therein, which wou'd fall a moſt impudent and intolerable Scandal upon all the High Court of Parliament; for in ſhort time after, all that was alledg'd and acted in that Treaty and Colloquy was approved and ratified by the Court of Parliament, ſo that their Cavils only diſcover an Extream Malice and Envy. For it was not poſſible, therefore not credible, he cou'd upon ſuch an inſtant (as it were) by any Practice, attain to that Power and Credit, with all the Barons Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, to procure and perſwade them from the Sons of King Edward, ſo unanimouſly to become his Subjects, and put the Crown upon his Head with ſuch Solemnity and Publick Ceremonies. Whilſt theſe Matters had their current, the Northern Gentlemen and his Southern Friends joyn'd in a Bill Supplicatory to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, earneſtly expreſſing their Deſires for the Election of the Lord Protector, with the former Cauſes urg'd: Alſo That the Blood of the Young Earl of Warwick was Attainted, and his Title Confiſcate by Act of Parliament. This Bill was deliver'd to the Lords, aſſembled in the Great Hall at Weſtminſter, the Lord Protector ſitting in the Chair of Marble amongſt them, upon the 26th of June, ſome Six or Seven Days after he was Proclaim'd: The Tenour of the Bill was thus written in the Chronicle of the Abbey of Croyland: Lib. Abb. Croyland.

PRrotector eodem die, quo Regimen ſub Titulo Regii Nominis ſibi vendicavit (viz) 26° die Junii, anno Dom. 1483. ſe apud Magnam Aulam Weſtmonaſterii in Cathedram Marmoream Immiſit & tum mox omnibus proceribus tam Laicis quam Eccleſiaſticis & Cæteris aſſidentibus, aſtantibus &c. oſtendebatur rotulus quidam, in quo per modum ſupplicationis in nomine procerum & Populi Borealis exhibita ſunt, Primum, quod Filii Regis Edwardi erant Baſtardi, ſupponendo, illum præcontraxiſſe matrimonium cum quadam Domina Elianora Boteler, antequam Reginam Elizabetham duxiſſet in Uxorem: Deinde quod Sanguis alterius Fratris (Georgii Scil. Clarenſiæ Ducis) fuiſſet Attinctus. Ita quod nullus certus incorruptus Sanguis Linealis ex parte Richardi Ducis Eboraci poterat inveniri, niſi in Perſona Richardi Protectoris, Ducis Gloceſtriæ, & jam eidem Duci ſuplicabant, ut jus ſuum in Regno Angliæ ſibi aſſumeret & Coronam acciperet.

In Engliſh thus:

" THE Protector, that ſame Day, wherein he " took upon him the Government, under " the Royal Name and Title, being the 26th " of June 1483. ſeated himſelf in the Marble " Chair in the Great Hall of Weſtminſter; after " which, all the Lords, as well Temporal as " Spiritual, and others ſitting, or ſtanding by, " &c. a certain Writing was produc'd, wherein, 1483. "by way of Humble Petition, in the Name of "the Gentry and Northern People, was repre- "sented, First, That the Sons of King Edward "were Bastards upon account of his having entred "before into a Contract of Marriage with the La- "dy Eleanor Boteler, before his Marriage with "Queen Elizabeth: And next, That the Blood "of the other Brother, George Duke of Clarence, "was Attainted. Insomuch, that none being "to be found that was undoubtedly of a Law- "ful and Lineal Descent from Richard Duke of "York, besides Richard the Protector, Duke of "Gloucester, they therefore Humbly Petition'd "the said Duke to take to himself his Right "unto the Kingdom of England, and to Ac- "cept of the Crown.

" by

But the Barons were all accorded before this Bill came, (b) both Sides moving with an equal and contented forwardness; and in July next following 1483. was Crown'd and Receiv'd with as general Magnificence and Acclamations, as any King in England many Years before. For as a Grave Man writeth, (i) Fuit dignissimus Regno, &c. non inter malos sed bonos principes Commemorandus; That he was most worthy to Reign, and to be numbred amongst the Good, not Bad Princes. The Queen his Wife was Crown'd with him, and with no less State and Greatness, Accompanied him from the Tower to Westminster; having in their Train (besides the Nobility of the South Parts) Four Thousand Gentlemen of the North (k). Upon the 19th of June 1483. in the 25th Year of Lewis the French King, he was named King of England, the Morrow Proclaim'd and Rode with Great Solemnity from London to Westminster, where in the Seat Royal, he gave the Judges of the Land a Strict and Religious Charge for the Just Executing of the Laws; then departed towards the Abbey, being met at the Church Door with Procession, and the Scepter of King Edward deliver'd to him by the Abbot; so ascended to St. Edward's Shrine, where he offer'd; the Monks in the mean time singing Te Deum: From thence he return'd to the Palace, where he Lodg'd until his Coronation.

Cambden.

Upon the 4th of July he went to the Tower by Water with the Queen his Wife, and the next Day * Created Edward his only Son, (about Ten Years old) Prince of Wales: † He Invested Sir John Howard, (who was made Lord Howard and Knight of the Garter, 17 Edw. IV.) in the Dukedom of Norfolk, in a favourable Admission of the Right of the Lady Margaret his Mother, Daughter of Sir Thomas Mowbray, D. of Norfolk, and an Heir General of the Mowbrays, Dukes of Norfolk and Earls of Surrey, descended from the Lord Thomas Plantagenet of Brotherton, a Younger Son of King Edward I. and Earl of Norfolk. This King also made him Marshal and Admiral of England; he was as rightfully Lord Mowbray, Lord Segrave, Lord Bruce, as Lord Howard, as I have seen him stiled by Royal Warrant in a Commission for Treaty of Truce with Scotland.

Monstrelet, Comines, Anglici Scriptores.

1483. Stile of the Duke of Norf. Introcuit in Domo convers.

His Eldest Son, Sir Thomas Howard, was at the same time Created Earl of Surrey, and made Knight of the Garter; Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, was made Constable of England for term of Life, but he claim'd the Office by Inheritance.

Sir Thomas Moor writes, That Sir Thomas Howard executed the Office of Constable that Day; William Lord Berkley was Created Earl of Nottingham, Francis Lovel Viscount Lovel, and Chamberlain to the King; the Lord Stanley restor'd to Liberty and made Steward of the Houshold (l), Thomas Rotheram, Chancellor and Archbishop of Canterbury, having been committed for delivering the Great Seal to the Queen Widow, receiv'd to Grace, and many Knights Addubb'd of the Old Order, and some of the New, or Habit of the Bath, whose Names I have set down, to shew what regard was had of their Family, and in those Times accused of so much Malignity.

Sir Edmund De la Pool, Son to the Duke of Suffolk.
George Gray, Son to the Earl of Kent.
William Zouch, Son to the Lord Zouch.
Henry Nevil, Son to the Lord Abergaveny.

Christopher Willoughby.	Thomas Arundel.
Henry Babington.	Gervoise of Clifton.
Henry Bainton.	Edmund Beddingfield.
Thomas Bullen.	Thomas Leukenor.
William Say.	John Browne.
William Enderby.	William Berkley.
Thomas of Vernon	i. another William
William Barkley.	Berkley.

The 5th Day of July he Rode from the Tower through the City in Pomp, with his Son the Prince of Wales, Three Dukes, and Nine Earls, Twenty Two Viscounts and Simple Barons, Eighty Knights, Esquires and Gentlemen not to be number'd; besides Great Officers of the Crown which had Special Service to do. But the Duke of Buckingham carried the Splendour

His Coronation.

(b) The Barons and Commons were so far from Choosing him, that they were afraid he wou'd not Crown his Nephew. This part of his History is all wrong. Vid Sir Thomas Moor's Hist. of Edward V. and Richard III.

(i) Compare this Quotation out of Cambden with what that Author says of King Richard in his Brit. sub Tit. Leicestershire; speaking of Bosworth, Here Henry Earl of Richmond encounter'd King Richard III. who had by most Wicked Means Usurp'd the Kingdom: He overcame and slew the Usurper, and freed England by his Valour from the Rule of a Tyrant. Besides, he does not tell us where Cambden speaks so well of him.

(k) These Four thousand Gentlemen of the North, were (as Hall and Grafton relate it) 5000 Fellows evil apparel'd and worse harnest, whom he sent for out of the North. They were mustred in Finsbury, and were the Contempt of the Beholders.

* His Creation was not before September following, at York; as appears afterwards by the Chronicle of Croyland, and the Notes there. J. S.

† This Title this young Prince enjoy'd but a small time: For as he was Created about the 8th of Septemb. he was dead before the 21st of July the next Year, as may be collected from a Warrant of K. Richard to Nicholas Leventhorp, Receiver of the Dutchy of Lancaster, order'd thereby to pay to John Dawney, late Treasurer of Pomfret 139*l.* 10 s. due to him for divers Provisions and Emptions by him made for the Expence (as the Warrant ran) of our most Dear Son, whom God pardon. Which last Words bespeak him now dead. This bare Date July the 21. Anno 2do. But before his Death, the King his Father heaped up all the Honour he cou'd upon him: He made the Lord Prime, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for Three Years; confirm'd his Title of Earl of Sarum anew to him; constituted Great Officers in his Houshold, whereof I find William Herbert was his Secretary, for which he had XL Mark assign'd him for his Salary yearly out of the Honour of Pomfret, J. S.

He was (if we may give credit to the King his Father's Patents to Create him Prince of Wales) of great hopes for his Excellent Parts and Disposition. The Words are, Cujus optima indoles, ac praclarae, quibus pro suae aetatis Modulo singulariter praeditus est, naturae Dotes ingentem atq; favente Deo, indubitatam probitatis spem nobis portendunt. i. e. Whose Excellent Wit and Remarkable Endowments of Nature, wherewith, his Young Age consider'd, he is singularly furnish'd, do portend to us great and undoubted hopes by the favour of God, that he will make a Good Man. K. Rich Journal penes me. J. S.

